[D] Chrysippus, a famous Physician, born at Cnidus.] Pliny spoke of him as of a Man, who had made great Innovations in Physic: 'Horum placita, says he (19), Chrysippus ingenti garrulitate mutavit, plurimumque & ex Chrysippo discipulus ejus Erasistratus, Aristotelis filia genitus. — Chrysippus, a greater Talker, deviated from their Opinions; and Erasistratus, his Disciple, Son of a Daughter of Aristotle, varied greatly from Chrysippus. Let us observe the two Qualities, which are here ascribed to Erasistratus. The first is That of Chrysippus's Disciple; the second That of the Son of Aristotle's Daughter. This does not agree with what we read in Sextus Empiricus (20), that Pythias, Aristotle's Daughter, was married three times. I. To Nicanor; II. To Procles, by whom she had two Sons, who studied Philosophy under Theophrastus; III. To the Physician Metrodorus, who had been a Disciple of Chrysippus the Cnidian, and who taught Erasistratus. From this third Marriage proceeded a Son, who was named Aristotle. Perhaps Erasistratus was adopted by Metrodorus, and by Pythias (21); and, if it be so, Pliny would be only guilty of having not properly used the Word genitus. We see, in Diogenes Laërtius, that Erasistratus acknowledged he had learned many Things of this Chrysippus (22); but the Expression being equivocal, it cannot be determined, whether he had learned those Things by Word of Mouth, or by Reading. Galen looks upon Chrysippus, the Cnidian, as Erasistratus's Master, and as the chief of those, who disapproved Bleeding (23). Father Hardouin observes, that This Chrysippus composed a Treatise de Brassica, and a whole Work περὶ λαγνῶν, de Oleribus. He (24) cites Pliny and Diogenes Laërtius, concerning the first of these two Things, and the Scholiast upon Nicanor (25) concerning the second. But Camerarius, in the Catalogue of the Authors de Re Rustica, which he added to his Treatise de Re Rustica, printed at Nuremberg, 1595, in 12mo, ascribes the Book de Brassica to one Chrysippus, a Disciple of Erasistratus. See Jonfius, who mentions nineteen Chrysippus's, but without pretending that they are all distinct (26). His Collections are good and curious. The Author of the Treatise, de Brassica, pretended, that Cabbages were a Remedy for all Diseases. Chrysippus medicus peculiarem brassicæ librum dicavit, omnium morborum ex ea remedia continentem (27). We must not forget, that Chrysippus, the Cnidian, was the Father of another Chrysippus, who was King Ptolemy's Physician, and who, being oppressed by Calurnny, was whipped, and punished with Death (28). Lastly, let us observe, that Moreri was in the wrong to say, That it is not well known in what Time Chrysippus, the Cnidian, lived. It is easy to infer, that he lived in the Time of Alexander the Great, and of the first Ptolemy.

(16) Σαμνέτα-τος συγγρα-φεύς dicitur apud Athenæum xiv. 16. Jonfius de Script. Hist. Phil. pag. 157.

(17) Rem. [E], of the Article CATIUS.

(18) Athen. lib. 14, cap. 15, pag. 648.

(19) Plin. lib. 29, cap. 1, pag. m. 663.

(20) Sext. Empiricus advers. Mathemat. cap. 12, pag. 51.

(21) See Father Hardouin upon that Passage of Pliny.

(22) Diog. Laërt. 1, 7, n. 186.

(23) Galen de Venæ Sect. contra Erasistrat. cap. 2, 7, item alibi.

(24) Hard. in Indice Autor. Plin. pag. 104.

(25) Ad Theophrast. pag. 39.

(26) Jonfius de Hist. Script. Phil. pag. 157.

(27) Plinius Valerianus, de Re medica, lib. 4, cap. 29. See also Pliny, lib. 20, cap. 9.

(28) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra.

CHRYSIPPUS, a Stoic Philosopher, was of Soli a Town of Cilicia (a). Some say, that he was a Disciple of Zeno (b); it is more certainly known, that he studied under Cleanthes, Zeno's Successor (c); but, as he had a very subtle Wit [A], and a great Talent at Reasoning, he departed from the Doctrine of those two great

(a) Valerius Maximus, lib. 1, cap. 7, n. 11, ext. Jonfius, ibid. Cleanthes was Chrysippus's Disciple: he is grossly mistaken.

[A] He had a very subtle Wit.] Let us see what Seneca said of him; but, to understand his Thought the better, let us remember that he had just before censured several trifling Things, advanced by the Ancients, concerning the Three Graces; and then he adds (1); 'Chrysippus quoque, penes quem subtile illud acumen est, & in imam penetrans veritatem, qui rei agendæ causa loquitur, & verbis non ultra, quam ad intellectum fati est, utitur, totum librum suum his ineptiis replet: ita ut de ratione dandi, accipiendi, reddendique beneficii pauca admodum dicat: nec his fabulas, sed hæc

(1) Seneca de Benefic. lib. 7, cap. 3, pag. m. 6.

(d) Diog. Laërt.
ubi supra.

great Philosophers, and opposed them in many Points (d). He wrote many Books: they are reckoned above 705; among which were many that concerned Logic [B]; for he applied himself zealously to cultivate and refine That part of the System. Such a great number of Compositures will not be so much wondered at, when it is known, that he wrote several times on the same Subject; that he made use of any thing that came in his Way; that he cared but little to correct his Works [C]; that hæc fabulis inferit. — Chryſippus likewiſe, coarſe Wit is ſubtle, and penetrating to the very bottom of Truth, who ſpeaks to the purpoſe, and uſes Words no farther than to be underſtood, fills his whole Book with theſe Trifles: to inform that he ſays but little of the manner of conſerring, receiving, and returning a Kindneſs: nor does he intermix Fables with Theſe, but Theſe with Fables. And, fearing to be blamed for having cenſured ſuch a Philoſopher, he makes uſe of theſe Words in his own Vindication:

 Tu modo nos tuere, ſi quis mihi obijciat, quod Chryſippum in ordinem coegerim, magnum mehercule virum, fed tamen Græcum, cujus acumen nimis tenue retunditur, & in ſe sæpe replicatur:
 etiam cum agere aliquid videtur, pungit, non perforat. Hoc vero quod acumen eſt? — Ad hanc honeſtiſſimam contentione, beneficii beneficia vincendi, ſic nos adhortatur Chryſippus, ut dicat verendum eſt, ne quia Charies Jovis filius tuus, parum ſe gratè gerere, ſacrilegium ſit, & tam bellis puellis fiat injuria. Tu me aliquid eorum doce, per quæ beneficior, gratiorque adverſus bene merentes ſiam, per quæ obligantur, obligatorumque animi certent, ut qui præſtitent, oblivifcantur, peritæſque ſit memoria debentium.
 Itæ vero ineptiæ poetis relinquuntur: quibus aures oblectare propoſitum eſt, & dulcem fabulam ne-ſcere. At qui ingenia fanare, & fidem in rebus humanis retinere, memoriam officiorum ingerere, animis voluti, ſerio loquantur, & magnis viribus agant: niſi forte exitiſſimas, levi ac fabuloſo fermone, & anilibus argumentis, prohiberi poſſe merpueruloſiſſimam, beneficiorum novas tabulas (2).

— I on desire you would stand by me, if any one shall object to me, that I endeavour to bumble Chryippus; a Great Man indeed, but a Grecian, whose Edge, too fine, is blunted, and often bent back on himself: even when he seems to be doing something, he only pricks, but does not perforate. But what kind of Edge is This? — Chryippus, when he would exhort us to this virtuous Contentment, to wit, of conquering Kindness by Kindness, tells us, it is to be feared, since the Graces are the Daughters of Jupiter, least Ingratitude should be Sacrilege, and an Injury to such fine Ladies. Instruct me in those Points, by which I may become more beneficent and grateful towards those who deserve well of me, and which excite an Emulation between the Obliging and Obligated, so that They, who confer Benefits, forget them, They, who are indebted for them, constantly remember them. Leave these Trifles to the Poets; whose Design is to please the Ear, and to work up an entertaining Fable. But let Those, who would better our Minds, keep us to the Practice of Honesty, and put us in mind of our Duty, speak seriously, and act with great Force: unless perhaps you think, that a general Discharge for Benefits received, a most pernicious thing, can be prohibited by a light and fabulous Discourse, and old Wives Arguments. Nothing can be more judicious than This Criticism of Seneca: he did very well to shew the Ridiculousness of those Poetical Reasons, set forth in a Work, relating to some of the principal Duties of civil Life. However, he was so equitable as to discover, in his Censure, one of the finest Strokes of Chryippus's Character, which was his Subtlety. We shall see the Epithets Cicero made Choice of in speaking of This Philosopher: ‘Chryippus, qui Stoicorum somniorum valerrimus habetur interpres, magnum turbam congregat ignotorum Deorum, atque ita ignotorum, ut eos ne conjectura quidem informare possimus, cum mens nostra quidvis videatur cogitatione posse deprinare’ (1.)

Chrysippus, the most artful Interpreter of the Dreams of the Stoics, collect together a vast Crowd of unknown Gods, and so unknown, that the Mind, which seems capable of representing any thing to itself in Thought, can attain to no

Idea of them, even in conjecture. 'Chrysippus quidem, quamquam eff accerrimo ingenio, tamen ea dicit, ut ea ab ipsa natura didicisse, non ut ipse reperire videatur (4). ---- Chrysippus, tho' (4) Id. ibid. lib. 2, cap. 6.
of the acutest Wit, says such things, as seem to be, not the result of Enquiry, but the Dictates of meer Nature. 'Et Chrysippus tibi acute dicere videbatur, homo sine dubio versutus & callidus. Versutus eos appello quorum celeriter mens versatur: callidos autem quorum tanquam manus opere, sic animus usu concalluit (5). ---- You thought Chrysippus argued very subtilly, a Man, no doubt, of great Quickness and Craft. I call those Quick, whose Minds turn about with great Celerity, and Those Crafty, whose Minds are grown callous thro' use, as their Hands thro' any Work or Craft.' Chrysippus's Application to Logic, which I am going to mention, is a very strong Proof of his Subtily.

[B] He wrote many Books - - - among which were several that concerned Logic.' Diogenes Laërtius makes them amount to the Number of Three hundred and eleven (6). Which makes me find some Obscurity in what Valerius Maximus says, that This Philosopher began his Thirty ninth Treatise of Logic at eighty Years of Age. ' Citeriores ætatis mætas, sed non parvi tamen spatii Chrysippi vivacitas flexit: nam octogesimo anno ætatum, undequadragiesimum λογικῶν exactissimæ subtilitatis volumen reliquit. Cujus studium in tradendis ingenii sui monumentis tantum operæ laborique fuit: ut ad ea quæ scripsit penitus cognoscenda longa vita sit opus (7). - - - Chrysippus retained the Springliness of his Genius to extreme old Age; for he left behind him the Thirty ninth Treatise of Logic, a Work of the greatest Subtlety, which he began in the eightieth Year of his Age. Whose Industry and Labour in delivering down the Monuments of his Wit was so great, that it requires a long Life to be acquainted with all his Writings.' There are some Examples, which shew, that Authors do not publish every Part of a Work according to it's Order. We know, that Julius Cæsar Scaliger published the fifteenth Book of his Exotericæ Exercitationes, without the fourteen that should have preceded it, and which, if I am not mistaken, have never appeared. You will find such an ther Example in the Article MORISON. One might therefore think, that Corysippus, having divided a Work of Logic into many Treatises, skipped the Thirty ninth, and referred it to another time (8), and wrote it only in the eightieth Year of his Life. Perhaps, it may be supposed, that all his Works of Logic were so divided, that the Thirty ninth Book was almost the last. By this means we might reconcile Valerius Maximus with Diogenes Laërtius. Note, that Moxer mistakes prodigiously here. Valerius Maximus, says he, relates, that he finished a Treatise of Logic at Four-score Years of Age, which he had begun at Forty. Mr Menage committed the same Fault (9). Lucian did not fail to jest upon the Dialectical Subtilities of This Philosopher (10). For the rest, he makes him live Eighty one Years (11); which confirms the Testimony of Valerius Maximus, concerning Corysippus's long Life; and therefore I did not think I ought to depend on Diogenes Laërtius, who makes him die at the Age of Seventy three Years (12).

[C] He cared but little to correct his Works.] I pretend to say this after Diogenes Laërtius, tho' the quite contrary is to be seen in the Editions of That Author. Ἐπιλύνει δὲ αὐτὸ, πολλὰκις ὕπερ τῆ αὐτῆς δόγματι ἐπιχειροῖ, καὶ πάν το ὑποσέτον γραφῶν καὶ διορθούμενων πλεονακίαι. Πάσις τις τῶν μαρτυρίων παρὰ διότι χρησόμενος. As vero tam multa conscripsit, quod da-cendæ re sæpe scribere aggrederetur, omneque quod incideret mandaret literis, ac sæpe emendaret, magis

(2) Id. ibid. cap.
5, pag. 9. Confer quæ Plutar-chus de audien-dis Poëtis, pag.
31. E.

(3) Cicero de
Natura Deor. lib.
I, cap. 15.

(4) Id. ibid. lib.
2, cap. 6.

(5) Id. ibid. lib.
3, cap. 10, in the second Book de finibus, cap. 14,
he calls him homo
acutus & diligens.

(6) Diog. La-ërt, lib. 7. n. 198.
pag. m. 485.

(7) Val. Maximus, lib. 8, cap. 7. num. 10. de Stud. & Industr.

(8) Diog. Laërt.
lib. 8, n. 198,
observes that the Work περὶ τῶν καταλεγομένων ζητημάτων, contained 39 books.

(9) Menag. in Laërt. lib. 7, n.
189.

(10) Lucian. in Vitar. Auctione, pag. 374, & seq. Tom. I. See also his Icaromenippus, pag. 295.

(11) Id. in Macrobiis, pag. 641, Tom. II.

(12) Diog. La-
ert. lib. 7, a.
184.

(e) Id. ibid. n.
180.

(f) Id. ibid.

he was full of Quotations (e); that he was, besides, very laborious (f); and that he lived to above the Age of Fourcore Years (g). He was of a very small Stature (b), but his Presumption was very great [D]. He associated himself for some time with the Academic Philosophers, and reasoned, after their manner, Pro and Con (i). Nevertheless, he is looked upon as a true Stoic, and even as one of the most illustrious Ornaments, and the most zealous and able Defenders, of That Sect (k). Scioppius has abused him very much [E], and this in a Work, wherein

(g) See Remark [B], Citat. (c).

(b) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, n. 183.

(i) Id. ibid. n. 184.

(k) See Remark [L].

(13) Id. ibid. n.
180.

naque testimoniorum nube uteretur (13). You see a very bad Reasoning in this Passage; for it imports, that the reason, why Chrysippus wrote so many Books, was, that he wrote often on the same Subject; that he made use of all that came into his Hands; that he often corrected his Works; and that he cited many Witnesses. Here are four Reasons: the first, the second, and the fourth are very good; but the third is good for nothing, and even contrary to the Author's Design; for the Trouble of revising a Work often, and polishing it from time to time, is the fittest Thing in the World to hinder a Writer from giving many Books to the Public. But, if he writes down whatever comes into his Mind, and every thing that he finds in other Writings, and if he corrects his Works but little, he may overflow the Republic of Letters with his Writings: and therefore I believe Diogenes Laërtius said, That, most commonly, our Chrysippus did not correct his Performances. I believe the Transcribers have forgot the privative Alpha in the Word διόρθωσεν (14). That, which confirms me in my Conjecture, is, that Diogenes Laërtius observes, in another Place, That Chrysippus, having a mind to publish as many Books as Epicurus, used frequent Repetitions, and published all that offered itself to him, without correcting it: he did not read his Writings over again; he made too much haste, and was full of Citations (15).

(14) Or perhaps διόρθωσεν.

(15) Diog. Laërt.
lib. 10. pag. 724.
Edit. Genev.
1616.

(16) The Amster- dam Edit. 1602.
has here τῶ μὴ ἐπιλαβῆναι καὶ
ἀδιόρθωτα, &c.
Eo quod non relegeret, & in-mendata adjunxit, eo quod festinaret.

Εἰ γὰρ τι γράψαι ὁ Ἐπικύρου, οἰκονομῶν τὸ σῶτον γράψαι ὁ Χρύσιππος. καὶ διὰ τὸ τοιοῦτον πολλὰς ταῦτα γράφει καὶ τὸ ἐπελθὼν καὶ ἀδιόρθωτον (16) εἰλε τὸ ἐπεργασθαι, καὶ τὰ βιβλία. Nam siquid Epicurus scriberet, tantum scribere & Chrysippus contendebat. Atque ideo saepius eadem scripsit. Unde & tumultuarie scribere ac parum emendatū illi ex festinatione contingebat, totque testimonia inserit, ut ex iis illi libri pleni esse videntur. It is plain, that the Historian meant the same thing in these two Places, and therefore the one must be corrected by the other. The great Desire of publishing many Books did not only engage our Philosopher to cite much, and to repeat, but also to contradict himself; for sometimes he copied, and sometimes he refuted himself (17). None of his Works are extant: we have only the Titles of them; and, besides, it is thought, that we have lost part of the Passage, wherein Diogenes Laërtius had mentioned them. It is Jonstius's Opinion. See his Treatise de Scriptoris Historiae Philosophicae (18), where he endeavours to repair, in some manner, the Loss of That Place. Note, That Chrysippus never dedicated any thing to any King (19). Some will have it to be a Sign of his proud and contemptuous Humour, and add, That he refused to go to Ptolemy, who had desired Cleanthes either to come to him, or to send him some of his Disciples (20); but Chrysippus is so far from being to be blamed for either of those two Things, that, on the contrary, he deserves to be praised for it: Nothing was more worthy of a Philosopher, than to act in that manner. We are going to give better Proofs of his Pride.

[D] His Presumption was very great. He said often to his Professor, It is sufficient to shew me the Doctrines; I want no more; I shall find the Proofs myself (21). A Person asked him, one day, To whom shall I recommend my Son? To Me, answered he; for if I knew any one that exceeded me, I would go myself and philosophize under him (22).

(21) Id. ibid. n.
179.

(22) Id. ibid. n.
183.

(23) Scioppius
Element. Philo-soph. Stoicæ moralis, fol. 165.
versio.

[E] Scioppius abused him much. He looks upon him as the Head of those Stoics, who had dishonoured the Sect, by making an ill use of their Wit, and running after vain Subtilties, that were only fit to expose the Gravity of the Stoics to laughter. Neque tamen, says he (23), defendere ac negare velim fuisse Stoicorum non paucos, qui specie ingenii illecti, inanibus argutiis ludibria quadam excitando, dignitatem severissimæ & gravissimæ rationis in contemptum adduxerint: quorum Princeps jure dici possit Chrysippus, qui cum esset magna quadam ingenii vi præditus, mireque ad quidvis excogitandum celer & acutus, nihil æque solebat laborare quàm ut non reliquarum tantum sectarum inventoribus contradiceret, sed à Magistris etiam suis Zenone & Cleanthe perisque in rebus dissideret. — Nor will I deny, that there were not a few Stoics, who, seduced by an appearance of Wit, wrote in a ludicrous manner, and thereby brought Contempt on the Dignity of severe and weighty Reasoning: the chief of whom we may justly say was Chrysippus; who, having a great Strength of Genius, and a wonderful Quickness of Thought, took the greatest pains, not only to contradict the Founders of other Sects, but even to dissent, in most things, from his Masters, Zeno and Cleanthes. His Pride, adds he, moved him to dispute pro and con on most Subjects, and to write much, out of Envy to Epicurus, who had written more Books than any other Philosopher; but he could never equal That Competitor: He often repeated the same Things, and said many more that refuted each other (24). Wherefore Plutarch had some reason to attack This Stoic particularly, and to curb his Temerity and Audaciousness. This is what happens, continues Scioppius, when a Man thinks more on Victory, than on the Truth, in a Dispute. Sed solet hoc fieri, quoties victoria majorem, qui disputant, quam Veritatis rationem ducunt, verumque est illud poetæ:

(24) Sæpe enim scripsit eadem, saepius sibi contraria ac repugnantia. Id. ibid. fol. 166.

Nimium altercando veritas amittitur.

Quod Carneadi quoque evenisse Cicero testatur, ut odio scilicet Stoicorum in constituendo bonorum fine, plurimum à reliquorum Academicorum, suaque ipsius sententia discederet (25). — And that of the Poet is true;

(25) Id. ibid. fol. 166. versio.]

In too much wrangling Truth is often lost.

Which, Cicero tells us, happened likewise to Carneades, who, through dislike of the Stoics in adjusting the Bounds of Good, departed greatly from the rest of the Academics, and even from his own Opinion. It cannot be denied, that these Reflexions of Scioppius are judicious. It is a very great Misfortune for a Sect to have a Writer for their Apologist, who has a vast, quick, ready, and proud Wit, and who does not only aspire to the Glory of a fine, but also of a fruitful Pen. The main and only Aim of such a Writer is to confute any Adversary whatsoever, whom he undertakes to oppose; and, as he labours more for his own Reputation, than for the Interest of the Cause, he attends chiefly to the particular Thoughts, which his Imagination suggests to him. He regards but little whether they are agreeable to the Principles of his Party, or not; he is well enough pleased, if they serve to elude an Objection, or to tire out his Adversaries. Dazzled with his Inventions, he does not see the wrong side of them; he does not foresee the Advantages, which the same Enemies, or another kind of Antagonists, will draw from them. He is only for a present Advantage, and does not trouble himself with Things to come. Moreover, heaping Book upon Book, sometimes, against one Sect, and sometimes against another, he cannot avoid contradicting himself; he cannot argue coherently. By this means he betrays the Interests of his Party, and, by striving to run from one Extrem, he falls into another, and successively into both. The Saying of an ancient Poet, alledged by Scioppius, That we lose the Truth by disputing too much, will make several People believe, wherein he extolls, as much as he can, the Opinions of the Stoics. He uses him so, because he considers him as proud even to contradiction, and having done much Injury to the whole Party, by his extravagant and audacious Conduct. The Stoics complained, that Chrysippus had collected so many Arguments for the Hypothesis of the Academic Philosophers, that he could not confute them afterwards [F]; which supplied their Antagonist Carneades with Weapons. This seems to shew that he acted honestly, and that he was not willing to obtain a Victory by the trick of representing weakly the Reasons of the other Party. But then, if it be considered, that he disapproved those, who took as much care to improve the Arguments of their Antagonists, as their own, one might think, that there was more Vanity, than fair dealing, in his Conduct: however, he might have been reproached with this, that his Counsels and his Actions did not agree together [G]. The Stoics might have complained more justly still of the Temerity, wherewith

(26) In his second Epistle.

(27) In Fable 9, of Part IV, Book 3, pag. m. 44.

(28) In Remark [E].

(29) Cicero Academicus, Quest. lib. 4, cap. 27.

(30) Plutarchus de Repugnant. Stoicorum, pag. 1036, according to the Version of Amiot.

lieve, that the Disputes of Philosophers resemble That about the Oyster, which Mr Boileau (26), and Mr de la Fontaine (27), have so well described. But there is a great Difference to be observed; for, if the Oyster, that was contended for, was not adjudged to either of the contending Parties, it was at least the Share of a third Person: The Disputes of Philosophers have another Effect; They make both the Spectators of the Combat, and the Combatants, lose the Truth: no body lays, or can lay, hold of it, in the Sequelstration it is left in during the Process. I shall dwell a little more on this Subject, in one of the Remarks of the Article EUCLID (28).

[F] The Stoics complained that Chrysippus had collected so many Arguments for the Hypothesis of the Academic Philosophers ----- that he could not refute them afterwards.] The Words I am going to set down are very remarkable. Cicero introduces an Academic Philosopher, who speaks thus: 'De quibus volumina impleta sunt non à nostris solum, sed etiam à Chrysippo, de quo queri solent Stoici, dum studiose omnia conquirit, contra sensus & perspicuitatem, contraque omnem consuetudinem, contraque rationem, ipsum sibi respondentem inferiorem fuisse: itaque ab eo armatum esse Carneadem (29). ----- With which whole Volumes have been filled, not only by our own Writers, but even by Chrysippus; concerning whom the Stoics are wont to complain, that, while he is industrious in collecting Arguments, against the Senses, and Perspicuity, and against all Custom and Reason, he falls short in answering himself; therefore that he furnished Carneades with Arms.' Plutarch enlarged much upon this: 'He says, that Chrysippus has not only sometimes, but often and in several places, confirmed and corroborated Opinions, which are contrary to his own Opinion, and That strenuously, and with so much Earnestness and Contention that it was not for every one to understand what he most approved: they themselves, who admire the Man's Acuteness, affirm it, and think that Carneades said nothing of his own, but, laying hold of those Arguments, which Chrysippus alledged for the contrary Opinion, turned them against him. He often cried out, to him, while disputing, in the Words of Homer,

Wretch! thy own Strength will thee undo ----

'As if he had given great Advantages, against himself, to those, who would overthrow or calumniate his Doctrine. But as to those things he has advanced against Custom, they are so proud of, and set such a value on them, that they fear not to affirm, that all the Sayings of all the Academics together, if they were collected into one Body, are not comparable to what Chrysippus has written in disparagement of the Senes: which is an evident Sign of the Ignorance or Self-love of the Speakers. But this indeed is true, that, being afterwards desirous to defend Custom and the Senses, he was inferior to himself; and the latter Treatise was much weaker than the former. So that he contradicts himself, &c (30).'

Note, by the way, a Mistake of Amiot: these words, he often cried out to him aloud in disputing, too plainly insinuate, that Chrysippus and Car-neades often disputed between themselves personally.

Now this is not true (31): Chrysippus was dead, before the other was capable of opposing him. The Greek of Plutarch, καὶ πολλὰς παρεχόμενος, Δαίμονι φησὶν ὅτι τὸ οὐ μόνον, signify, according to Xylander, not that Carneades said this; but that it was customary to make such Exclamation to Chrysippus; & Chrysippo solent exclamare: infelix, tua te vis perdet. I would rather say, this Expression relates to Carneades, and that it signifies, that That Philosopher, in refuting Chrysippus, turned his Discourse to him, applying to him This Verse. For this purpose, it was not necessary, either that Chrysippus should be present, or even still alive: and observe, that Plutarch remarks, in another place not far from this, that these two Philosophers were not contemporaries. He introduces a Stoic, who remarks, that 'it was not by Accident, but by divine Providence, that Chrysippus came after Arcefilaus, and before Carneades, of whom the one is Author and Promoter of the Injury and Outrage done against Custom, and the other had more Credit than all the rest of the Academics. And Chrysippus, being between the two, by his Writings contrary to the Doctrine of Arcefilaus, stopped and shut up the Eloquence of Carneades (32). This Stoic did not agree, that our Chrysippus furnished Carneades with Arms; for he compares him to a General of an Army, who places a good Garrison in a Town ready to be besieged by the Enemy, and assigns to each Soldier the Post he is to defend, with great Order and Prudence (33).

[G] He might have been reproached with this, that his Counsels and his Actions did not agree together.] I have said (34), that he does not seem to have acted deceitfully, and that he did fairly represent the Objections of his Adversaries. He preserved all their Force so faithfully, that it was not possible for him to refute them so easily as he had proposed them. He is accused to have in this contradicted his own Principles; and this is one of the things, for which Plutarch taxes him with Contradiction. Here is the Sequel of the above quoted Passage (35). 'So that he contradicts himself; for, having always directed the proposing of an Adversary's Opinions, not with Approbation, but by shewing in some Measure their Falsity, he has shewed himself more acute in opposing, than defending, his own Doctrines; and, having admonished others to beware of contrary Arguments, as preventing Comprehension, he has been more sedulous in framing such Proofs, as take away Comprehension, than such as confirm it. And yet he plainly shews, that he himself feared this, writing thus in his fourth Book of Lives: Repugnant Arguments, and Probabilities on the contrary side, are not rashly to be proposed, but with Caution; lest the Hearers, distracted by them, should let go their Conception, not being able sufficiently to apprehend their Solutions, but so weakly, that their Comprehensions may easily be shaken. For even those, who have, according to custom, preconceived both sensible and other things, quickly forego them, being distracted by Megarian interrogations, and others more numerous and forcible (36). Plutarch presses him very hard, and maintains against him, I. That his Maxim is wrong: II. That, not having followed it, he has contradicted himself most grossly. As to the first Point, read these

(31) See Remark [E], of the Article CARNEADES, Citations (39), and (40).

(32) Id. de Communibus Notionibus adversus Stoicos, init.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) In the Text of this Article.

(35) Citat. (30).

(36) Plut. de Repugnant. Stoicorum.

wherewith he maintained several Doctrines, which might render their Sect odious ;

these words: 'As for disputing on both sides, he says, that he does not universally reject it, but exhorts us to use it with Caution, as is done in Pleadings, not with Approbation, but to dissolve their Probability. For to those, says he, who endeavour a Suspension of Assent concerning all things, it is convenient to do this, and it co-operates to what they desire; but, as for those, who would work in us Science, according to which we are professedly to live, they ought to lay down the contrary, and to conduct those, who are entered, from the beginning to the end; and, where there is occasion to make mention of contrary Discourses, to dissolve their Probability, as is done in Pleadings. For this he has said in express words. Now, that it is absurd for Philosophers to think, that they ought to set down the contrary Opinion, not with all it's Reasons, but, like Pleadings, disabling it, as if they contended not for Truth, but Victory, we have elsewhere spoken against him (37). As to the second Point, here is work for Chrysippus. One of his Books is cited against him (38), wherein he had spoken of the Arguments of Stilpo and Menedemus (39) with the utmost Contempt. And yet, good Sir, you fear lest these Arguments, which you deride, and term the Disgrace of their Proposers, as having a manifest Faultiness, should divert some from Comprehension: And did not you yourself, writing so many Books against Custom, in which you have added whatever you could invent, ambitiously striving to exceed Arcesilaus, expect, that you should perplex some of your Readers? For neither does he use slender Arguments against Custom; but, as if he were pleading, he, with some Passion in himself, stirs up the Affections of others, telling his Opponent, that he talks foolishly and labours in vain. And that he may leave no room to deny his speaking of Contradictions, he has, in his Natural Positions, written thus: It may be lawful for those, who comprehend a thing, to argue on the contrary side, applying it to the Defence, which is in the thing itself; and sometimes, when they comprehend neither, to discourse of what is alleged for either. And, having said, in his Book concerning the use of Speech, that we ought no more to use the Force of Reason, than of Arms, for such things as are not fitting, he subjoins this; For they are to be employed for the finding out of Truth, and for the Alliance of them, and not for the contrary, though many Men do it. By the many, perhaps he means those, who withhold their Assent. But they indeed, comprehending neither, argue on both sides, as may be perceived: for thus only, or chiefly, does Truth afford a Comprehension of itself. But you, who excuse them, and do yourself write contrary to those things, which you comprehend, concerning Custom, and exhort others, with Approbation, to do the same in unprofitable and hurtful things, confess, that, using the Faculty of Disputing, You, through Ambition, act like a young Scholar.

It is no easy thing to apprehend, how Chrysippus, notwithstanding the Subtlety of his Wit, could have come off; for his Maxims are very unworthy of a Philosopher: and, if he could have justified them, he would by that very thing have pronounced a Sentence of Condemnation against his own Conduct, because he had infringed them, by maintaining the Cause of the Academics, which he believed to be most opposite to Truth, with all his Force, and better than Arcesilaus himself. They seem to me to have been in the right to tell him, that the Vanity of a young Man had seized him, in such a manner, that he had sacrificed his own Maxims to the Desire of taking advantage of a favourable Occasion to shew the Subtlety of his Thoughts, to the Prejudice of the Truths, which the Stoics taught. The Glory, that he promised to himself, if it should be said, that he had out-done Arcesilaus, and carried the Objections of the Academy much farther than he, transported him in such a manner, that he troubled himself but little about the rest. Thus we have seen a Controversist, in our Days, make no difficulty to contradict himself on all occasions, and dangerously to expose the Interests of his Church, and even such Truths as are generally received among Christians, provided he might acquire the Reputation of having found out new Ways, or new Methods of attacking and defending. What was the Idol, to which he sacrificed? When the world comes to the worst, said he to himself, it will be confessed, that I have a vast Wit, and an happy Imagination.

Let us lay open the Fallacy of Chrysippus's Maxims. He would have those, who teach a Truth, to take but little notice of the Reasons of the contrary Party, and to imitate the Advocates. It was the general Spirit of the Dogmatists: there were but few, besides the Academics, who proposed the Arguments of both Parties with the same force. Now I maintain, that That Method of the Dogmatists was a bad one, and that it differed very little from the deceitful Art of the Rhetorician Sophisters, which made them so odious, and which consisted in transforming the worst Causes into the best (40); for one of their chief Artifices was, to conceal all the Advantages of the Causes, which they opposed, and all the weak Sides of those, which they maintained; only they proposed some Objections to themselves for form-sake, which were chosen among the easiest to be refuted. This is, at the bottom, what Chrysippus would have Philosophers do: he would have them to touch slightly upon the Reasons of the contrary Party, which were able to shake the Persuasion of the Hearers or Readers, and to imitate those, who plead at the Bar. Why did he not say plainly, that they must do like Shop-keepers, who cry up their own Wares, and cunningly decry those of their Neighbours? Why did he not say, also, that they must do like those, who, having quarrelled, carry their Complaints before the Judges? Every one tells his own Story so much to his Advantage, that, if you believe him, he is not at all in the wrong (41), because he suppresses all that is against him, and all that is favourable to his Enemy. Chrysippus was not only to blame for the dishonest and unfair way, by which he would have the Victory obtained, but also for his Indiscretion in revealing that Practice. It was not a thing, to be communicated to the Public; he ought to have kept it in secret, as the Politicians do their Designs or Maxims of State, Arcana Imperii: he ought, at most, to have whispered it in the Ear of some wise and learned Disciple.

Note, That Antiquity had two sort of Philosophers; some were like the Advocates, and others like those, who report a Cause. The former, in proving their Opinions, hid the weak side of their Cause, and the strong side of their Adversaries, as much as they could. The latter, to wit, the Sceptics or Academics, represented the strong and the weak Arguments of the two opposite Parties faithfully, and without any Partiality. This Distinction has been very seldom seen among Christians, in the Schools of Philosophy, and less still in the Schools of Divinity. Religion does not admit of the Character of an Academic; it requires either a Negative or an Affirmative. No Judges are found there, but what are Parties at the same time: there are a great many Authors, there, who plead a Cause according to Chrysippus's Maxim, I mean, who keep to the Function of an Advocate: but there is scarce any Reporter to be seen; for, if any one represents the whole Strength of the contrary Party faithfully, and without any Disguise, he becomes odious and suspected, and runs the hazard of being treated as an infamous Prevaricator (42). Human Prudence, Policy, the Interest of the Party, are not always the Reason why a Man acts merely like an Advocate. A charitable Zeal likewise inspires this Conduct: and, upon this, I shall alledge what was said to me, the other Day, by a learned Divine, and a very honest Man. I maintained to him, that an Author, who, without dogmatizing, keeps within the bounds of History, may, and ought, faithfully to represent the most specious things, that the worst Sects can alledge, in their own Vindication, or against Orthodoxy. He denied it. I suppose, said I, that you are a Professor of Divinity, and that you make choice of the (40) Τὸν ἄριστον λόγον κρείττω ποιῶν. Custom infirmissem potorem efficeret. See Cicerolius, Theatr. Sophistar. lib. 1, cap. 11, pag. 79, & seq.

(41) Compare what has been said above, in the Article BLONDÉL (DAVID), Remark [2], concerning the Narration of Facts in the Disputes of the Learned.

(42) See the Article CHAR- RON, Remark [P].

(37) Plut. ubi supra.

(38) Plut. ibid.

(39) The same thing with what he had called Megarian Interrogations.

(1) Diog. Laërt.
lib. 7, n. 188.
See also Sextus
Empiricus, Pyr-rhon. Hypotyp.
lib. 3, c. 24, 25

(m) Id. lib. 7,
n. 188. See also Empiricus, Pyr-
rhon. Hypotyp.
lib. 3, cap. 24.
I speak not of a Community of Wives among the Sages; but among it, but when Philosophers flew him the way:
ἐπεὶ τὸν, ἐν-τροχῶν τῶν ἐντροχῶν, ὅτι ὅτι, ut quilibet illi congregiatur que sibi occurrit.
Diog. Laërt. lib.
7, in Zenone, n.
131.

(n) See his Treatise, de Repugnantiis Stoicorum, and his other Treatise de Communibus Notitiis contra Stoicos.

(o) See Praefationem & Eruditionem. Viri. Epist. Ecclesiasticae ac Theologicae, pag. 610, 659, Edit. 1684.

(p) See above, Remark (1), of the Article BELLARMIN.

WHETHER those, who prohibit the Sale of heretical Books, ought to permit the Objections of Heretics to appear in the Writings of the Orthodox, who confute them.

(44) See above, Citat. (45), of the Article BELLARMIN.

(45) Et quæ Desperat tractata nitescere posse, relinquit. Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 150. See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, July 1685, Art. 3, pag. 804.

(46) Non — invenias etiam disiecti membra Potæ. Id. Sat. 4, lib. 1, ver. 62.

(47) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, ubi supra.

for he made no scruple to teach, that Fathers might commit Incest with their Daughters, Sons with their Mothers, and Brothers with their Sisters (1), and that Men ought to eat dead Bodies (m). Most of the Contradictions, and absurd Paradoxes, which Plutarch objects to the Stoics (n), and about which he fiercely attacked them (which must needs have vexed them prodigiously) are taken from Chrysippus's Works. If he had only reproached them with contradicting themselves in the Doctrine of Fate, and in That of Human Liberty, he would not have gained so many Advantages over them; for the same things would be answered, to justify Chrysippus, that are answered, at this time, in favour of those, who cannot reconcile the Decrees of God with our Free-will, and who cannot chuse any words, when they speak of Predestination, but what seem to be opposite to the Phrases they make use of when they exhort Men to Virtue, and censure them for their Vices. No Philosophers have spoken more powerfully of the fatal Necessity of Things, nor more magnificently of the Liberty of Man (o), than the Stoics. You may judge whether Chrysippus, who wrote so many Volumes with Precipitation, and who had a quick and very bold Wit, could come off without advancing many Propositions in his Moral Treatises, which could not agree with what he advanced in his Metaphysical Treatises. Plutarch accuses him of making Mystery of the Trinity for the Subject-matter of your Lectures for a whole Winter. You examine to the bottom what the Orthodox have said, and what the Heretics have objected, and you find, by your Meditation, and by the Strength of your Parts, that the Solutions of the Orthodox may be much better answered, than they have been by the Sectaries. In a word, you discover new Objections, more difficult to be resolved than all that has been hitherto objected; and I suppose you propose them to your Auditors. No, replied he, I would by no means do it; it would be a dangerous thing, for them: neither Charity nor Zeal for Truth allow of such a thing. Such was his Answer. It may very well be, then, that certain Authors boast, in a Preface, to have overthrown all the Bulwarks of Heresy, and yet that they remember to have omitted the Discussion of the most captious Arguments, for Charity-sake. There is reason to believe this chiefly of the Romish Controversists, since the Complaints, that have been made against Bellarmin, that his Sincerity in representing the Reasons of the Heretics has been prejudicial to the Romish Church (43).

Here I must examine a thing, which I promised in the Article of That Cardinal (44). Is it to argue consequentially, is it to preserve an uniform and regular Conduct, to cause the Writings of an Heretic to be burnt, and yet to permit the reading of the Authors, who have refuted him? No, you will say: for the Reason, why the reading and the sale of heretical Books are prohibited, is, because it is feared they will infect the Readers. They are afraid, in Italy, that those, who should see in what manner a Protestant Writer proves his Tenets, and attacks the Catholic Doctrine, would be filled with Doubts, and even would suffer themselves to be wholly persuaded by That Author's Reasons. But is there no Reason to fear the same Misfortune, if they read Bellarmin's Writings? Will they not see, there, the Proofs and Objections of the Heretics? And, supposing that Bellarmin has been a fair Writer, will they not find them as strong there, as in the very Books of the most learned Protestant? Yes, will it be said to me; but they will find them confuted; whereas, if they should read the Book of a Heretic, they would find the Poison, without having a Preservative at the same time. This Answer is not satisfactory; for it supposes an extraordinary Imprudence and Laziness in the Readers: it is to suppose, that they had rather run the Hazard of their Salvation, than go from one Book to another; and that, knowing they might find Bellarmin's Works in a Shop, where they bought the Book of a Calvinist, they would decide in favour of the latter, before they had informed themselves of That Cardinal's Reasons; though at the same time they might lay on their Table both the Books which contains the Poison, and That which has the Antidote. You will grant, that the Difference between the Arguments of an Heretic, bound up together with the Arguments of an Orthodox, and those same Arguments, bound up by themselves, those of the Heretic in one Volume, and those of the Orthodox in another; I say, you will grant me, that such a Difference is not a sufficient Reason either to hope or to fear. This Hope or this Fear must therefore proceed from something else. It must be said, that what is thought to be a sufficient Antidote, when the Reader compares together what an Orthodox Writer quotes out of an heretical Book, and what he answers to it, is not looked upon as a good Remedy, when he compares together the whole Book of the Heretic, and the whole Book of the Orthodox. It is therefore supposed, that, independently of the Answer, the Reasons of the Heretic are weaker in the Work of the Orthodox Writer, than in the Work of the Heretic; and consequently it is supposed, that the Author of the Answer had the Prudence to misrepresent and curtail them, and to turn them in such a manner, that they shall not be able to surprize those, who shall see nothing but That, and shall compare it with the Refutation. At this rate, the Inquisitors, who prohibit a Book, and permit the reading of those, who have refuted it, do not contradict themselves: their Conduct is not made up of inconsistent Proceedings; they are sure, that the Prohibition will be useful, and that the Permission will do no harm. Nevertheless, let us infer, that the same Policy, Prudence, Charity, or Zeal, (make use of what term you please), which requires that certain Books should be burnt, or that the reading or selling of them should be prohibited, requires, by a necessary consequence, that all the Reasons of an Author should not be inserted in the Books, wherein they are confuted: for if, contrary to Chrysippus's Maxim, all the Strength of those Reasons should be displayed with the utmost Sincerity, it would be to no purpose to suppress those ill Books, unless they should prohibit, at the same time, all the Writings that confute them. This is so plain, that it is very probable, that all the Authors, who are zealous to maintain the Discipline, comply with the Spirit of the Tribunals, that condemn certain Books; I say, it is very probable, that, if those Authors undertake to refute any of those Books, they order it so, that their Refutation does not discover what might shake the Faith of the Readers. They reduce an Objection to three or four Lines, which takes up several Pages; they produce it, without any Support, and without it's Preliminaries; they leave out what they cannot answer (45). After all, a Book, which seems never so strong to those who read it through, will hardly appear so in the Fragments, which an Adversary alledges out of it, and which he scatters in several parts of his Answer, here four Lines, there five or six, &c: they are Branches lopped from their Trunk; they are a dismounted Machine; a dismembered Body, which cannot be known again (46). All Controversists mutually complain of the Artifices of those, who write against them (47). I knew a Roman Catholic, who said, that all the Works, published against Bellarmin, deserved the Title of Bellarminus enervatus, which Amesius made use of; enervatus, added he, not by the Force of the Answer, but by the Manner of representing his Objections.

The

making God the Author of Sin. Lipſius, having undertaken to clear him from This Imputation, did not ſucceed well in it [H]. I do not wonder at it. The Definition

The Proteſtants complain yet more of the Tricks of their Adverſaries. If you obſerve the Quarrels that ariſe ſometimes between Perſons of the ſame Party, and if you read the Books of the two Diſputants, you will find ſome Force in them; but, if you ſhould judge of Mævius's Book, by the Scraps, which his Antagoniſt Titius cites out of them, and by the Censure that he paſſes upon them, you would think that Mævius can neither write nor argue, and that he has not common Senſe.

Note, That I do not pretend to maintain, that the Tribunals, which prohibit Books, do not act inconſequentially (48).

(48) See the Nouvelles de la Republi. des Lettres, Sept. 1685, pag. 1053. Jan. 1686. Art. 3, pag. 639. July 1686. Art. 8, pag. 810.

[H] Plutarch accuſes him of making God the Author of Sin: Lipſius, having undertaken to clear him - - - did not ſucceed very well in it. You will find the Accuſation in the Remark [G] of the Article PAULICIANS. I will not remove it from that place, ſince it was inſerted there in the firſt Edition of this Work. I ſhall only examine Lipſius's way of clearing him: but firſt of all let us ſee Chryſippus's Thought concerning the Nature of God. 'Ait (Chryſippus) vim Divinam in ratione eſſe poſitam, & univerſæ naturæ animo, atque mente: ipſumque mundum Deum dicere eſſe, & ejus animi fuſionem univerſam: tum ejus ipſius principatum, qui in mente & ratione verſetur, communemque rerum naturam univerſam atque omnia continentem, tum fatalem umbram, & neceſſitatem rerum futurarum. Ignem præterea, & eum quem antea dixi æthera: tum ea quæ natura fluere, atque manere, ut aquam, & terram, & æræ, ſolem, lunam, ſidera, univerſitatemque rerum, quæ omnia continerentur, atque homines etiam eos, qui immortalitatem eſſent confeſſi. Idemque diſputat, æthera eſſe eum, quem homines Jovem appellarent, quique ær per maria maneret, eum eſſe Neptunum: terram eam quæ Ceres diceretur: ſimilique ratione perſequitur vocabula reliquorum Deorum. Idemque etiam legis perpetuæ & æternæ vim, quæ quaſi dux vitæ, & magiſtra officiorum ſit, Jovem dicit eſſe: eandemque fatalem neceſſitatem appellat, ſempiternam rerum futurarum veritatem, quorum nihil tale eſt, ut in eo vis divina ineſſe videatur. Et hæc quidem in primo libro de Natura Deorum. In ſecundo autem vult Orphei, Muſæi, Heſiodi, Homerique fabellas accommodare ad ea quæ ipſe primo libro de Diis immortalibus dixerat: ut etiam veterum poëtæ, qui hæc ne ſuſpicati quidem ſint, Stoici fuiſſe videantur (49). — Chryſippus ſays, that the divine Energy conſiſts in Reaſon, and in the mind of univerſal Nature; and he pretends, that the World itſelf is God; and the univerſal Diſſuſion of his Mind; as alſo the Principle of That, which conſiſts in Mind, and Reaſon, and containing the common Nature of Things, the Univerſe, and all things in it, as alſo the fatal Shadow, and Neceſſity of Things future. To which he adds the Fire, and the abovementioned Æther; then thoſe things, that are by nature fluid, as Water, and the Earth, and the Air, the Sun, Moon, Stars, the Univerſe, in which all are contained, and even thoſe Men, who attain to Immortality. The ſame Philoſopher contends, that the Æther is Him, whom we call Jupiter, and the Air, which pervades the Seas, Neptune; the Earth, She who is called Ceres; and after the ſame manner he goes through the Names of the reſt of the Gods. He pretends likewiſe, that the Energy of a perpetual and eternal Law, which is as it were the Guide of Liſe, and Preceptreſs of our Duty, is Jupiter; and he calls the ſame fatal Neceſſity, the everlaſting Truth of things future; nothing of which ſeems to have in it any divine force. This is the Subſtance of his firſt Book of the Nature of the Gods. In the ſecond, he attempts to reconcile the Fables of Orpheus, Muſæus, Heſiod, and Homer, with what he had ſaid in his firſt Book concerning the Immortal Gods: inſomuch, that the moſt ancient Poets, who never ſo much as dreamed of theſe things, appear to have been Stoics.' The Proceſs would be ended to his Confuſion by this ſingle Paſſage, if he were a Man, who kept to his Principles; but becauſe he argued ſometimes one way, and ſometimes another, and maintained quite contrary things at ſeveral times, his Apologiſts want no Shifts; and, by the favour of his Contradiſtions and Incoherencies, they may pretend, for ſome time, that he is an orthodox Man, and impoſe upon People. We find, in the Paſſage of Cicero, which I have quoted, an incomprehenſible Nonſenſe, and a more confuſed Chaos, than That of the Poets; nevertheleſs it appears clearly from it, that, according to Chryſippus, God is the Soul of the World, and that the World is the univerſal Extension of That Soul, and that Jupiter was the eternal Law, the fatal Neceſſity, the immutable Truth of all future things. The neceſſary and unavoidable Conſequence, which follows from this, is, that the Soul of Man is a Part of God, and that all his Actions have no other Cauſe but God himſelf. Nevertheleſs, let us leave this Philoſopher the liberty of forging Diſtinctions altogether precarious; he will at laſt fall again into an Abyſs, after his Windings and Turnings. He ſuppoſes the Soul of Man has preſerved itſelf from the general Fatality; he exempts it from the Condition of all other things; he makes it free. 'Ac mihi quidem videtur quum duæ ſententiæ fuiſſent veterum philoſophorum: una eorum, qui cenſerent omnia ita fato fieri, ut id fatum vim neceſſitatis afferret, in qua ſententia Democritus, Heraclitus, Empedocles, Ariſtoteles fuit: altera eorum, quibus videretur ſine ullo fato eſſe animorum motus voluntarii: Chryſippus tanquam arbitri honorarii medium ferire voluiſſe, ſed applicat ſe ad eos potius, qui neceſſitate motus animos liberatos volunt (50). — There were two Opinions of the ancient Philoſophers: one of thoſe, who thought that every thing ſo fell out by Fate, that That Fate brought with it the Force of Neceſſity: in which Opinion were, Democritus, Heraclitus, Empedocles, and Ariſtotle: the other of thoſe, who thought, that the Motions of Minds were voluntary, and not ſubject to Fate: Chryſippus, as an honorary Arbitrer, would ſteer a middle Courſe; but he inclines rather to thoſe, who will have the Soul free from a neceſſity of Motion. Chryſippus autem cum & neceſſitatem improbare, & nihil vellet ſine præpoſitis cauſis evenire cauſarum genera diſtinguit, ut & neceſſitatem effugiat, & retineat fatum. Cauſarum enim, inquit, aliæ ſunt perfectæ & principales, aliæ adjuvantes & proximæ. Quomobrem quum dicimus omnia fato fieri cauſis antecedentibus, non hoc intelligi volumus, cauſis perfectis & principalibus, ſed cauſis adjuvantibus antecedentibus, & proximis (51). — But Chryſippus, diſapproving of Neceſſity, and allowing nothing to happen without previous Cauſes, diſtinguiſhes the ſeveral kinds of Cauſes, ſo as to reject Neceſſity, and retain Fate. For of Cauſes, ſays he, ſome are perfect and principal, others aſſiſting and ſecondary. When, therefore, we ſay, that all things happen thro' Fate by antecedent Cauſes, we mean, not perfect and principal Cauſes, but aſſiſting and ſecondary.' You ſee he does not deny, that every thing is produced by antecedent Cauſes; but he admitted two ſorts of Cauſes, whereof the laſt did not deſtroy Liberty. The perfect and principal Cauſes, ſaid he, do not permit an Action to be free, but the Cauſes, that are only aſſiſting, do not hinder it from being ſo. Wherefore, forasmuch as he pretended, that our Deſires do not depend on an external principal Cauſe, but only on an external and not principal one, which does only excite Man, he concluded, that our Soul produces them freely, and has the Command of them. It ſtands in need of being excited by Objects, without which it could not form any Acts of Conſent; but the Objects, that excite it, do not produce the Acts of it's Will: it determines itſelf by it's own Force, after the Objects have given it a firſt Motion. He explained this by a Compariſon. He that puſhes a Cylinder, ſaid he, gives it the firſt Motion, but not the Volubility: the Cylinder rolls afterwards by it's own Force: likewiſe our Soul, ſhaken

(49) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1, cap. 15.

(50) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 17, & ſeq.

(51) Id. ibid.

(p) See Remark
[H], Citat. (49).

tion alone, which Chrysippus gives of God (p), is sufficient to make one apprehend, that he does not distinguish him from the Universe; so that, by arguing consequentially, he must of necessity make him the Author of Moral and Physical Evil. What shaken by the Objects, moves afterwards of itself. 'Quamquam assensio non possit fieri nisi commota vi, tamen quum id visum proximam causam habeat non principalem, hanc habet rationem, ut Chrysippus vult, quam dudum diximus, non ut illa quidem fieri possit nulla vi extrinsecus excitata, necesse est enim assensionem visio commoveri, sed revertitur ad cylindrum, & ad turbinem suum, quæ moveri incipere nisi pulsa non possunt. Id autem quum accidit, suapte natura, quod superest, & cylindrum volvi, & versari turbinem putat. Ut igitur, inquit, qui protrusit cylindrum dedit ei principium motionis, volubilitatem autem non dedit, sic visum objectum imprimit illud quidem, & quasi signabit in animo speciem suam, sed assensio nostra erit in potestate, eaque, quemadmodum in cylindro dictum est, extrinsecus pulsa, quod reliquum est suapte vi & natura movebitur (52).' Take notice, that Cicero had said, that Chrysippus perplexed himself in such a manner, that, whether he would or no, he confirmed the Necessity of Fate (53). This does not well appear in That Work of Cicero; and for that Reason I could easily believe, with Lipfius, that something is wanting in That Place (54), as it is certain that there are Gaps in some others. Lipfius applies himself to Aulus Gellius, who has preserved That Explication of Chrysippus more exactly. The Reader will give me leave to set down, somewhat at length, what he says; for this Subject is so sublime, so intricate, and so inexplicable, that we must not pretend to Brevity in the Quotations; the Retrenchments would only serve to obscure what had not been retrenched. In the Passage of Aulus Gellius, you will see, at first, the Definition of Fate according to Chrysippus; and afterwards the Consequence that was drawn from it, that Man does not sin, and that all Crimes ought to be imputed to Fate; and lastly, That Philosopher's Answer: 'Fatum, quod Græci περσωμὲνν vel εἰμαρμέννν vocant, ad hanc ferme sententiam Chrysippus stoicæ princeps philosophiæ definit. Fatum est, inquit, sempiterna quædam & indeclinabilis series rerum & catena, volvens semetipsa sese & implicans per æternos consequentium ordines, ex quibus apta connexaque est (55). — Aliarum autem opinionum disciplinarumque auctores huic definitioni ita obstreperunt. Si Chrysippus, inquit, fati putat omnia moveri & regi, nec declinari transcendique posse agmina fati & volumina; peccata quoque hominum & delicta non sustentanda neque condicenda sunt ipsis voluntatibusque eorum, sed necessitati cuidam & instantiæ, quæ oritur ex fato, omnium quæ sit rerum domina & arbitra, per quam necesse sit fieri quicquid futurum est: & propterea nocentium penas legibus inique constitutas, si homines ad maleficia non sponte veniunt, sed fato trahuntur. Contra ea Chrysippus tenuiter multa & argute differit. Sed omnino fere, quæ super ea re scripsit, sententia hujuscemodi est. Quamquam ita sit, inquit, ut ratione quadam principali necessario coacta atque connexa sint fato omnia; ingenia tamen ipsa mentium nostrarum proinde sunt fato obnoxia, ut proprietas eorum est ipsa & qualitas; nam si sunt per naturam primitus salubriter utiliterque facta, omnem illam vim, quæ de fato extrinsecus ingruit, inoffensus tractabilisque transmittunt. Sin vero sunt aspera & inscita & rudia, nullisque artium bonarum adminiculis fulta: etiam si parvo sive nullo fatalis incommodi conflictu urgeantur, sua tamen scævitate & voluntario impetu in assidua delicta & in errores ruunt: idque ipsum ut ea ratione fiat naturalis illa & necessaria rerum consequentia efficit, quæ fatum vocatur. Est enim genere ipso quasi fatale & consequens, ut mala ingenia peccatis & erroribus non vacent (56). — Chrysippus, the Head of the Stoic Philosophy, defines Fate, which the Greeks call περσωμὲνν, or εἰμαρμέννν, nearly according to this Opinion. Fate, says he, is a certain, and eternal, immutable Series and Chain of Things, rolling and twisting itself thro' eternal

'Orders of Consequences, of which it is formed and linked together. — But the Authors of other Opinions and Tenets thus refute this Definition. If Chrysippus, say they, thinks, that all things are moved and influenced by Fate, and that there is no opposing it's Laws, then the very Sins of Men are not to be imputed to themselves, and their Wills, but to a certain Fatality, which governs all things, and makes every thing future necessarily happen; and therefore that it is unjust to punish Offenders, if Men are fatally, not voluntarily, wicked. Against this Chrysippus argues with great Subtlety. But the Sum of what he says on this Head is as follows: Though every thing, says he, be compelled and necessitated by Fate, yet the Minds of Men are obnoxious to it according to their Propriety and Quality; for if they are originally, by Nature, made virtuous and good, they transmit, with less Offence, and more readily, all that Force, which falls on them extrinsically from Fate. But if they are rough and unpolished, and supported by no help of Science; also if they are pressed by little or no fatal Inconvenience; they yet rush into daily Offences and Errors, thro' their own Depravity and voluntary Inclination: and this very thing produces the natural and necessary Consequences of things. For it is as it were necessary and consequential, that bad Minds should not be free from Offences and Errors.' Afterwards Aulus Gellius relates the Comparison of the Cylinder, and the Conclusion, which Chrysippus drew from his Discourse, that no body ought to be allowed to impute his Sins to Fate, and that no Malefactors ought to be heard, who have recourse to such a Refuge. 'Propterea negat oportere ferri audiriue homines aut nequam aut ignavos & nocentes & audaces; qui, cum in culpa & in maleficio revidi sunt, peragiunt ad fati necessitatem, tanquam in aliquod Fati asylum; & quæ pessimè fecerunt, ea non suæ temeritati sed fato esse attribuenda dicunt (57).'

It is easily seen, that this Philosopher does not extricate himself, and that his Distinction between the external Causes that necessitate, and those that do not necessitate, is of no use to him. He only goes about the Bush, and at last finds himself in the same place with those, who submit all things to the unavoidable Necessity of Fate. To be convinced of it, one need only join together his Comparison of a Cylinder, and the Confession he makes, that the internal Qualities of the Soul, which incline it to evil, are a natural and necessary Consequence of Fate (58). He says, that there are Souls well formed from the beginning, which bear the Storm that falls upon them from Fate without any Damage, and that there are others so rough and ill-turned, that, if Fate strikes them never so little, or even without any shock of Fate, they fall into Sin by a voluntary Motion. It is a certain natural Perverseness, that is the cause of it. But he said, that the fatal Necessity of all things is the first cause of human Souls being well or ill formed; he must therefore grant, that one may and ought to ascribe to Fate all the Crimes, that Men commit: so that, acknowledging otherwise a divine Providence, he could not avoid, if he argued right, to look upon God as the Cause of all those Crimes: and consequently Plutarch's Accusation is very justly grounded; for, to make the Comparison of the Cylinder just, Fate must not be compared to the first Comer that pushes it, but to the Joyner that made it, and who afterwards pushes it with his Foot. The Reason, why the Cylinder rolls a long time, proceeds from it's Figure; but because the Joyner gave it that Figure, the necessary Cause of a lasting Motion, he is the true Cause of the Continuance of That Motion. All the Difference between a Cube, that does not roll, and a Cylinder, that rolls, all the Consequences, all the Regularities or Irregularities of the Rest of the one, and of the continued Motion of the other, ought to be attributed to the Workman, who gave those two Bodies the Form, from which they necessarily

(52) Id. ibid.
cap. 18.

(53) Dum autem
verbis utitur suis, delabitur in eas difficultates, ut necessitatem fati
confirmet inivisus.
Id. ibid. cap. 9.

(54) Sed quod in Vro Cicero dicit, & hæret, parum
pro interiore ipsa
re videtur, & credo plura addidisse
quæ vero exciderunt. Lipfius
Phil. Stoicæ. lib.
3. Dissert. 24.
pæg. m. 865.

(55) Aulus Gellius,
lib. 6. cap.
2.

(56) Id. ibid.

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) Idque ip-sum ut ea ratione
fiat naturalis illa & necessaria re-rum consequentia efficit quæ fatum
vocatur. Id. ibid.
pæg. 170.

What he taught concerning the Mortality of the Gods, cannot be read without Horror [I]. He not only believed them to be perishable; but he maintained also, that they would be destroyed in the Conflagration of the World; and, though he excepted Jupiter, yet he subjected him actually to Mutability. A certain Book, wherein he treated of the Amours of Jupiter and Juno, was so full of Obscenities [K], that it was much murmured at. One may therefore easily apprehend, that the cessarily result. Any body may make the Application of this to human Souls. Lipfius plainly saw this Intricacy, and therefore, to bring off Chrysippus, he supposes, that the Stoics attributed the Imperfections of the Soul of Man to a real and incorrigible Vice of Matter, and not to God. Sed heus Chrysippe, si à Naturâ hæc constitutio aut devergium, Deum à malo qui excusas? quomodo non ille Naturæ auctor, atque ipsa Natura, malum maloque genuit, si tales fecit? Hoc caput est, & arx, ut sic dicam, causæ, nunc adenda & occupanda. Aio Stoicos Mali principium non in Deo, sed in Materia (quæ tamen Deo, ut ipsi alique voluerunt, ævo æqualis, & æterna) in Materia, inquam, constituisse. Itaque cum Deus homines alique faceret, omnia bona & in bonum finxisse: sed repugnantem aliquam vim & malitiosam in illa fuisse, atque esse, quæ alio traheret: atque hinc Interna, atque etiam Externa, mala exstitisse (59). — But tell me, Chrysippus! if this Constitution or Byasis be from Nature, how do you justify God from Evil? How will you suppose him, who is the Author of Nature, and Nature itself, not to have produced Evil, and bad Men? This is the Capital and Fort, if I may so say, of the Cause, which is now to be attacked and taken. I say, then, that the Stoics refer Evil, not to GOD, but to Matter, which yet, as they and others affirm, is co-æval with GOD. Therefore, as GOD is the Creator of Men and all Things, he made all things good, and for good Purposes; but that there was in Matter a repugnant and evil Byasis, which drew another way; and hence arose Internal, and even External, Evils. But this pretended Justification of Chrysippus has been so well confuted by Plutarch (60), that it is altogether insignificant. Eusebius has preserved us a Fragment of a Peripatetic Philosopher, called Diogenianus, who had very well shewed the Defects of Chrysippus's Doctrine on this Point (61).

Note, that Calvin, for instance, nor any other Christian Defender of absolute Predestination, is exposed to This Attack, since they declare, that there was not any Quality, necessitating to Evil, in the Soul of the first Man.

[I] What he taught concerning the Mortality of the Gods, cannot be read without Horror. Plutarch, designing to shew, that the Stoics had spoiled all the common Notions, that Men had of the Gods, begins with the Idea of Eternity and Incorruptibility. What Man is there, or ever was, says he (62), who does not believe the Divinity to be immortal and eternal? — One may perhaps meet with some Nations so barbarous and savage, as not to think there is a God; but there was never found any Man, who, believing a God, did not, at the same time, believe him immortal and eternal. Certainly, those who were called Atheists, a Diagoras, a Theodorus, and a Hippo, durst not say, that the Divinity is corruptible; but they did not believe, that there is any thing incorruptible: thus they retained the common Anticipation of the Gods, but took away the Incorruptibility of Substance. But Chrysippus and Cleanthes, having filled, as one may say, Heaven, Earth, Air, and Sea, with Gods, have not yet made any one of those Gods immortal, or eternal, except Jupiter alone, on whom they make all the rest to depend, and into whom they suppose them to be resolved: so that in him to resolve is nothing better than to be resolved. For it is an Infirmit, both to perish, by being resolved into another, and to be preserved and nourished by the Resolution of others into himself. Now these are not like other of their Absurdities, gathered by Argument from their Suppositions, or drawn by consequence from their Doctrines; but they themselves, proclaiming it aloud in their Writings concerning the Gods, Providence, Fate, and Nature, expressly say, that all the Gods were born, and shall die by the Fire, melting away, in their Opinion, as if they were of Wax or Tin. — Chrysippus then says, that Jupiter is like to Man, as is also the World and Providence to the Soul. When therefore the Conflagration shall be, Jupiter, who alone of all the Gods is incorruptible, will retire into Providence, and they, being together, will both perpetually remain in one Substance of the Æther (63). These words seem to me to import a Separation of Body and Soul, and consequently Death. We have seen (64), that Chrysippus supposed, that God is the Soul of the World; and he said just now, that, when the World shall be burnt, Jupiter will withdraw into another place. Let us see his Contradictions, and at the same time a Parallel between the Impiety of Epicurus and the Impiety of Chrysippus. Whoever they are, says Antipater, who shall take from the Gods Beneficence, strike partly at the Provision of them; and, according to the same reason, they do also, who think they participate of Generation and Corruption. If, then, he, who esteems the Gods corruptible, is equally absurd with him, who thinks them not to be provident and gracious to Men, Chrysippus is no less in an Error than Epicurus. For the one deprives the Gods of Beneficence, and Liberality, the other of Immortality and Incorruptibility. The other Gods, says Chrysippus, use Nourishment, being equally sustained by it; but Jupiter and the World, after another manner than those, who are engendered and consumed by Fire. Here indeed he declares, that all the other Gods are nourished, except Jupiter and the World; but, in his first Book of Providence, he says, that Jupiter encreases till all things are consumed into himself. For, since Death is the Separation of the Soul from the Body, and the Soul of the World is not indeed separated, but encreases continually, till it has consumed all Matter into itself, it is not to be said, that the World dies. Who, therefore, can more plainly contradict himself, than he, who says, that the same God is nourished and not nourished (65)? Is it possible, that so subtle a Philosopher should have such monstrous Ideas?

[K] A Book, wherein he treated of the Amours of Jupiter and Juno, was full of Obscenities. Diog. Laërtius is not the only Author, who says so: Εἰσι δὲ οἱ κατατρέχοντες τὴν Χρυσίππου ὡς πολλὰ αἰσχρῶς καὶ ἀρρήτως ἀναγέγραφοι. Ἐν μὲν γὰρ τῷ περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων φυσικῶν συγγραμμάτων αἰσχρῶς τὰ περὶ τὴν Ἥραν καὶ τὴν Δία ἀναπλάττει, λίγων κατὰ τὰς ἐξακοσίας στίχους ἃ μὲν οἱ ἠτυχηκῶς μολύνειν τὸ σῆμα, εἶποι ἂν. Αἰσχροτάτην γὰρ (φασὶ) ταύτην ἀναπλάττει ἰσορίαν, εἰ καὶ ἐπαίνει ὡς εὐστεινήν, χαμαὶ τύπαις μᾶλλον πρέπουσαν ἢ θεοῖς. Ἐτι τε τὰ παρὰ τοῖς περὶ πινάκων γραφασὶ κατακχευομένην. Non desunt, qui & Chrysippum lacerent, dicentes illum complura turpiter obscæneque scripsisse. Nam in eo opere, quod de antiquis physiologis scriptum, fœda de Junone fingit ac Jove, ea dicens sexcentis fere versibus quæ nemo nisi illoto ore dixisset. Turpissimam enim, aiant, hanc fingit historiam, etiam ut naturalem laudat, iustis tamen magis convenientem quam diis. Neque ab iis qui de tabulis scribere solent insertam (66). — There are not wanting some, who censure Chrysippus, saying that he wrote many filthy and obscene things. For in that Work, which he wrote concerning the ancient Naturalists, he seigns scandalous Things of Jupiter and Juno, repeating such things for almost Six hundred Verses, as no one, but with unwaſhen Mouth, would have said. For, they say, he invents this most scandalous Story, which yet he commends as natural, more applicable to common Strumpets, (59) Lipfius Phys. Stoic. lib. 3, Diff. 14.

(60) See the Article PAULICIANS, Remark [G].

(61) See Eusebius Preparat. Evangel. lib. 6, cap. 8, p. 262, & seq. See also what Oenomaus says against the same Chrysippus, ibid. cap. 7.

(62) Plut. de Commun. Notitiis contra Stoicos.

(63) Id. ibid.

(64) See above, Citat. (49).

(65) Plut. de Regup. Stoicor.

(66) Diog. Laërt. l. 7, n. 187.

the Stoics had no great reason to be pleased with his Writings; for the Figure he made in their Party [L] gave occasion to ascribe to the whole Body the Errors of so famous a Member. Neither do we see the great Stoic Authors, as Seneca, Epictetus, and Arrianus, very forward to shew their Veneration for him [M]. They are commonly very sparing of their Praises of him. I do not find, that he has been reflected upon on the account of his Morals, which makes me believe that he led an unblameable Life. They make his whole Family to consist of one very old Maid-servant [N]; This is a Proof of his Chastity and Frugality. He very often quoted five Verses of Euripides (q) against Good-cheer, wherein it is said, that Nature has sufficiently provided for our Necessities by Bread and Water: from whence it may be inferred, that he was very sober. I have already said, that he addicted himself very much to Logic, and he detested the Works of Archestratus (r). I add here, that he took extraordinary pains to find out the Solution of a Sophism, which puzzled the Philosophers very much, and which was called Sorites [O]: It was a heap of Interrogations, where there was no end. The progress

(q) Aul. Gell. lib. 7, cap. 16.

(r) See Citation (80).

Strumpets, than to Gods, nor ever inserted by Writers about Fables. We may join to this a Passage of Origen: Καὶ τί μὲ δεῖ καλᾶν τὰς περὶ θεῶν ἀπόψεις ἑλλήνων ἱστορίας, αἰσχρὺν αὐτῶν ἀξίας, καὶ ἀλλοτριωμένας; ὅτι τε ὁ Σοκράτης Χρύσιππον, ὁ τὴν Στοᾶν τῶν φιλοσόφων πολλοῖς συγγραμμάσιν συνετοῖς κεκοσμημέναις νομιζόμενον, παρρησιάζεται γερῶν τὴν ἐν Σάμῳ, ἐν ᾗ ἀρρητοποίησα ἡ Ἥρα τὴν Δία ἐξέσπαιτο. Et quid me opus est enumerare absurdas de Diis historias Græcorum, putendas & ex se, & per allegoriam? quando Chrysippus Solensis, qui plurimis scriptis Porticum Philosophorum ornasse creditur, interpretatur Picturam in Samo, ubi Juno depicta est, morem gerens Jovis non nominandæ libidini (67). — Why need I mention the absurd Stories of the Greeks concerning the Gods, shameful in themselves, and even allegorically understood? When even Chrysippus of Soli, whose Writings are said to be the Ornament of the Stoic Philosophy, interprets a Picture in Samos, in which Juno is represented as obliging Jupiter in a manner not fit to be named. What a shameful thing, that such Pictures should have been seen in the Temples of the Heathens! Observe, that Chrysippus explained this by way of Allegory, and did not find in it a moral but a physical Sense. I leave you to think whether his Expressions could be modest. You have seen before (68), that he allegorized in the same manner all the Extravagancies of Mythology: he found all the Theology of the Stoics in them.

(67) Orig. contra Cels. lib. 4.

(68) In Remark [H], Citat. (49).

[L] He made a Figure in their Party. He was looked upon as the Pillar of the Portico (69), and there went a Proverb, that, without him, there would be no Portico: Ὅθεν φασὶν ἐπ' αὐτῷ λεγέσθαι: Οἱ δὲ πέννυσαι, τοὶ δ' ὡς σκιαὶ ἀίσουσιν καὶ, Εἰ μὴ γὰρ ἦν Χρύσιππος, ἐκ αὐτῶν ἦν σοὶ.

(69) Diog. Laert. lib. 7, n. 183.

(71) In Remark [A].

(72) Seneca, de Otio Sapientis, sub fin.

(73) Epictet. Enchir. cap. 64.

(74) See Arrian Epictet. lib. 1, cap. 10, 17, lib. 2, cap. 16, & alibi.

the divine Honours that were paid to Triptolemus (75). I believe, he means, in general, that he, who discovered to Men Truth, and the way to Virtue, would more justly deserve Altars, than Those, who taught them to sow Corn.

[N] His whole Family consisted of one very old Maid-servant. Diogenes Laërtius speaks two or three times of it: ἡ καὶ τὸ τε γυναικίῳ μόνῳ, sola autem ancilla contentus erat (76). He had already said, that they had known, from This old Servant, that Chrysippus used to write five hundred Lines every Day (77). Mr Menage is mistaken (78), when he pretends, that Plutarch spoke of the same old Woman, in the words, that I am going to cite. And even Chrysippus himself, in his Commentary concerning Jupiter, says, that it were as poor, absurd, and impertinent a thing, to glory in such Acts, though they proceed from Virtue, as it would be to bear valiantly the stinging of a Whip, and chafly to abstain from an old Woman that lies a dying (79). Chrysippus spoke there in general, and without any relation to his Maid. His Censurer understands it so, and alleges it, only to reproach the Stoicks for contradicting themselves, and opposing common Notions: 'They think, said be a little before, that it is the same thing, to abstain from the Enjoyment of an old Woman, that has one Foot in the Grave, and to venture one's Life in defence of one's Country, since both do what their Duty requires: And yet for this, as a great and glorious thing, they will be ready to die, whereas to boast of the latter would be shameful and ridiculous, I have said an hundred times, that one runs the hazard of making wrong Applications, when one makes use of a Passage, before having examined what precedes, and what follows it. Mr Menage is an Instance of it here. I have found a thing in Athenæus, which confirms the good Opinion we ought to have of Chrysippus's Temperance.

Χρύσιππον δ' ἀνδρες οἶμαι τὴν τῆς σοῦς ἡγεμόνα κατὰ πολλὰ θαυμάζων ἐτι μᾶλλον ἐπαίνῳ, τὸν πολυβύλλον ἐπὶ τῇ ἐφοροῦν Ἀρχέστρατον αἰεὶ ποιεῖν μετὰ φιλανιδῶ κατὰ τὰς ὁδοῦς, εἰς ἣν ἀναφέρει τὸ περὶ Ἀρετῆς σὺν ἀκρίστον σύγγραμμα. 'Chrysippum, ὁ αὖ μὲν viri, Stoicorum ducem ac principem, ego mehercule in multis admiro, ob id tamen impensius laudo, quod famosum suis de obsoniis scriptis Archestratum in eodem loco ac numero semper collocat cum Philenide, cui turpissimum de venereis opus adscribunt (80). — In many things, my Friends, I admire Chrysippus, the Leader and Chief of the Stoics; but I principally commend him for this, that he always ranked Archestratus, infamous for his Writings on Delicacies, with Philenis, to whom they ascribe a most scandalous Work concerning Venereal Pleasures.

[O] He took extraordinary Pains to find out the Solution of a Sophism — which was called Sorites. In Greek σφερίτης, from the Word σφῆρα, which signifies acervous, a Heap. Hence it is, that the Latins thought they might call that Sophism Acervaleum (81). Ulpian has defined it, 'cū ab eviderter veris, per brevissimas mutationes, disputatio ad ea, quæ eviderter falsa sunt, perducitur (82). — When, from Positions evidently true, the Disputation is led, through the shortest mutations, to Positions evidently false.' Cicero describes it so as to blameable, (75) Arrianus, ibid. lib. 1, cap. 4. James Schekgius, in Latin Translator put in the Margin, Chrysippus Triptolemo divinis honoribus dignior.

(76) Diog. Laert. lib. 7, n. 185.

(77) 'H δὲ παρρησιάζουσα πρὸς ὅτις αὐτῷ ἔλεγον, &c. Annus quæ illi affidebat dicebat, &c. Id. ibid. n. 181.

(78) Menag. in Laert. lib. 7, pag. 339.

(79) Plut. de Comm. Notitiis, pag. 106c. See also Repugn. Stoicorum.

(80) Athen. lib. 8, pag. 335.

(81) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 2, cap. 4.

(82) Ulpian. lib. 6, ff. de Reg. Juris.

progress he made, as a Logician, which was without doubt very great, was of no

make the Etymology of the Word to be understood :

Primum quidem hoc reprehendendum quod capitiolissimo genere interrogationis utuntur. Quod genus minime in Philosophia probari solet, quum aliquid minutatim & gradatim additur aut demitur :

Soritas hos vocant qui acervum efficiunt uno addito grano (83). — In the first place, this is blameable, that they make use of a most captious kind of Interrogation. Which Method is by no means commendable in Philosophy, when any thing is minutely and gradually added or taken away : they call those Sorites, who make an Heap, by the addition of a single Grain. They took for example a grain of Corn, as you shall see below ; and from this true Proposition, One grain of Corn is not a heap, they endeavoured to lead one by degrees to this visible Falsity, One grain of Corn makes a heap.

You will find some Examples, in Sextus Empiricus, of the use that was made of this captious way of interrogating. I shall quote presently a long Passage of Cicero, whereby it will appear, that they pretended to shew, by the help of the Sorites, that the Mind of Man never attains to the knowledge of the fixed Point, that divides the opposite Qualities, or that determines precisely the Nature of every thing. This was their Question : Wherein consists little, much, length, breadth, smallness, greatness, &c. Do three grains of Corn make a heap? The Answer was, No. Do four grains make a heap? The Answer was still the same. They went on in their Questions, from grain to grain, without any end ; and, if you had answered at last, Here is the Heap ; they pretended, that your Answer was absurd, since it supposes, that one single grain made the difference between what is not a heap, and what is one.

I could prove, by the same Method, that a great Drinker is never drunk. I would ask, Will one drop of Wine make him drunk? No, will you say. Will two drops do it? By no means ; nor three, nor four neither. I would continue my Questions drop by drop ; and, if you should tell me, when you come to the Nine hundred and ninety ninth drop, he is not drunk, and then, coming to the next drop, he is drunk, I should conclude, that one drop of Wine makes the specific Difference between a great Drinker's being drunk, and not being drunk, which is absurd. If the Interrogations were made at every three Pints, you might easily observe the Difference between enough and too much ; but the Maker of the Sorites has the choice of his Weapons, and makes use of the least Particles of Quantity, and goes from one to the other, to hinder you from finding any fixed Point, that separates the not being drunk from the being drunk, little from much, enough from too much, &c. A Man, unacquainted with Logic, would justly laugh at such Cavils ; he would appeal to common sense, and to that degree of Light, which, in the use of civil Life, is sufficient to make us discern, in general, what is little, much, &c. But a professed Logician was not allowed to have recourse to that Tribunal ; he was obliged to answer in due form ; and, unless he found a Solution according to the Rules of his Art, he lost the Field of Battle ; his Defeat and Overthrow were unavoidable. At this time, an Hibernian Tutor, who should tease a Professor of Salamanca with a thousand logical Cavils, and who should receive for Answer, Common Sense, notorious evidence, sufficiently shews that your Consequences are false, would pass for the Conqueror ; and it would be said with reason, that the Professor was worsted ; for it was his Duty to answer in due form, and according to the Rubric of his Trade, since his Thesis was attacked by That Rubric. Chrysippus, who knew his Duty very well in that point, plainly saw, that the Sorites of the Megaric Dialecticians required a categorical Solution. We shall see his invention, after I have cited a Latin Passage : Sed quoniam tantum in ea arte

(Dialectica) ponitis, (Cicero brings in an Assertor of Uncertainty, who speaks thus) videte ne contra vos tota nata sit, quæ primo progressu festive tradit elementa loquendi, & ambiguum intelligentiam concludendique rationem, tum paucis additis venit ad Soritas lubricum sanè & periculosum locum, quod tu modo dicebas esse vitiosum interrogandi genus. Quid ergo, istius vitii num nostra culpa

est? Rerum natura nullam nobis dedit cognitionem finium, ut ulla in re statuere possimus, quatenus nec hoc in acervo tritici solum unde nomen est. Sed nulla omnino in re minutatim interrogandi dives, pauper, clarus, obscurus sit, multa, pauca, magna, parva, longa, brevia, lata, angusta, quanto aut addito aut dempto certum respondeamus non habemus. At vitiosi sunt Sorites. Frangite igitur eos si potestis, ne molesti sint. Erunt enim nisi caveatis (84). — But since you lay so much stress on Logic, take care you do not run counter to those Elements of speaking, be so wittily lays down, and the way to apprehend ambiguous expressions, and the Method of drawing Conclusions, from whence he goes on to the Sorites, a slippery and dangerous place indeed, which you just now called a faulty kind of Interrogation. What then? Is this Fault to be imputed to us? The Nature of things gave us no knowledge of Bounds, so as that we might determine in any thing, as 'tis plain we cannot in relation to the Heap of Corn, whence alone it had its Name. We cannot certainly answer, when we are minutely asked, what addition, or diminution, makes Rich or Poor, Famous or Obscure, Much or Little, Great or Small, Broad or Narrow. But the Makers of the Sorites are in the wrong. Break them therefore, if you can, lest they be troublesome ; for they will be so, unless you guard against them. Chrysippus found no other Expedient, than to answer only a certain number of Interrogations, and then to be silent. His Invention was called the quiet Method. Multum in eo Chrysippus sudaverat, ut finitorem acervi inveniret, sed frustra : quare spe inveniendi quod querebat defectus, καὶ δὲ δεινὰ πῶν τινα πλεον, quod aiunt, excogitaverat quem vocabat τὸν ἡσυχάζοντα λόγον (85) : cum in terrogatus sustinebat se priusquam ad finem interrogans perveniret (86). Consult Calaubon in his excellent Commentary on these words of Persius ; depunge ubi sistam Inventus, Chrysippe, tui finitor acervi (87). This Invention of Chrysippus was not a lucky one ; you shall see how Carneades overthrew it (88) : Cautum est inquit. Placet enim Chrysippo quum gradatim interrogetur, verbi causa tria pauca sint (89), an ne multa, aliquanto priusquam ad multa perveniat quiescere, id est, quod ab his dicitur ἡσυχάζειν. Per me vel stertas licet, inquit Carneades, non modo quiescas. Sed quid proficit? Sequitur enim qui te ex fomno excitet, & eodem modo interroget, quod in numero conticisti. Si ad eum numerum unum addidero, multa ne erunt? progrediar rursus quoad videbitur, quid plura? Hoc enim fateris, neque ultimum te paucorum, neque primum multorum respondere posse. Cujus generis error ita manat, ut non videam quò non possit accedere. Nihil me lædit, inquit. Ego enim ut agitator callidus priusquam ad finem veniam equos sustinebo, coque magis si locus is quò ferentur equi præceptis erit. Sic me, inquit, ante sustinebo, nec diutius captiose interroganti respondebo. Si habes quod liqueat, neque respondes, superbis : si non habes, ne tu quidem perspicis, quia obscura concedis. Sed negas te usque ad obscura progredi : illustribus igitur rebus insistas. Si id tantummodo ut taceas, nihil assequeris. Quid enim ad illum qui te captare vult, utrum tacentem irretiat te, an loquentem? Sin autem usque ad novem, verbi gratia, sine dubitatione respondes pauca esse, in decimo insistas, etiam à certis & illustrioribus cohibes assensum, hoc idem me in obscuris facere non finis. Nihil igitur te contra Soritas ars ista adjuvat, quod nec augendi nec minuendi quid aut primum sit, aut postremum, docet. — When Chrysippus was gradually asked, for instance whether three were few, or many, he stopped short, before he came to many, which those Philosophers call ἡσυχάζειν, the being quiet. You have my leave, said Carneades, to swear, as well as to be quiet. But what advantage do you gain? One follows you, who will rouse you from your Sleep, and go on to interrogate you in the same manner, as when you became silent. If to the last number I add one, will they be many? I will go on as far as I please: What need there any more? You confess, you cannot answer, that it is the last of a few, or the first of many. Which kind of Error spreads

est? Rerum natura nullam nobis dedit cognitionem

finium, ut ulla in re statuere possimus, quatenus nec hoc in acervo tritici solum unde nomen est.

Sed nulla omnino in re minutatim interrogandi dives, pauper, clarus, obscurus sit, multa, pauca, magna, parva, longa, brevia, lata, angusta, quanto aut addito aut dempto certum respondeamus non habemus. At vitiosi sunt Sorites. Frangite igitur eos si potestis, ne molesti sint. Erunt enim nisi caveatis (84). — But since you lay so much stress on Logic, take care you do not run counter to those Elements of speaking, be so wittily lays down, and the way to apprehend ambiguous expressions, and the Method of drawing Conclusions, from whence he goes on to the Sorites, a slippery and dangerous place indeed, which you just now called a faulty kind of Interrogation. What then? Is this Fault to be imputed to us? The Nature of things gave us no knowledge of Bounds, so as that we might determine in any thing, as 'tis plain we cannot in relation to the Heap of Corn, whence alone it had its Name.

We cannot certainly answer, when we are minutely asked, what addition, or diminution, makes Rich or Poor, Famous or Obscure, Much or Little, Great or Small, Broad or Narrow. But the Makers of the Sorites are in the wrong. Break them therefore, if you can, lest they be troublesome ; for they will be so, unless you guard against them. Chry-sippus found no other Expedient, than to answer only a certain number of Interrogations, and then to be silent. His Invention was called the quiet Method. Multum in eo Chrysippus sudaverat, ut finitorem acervi inveniret, sed frustra : quare spe inveniendi quod querebat defectus, καὶ δὲ δεινὰ

πῶν τινα πλεον, quod aiunt, excogitaverat quem vocabat τὸν ἡσυχάζοντα λόγον (85) : cum in terrogatus sustinebat se priusquam ad finem interrogans perveniret (86). Consult Calaubon in his excellent Commentary on these words of Persius ;

depunge ubi sistam Inventus, Chrysippe, tui finitor acervi (87). This Invention of Chrysippus was not a lucky one ; you shall see how Carneades overthrew

it (88) : Cautum est inquit. Placet enim Chrysippo quum gradatim interrogetur, verbi causa tria

pauca sint (89), an ne multa, aliquanto priusquam ad multa perveniat quiescere, id est, quod ab his dicitur ἡσυχάζειν. Per me vel stertas licet, in-quit Carneades, non modo quiescas. Sed quid proficit? Sequitur enim qui te ex fomno excitet, & eodem modo interroget, quod in numero conticuisti. Si ad eum numerum unum addidero, multa ne erunt? progrediar rursus quoad videbi-tur, quid plura? Hoc enim fateris, neque ultimum te paucorum, neque primum multorum respondere posse. Cujus generis error ita manat, ut non vi-deam quò non possit accedere. Nihil me lædit, inquit. Ego enim ut agitator callidus priusquam ad finem veniam equos sustinebo, coque magis si locus is quò ferentur equi præceptis erit. Sic me, inquit, ante sustinebo, nec diutius captiose interro-ganti respondebo. Si habes quod liqueat, neque respondes, superbis : si non habes, ne tu quidem perspicis, quia obscura concedis. Sed negas te usque ad obscura progredi : illustribus igitur rebus insistas. Si id tantummodo ut taceas, nihil assequeris. Quid enim ad illum qui te captare vult, utrum tacentem irretiat te, an loquentem? Sin autem usque ad novem, verbi gratia, sine dubita-tione respondes pauca esse, in decimo insistas, etiam

à certis & illustrioribus cohibes assensum, hoc idem me in obscuris facere non finis. Nihil igitur te contra Soritas ars ista adjuvat, quod nec augendi nec minuendi quid aut primum sit, aut postremum, docet. — When Chrysippus was gradually asked,

for instance whether three were few, or many,

he stopped short, before he came to many, which those Philosophers call ἡσυχάζειν, the being quiet.

You have my leave, said Carneades, to swear, as well as to be quiet. But what advantage do you gain? One follows you, who will rouse you from your Sleep, and go on to interrogate you in the same manner, as when you became silent. If to the last number I add one, will they be many? I will go on as far as I please: What need there any more? You confess, you cannot answer, that it is the last of a few, or the first of many. Which kind of Error

(84) Cicero, ubi
supra, cap. 16,
28.

(85) These Words might be rendered the Quietist, and this Expedient in a Dispute might be so called, as others were called
The Resper, The Liar, &c.

(86) Calaub. in Persium, Sat. ult.
p. m. 521.

(87) Persius, Sat.
ult. in fin.

(88) Cicero, ubi
supra, cap. 16.

(89) This shews, that there is a Gap in Diogenes
Laërtius, lib. 7,
in Zeno, n. 82 ;
for the Example of the Sophism called Obvelatus, which is to be found there, plainly agrees with the Sorites,
as it has been well observed by Cujacius, Tractatu 5, ad Affri-canum, & Cassian-us Ope. Tom. 1.
pag. 41.

no use to him as to his Style. Dionysius Halicarnassensis produces him for an Example, That the Authors, who are perfect in Logic, observe the Rules of Grammar very ill as to the placing of Words [P]. This Carelessness in the Language is less surprising at first, than to see this Philosopher himself undermine all the Foundations of the Science, that he had so much cultivated [Q]; but neither does 'spreads so far as to extend I know not whither. It gives no advantage against me, says he. For I, like a skillful Driver, before I reach the Goal, will check my Horses, especially if I am driving towards a Precipice. In this manner, says he, I will stop, and answer no farther a captious Questioner. If you can, but will not, reply, you are proud; if you cannot, neither do you see clearly, because you grant what is obscure. But you deny that you proceed so far as to what is obscure: you stop then at what is evident. If you gain silence only, you gain nothing. For what is it to him, who would ensnare you, whether he takes you silent, or speaking? But if, as far as nine, for instance, you reply without hesitation that they are few, you stop at the tenth, you withhold assent even from what is certain and clear, yet you suffer not me to do the same thing in what is obscure. That Invention, therefore, is of no use to you against the makers of the Sorites, since it teaches neither the first nor last point of Increase or Diminution.' The Sceptics took advantage of This Invention of Chrysippus, and made it serve for an Argument ad hominem. See Sextus Empiricus (90). Note, that Horace fell upon the Admirers of the Ancients with a Sorites: It is a very fine Passage; suffer me to give way to the Temptation of placing it here:

Si meliora dies, ut vina, poemata reddidit,
Scire velim, pretium chartis quotus arroget annus
Scriptor abhinc annos centum qui decidit, inter
Perfectos veteresque referri debet? an inter
Viles atque novos? excludat jurgia finis.
Est vetus atque probus, centum qui perficit annos.
Quid? qui deperit minor uno mense, vel anno,
Inter quos referendus erit? veteres-ne Poetas?
An quos & præsens & postera respuet ætas?
Iste quidem veteres inter ponetur honestè,
Qui vel mense brevi, vel toto est junior anno.
Utor permisso, caudæque pilos ut equinæ
Paulatim vello, demo unum, demo etiam unum,
Dum cadat elusus ratione ruentis acervi,
Qui redit ad fastos, & virtutem æstimat annis,
Miraturque nihil, nisi quod Libitina sacrauit (91).

*If Verse, like Wine, improves, matur'd by Age,
What length of Years gives value to the Page?
Say, shall the Bard, who chanc'd to write, we know,
A Century, nor more nor less, ago,
Stand with the Ancients, or the Moderns, plac'd?
With these admir'd, or with those disgrac'd?
A Century, sure, so long ago he writ,
Makes him an Ancient, and a Classic Wit.
What rank is His, an Age who cannot boast,
More Modern by a Month, or Year at most?
'Midst Bards of old, or Those, whom, later born,
The present and the future Times shall scorn?
Who wants a Month, or Year at most, may be Allow'd the Privilege of Antiquity.
This frank Concession will my Cause avail;
By single Hairs, I bare the Horse's Tail.
One from an hundred Years you let me take,
From That Another, 'till the Heap I break;
Consulting Him, who values Wit by Years,
Nor living Bards, because alive, revere.*

I find a tamen, a nevertheless, in Mr Menage, which is wrong. He says, that Carneades laughed at This Invention of Chrysippus, and that, nevertheless, he made use of the Sorites, to prove that there were no Gods. 'Ridet illud inventum Carneades apud Ci- ceronem — Tamen ipse Carneades fortitè multa rogat apud Sextum Empiricum adversus Mathematicos pag. 339. & 340. dum probare fatigat non esse Deos (92). But Carneades's Contempt for the Quietist of the other Philosopher should not have hindered him from making use of the Sorites; on the contrary, That very thing should have made him most earnest to employ it against him.

[P] Dionysius Halicarnassensis produces him for an Example, that Authors, perfect in Logic, pay but little regard to the Rules of Grammar. Here are his Words, according to the Latin Translation: 'Denique temporibus consequentibus omnino neglecta est (bona collocatio verborum) nulliusque prorsus existimabat (eam) necessariam esse, quidpiamve ad orationis pulchritudinem conferre. Itaque ejusmodi structuras reliquerunt. — Dico autem Phylarchum, Durim — & alios infinitos — Verum quid opus eos admirari, ubi etiam hi qui Philosophiam profitentur, & de Dialecticis differunt disciplinis, adeo sunt in collocandis verbis fuciles, ut etiam pudeat dicere. Sufficiat autem argumento uti oratione Chrysippi Stoici: (ulterius enim non procedam) quo neque melius quisquam, neque exactius Dialecticas disciplinas prosecutus est (93): neque deteriori junctura compositos sermones protulit; ex his qui alicujus nominis & famæ sunt (94). — Lastly, in the following Times, a proper Position of Words was entirely neglected, and scarce any one thought it necessary, or that it contributed any thing to the Beauty of the Diction. They therefore laid aside such kind of Structures. — I speak of Phylarchus, Duris, — and numberless others. — But why should we wonder at these, when even the Professors of Philosophy and Logic are shamefully negligent in the Position of Words? I need only instance in the Style of Chrysippus the Stoic (for I will proceed no farther) than whom no one excelled more in Logic, nor fell so short in the Structure of Language: of those, I mean, who were of any Credit or Reputation.' Diogenes Laertius may serve us to confirm the Judgment of Dionysius Halicarnassensis; for, if he informs us, on one side, that Chrysippus's Logic was so much admired, that it was said the Gods would have made use of it, if they would have employed Dialectic; he observes, on the other side, that the same Philosopher did not write well. Οὐτὼ δ' ἐπίδοξον ἐν τοῖς διαλεκτικοῖς ἐγχαίρει, ὥς δὲ δοκῇ τὰς ἀλγεῖς ἐπὶ εἰς παρὰ θεοῖς ἢν ἡ διαλεκτικὴ, καὶ ἂν ἢ ἄλλη ἢ ἡ χρεωστικὴ. Πλεονέκτας δὲ τοῖς πρῶτοις μαρτυροῖ, τὴν λείαν ἐκαστὸν ὁρᾷ. Adeo autem in dialectica insignis fuit, tantæque apud omnes æstimationis, ut plerique dicerent, si apud deos usus esset dialecticæ, non futuram aliam quam Chrysippæam. Cæterum quum esset secundissimus, non usque adeo dictione clarus fuit (95).

[Q] He himself undermined all the Foundations of the Science that he had so much cultivated. See here the Proofs of it, which Plutarch supplies us with. 'Believe also, says he (96), our Friends the Stoics, saying, that Nature, not by Chance, but by a divine Providence, brought forth Chrysippus, when she had a Mind to turn Things up side down, and alter the Course of Life; for which purpose never was any Man fitter than he: But, as Cato said of Julius Cæsar, that never any but he came to the Management of public Affairs, sober and considerably resolved on the Ruin of the State; so does this Man seem to me, with the greatest Diligence and Eloquence to overturn and demolish Custom. Which they testify, who magnify the Man, when they dispute against him concerning the Sophism called the Liar: For to say, that a Conclusion, drawn from contrary Positions, is not notoriously false; And again, to say that some Arguments, having true Premises, and true Inductions, may yet moreover have the contrary to their Conclusions true; what Conception of Demonstration, or what Anticipation of Faith,

(90) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypos. lib. 2, cap. 22.

(91) Horat. Epist. 1, lib. 2, ver. 34, & seq.

(92) Menag. in Diog. Laert. lib. 7, n. 197, pag. m. 343.

(93) The Great runs thus, τὰς ἀλγεῖς τὰς διαλεκτικὰς τὴν ἡμετέραν.
(94) Dionys. Halicarn. de Collocatione Verborum, cap. 15, pag. m. 10.

(95) Diog. Laert. lib. 7, n. 180. See Cicero in the fourth Book de finibus, cap. 3, where he speaks of Chrysippus's Rhetoric with the greatest Contempt.

(96) Plut. de Comm. Notitiis advers. Stoicos init.

does this seem very strange, if one considers attentively what are the Effects of a long and earnest Application to the Subtilities of Logic. It almost always happens, that a Man of Parts, applying himself too much to This Study, becomes a Caviller, and, by his Sophistries, embroils the very Thesis that he had most zealously maintained. He will rather destroy his own Work, than abstain from disputing, and he forms Difficulties against his own Doctrine, which put his Art to a Non-plus. The Spanish School-men are a speaking Proof of this. They had not the Advantages, that Chrysippus had; for they did not, like him, join the Knowledge of good Literature to That of Logic. He was an universal Scholar; he understood Mythology, the Ancient and Modern Poets, History, &c. (s). There were but very few Subjects, whereon he did not write Books, and he condescended to give some little Precepts for the Education of Children [R]. This being at the bottom a very important thing to Human kind, we ought to praise him for having treated of it. He does not deserve the like Approbation for his Works of Grammar (t), nor for his Books de Divinatione, wherein he explained the very Prefages of Dreams (u). He took care not to forget the most famous Dispute of Things possible and impossible [S]: It concerned him as a Philosopher who asserted the Doctrine of Fate. He laid down a Thought, in his Treatise of Providence, ‘does it not overthrow? — Chrysippus’s Logic, taking away and cutting off it’s own chief Parts and Principles, what other Notion hath it left unsuspected of Fallhood? For the Superfluities cannot be steady and sure, if the Foundations remain not firm, but are shaken with so many ‘Doubts and Troubles.’ Plutarch adds, that the Sect of the Stoics, who complained of the Academics perverting the common Conceptions, were more guilty of That Fault than they. It must be said at least, that our Chrysippus deserved, as much as Arcefilaus, to be compared to those Tribunes of Rome, who disturbed the public Peace (97). There never was a greater Disturber of all things in the Empire of Philosophy; and, though he was a Dogmatist by Name, yet he laboured, in effect, as much for Pyrrhonism, as the most passionate Sceptics by Profession. For, if in a Syllogism, as it is pretended, he affirmed, that the Conclusion, drawn from a true Major and a true Minor, is so true, that it does not hinder a contrary Conclusion from being true also, it is to no purpose to argue, and a Man must no more hope to attain to Certainty; the most evident Propositions become Problematical; it is, as much as, or more than, if one should question, with Carneades, whether Things equal to a third are equal among themselves (98). This is the Fate of those, who addit themselves excessively to the Subtilities of Logic; they fall at last into their own Snares, and cannot extricate themselves; they discover Difficulties, which they cannot answer, and which, at the same time, overthrow what they had before laid down. Cicero has described their Character very well; I set down his Words, though I have made use of them elsewhere in the first Edition of this Work. ‘Dialectici ad extremum ipsi se compungunt suis acuminibus, & multa querendo repunt non modo ea quæ jam non possint ipsi dissolvere, sed etiam quibus ante exordia & potius de-texta prope retexantur (99). — The Logicians ‘in the end turn their own Points upon themselves, and, through much Enquiry, meet with what they not only cannot solve, but with what unravels all they have before woven.’ It is for this reason, that he compares Logic to Penelope, who unravelled her own Work (100). No body could, better than Chrysippus, know himself in the Picture of the Logicians, which Cicero has left us.

[R] He condescended to give some little Precepts, for the Education of Children. He has prescribed a kind of a Song for Nurses, and advised to make choice of the most honest, that were to be found. Nay, he would have had, if it had been possible, Children nursed only by learned Women. ‘Et Chrysippus etiam nutricum, quæ adhibentur infantibus, allectationi suum quoddam carmen assignat (101). Ante omnia ne sit vitiosus sermo nutricibus: quas, si fieri posset, sapientes Chrysippus optavit; certe, quantum res pateretur, optimas eligi voluit (102).’ He would have Children to be three Years under the Care of their Nurses, and that they should instruct them, without staying till they were older. He did not approve, that they should not be instructed till they were seven Years of Age.

Quintilian is of his Mind. ‘Quidam literis instituentos qui minores septem annis essent non putaverunt — melius autem, qui nullum tempus vacare cura volunt, ut Chrysippus, nam is quamvis nutricibus triennium dederit, tamen ab illis quoque jam in-formandam quam optimis institutis mentem infantium judicat (103). — Some have thought, that Children, under seven Years of Age, ought not to be trained to Learning — but they judge better, who are for improving every part of Life, as Chrysippus; for he, though he allowed three Years for Nursing, yet was of Opinion, that the Minds of Infants themselves ought to be cultivated as much as possible.’ He had examined the Question, Whether School-Boys were to be beaten? and declared for the Affirmative. ‘Cædi vero dicentes, quanquam & receptum sit, & Chrysippus non improbat, minime velim (104). — I would by no means have Learners beaten, though it is allowed of, and Chrysippus does not disapprove it.’ I would fain know, upon what grounds Vossius says (105), that the Stoic Chrysippus is the Author of the Nurses Songs, which Athenæus calls κατὰ γαυνκαλίσσεις (106). The Words, which I have quoted, and which he quotes also, out of the tenth Chapter of the first Book of Quintilian, are not a good Foundation to build upon.

[S] He forgot not the most famous Dispute of Things possible and impossible. It owed it’s Original to the Doctrine of the Stoics concerning Fate. The Thing in question, was to know, whether there are possible Things, among those that never were, and never shall be; or, whether all that is not, all that never was, and all that never shall be, is impossible. A famous Logician, of the Sect of Megara, whose Name was Diodorus, denied the first of these two Questions, and affirmed the second; but Chrysippus strenuously opposed him. Here are two Passages of Cicero: ‘Περὶ δυνατῶν με σέο κατὰ Διόδωρον κρίνειν. Quapropter, si venturus es, scito necesse esse te venire. Sin autem non es, τῶν ἀδυνατῶν ἐστὶν te venire. Nunc vide, ultra te κρίσις magis delectet, χροσιστία, ne an hæc, quam noster Diodorus (107) non concoquebat (108). — As to Things possible, know, that I am of the Opinion of Diodorus. Wherefore, if you intend to come, know, that you cannot but come, and, if you do not come, it is impossible you should come. Consider now, which Opinion you like best, That of Chrysippus, or That, which my Friend Diodorus could not digest.’ This is taken from a Letter, written by Cicero to Varro. He lays down, more at large, the whole State of the Question, in the little Book de Fato. I shall quote some Passages out of it. ‘Vigila, Chrysippe, ne tuam causam, in qua tibi cum Diodoro valente dialectico magna luctatio est, deferas — omne ergo quod falsum dicitur in futuro, id fieri non potest. At hoc Chrysippe minime vis, maximeque tibi de hoc ipso cum Diodoro certamen est. Ille enim id solum fieri posse dicit, quod aut sit verum, aut futurum sit verum: & quicquid futurum sit, id dicit fieri necesse esse: & quicquid non sit futurum, id negat

(s) Permutata alia colligit Chrysippus, ut est in omni historia curiosus. Cicero Tuscul. lib. 1, cap. 45.

(t) Varro de lingua Latina, lib. 8, pag. m. 101. mentions six Books of Chrysippus.

(u) See Cicero in libris de divinatione, v. g. l. 19. 20, 39. II. 15. &c.

(103) Id. ibid. pag. 8. Note, that he quotes him again in the 11th Chapter of the same Book, pag. 57.

(104) Id. ibid. cap. 3, pag. 17.

(105) Vossius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 87.

(106) Αἱ δὲ τῶν τριτηνῶν ἐπὶ καταβαυκαλίσσεις ὁμαζόντων. Nutricum lactantium cantilene Catibancæles noncupuntur. Athen. lib. 14, cap. 3, pag. 618.

(107) A Stoic who had lodged a great while in Cicero’s House.

(108) Cicero, Epist. 4. lib. 9. ad Familiares.

(97) See the Article ARCESTILÆUS, Citation (49).

(98) See above, Citat. (26), of the Article CARNEADES.

(99) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2, cap. 38.

(100) Quid quod eadem illa ars quasi Penelope telam retexens tollit ad extremum superiora. Id. Acad. 2. q. 2. lib. 4, cap. 29.

(101) Quintil. Inst. Orat. lib. 1, cap. 10, pag. m. 55.

(102) Id. ibid. cap. 1, pag. 6.

(*) See, above, Remark [E], of the Article CARNEADES.

Providence, which may be looked upon as a first Draught of one of the finest Principles, that a great Philosopher of the XVIIth Century has advanced, and cleared [T]. Some Authors have reported, that he took Hellebore, to encrease the Strength of his Genius (*). He died in the CXLIII Olympiad (y). They raised (y) Diog. Laërt. lib. 7, n. 184. Concerning the Circumstances of his Death, see Citation (119).

(109) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 6, & seq.

(110) In Rem. [E].

(111) Plut. de Stoicor. Repugn. pag. 1053, 1054.

(112) Arrian. in Epict. lib. 2, cap. 19, pag. m. 166.

(113) Citator honorifice apud Arrianum. Menag. in Laërt. lib. 7, pag. 341.

negat fieri posse. Tu etiam quæ non sint futura posse fieri dicis, ut frangi hanc gemmam, etiam si id nunquam futurum sit: neque necesse fuisse Cypselum regnare Corinthi, quamquam id millesimo ante anno Apollonis oraculo editum esset. — Placet Diodoro, id solum fieri posse, quod aut verum sit, aut verum futurum sit: qui locus attingit hanc quæstionem, nihil fieri quod non necesse fuerit: & quicquid fieri possit, id aut esse jam, aut futurum esse: nec magis commutari ex veris in falsa ea posse quæ futura sunt quam ea quæ facta sunt: sed in factis immutabilitatem apparere, in futuris quibusdam, quia non apparent, ne ineffe quidem videri: ut in eo qui mortifero morbo urgeatur, verum sit, hic morietur hoc morbo: at hoc idem si vere dicatur in eo in quo tanta vis morbi non apparet, nihilominus futurum sit. Ita fit ut commutatio ex vero in fallum, ne in futuro quidem ulla fieri possit (109). — Take care, Chrysippus, you do not desert your Cause, which has occasioned a great Contest between you and Diodorus, the famous Logician. — Whatever, therefore, is said to be false in time to come, That cannot happen. This you by no means assert, Chrysippus, and it is this very thing you so strongly contest with Diodorus. For he only asserts, that That may possibly happen, which is either true, or may hereafter be true, and what hereafter will be must necessarily be: and whatever will not hereafter be, That, he says, cannot possibly happen. Whereas you affirm, that even what will not be is possible, as that This Diamond may possibly be broken, which yet it never will be: and that it was not necessary, that Cypselus should reign at Corinth, though it was foretold a thousand Years before by the Oracle of Apollo. — Diodorus thinks, that That only is possible, which is either true, or will be true: which brings us to this Question, That nothing happens but what necessarily happens; and whatever is possible, either now is, or is to come: and that those things, which will be, can no more be changed from true to false, than those, which actually are: that there appears an immutability in those things, which are, but, in some of those, which will be, no such thing seems to be, because they do not appear: as of him, who labours under a mortal Disease, it may be truly said, This Man will die of This Disease; but the same Thing, if it be truly affirmed of him, in whom so violent a Disease does not appear, will nevertheless happen. Hence it is, that, in what is to come, there can be no change from true into false. Cicero makes it plainly appear, that Chrysippus found himself often puzzled in That Dispute, and it must not be wondered at; for the way he took had no Connexion with his Doctrine concerning Fate; and if he had known, or if he had dared to argue consequentially, he would have adopted the whole Hypothesis of Diodorus with all his Heart. It has been seen above (110), that, notwithstanding the Liberty he acknowledged in the Soul, and his Comparison of the Cylinder, all the Actions of Man's Will are unavoidable Consequences of Fate; from whence it results, that whatever does not happen is impossible, and that there is nothing possible but what is actually done. Plutarch runs him down both on this, and on his Dispute with Diodorus, and maintains, against him, that his Opinion about Possibility is altogether contrary to the Doctrine of Fate (111). Note, that the most illustrious Stoics had written on this Subject, without following the same Road. Arrianus names four of them, viz. Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Archedemus, and Antipater (112). He shews a great Contempt for This Dispute; and Mr Menage ought not to have quoted him as a Writer, who speaks honourably of Chrysippus's Work περί Δουλώ (113); for certainly these Words, γίγνεται δὲ καὶ Χρύσιππος δαυμάσας, &c. de his rebus mira scriptis Chrysippus, &c. are not an Elogy in That Place, as it appears by the foregoing and following Words.

Dionysius Halicarnassensis mentioned (114) two Treatises of Chrysippus, wherein, under a Title that promised other things, he made a great Excursion into Logic. The Work was intitled Περὶ τῆς συντάξεως τῶν τῶ λόγων μερῶν, de partium orationis collocatione, and treated only of Propositions true and false, possible and impossible, contingent, ambiguous, &c. A Subject, which our Schoolmen have very much handled and refined. Note, that Chrysippus acknowledged, that Things past were necessarily true, which Cleanthes would not admit of (115). Οὐ γὰρ δὲ παρὰ τὸν Διόδορον ἀναγκαῖον εἶναι, καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ εἰ περὶ Κλεάνθου φησὶν ὅτι δὲ οὐκ εἴσθαι. Non omne præteritum ex necessitate verum est, ut illi, qui Cleanthes sequuntur, sentiunt (116). We have seen, in another Place (117), that it has been pretended, that Abelard taught a Doctrine like That of Diodorus. I believe the Stoics resolved to give more extent to possible than to future Things, to soften the odious and frightful Consequences, which were drawn from their Doctrine of Fatality. At present, it puzzles the Spinozists, to see, that, according to their Hypothesis, it was as impossible from all Eternity, that Spinoza, for Example, should not die at the Hague, as it is impossible, that two and two should be six. They are sensible, that it is a necessary Consequence from their Doctrine, and a Consequence that scares and shocks the Mind, as containing an Absurdity diametrically opposite to common Sense. They are not well pleased, that it should be known, that they overthrow such a general and evident Maxim as this; Whatsoever implies a Contradiction is impossible, and whatsoever does not imply a Contradiction is possible. Now what Contradiction would there have been in this, that Spinoza should have died at Leyden? Would Nature have been less perfect, less wise, less powerful?

Let us not end without observing, that Chrysippus placed, among possible Things, the Resurrection of Men, and their Re-establishment in the same State, wherein each of them have appeared. Laërtius informs us of this, and also quotes his Words (118). Melius Chrysippus — qui in libris quos de providentia scripsit, cum de innovatione mundi loqueretur, hæc intulit. Τέτα δὲ ἔως ἐχούτω, δίδον ὡς ἐδὲν ἀδύνατον, καὶ ἡμᾶς μετὰ τελευτήσας, πάλιν πεισθόντων τινῶν εἰλημμένων χρόνῳ εἰς τὸ νῦν ἰσμεν καλεσθῆσθαι σχήμα. Chrysippus thought better, who, in his Books concerning Providence, speaking of the Renovation of the World, expresses himself thus: 'Things being so, it is plainly not impossible, that we ourselves, after Death, may, after certain Periods of Time, be restored to our present State.' The same Father ascribes to him another great Point of Orthodoxy, which moved him to do an ill Action; he believed, that his Soul would ascend into Heaven at its Separation from the Body; and he killed himself to go and enjoy that Place of Bliss (119): 'Multi ex iis quia æternas esse animas suspicabantur tanquam in cælum migraturi essent, sibi ipsi manus intulerunt, ut Cleanthes, ut Chrysippus, ut Zeno (120). — Many of those, who suspected the Soul to be immortal, that they might go to Heaven, laid violent Hands on themselves, as Cleanthes, Chrysippus, and Zeno.'

[T] He laid down a Thought — — — which may be looked upon as a first Draught of a Principle, which a Philosopher of the XVIIth Century has cleared.] Chrysippus, in his Work of Providence, examined this Question, among others, Did the Nature of Things, or the Providence that made the World and human kind, make also the Diseases, to which Men are subject? He answers, that Nature's chief Design was not to make them sickly, for that would not agree with the Cause of all good Things; but, in preparing and producing many great Things very well ordered, and very useful, she found, that some Inconveniences resulted from it; and so they are not agreeable to her primary Design and Aim; they

(114) Dionys. Halicarn. de Collocatione Verborum, cap. 17, p. m. 11.

(115) Omnia enim vera in præteritis necessaria sunt, ut Chrysippus placet dissentienti à magistro Cleanthe, quia sunt immutabilia nec in fallum è vero præterita possunt converti. Cicero de Fato, cap. 7.

(116) Arrian. in Epictet. lib. 2, cap. 19, pag. m. 165.

(117) In Remark [E], of the Article BERENGER.

(118) Laërt. Divin. Institut. lib. 7, cap. 23, pag. 506.

(119) Diogenes Laërtius does not speak of this; he says only, l. 7, n. 184, 185, that, according to Hermyppus, Chrysippus, being invited to a Sacrifice by his Scholars, drank some sweet Wine without Water, and fell into a Vertigo, and died five Days after; but, according to others, he died with laughing, bidding his Maid to give some Wine to an Ass, which had eat his Figs.

(120) Laërt. ibid. lib. 3, cap. 18, pag. 194.

raised a Monument to him among those of the most Illustrious Athenians (2). His Statue was erected in the Ceramicus [U]. He accepted of the Freedom of Athens, which neither Zeno nor Cleanthes had done. Plutarch's Criticism upon this seems to me too severe [X].

they are found in the Sequel of the Work, and exist only as Consequences. For the Formation of a human Body, said he, the exactest Idea, even the Usefulness of the Work, required, that the Head should be composed of a Contexture of small and thin Bones; but from thence this Inconvenience resulted, that it would not be able to resist Blows. Nature was preparing Health, and at the same time, by a kind of Concomitancy, it was necessary, that the Source of Diseases should be opened. It is the same with respect to Virtue; the direct Action of Nature, that gave it a Being, did, by a Counter-blow, produce the Generation of Vices. I have not translated literally, wherefore I place the Latin of Aulus Gellius here, in favour of those who understand that Language. 'Idem Chrysippus in eodem libro (quarto περί περνοίας) tractat consideratque, dignumque esse id queri putat, si ei τῶν ἀνθρώπων νόσοι καὶ αἰτίαι γίνονται. Id est naturae ipsa rerum vel providentia, quae compagem hanc mundi & genus hominum fecit, morbos quoque & debilitates & aegritudines corporum, quas patiuntur homines, fecerit: existimat autem non fuisse hoc principale naturae consilium, ut faceret homines morbis obnoxios; nunquam enim hoc convenisse naturae auctori parentique rerum omnium bonarum. Sed quum multa, inquit, atque magna gigneret parenteque aptissima & utilissima, alia quoque simul agnata sunt incommoda iis ipsis, quae faciebant, coherentia: eaque non per naturam, sed per sequelas quoddam necessarias facta dicit, quod ipse appellat, κατὰ παρακολούησιν. Sicut, inquit, quum corpora hominum natura fingeret, ratio subtilior & utilitas ipsa operis postulat ut tenuissimis minutisque ossiculis caput compingeret; sed hanc utilitatem rei majoris alia quaedam incommunitas extrinsecus consecuta est; ut fieret caput tenuiter munitum, & ictibus offensivibusque parvis fragile. Proinde morbi quoque & aegritudines partae sunt, dum salus paritur. Sic Hercule, inquit, dum virtus hominibus per consilium naturae gignitur, vitia ibidem per affinitatem nata sunt (121). I do not think, that a Pagan could have said any thing more reasonable, in the Ignorance he was in, of the Fall of the first Man; a Fall, which we could not know but by Revelation, and which is the true Cause of our Miseries: If we had many such Extracts of Chrysippus's Works, or rather if we had his Works, we should have a greater Notion of the Beauty of his Genius, than what we have.

The modern Philosopher, whom I meant, when I said, that he has explained a very fine Principle, of which Chrysippus's Thought was the first Draught, is the famous Author of the Search after Truth. The Substance of his Principle may be seen in the Miscellaneous Thoughts upon Comets (122), and one may judge thereby, whether Chrysippus had the same Idea.

As for the other Things that he advanced to justify Providence (123), you will find the Discussion of them in the Remarks [E] and [G] of the Article PAULICIANS. See also the Remark [F] of the Article DE JOTARUS.

[U] His Statue was erected in the Ceramicus. Diogenes Laërtius, who says this, has added to it an Observation somewhat fallacious. These are his Words: 'Ὡς δὲ καὶ τὸ σωματικὸν ἐνδεές, ὥς δὲ ἡνὶ ἐν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τὸ ἐν κερματικῷ, ὥς σχεδὸν τι ὑποκέρυπται τῷ πηλοῦ ἰππεύ. ὅθεν αὐτὸν ὁ Καρνεάδης Κρύππιον ἔλεγε. Erat autem tenui corpufculo, ut ex ejus imagine, quae in Ceramico est, videre licet, quae ferme à vicino equite occulitur. Quocirca illum Carneades Crypsippum vocabat (124). - - - He was a Man of very small size, as appears by his Statue in the Ceramicus, which is almost covered by an Equestrian Statue standing by it; for which Reason Carneades called him Crypsippus. It looks as if it were in order to prove, that the Statue of Chrysippus was small, that he mentions it's being almost entirely covered by the Equestrian Statue just by it. But this would be a very bad Reasoning, and I should rather believe, for his Honour, that he mentioned that Neighbourhood as a meer Fact, and not as a Proof of what he had just said; for, in short, it is easy to conceive, that a Man on Horseback may intercept the Sight of a Foot man of a good size. If we add to this, that the Statue of that Philosopher was sitting (125), we shall yet better apprehend how the Statue on Horseback might almost cover it all, without it's being a sign of it's Smallness, and therefore I wonder that Vossius, and several others, have approved the Reason which they pretend Diogenes Laërtius made use of. 'Chrysippum contumeliosè quasi latinam dixeris vocabat Zeno (126), teste Tullio in 1. de Nat. Deorum. Crypsippum Carneades, quia esset exiguus, ita ut statua ejus in Ceramico posita à vicino equite occulere: teste Laërtio (127). - - - Zeno in contumely called him Chesippus, that is to say, a Jakes, as Tully affirms in B. 1. de Nat. Deorum. Carneades called him Crypsippus, because he was so little, that his Statue in the Ceramicus was almost covered by an Equestrian one standing near it, according to Diogenes Laërtius. I shall observe, by the by, that they are mistaken who say, That Diogenes Laërtius, who mentions that Punn of Carneades, says also that the same Carneades accused Chrysippus of being a Parasite of Books, because he had copied Epicurus's Books Word for Word: 'Hunc (Chrysippum) Carneades lepidè parafitum librorum appellat quod scripta Epicuri sit furatus, scriptisque eadem & verbis & numeris Diogenes (128). This is what Volaterranus ventured to say, as taken from Diogenes Laërtius. It is a strange Alteration of another Censure, viz. that Chrysippus, out of meer Emulation, always set himself to write a Book as soon as ever Epicurus had published one. See the Remark [C] above. Robert Stephens, and Theodorus Wringier, have copied that Mistake of Volaterranus (129). For the rest, according to Pausanias (130), the Statue of our Philosopher was not in the Ceramicus, but in the College which bore the Name of it's Founder Ptolemy. Mr Menage reconciles that Difference, by supposing that this Statue was placed in the inner Ceramicus (131). Lipsius had said it (132). Plutarch mentions a brazen Statue erected to Chrysippus by one of his Scholars, with a glorious Inscription. 'Αεισεκρίων γὰρ ὁ Χρυσιππὸς μαθητὴς καὶ οὐκ ἐπὶ, εἰκὼνα χαλκῇν ἀνασπῶσας ἐπιγράψας τὸς τὸ ἐλεγεῖον,

Τῶν δὲ νέων Χρυσιππὸν Ἀεισεκρίων ἀνέθηκε
Τῶν Ἀκαδημαϊκῶν σεργασίῳ κοτίδα.

Aristocreon quidem Chrysippi discipulus & familiaris, aëream imaginem in columna ponens, hos elegos inscripsit.

Hunc Academiacos solitum discindere nexus

Chrysippum juvenem ponit Aristocreon (133).

Aristocreon, the Scholar and Friend of Chrysippus, placed his Statue on a Column, with this elegiac Inscription.

This Statue Aristocreon places here,

To young Chrysippus, who was wont to solve

The Doubts of th' Academics. —

[X] He accepted of the Freedom of Athens. — Plutarch's Criticism upon this seems to me too severe. Antipater, in his Books concerning the Variance between Cleanthes and Chrysippus, writes, that Zeno and Cleanthes would not be made Citizens of Athens, lest they should seem to injure their own Country. Now, if they did well, Chrysippus acted amiss in suffering himself to be enrolled as a Member of the City of Athens: However, I shall not insist any further upon that at present. But this I say; there is a monstrous Inconsistency in their Conduct, to preferre to their

(2) Pausan. lib. 1, pag. 55. Edit. 1696.

(125) Statua est in Ceramico Chrysippi sedentis, porrecta manu. — There is in the Ceramicus a Statue of Chrysippus, sitting with his hand stretched out.

(126) Cicero de fin. lib. 1, cap. vi. Note, ibat Siderius Apollinaris, Epist. 9, lib. 9, scy, ibat Chrysippus was represented so little, that his Statue in the Ceramicus was almost covered by an Equestrian one standing near it, according to Diogenes Laërtius.

(127) Vossius de Philosphor. sectis, cap. 19, n. 11, pag. m. 102.

(128) That is, Zeno the Epicurean.

(129) Vossius de Philosphor. sectis, cap. 19, n. 11, pag. m. 102.

(130) Volaterr. lib. 14, pag. m. 531.

(131) See Thomassius de plagio literario, pag. 170, 171.

(132) Pausan. lib. 1, pag. 39.

(133) Menag. in Laërt. lib. 7, n. 182.

(134) Lipsius Manud. ad Stoic. Philo. lib. 1, dissert. 11, pag. m. 654.

(121) Aulus Gellius, lib. 6, cap. 1.

(122) Paragraph 234, pag. 704, and following.

(123) See Aulus Gellius, lib. 1, cap. 1.

(124) Diog. Laërt. lib. 7, n. 182.

(133) Plot. de Repugnant. Stoicor. init. pag. 1033, D.

'native Place the bare name of Country, but deprive it of both their Persons and Converse, by going to reside so far off in a strange Place; which is just the same thing as if a Man should leave his Wife, and go to cohabit with another, bed constantly with her, and have Children by her, and yet refuse to contract Marriage with the second, lest he should seem to wrong the 'former (134).' Every body may see, that Plutarch gives us a Parallel between two Things that are not alike. The Caution of Zeno and Cleantes, with respect to their Country, was, really, a Piece of Civility that was received as such; but the Caution of the Husband, to whom the Censurer compares it, will never pass for any thing but Mockery.

(134) Id. ibid.
pag. 1034.

CHRYISIS, a Priestess of Juno at Argos, was the cause, by her Carelessness, that the Temple of the Goddess was wholly burnt. She had placed a Lamp too near the Sacred Ornaments; they took Fire, and, as she happened then to be in found a Sleep, that she did not awake soon enough to prevent the Consequences of that Accident, the Fire consumed the whole Temple (a). Some say that she perished in the Flames [A], but others affirm that she fled to Phlius that same Night [B]. She had reason to fear the Resentment of the Argians; for, instead of recalling her, they made another Priestess (b). That Dignity was very considerable among them; it was the Rule of their Dates and Chronology (c). That Fire happened in the Ninth Year of the Peloponnesian War [C].

(a) Thucydides, lib. 4, sub. fin.

(b) Called Phaenias. Thucyd. ibid.

(c) Josua Barnes in vita Euripidis, pag. 7. See Remark [C].

(d) Hieronymus adversus Jovinianum, lib. 1, pag. m. 438.

St Jerom observes, in his First Book against Jovinian (d), that our Chrysis, Priestess of Juno, was a Virgin. Marianus Victorius has no reason to say, in his notes on that Place, that the said Father speaks of Chryseis, whom Agamemnon carried away.

[A] Some say, that she perished in the Flames. Arnobius not only affirms it, but draws an Argument from this Fact against the Pagans. 'Ubi Juno regina, says he (1), cum incitum ejus fandum sacerdotemque Chrysidem eadem vis flammæ Argiva in civitate deleret? - - - - Where was your Queen Juno, when her famous Temple and her Priestess Chrysis were both destroyed together by Fire in Argos.' Clement Alexandrinus supplied him both with this Fact, and the Consequence drawn from it (2). It was injudicious in him to make use of such a Proof against the Gods of the Pagans; for, besides that Lucretius makes use of the like Reason to destroy the Worship of the Gods in general, might not Arnobius's Question have been retorted upon himself? Might he not have been asked, Where the God of Israel was, when the King of Babylon plundered and burned the Temple of Solomon? I do not know what the Fathers dreamed of, in some of their Arguments against the Gentiles.

(1) Arnob. lib. 6, pag. m. 207.

(2) Clem. Alex. in Protrept. pag. 35.

[B] - - - - others pretend, that she fled to Phlius that same Night. Since Thucydides, who lived in those Times, affirms this Fact (3), it is very likely, that it is true, and that therefore Arnobius grounded a bad Objection on a Falshood. Pausanias (4) relates, that That Priestess took refuge at the Altar of Minerva at Tegæ, and that the Argians, out of respect for that Asylum, did not require that she should be delivered up to them (5), nay, they preserved her Statue, for it was still to be seen in Pausanias's Time, at the Entrance of the Temple that was burnt (6).

(3) Thucyd. lib. 4, sub. fin.

(4) Pausanias, lib. 2, pag. 59.

(5) Id. lib. 3, pag. 86.

(6) Id. lib. 2, pag. 60.

(7) Thucyd. lib. 4, sub. fin.

[C] That Fire happened in the ninth Year of the Peloponnesian War. Thucydides affirms it (7). The learned Man, to whom the Public is obliged for the Edition of Euripides, printed in England in the Year 1694, informs us, that Chrysis was made Priestess of Juno at Argos in the third Year of the LXXVth Olympiad, and that she had exercised that Office Fifty six Years when the Temple was burnt. These are his Words, and his Quotation: 'Argis quidem hoc anno Chrysis Sacerdos Junonis constituitur, ex cujus sacerdotio mos erat Argivis periculis suorum temporum numerare. At illa quum per quinquaginta sex annos suo fungeret officio, tum demum lucerna negligenter ad corollas posita, templum incendio conflagravit (8).' - - - - At Argos, this Year, Chrysis is appointed Priestess of Juno; by the Succession of which Priestesses, the Argives used to reckon their Time. But, when she had exercised that Office Fifty six Years, placing a Lamp carelessly near the Ornaments, she set fire to the Temple, and destroyed it. No body would think, considering the Place where Mr Barnes has put the Quotation out of Thucydides, but that That ancient Historian informs us, that Chrysis was in the Fifty sixth Year of her Priesthood, when the Fire consumed the Temple, and yet Thucydides does not speak of it; he says only, That it was at that time eight Years and six Months from the beginning of the Peloponnesian War. Whoever would accuse Mr Barnes upon this Account, would be a Caviller; for if it be true, that Chrysis was made Priestess in the third Year of the LXXVth Olympiad, there is some reason to cite Thucydides to prove, that That Woman was in the Fifty sixth Year of her Priesthood, more or less, when the Temple was burnt; since Thucydides observes, that That Fire happened in the ninth Year of the Peloponnesian War (9). Farther, Thucydides observes, in a Place, which Mr Barnes does not quote (10), that the Peloponnesian War began in the Forty eighth Year of Chrysis's Priesthood. It is true, that this proves that That Priestess was in the Fifty seventh Year of her Office at the time of the Fire, and not in the Fifty sixth, as Mr d'Ablancourt (11) and Mr Barnes affirm.

* Thucydides, lib. 4, in ipso fine, fol. 164. Vide Joh. Meursii Archont. Athen. lib. 3, cap. 6.

(8) Josua Barnes in vita Euripidis, pag. 7.

(9) That is, the second Year, or thereabouts, of the 98th Olympiad.

(10) Lib. 2, init. pag. 99.

(11) In his Translation of Thucydides.

CHRISTINA, Queen of Sweden, died at Rome the nineteenth of April 1689. Look for SWEDEN.

CICCHUS (a), Native of Ascoli in Italy, an Author, who was reputed to have studied Magical Superstitions. It is not certain that he pretended to have a familiar Spirit. His Commentary on the Sphere of Sacrobosco was printed at Venice in the Year 1499. I shall recite Gabriel Naudé's Judgment of him [A].

(a) He is called Cicubus de Esculo, or Esculanus, or Esculanus, or Esculanus. Some say Cicubus, or Cicubus, instead of Cicubus.

(1) Apologie des grans hommes, cap. 13, pag. m. 344.

(2) Disquisit. lib. 1, cap. 3.

[A] I shall recite Gabriel Naudé's Judgment of him (1). The only Commentary that we have of Cicubus Esculanus on the Sphere of Sacrobosco, shews sufficiently that he was not only superstitious, as Delrio calls him (2), but also that he was a little crack-brained, having undertaken three Things in it that can do no less than discover his Folly: The first is, To interpret Sacrobosco's Book according to the Sense of Astrologers, Necromancers, and Chiropodists: The second is, To cite a great many Authors that are falsified, and full of old and foolish Stories, as for instance, Solomon de umbris idearum; Hiparchus de vinculo spiritus, de ministerio nature, de Hicrarebit spirituum; Apollonius de arte magica; Zoroaster de dominio quatuor elementorum; Hippocrates de stellarum aspectibus secundum lunam; Asthen de mineralibus confectis; and many more such: And the third, to make a frequent use of the Revelations of a Spirit called Florum †, whom he pretended to be of the Order of Cherubims: and that one day, being asked, What

† Cap. 4, 5ph.

He makes him live in the Year 1320 (b), in the time of Garbo, who was a Physician of Florence, who accused him of Magic before the Inquisitors, by whose Sentence he was burned alive. He adds that he had seen his Tryal at Rome in the Library of the Cavalier del Pozzo; and that he was a Wag, who acted the Magician, and that he published a Treatise of Natural Philosophy in Italian Verse.

The Author of the Turco-Papismus is grievously mistaken, when he makes him live under the Pontificate of Paul III [B]. There were almost two Centuries between the Death of that Astrologer and the Installing of that Pope, if we follow the Abbot Crescimbeni, who says that Cecco, of Ascoli, was burned at Florence the sixteenth of September 1327 (c). On that Supposition, I ought to have said, that he lived, not towards the end of the XVth Century, but about the beginning of the XIVth. I must not forget, that he makes a pretty good Figure among the Italian Poets. Some of the Poems that he writ in that Language have been printed [C]. A certain Author says that he was a better Astrologer than Poet (d).

(b) Naudanus, pag. 41. Edit. of Paris.

(c) Giovanni Mario de Crescimbeni, Storia della volgar Poesia, pag. 47, 262.

(d) Leandro Alberti, Descritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. m. 267.

What the Spots in the Moon were, he answered briefly, Ut terra terra est: But, besides that he does not attribute that Spirit to himself in any Place of the said Commentary, it is also easy to judge, that this Story is like that which Pliny tells of the Grammarian Apion, who raised the Devil to know Homer's Country. Leo Allatius relates Floron's Answer more at large; 'Patrum nostrorum memoria (3), says he (4), Cicchus Asculanus Commentar. de Sphæra cap. 4. tradit Floron spiritum naturæ nobilissimæ ex Cherubinica hierarchia quærenti, quæ esset illa umbra quæ in luna conficeretur, tradit respondisse, ut terra terra est, sic idea humiditatum est terra; si totam umbram habueris te non decipiet sicut umbra. Rursumque, ab alio de Christo interrogatum dixisse, carnem sumpsit humanam ut per ipsum salveretur omnis caro. --- Cicchus Asculanus, in his Commentary on the Sphere, chap. iv. says, that the Spirit Floron, of the most noble Nature of the Cherubinic Hierarchy, being asked what the Shade that appears in the Moon is, answered, An Earth is Earth, so the Idea of Moisture is Earth; if you had the whole Shade it would not deceive you like a Shade. And again, when he was asked by another concerning CHRIST, he said, that he took upon him human Flesh, that all Flesh might be saved by him.'

[B] The Author of the Turco-Papismus --- makes him live under the Pontificate of Paul III. He places this Pope among those that were addicted to Magic, and reproaches him with his intimate Conversation with Asculanus, a noted Magician, as a Proof of it (5): 'Paulum tertium cum Cecio Asculano, Magiæ & Necromantiæ insigniter perito magnam familiaritatem habuisse testantur historici *.' Sleidan, one of the Authors that he quotes, cannot be accused of that Fault. These are his Words, which he takes from a Libel that had been published against that Pope: 'An non turpissimum est te pendere totum ab Astrologis & Necromanticis? Negari factum non potest: nam & honoribus illos & facultatibus atque donis amplissimi casti Cecium, Marcellum, Gauricum Lusitanum & alios (6). --- Is it not a scandalous thing that you should be so fond of Astrologers and Necromancers: this cannot be denied: for you have advanced them to Honours, Wealth, and Presents, to wit, Cecius, Marcellus, Gauricus, the Portuguese, and others.' Sleidan says, indeed, that one Cecius had a share in the good Graces of Paul III, but he does not surname him Asculanus, and so he may come off. If he had had the like Precaution as to Gauricus, he could not have been charged with the Fault of making an Italian a Native of Portugal.

[C] Some of the Poems which he wrote in the Italian Tongue have been printed. His Poem della Natura dell' Universo was printed the first time in the Year 1478, with a Commentary by an anonymous Author, and afterwards in the Year 1516, and last of all, in 1552, in 8vo (7). The Abbot Crescimbeni, from whom I have this, says elsewhere (8), that l'Opera intitulata L'accerba di Maestro Cecco d'Ascoli Astrologo del Duca di Calabria, has been published.

(5) Sutilvius, in Turco-Papismus, lib. 1, cap. 8, pag. 55.

* Sleidan, & Verger.

(6) Sleidan, lib. 21, pag. m. 668, ad Ann. 1549.

(7) Crescimbeni, Storia della volgar Poesia, pag. 306.

(8) Ibid. pag. 47.

CICONIA (FLAMINIUS), a Native of Vicenza in Italy, was a tolerable good Philosopher about the end of the XVIth Century. I doubt not but his Italian Name was Cicogna or Cigogna. He published a Book at Vicenza in the Year 1592 [A]. Mr Konig was not acquainted with this Edition (a). There was one STROZZI CIGOGNA, a Gentleman of Vicenza, who was a Divine; a Philosopher, Doctor of Civil-Law, and Nuncio of the City of Vicenza. These are the Titles he gives himself at the beginning of a Book, which he dedicated to the Doge of Venice, and Council of Ten, the sixteenth of July 1605 [B].

[A] He published a Book at Vicenza in the Year 1592. It is a Quarto of 80 Leaves intitled, Quæstiones naturales in quibus juxta Aristotelis principia multa diligenter pertractantur & summa facilitate disputantur contra Robertum Juvenatensem. I have a Book, which was printed at Venice in 1585, with this Title, Quæstiones tres R. P. Domini Honorati de Robertis Juvenatensis Congregationis Lateranensis, Canonici Regularium Sancti Augustini. These are the Names and Titles of the Author that Ciconia refuses. He attacks some others here and there, as Averroes, Pomponatius, Zimara. These sorts of Books are now a Days like base Coin cried down.

[B] STROZZI CIGOGNA --- dedicated a Book to the Doge and Council of Ten --- in 1605. It is intitled, Del palagio de gl' Incanti & delle gran meraviglie d'e gli Spiriti & di tutta la natura loro. The Edition I make use of is of Brescia, appresso Comino Prefagni, 1605, in 8vo. The Oxford Catalogue mentions an Edition of Vicenza in 4to, also in the Year 1605 (1). This Book was printed the following Year in Latin at Cologne in 8vo, under the Title of Magiæ Theatrum de Spirituum & Incantationum naturâ. The Translator was one Gaspar Eps.

(a) He says that Ciconia published his Quæstiones Naturales, in 1603.

(1) Konig only speaks of the Edition in 1617.

CIECA, a Spanish Author of a History of Peru. See LEO.

CYGNE (MARTIN du), a Jesuit, is reckoned the most famous Rhetorician of the XVIIth Century. He published in 1661 an Analysis of Cicero's Orations, which has been re-printed several times, and particularly at Paris in 1704. He left also an Art of Poetry, an Art of History, and an Art of Rhetoric. He died at Ipres in 1669 (a).

(a) Taken from the Mémoires de Trevoux, July, 1704, Art. 95.

CIMON

CIMON, Son of that Miltiades, who vanquished the Perians in the famous Battle of Marathon, was one of the best Generals of the Republic of Athens. Some Historians relate, that he was committed to the same Prison, where Miltiades died, and was not released till he had paid the Fine the deceased was condemned to pay, which he could never have paid, if Elpinice, his Sister and Wife, had not married Callias [A]. Others say, he willingly made a Sacrifice of his own Liberty to have leave to bury his Father [B], and this latter Opinion would not well be confuted by saying, that in his Youth he was branded for his debaucheries [C]; for even those, who have blamed him on this account, yet confess he was of a free

[A] Some Historians relate, that he was committed to the same Prison where Miltiades died, and was not released — &c.] Cornelius Nepos follows this Opinion. 'Quam pater ejus, says he (1), litem æstimatam populo solvere non potuisset, ob eamque causam in vinculis publicis decessisset, Cimon eadem custodia tenebatur, neque legibus Atheniensibus emitte poterat, nisi pecuniam, qua pater multatus erat, solvisset. — His Father not being able to discharge the fine, and for that reason dying in Prison, Cimon was confined in his place, nor could he, by the Laws of Athens, be released, till he had paid the Sum, which his Father had been fined.' He adds, that Callias, who was more rich than noble, desired to marry Elpinice, and offered to pay Cimon's Debts, if he would agree to the Match. Cimon rejected the proposal, but Elpinice declared she would never suffer the Son of Miltiades to die in Prison, and, since she could prevent it by marrying Callias, she would do it. Thus the Affair was adjusted, and Cimon recovered his liberty by the marriage of Elpinice his Sister (2), a Woman that was not accounted of chaste (3). I have already made mention of her in another place (4). She bestowed her favours upon Polignotus the Painter. I know not whether he expressed his Gratitude to her otherwise than by the Picture of Laodice. To understand this, you must know, that Polignotus being to draw the Trojan Ladies, he drew Laodice exactly like Elpinice (5). Observe, that Herodotus, speaking of the Trial of Miltiades (6), says nothing of the Imprisonment, either of the Father or Son, and plainly insinuates, that Miltiades was not imprisoned at all. This great Man got a fall at the Siege of Paros, and hurt his Thigh; for which reason he could not himself answer at his Trial. His wound confined him to his Bed, and they condemned him in a Fine of Fifty Talents. And as he died soon after by the Mortification in his Thigh, his Son Cimon paid his Fine. This is Herodotus's account; but there wants one Circumstance which Plato tells us: the Sentence was, that Miltiades should be put into the Dungeon; but this Sentence was not executed; the College of the Prytanes opposed it. *Μιλτιάδην δὲ τὸν ἐν Μαραθῶνι εἰς τὸ βάρβαρον ἐμβαλὼν ἐκνήρισαντο καὶ εἰ μὴ διὰ τὸν αὐτάνην, ἐνέπεσον αὖν, Μιλτιάδην δὲ, qui in Marathonem pugnasset, in carceris barathrum detrudere decreverunt, ac nisi obstitisset magistratus, proculdubio incidisset (7). It is very strange, if matters were thus ordered, that Cornelius Nepos should write as we have seen above. He also says in the Life of Miltiades. Hanc pecuniam quid solvere non poterat, in vincula publica conjectus est, ibique diem obiit supremum. — Not being able to pay his Fine, he was thrown in Prison where he died. I shall produce some Authors in the following Remark, who maintain, that Miltiades did die in Prison.*

[B] Others say, that he willingly made a sacrifice of his liberty, to have leave to bury his Father.] This is so generous an Action, that I am surprised Plutarch should not mention it, who follows the Opinion of those, who say Miltiades died in Prison (8). It appears by Seneca's Controversies (9), that the Imprisonment of Miltiades, and Cimon left in his stead, served for Themes for the Rhetoricians to declaim upon. See also Valerius Maximus, who relates, that the Athenians constrained Miltiades to die in his Fetters, and would not suffer him to be buried, but on Condition, that Cimon his Son should be committed to Prison in his room. 'Bene egissent Athenienses cum Miltiade, si cum post trecenta millia Persarum Marathonem devicta, in exilium protinus misissent, ac non in carcere & vinculis mori coëgissent. Sed ut puto, hæcenus sævire adversus optime meritum abunde non duxerunt. Immo ne corpus quidem ejus, sic expirare coacti, sepulturæ prius mandari passi sunt, quam filius ejus Cimon eisdem vinculis se confringendum traderet. Hinc hereditatem paternam maximi ducis filius, & futurus ipse ætatis suæ dux maximus, solam se sortitum, catenas scilicet & carcerem, gloriari potuit (10). — Well had the Athenians acted with Miltiades, if, after a Slaughter of Thirty thousand Persians at Marathon, they had banished him, and not forced him to die in a Prison loaded with Chains; but in my Opinion they thought these Rigours but too mild for a Man of his distinguished Merit, when, after a Death, hastened by this severe treatment, not even his Body was permitted to be interred, till Cimon his Son submitted to his Father's Bonds. Thus Chains and Imprisonment were the only Inheritance, which a Son, who was afterwards the greatest General of his Age, could boast to have received from a Father, who had been the greatest of his.' In the next Chapter he says expressly, that Cimon, at the price of his own liberty, willingly purchased a Permission to bury his Father. Ne te quidem Cimon silentio involvam, qui patri tuo sepulturam voluntariis vinculis emere non dubitasti (11). — Nor shall Cimon's Fame be lost in Silence, who generously ransomed his dead Father's Body, at the Price of his own Freedom. I should not much regard the evidence of this Author, if it was not confirmed by an Historian: for though no Body had said it but Seneca's Rhetoricians (12), yet we should have found it in the Collections of Valerius Maximus: but here is an Authority of greater Weight. Græci duce constitutunt Cimonem Atheniensem, filium Miltiadis, quo duce apud Marathonem pugnatum est, juvenem, cujus magnitudinem futuram pietatis documenta prodiderunt. Quippe patrem ob crimen peculatus in carcerem conjectum, ibique defunctum, translatum in se vinculis ad sepulturam redemit (13). — The Greeks chose for their General Cimon of Athens, Son to Miltiades, General in the Battle of Marathon, a young Man, whose filial Piety had promised a future Grandeur, having surrendered himself Prisoner to redeem the Body of his Father, who, for defrauding the Public, had been thrown into Prison, and was there dead.

[C] In his Youth he was branded for his debaucheries.] They not only charged him with stupidity, but also with Lewdness, Drunkenness, and lying with his Sister (14). Κακῶς ἤκεν ὡς ἀπαρχὰς καὶ πολυπότης — νεὸς ἐν ἀντιᾷ ἐσχε πλυσσάμεν τῇ ἀδελφῇ. Male audivit ex iustis & violentia — adolescentia ejus famosa fuit quasi sorori suæ illuderet (15). These are great Faults of his understanding and heart. It is reasonable to believe the first imputation is Calumny; for he discovered so great a Capacity after he was raised to Employments, that there was no Appearance of his ever having been a silly Man or a Fool. I confess some heavy Minds unfold by little and little, and become skillful by practice in Business; but then observe, those Men, at the time of their heaviness, act with Judgment, and, if they have not vivacity, they have good sense, and are far from deserving to be called stupid and foolish; and therefore at the worst let us keep to the Testimony of Stesimbrotus, who was very near his cotemporary (16). Now what does he say of our Cimon? That in his Youth he learnt neither Music, nor any other things, which are commonly taught, among the Greeks, to those who had a good Education given them (17), that he had not that elegance of Behaviour, and softness of Language, which were peculiar to the Athenians, and that his Candor and Generosity favoured more of Peloponnesus than Attica. Τὸ πρότερον πολὺ τὸ γενναῖον καὶ ἀλκιμὲς ἐνυπάρχειν καὶ μάλλον εὐλα

(1) Corn. Nepos in Vita Cimonis, init.

(2) Tali modo custodia liberatus Id. ibid.

(3) Plut. in Cimon, p. 480, F.

(4) Remark [N] of the Article PERICLES.

(5) Plut. in Cimon, p. 480, F.

(6) Herodot. lib. 6, cap. 136.

(7) Plato. in Gorgia, pag. m. 352, B.

(8) 'Επειδὴ αὖν ἐν τῷ διωρισμῷ. Diem suum obiit in carcere. Plut. in Vita Cimon, pag. 480, D.

(9) See Seneca the Father, Controversies, 29, pag. m. 245.

(10) Valer. Maximus, lib. 5, cap. 3, n. 3, Ext. p. m. 460, 461.

(11) Id. ibid. cap. 4, n. 2 Ext. pag. 473.

(12) Miltiades peculatus damnatus in carcere aliquot dies decessit. Cimonque filius ejus ut cum sepeliret vicarium se pro corpore patris dedit. — Miltiades, being condemned for defrauding the Public, died in Confinement, and Cimon his Son, to redeem his Body, put himself in his Father's Place. Seneca, Controversies, 29, pag. 243.

(13) Justin. lib. 2, sub. fin.

(14) Plut. in Cimon, pag. 480.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Stesimbrotus Thasius, apud Plutarch. ibid.

free and generous Spirit (a). There is reason to believe that his Youth was not deftute, as some report (b), of the Advantages of Education, or the Endowments of Nature. I have much to say upon his Marriage with his Sister [D]. He fig-

nalized

(a) See Remark [C], Citation 18.

(b) See Remark [C].

- (18) Id. ibid.
- (19) Plut. in Cimon, pag. 481. he cites Ion.
- (20) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.
- (21) Plut. in Cimon, pag. 481.
- (22) Valerius Max. lib. 6, cap. 9, n. 3. Ext. pag. m. 583.
- (23) Plut. in Cimon, pag. 481.
- (24) Aristeria of Salamis and Mneftia.

είναι Πελοποννήσιον τὸ χρέμα τῆς ψυχῆς τῷ ἀνδρὶ. Mores insigni generositate & sinceritate tinctos, potiusque ingenium huius viri Peloponnesium fuisse (18). I do not know whether this Testimony of Stesimbrotus be true; for it is said that Cimon, being desired to sing at Dinner with Laomedon, had the Complaisance to do it, and performed well. Παροχρηθέντος αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀσπασθῆναι ἐκ ἀνδρῶν, cum rogatus esset canere, & non illepede cecinisset (19). Ion, who was at the same Entertainment, published this in one of his Poems. Cornelius Nepos affirms, that Cimon was eloquent betimes, well versed in the Knowledge of Civil-Law, and in the Art of War. Celeriter ad principatum pervenit, habebat enim satis eloquentiæ, summam liberalitatem, magnam prudentiam cum juris civilis, tum rei militaris, quod cum patre à puero in exercitu fuerat versatus (20). Let us also produce Plutarch: he does not confirm what is said of Cimon's Foolishness and ill Education. Cimon, says he (21), was not inferior to Miltiades for Courage, nor to Themistocles for good Sense and Wisdom; and, no doubt, was superior to both for Justice and Integrity: He was equal to them in the Qualifications of a good Commander, but excelled them both in those of a good Governor, and the Administration of the Civil Affairs of the Town, and this when he was young, and unexperienced in War. However it be, we find this Passage in an old Compiler. Cimonis incunabula opinione stultitiæ fuerunt referta (22).

Thus much for the first Charge. The second, with respect to his ill Morals, is not so easy to be defended. Plutarch confesses that Cimon abandoned himself to the Excesses of Love. Οὐ μὲν ἀλλὰ καὶ ὁλοῦς παύσαι τοῖς ἀπὲρ τὰς γυναῖκας ἐρωσὶν τοῖς ὁ Κίμων ἔνοχος γένεσθαι. At qui apparet omnino beffisse circa mulierum libidines Cimonem (23). He cites Melantibus the Poet, who names two Concubines That General was passionately fond of (24); but it is surprising that he should alledge also his Grief for the loss of a lawful Wife; for this Sentiment is not always a Proof of Lewdness. The most virtuous are sometimes inconsolable for the Death of their Wives. However it be, you find this Observation in the same place, where Plutarch is endeavouring to prove the lascivious Temper of Cimon. You will find also, that this disconsolate Husband had need of Philosophers upon this Occasion; and it is thought, Archelaus composed, at this time, his Elegies of Consolation. Διὰ δ' ἐστὶ καὶ πρὸς Ἰσοδίκην, τὴν Εὐρυπτολέμου μὲν θυγατέρα τὴν Μεσακλίου, κατὰ νόμον δ' αὐτῷ συμβιώσασαν, ὁ Κίμων ἐμπάθεσεν διαλειθεῖς, καὶ δυσφορήσας ἀποθανόντας, εἰ τι δεῖ τεκμαιρῆσθαι ταῖς γεγεμέναις ἐπὶ παρηγορίᾳ τὴν πένθος ἐλεγεῖαις πρὸς αὐτὸν ὃν Παναίτιος ὁ φιλόσοφος οἰεῖται ποιῆσαι γεγενῆσθαι τὸν φυσικὸν Ἀρχέλαον, ὃν ἀπο τρέπε τοῖς χρόνοις εἰκάζων. Jam non obscuro amore filiam Euryptolemi Magacis filii, justam tamen uxorem, est Cimon prosequutus, ejusque mortem tulit ægerimè, quatenus conicere licet ex scriptis ad leniendum luctum ejus elegiis, quas Panætius philosophus condidisse physicum Archelaum putat, neque absurdè ducit ex temporibus conjecturum (25). ----- It is moreover certain, that Cimon had an extraordinary Passion for his Wife Iodice, Daughter of Euriptolemus, Son of Megacles, and that he was greatly concerned at her Death, if we may credit the Elegies written to soften his Affections, of which, Panætius the Philosopher, not improbably from the Time, conjectures Archelaus the Naturalist to have been the Author. Observe by the way, there was a Report, that Cimon, having made a Discovery of his Wife, the Daughter of Callias, being guilty of Adultery, caused her to be put to Death. The Rhetoricians declaimed much upon that Subject (26); for they supposed him to be accused of Ingratitude, because, by marrying this Woman, he was enabled to pay the Debts he lay in Prison for. Some say, this was a supposed Case, and that the Rhetoricians altered the Case, to display their Wit the better (27). Perhaps it may be so; but the Reason, they found this upon, does not appear convincing to me. Callias, say they, paid the Fine, not to procure his Daughter the Benefit of marrying Cimon, but to have himself the Happiness of espousing Elpinice, Cimon's Sister. But might not somebody answer, Callias covenanted for both these Marriages, when he paid the fifty Talents; that is, he engaged Cimon to give him his Sister, and to marry his Daughter. There is great Confusion among Authors about this Matter; for Tzetzes says, that Callias, the Son of Cimon and Iodice, paid a Fine of fifty Talents, to hinder his Father's being punished for lying with his Sister (28). Let us boldly fix this Incest as one of Cimon's Debaucheries. As to Drunkenness, I do not see that Plutarch undertakes to acquit him; he only says, this did not prevent him from performing great Actions. There are his Words (29), to which the Verses of Eupolis the Poet, also refer (30). 'He is not wicked, but he is negligent, loving Wine more than Money, and sometimes he slips away, and lies all Night at Sparta, leaving poor Elpinice, his Sister, to lie alone; and if, thus lazy, as he is, and addicted to Wine, he has taken to many Cities, and gained so many Victories, it is certain, if he had been temperate and vigilant, no Grecian Commander, before or after him, would have excelled him in glorious Feats of Arms.'

[D] I have much to say upon his Marriage with his Sister.] The Commerce between Cimon and Elpinice is told several ways. Some consider it as lawful, others as unlawful. Cornelius Nepos is one of the first: 'Neque enim Cimoni fuit turpe Atheniensium summo viro, sororem germanam habere in matrimonio: quippe quum cives ejus eodem uterentur instituto. -- Nor was it a Crime in Cimon, the principal Man in Athens, to marry his own Sister: every Citizen had the same Privilege.' He speaks thus in his Preface: 'Habebat autem, says he, in another place (31), in matrimonio sororem suam germanam nomine Elpinice, non magis amore quam more ductus, nam Atheniensibus licet, eodem patre natus, uxores ducere (8). -- He married his own Sister, not more out of Love than Custom, for the Athenians are permitted to marry their Fathers Daughters.' Athenæus speaks of it in quite a different manner, assuring us, that Cimon lay with Elpinice, contrary to the Laws (32). I have already cited one, who pretends, that this infamous Commerce would have exposed Cimon to some grievous Punishment, if they had not paid a large Fine for him:

Καλλίας δὲ πενήκοντα τέλανθα ζημιῖται ὅπως ὁ Κίμων ὁ παῖς μὲν δεινὸν τι πάθῃ ἔνεκα γάμων τῶν αἰσχυρῶν τῆς ἀδελφομίας.

Decies talenta quinque multum Callias Solvit, Cimon ne quid mali pateretur ob Turpes sororis atque fratris nuptias (33).

Callias a Fine of fifty Talents paid, To screen his Sire from Laws his Love had broke, And join'd a Sister in the Marriage Yoke.

Rutgerfius, who relates this Passage, and that of Athenæus, as two Authorities, to prove, that this Incest of Cimon's was punished, alledges three other Authors for the same Fact, as Andocides, Suidas, Varinus. The first affirms, that Cimon suffered the Punishment of Ostracism, for breaking the Laws by lying with his Sister (34). According to Suidas, he was accused of lying with her, and banished for that Offence (35). Varinus observes the same thing (36), but through forgetfulness puts Arifides instead of Cimon. If we believe Rutgerfius, all these Authors vent nothing but Fictions (37): He opposes to them the Athenian Laws, which permitted the Marriages of Brothers with Sisters by the (28) Tzetzes, Chil. 1, Hist. 22.

(29) Plut. in Cimon, pag. 483.

(30) The Greek of Eupolis is: Κακὸς μὲν ἐν ἡν, φιλοπότης δὲ καμάλης. Κανὸς ἀπὸ κοινοῦ μὰτ' ἐν ἡν Λαυδαίμονι. Κὰν Ἑλπινίην τὴν δὲ καταλινὸν μόνην.

(31) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 1.

(32) I have recited his Words in Remark [N], of the Article PERICLES.

(33) Tzetzes, Chil. 1, Hist. 22.

(34) Οἷτος ἐστὶν Κίμων διὰ παρανομίαν ἐπὶ τῇ ἀδελφῇ τῇ αὐτῷ συνώκει. Andocides, in Ostracism, contra Alcibiadem, apud Rutgerf. Varior. Lect. lib. 1, cap. 9, pag. 39.

(35) Suidas, in Voce Κίμων & Ὀστρακισμός.

(36) Varinus, in Voce Ὀστρακισμός.

(37) Δηρῶν, Rutgerf. Varior. Lect. pag. 39.

(c) Plutarch in vita Cimonis p.
431.

nalized himself at the Battle of Salamis (c), and rendered himself so acceptable to the

(38) Corn. Ne-pos, in Vita Ci-monis, cap. 1.

(39) Philo, πρὸ
τῶν ἀναφαιρομένων ἐν εἰς νῦν.

(40) Schol. Aristoph. in Nub.
Act. 5, Sc. 2,
pag. m. 168.

(41) Seneca, in Ludo de Morte Claudii.

(42) Plut. in Themist. sub.
fin. pag. 128.

(43) Ὁμοῦγενῶν, ἐκ
πατρὸς γενίται.

(44) Demost. advers. Aristocrat.
pag. m. 457.

(45) Cyrtill. lib.
6, contra Julia-num.

(46) Rutgerf.
Variar. Lect. pag.
138. Dalechamp, in his Version of Athenæus, hath omitted ob id.

(47) Wower, in Minuc. Felicem,
pag. m. 304.

(48) Georg.
Galp. Kirchm.
in Cornel. Ne-
pos. Cimon. pag.
m. 242.

(49) Plut. in Ci-mone, pag. 489.

(50) Id. ibid.,
pag. 488.

(51) Id. ibid. A.

the Father's Side, which he proves by the Testimonies of Cornelius Nepos (38), Philo (39), and the Scholiast of Aristophanes (40). He cites these words of Minutius Felix: Athenis cum sororibus legitima conjugia. — At Athens it is lawful to marry a Sister: and Seneca, who says, Athenis dimidium licet, Alexandria totum (41). — At Athens it was allowed to marry in half Blood, at Alexandria in the whole: and Plutarch (42), who relates, that Archepolis, the Son of Themistocles, married Mneſtipoleme his own Sister (43). He attacks them from another quarter, and pretends, that Ostracism was never used to punish Crimes, but was designed to lessen the Glory of a Virtue that was envied, and he shews the Differences among those who say Cimon was punished. Some pretend he was banished, and others, that he was fined fifty Talents. Some assure us he was fined for his Father's Crime, for which he cites several Writers, as Herodotus, Cornelius Nepos, Seneca the Father, Valerius Maximus, and Justin. Unnecessary and mistaken Citations; for they have no Reference to the Question he is examining, or to the Punishment, the Authors he refutes are speaking of. They mean only the Punishment which was inflicted on Cimon, after his long Administration of the Affairs of the Republic. Finally, he quotes Demosthenes, who informs us, that Cimon was fined fifty Talents, for attempting to engross the public Administration of Affairs, and that there wanted but three Voices to have put him to Death (44). He quotes also a Passage of St Cyril (45), which declares, that Cimon's Punishment was grounded on his being convicted of having aspired to the Sovereignty. Rutgerfius, in my Opinion, is partly right, and partly wrong: He is right to maintain, that the Athenian Laws permitted Men to marry their Sisters, provided they were not by the Mother's side, and that Cimon's Banishment was not on account of his Marriage with Elpinice; but he is wrong in imputing what he does to Athenæus. Athenæus, giving a Catalogue of Pericles's Vices, concludes with the Adventure of Elpinice. This Conclusion contains four things: 1. That Cimon had enjoyed his Sister in a criminal manner. 2. That afterwards he married her to Callias. 3. That he was banished. 4. That, for procuring his Return, Pericles was rewarded with the Enjoyment of Elpinice. This is what Athenæus says; but he does not say that Cimon was banished for having enjoyed his Sister; therefore Rutgerfius is to blame for inserting, in his Translation of that Greek Author, a Clause which he ought not to insert: you will find it in a Parenthesis in the following Words. 'Cum Cimon Elpinice sorore quam postea Calliæ elocavit contra leges abutaretur ac (ob id) in exilium pulsus esset (46). — — — — — Because Cimon had, contrary to the Laws, married his Sister, (whom he afterwards gave to Callias), and was, (for that reason), banished.' He is not the only one who is here mistaken. Wower (47), Kirchmayer (48), and several others, impute the same thing to Athenæus. The worst is, they charge Plutarch with the same, though he says, very plainly, that the Cause of Cimon's Ostracism, was Resentment for an Affront the Athenian Troops received at Sparta (49). This Resentment renewed and redoubled the ill Design, which was hatching against Cimon, who had been long suspected of too much Friendship for the Lacedæmonians, and was become odious to the popular Faction (50), by attempting to re-establish the Authority of the Areopagus, and to restore to the Nobility the Tribunals which the People had taken from them. The Reason, which has deceived the Authors I now criticize, is a very weak one. Plutarch relates, that the Endeavours to restore Aristocracy raised a Clamour against Cimon, that they animated the People against him, and renewed the old Slanders concerning his Commerce with Elpinice (51). But is this a good Reason to maintain, that this Author affirms That Commerce to be the Cause of Cimon's Exile? Must it not be confessed, that an infinite number of Authors examine ill what they allege, and but very few are exact? It may be said, perhaps, that it is true, Athenæus and Plutarch do not say what is imputed to them;

yet it may not be less certain, that Cimon's criminal Conversation with his Sister was the Cause of his Banishment. I answer, there remains no other Authority for this Fact, but that of the Orator Andocides; for, it is probable, Suidas builds upon him: and, as to Varinus (52), his Testimony is of no Weight. He lived in the beginning of the XVIth Century. Let us see then how far Andocides is to be depended upon, and let us remember, that an Orator makes no Scruple to amplify or extenuate things, according to the Interest of his Cause; he suppresses those Circumstances which are not to his Purpose; he takes for principal, what has been only accessory, or for accessory, what has been principal. Andocides knew, either by Books or by Tradition, that Cimon's Enemies raised a loud Clamour against him, when they were attempting to get him banished. They ript up all the Faults of his Youth, and, above all, they raked into the old Filth of his Commerce with Elpinice: He was banished, not for his Crime, but because he was suspected of too much Ambition, and they abhorred his Attachment to the Lacedæmonian Interest. But it did not serve Andocides's Turn to touch upon this true Cause of his Banishment; therefore he takes no notice of it. His Design was to represent with what Severity their Ancestors punished a scandalous Behaviour; therefore he insists only on the Reproach of an ill Life, alledged by Cimon's Enemies, and gladly assigns this for the only Cause of the Exile of that great Man. But it may be replied, does not Tzetzes say, that vast Numbers of Authors have reported, that Callias, the Son of Cimon and Jodice, paid fifty Talents to prevent the Mischief his Father was threatened with for his Marriage with Elpinice. I confess he does say this.

Τὸ δ' ὅροι ταῦτα γράψαι, μακρὸν ἐστὶ μοι
λέγειν,
Ἐστὶ γὰρ πολλοὶ ἀπειρεὶν τῶν ταῦτα γεγενότων,
Οἱ κωμικοὶ, καὶ ῥήτορες, Διδάσκαλοι καὶ ἄλλοι.
Quot ista tradant, longum id esset exequi,
Nam sunt eorum plurimi, qui hæc scripserunt,
Diodorus, alii, Comici, atque Rhetores (53).

--- It would be tedious for me to reckon up all who have maintained the same; there is, indeed, a vast Number, Comedians, Rhetoricians, Diodorus, and others.

But in the first place, there is no Writer extant, who makes mention of a Callias, the Son of Cimon, nor who relates that a Son of Cimon paid for his Father. In the second place, the Authors, who remain, do furnish us with Reasons to doubt of these Facts; so that we ought not to rely much on the Evidence of a Poet, who lived in an Age far distant from all Antiquity. Thirdly, We may observe, he chiefly points out Comic Poets and Rhetoricians, Men that play with Circumstances, and dispose them as they please. To conclude, I say it is customary for Writers, who are something more solid than Tzetzes, to cite several Authors at the end of a long Narration, although those Authors do only mention the chief Points of that Narration; therefore we may suppose, that this great Number of Authors, that Tzetzes refers us to, only speak of the unlawful Amours of Cimon and Elpinice.

There remains another Difficulty to examine. If the Athenians were permitted to marry their Sisters, by the Father's Side, how comes it to pass that Cimon was so much traduced for such a Marriage? I answer, that, in all appearance, the Slander, that was raised against him, was only built upon a Supposition that he lay with Elpinice before he married her. Plutarch leads us to this, for, after observing, (54) that it was believed, Cimon was guilty of a criminal Conversation with his Sister, he adds, that others said she was his Wife, and that, not being able to find a suitable Match for herself, because she was poor, she chose her Brother for her Husband. Εἰσὶ δ' οἱ τὴν Ἐλπινικὴν, ἢ κούφα τῷ Κίμωνι, φασκεῖν (52) That is to say, Varinus Peditanus.

(53) Tzetzes, Chil. 1, Hist. 22, apud Rutgerf. Var. Lect. lib. 1, cap. 9, p. 37, 38.

(54) Plut. in Cimon. p. 430. F.

the Athenians, that they readily advanced him to the highest Posts. If his own merit ἡρώς δὲ γημεμένην συνεικῆσαι λέγουσιν, ἀλλὰ τῆς εὐγενείας νομίμῃ διὰ τὴν πατρίαν ἀπορῶσαν. Sunt qui Elpinicem non clam cum Cimone, sed apertè ferunt contractis nuptiis ut uxorem habitasse, quod sponsum pro generis dignitate non inveniret inopiam (55). As far as Histories of this Nature can be certain, we may be assured, in Consequence of these Words, that Cimon enjoyed his Sister before she was his Wife (56). They were both of an amorous Temper. If he was lewd, she was not chaste. They were very young, and lived together; judge, I beseech you, if they could contain. Such Intrigues do not continue long, before the World begins to suspect something; the Slander soon fills the whole Town; thus Cimon was traduced with it. It is probable, that, to screen himself from Satire, without being deprived of the Pleasures of his Amour, he did what the Laws allowed; that is, he married Elpinice. He acted, in this Case, as many others, who marry the Mistresses they have dishonoured. This is a Reparation of Honour, with respect to the Magistrate, but none to the particular Persons. They are always punishing the Fault by their Satire; the Breach is always open in their Opinion; it is a Wound ill closed, which they spitefully open again, as Opportunity offers. No wonder then, that Cimon's Enemies made use of this old Infamy, as often as they would plague and persecute him. But, when Historians have been favourable to him, they have only considered the thing in it's best light, and dismissing the Preliminaries of his Marriage, are contented with saying, Elpinice was his Wife. Cornelius Nepos has blindly followed this Method, in imitation of those other Authors mentioned by Plutarch. You see now, that, by knowing what the Athenian Laws allowed, it may be said, our Cimon transgressed the Laws by his Commerce with his Sister. If it is asked why he did not marry her, as soon as he fell in love with her, I answer, because she was poor, and he was willing to indulge himself, without entering into any Engagements, which might deprive him of the Liberty of marrying a rich Woman, when an Opportunity presented: but, when his Commerce with her grew infamous, he was forced to take other Measures, and convert his Concubinage into Wedlock. We often see such Conversions.

I did not remember that any one before me had made use of this Distinction, which I have just made; but, having read again two Chapters of Muret, wherein he criticizes Cornelius Nepos, I find that, Two hundred Years ago, the Latin Translation of Plutarch had made use of it. Let us see a little the Substance of Muret's Criticism: Muret declares (57), that, reading in Cornelius Nepos, that it was no shame for Cimon to marry his own Sister, the Athenian Custom allowing it, he was surprized at it, for he did not remember that any other Author mentions such a thing of the Athenians. He considered it attentively, and he recollected the Harangue of Andocides, where it is said that Cimon was banished for this Marriage, as a Transgressor of the Laws; therefore he apprehended Cornelius Nepos was mistaken. Two or three Years after (58), the Apology of that ancient Historian appeared in the Notes upon Plutarch (59). The Apologist makes use of two Methods: 1. He says that Cimon was banished, for having to do with his Sister before she was his Wife. 2. That Themistocles's Son married his Sister, by the Father, as Plutarch witnesses; and therefore Cornelius Nepos is not the only one who charges the Athenians with such a Custom: the first Observation was confirmed, by the Word πατρὸς, against the Laws, which an Author uses in speaking of this Commerce (60); a Word which would have been useless, if, in some Cases, the Athenian Laws had not permitted a Man to lie with his Sister. Muret replied, that he was not ignorant that the Athenian Laws permitted the Marriage of a Sister, not by the Mother's Side, with her Brother (61). Theon, continued he, has informed me of this, in his Notes upon Aristophanes; and I had read, in Philo, the Difference there was between Solon and Lycurgus: the latter allowed them to marry their Sister, by the Mother's Side, the former their Sister by the Father's Side; but I never knew they were allowed to marry their Sister both by Father and Mother: and, if Elpinice was only Cimon's Sister by the Father's Side, Cornelius Nepos was wrong to call her sororem germanam, and they would not have had a just Reason for banishing Cimon; for it was not Incest, but simple Fornication, to lie with a Woman that the Laws allowed to marry. The Addition of the Word πατρὸς, proves nothing. They may as well tell me, that Cicero would not have employed the Term nefarie, speaking of Cataline's Conspiracy, if (62), in some Cases, it had not been lawful to conspire the Ruin of one's Country. Muret concludes, that Cimon and Elpinice had the same Father and Mother; and, for that Reason, they considered his Marriage as a Breach of the Laws. He adds, that St Cyril (63) would not have reproached Cimon with this Marriage, as a vile Action, if it had been consistent with the Customs of the Athenians. In that Case he ought to have condemned Solon, and not Cimon.

Let us make a few Remarks here upon this Dispute of Muret. I. It was so natural to join the Observations of the Scholiast upon Aristophanes, and of Philo, to the Censure of Cornelius Nepos, that it cannot be imagined the Critic would have omitted them if he had known them. I appeal here to the Consciences of all learned Men. One word, if you please, Gentlemen; can you believe, that a Man of Learning, who looks upon what Cornelius Nepos said to be false, viz. that the Athenian Laws gave Permission to marry a Sister; can you believe, that he would content himself with alleging Andocides, and there shut up his Chapter, when he knows what the Interpreter of Aristophanes and Philo have observed upon the same? Can you believe, that, if he remembers, they say, it was permitted in Athens to marry a Sister by the Father's Side only, he would make no Reflexions thereupon, but quit Cornelius Nepos abruptly, without informing the Public of so curious a Difference as that, between the Laws of Solon and Lycurgus, concerning the Marriages of Brothers with Sisters? I am certain, if you speak sincerely, you will answer me in the Negative, and that, if Muret has not inserted those Remarks, it is purely because he was not then acquainted with what Theon and Philo have since taught him. Let us say then, that in this Place of his Answer to the Apologist of Cornelius Nepos; Ego autem non eram nescius licuisse Atheniensibus sorores eodem patre, dum ne eadem matre, natas uxores ducere: Docuerat me id Theon — docuerat me id Philo (64): — I was not ignorant, that at Athens a Man might marry his Sister by the same Father, if she were not Sister by the same Mother: Theon and Philo had both informed me of that: he is fallen into the Foible of some learned Men, whose Vanity does not permit them ingenuously to confess, that they are indebted to their Censors for some Information (65), whether they have this Obligation to them from what they have found in their Works, or because they have there seen some things, which have given birth to enquiries, that otherwise would never have been attempted. That, which confirms me in this Thought, is, that, if he had known at that time what these two Writers say, he would have seen the Error of his own Criticism; for he could not be ignorant that the Historian, he censures, evidently supposes, that Elpinice was not the Sister of her Husband by the Mother's Side (66). He could only then have charged him with using an improper Word, in maintaining, that soror germana signifies a Sister by Father and Mother. II. Muret did not forget this grammatical Note, in his Answer to the Apologist: but who will believe that a polite Author, in the time of Augustus, could be ignorant that germana soror may signify a Sister by the Father's Side? It has been proved against Muret, that his Criticism was ill-founded (67). III. He is wrong to imagine, that, because it was permitted to marry a Sister by the Father's Side, therefore to defile her before Marriage was not a punishable Crime. It must be supposed, that the Laws, by permitting some particular things, yet do not free from blame those (55) Id. ibid. pag. 481, A.

(56) Plutarch, de his qui sero à Namine puniuntur, pag. 552, suppositi they might have brought a criminal Process against Cimon, for his Commerce with his Sister. ἢ Κίμωνος συνόντα τῇ ἀδελφῇ διότι εἶπεν: aut Cimonem cum sorore concubentem in Judicio reum tantis criminis peregrifect.

EXAMINATION of Muret's Criticism.

(57) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 7, cap. 2, pag. m. 989.

(58) Id. ibid. lib. 15, cap. 5, pag. 1138.

(59) See the Notes of Xylander and Cruiserius, in Vitas Plut. pag. 40.

(60) Athenæus, lib. 13.

(61) See the 5th Chapter of the 14th Book of Variæ Lectiões.

(62) Nam illud quidem argumentum ex Athenæo, non fuisse additurum, πατρὸς non idem heri posset etiam πατρὸς, æque bellum esset, ac si quis, quia Cicero alicubi dicit, Catilinam pestem patriæ nefarie moliri, colligat, idem non semper nefarie, sed interdum etiam sine scelere fieri posset. Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 15, cap. 5, pag. 1138, 1139.

(63) Cyrill. advers. Julianum, lib. 6.

(64) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 15, cap. 5.

(65) See Remark [E], of the Article MARCIONITES.

(66) Habebat in matrimonio sororem germanam suam, nomine Elpinicem: non magis amore, quam patrio more, ductus. II. Muret did not forget this grammatical Note, in his Answer to the Apologist: but who will believe that a polite Author, in the time of Augustus, could be ignorant that germana soror may signify a Sister by the Father's Side? It has been proved against Muret, that his Criticism was ill-founded (67). III. He is wrong to imagine, that, because it was permitted to marry a Sister by the Father's Side, therefore to defile her before Marriage was not a punishable Crime. It must be supposed, that the Laws, by permitting some particular things, yet do not free from blame those merit on the one side was an advantage to him, the public Envy of Themistocles's Glory was no less for his Interest [E] on the other, who had been too long in Authority not to have a rival wished for, to supplant him. - Cimon's Courtesy, and the Discipline he established among the Athenian Troops, whom he commanded under Pausanias General of all Greece a Man fierce and harsh, contributed not a little to transfer the Superiority of the Greeks from the Lacedemonians to the Athenians. All the Allies put themselves under his Conduct, in order to besiege Pausanias in Byzantium (d), whose ill behaviour they were no longer able to bear, and afterwards to attack the Persians in a City of Thrace (e), upon the River Strymon. He defeated them upon that River; after which he made a descent upon the Country, and blocked up the City in such a manner, that the Governor, despairing of being

(67) See Woeværus in Minicium Felicem, pag. m. 304, and Rutgerius, Var. Lect. lib. 1, cap. 9, pag. 41.

(d) They could not take him; he escaped privately. Plut. in vita Cimonis, pag. 483. C. See the Article CLEO NICE, Remark [A].

(e) Called Eione: see Remark [B] of the Article AGESIPOLIS.

those that commit them. I am sure very few among the Athenians acted like Cimon, the Public being shocked at those Sorts of Marriages. If I am not mistaken, they looked upon it as an odious and scandalous thing. And therefore it was thought a horrible Action for a Man to debauch his own Sister, and, when he was at liberty to marry her, to chuse rather to live with her in a State of Concubinage. IV. The Argument taken from the word παρνόμος might have been better answered; they might have alledged Athenaeus himself, who says somewhere, that Alcibiades was charged with not observing the Laws in his Amours, since he lay with his Mother, his Daughter, and his Sister. Παράνομον εἶναι λόγον καὶ εἰς γυναῖκας καὶ εἰς τὴν ἀλλήν διαβαίνει. συνέιναι γὰρ ἔστιν αὐτῷ καὶ μητρὶ καὶ θυγατρὶ καὶ ἀδελφῇ ὡς Πέρσας. Dicens contra leges eum & faeminarum congressu abuti, & reliquam vitæ partem agere: esse ΝΑΜ-QUE illi cum matre, filia, sorore, more Persarum, supri consuetudine (68). V. What relates to St Cyril is very weak. These are Muret's Words: 'Postremo sanctissimus & eruditissimus vir Cyrillus Alexandrinus libro sexto adversus Julianum, non furtivos concubitus, sed nuptias, cum sorore Cimoni, ut scelus nefarium objicit: non facturus, si id apud Athenienses legitimum & usitatum fuisset. Tunc enim accusari Solonem oportuerat, qui id permisset, non civem, qui patriæ suæ legibus parvisset' (69). — Lastly, That most pious and learned Man Cyril of Alexandria, in his sixth Book against Julian, does not condemn private Amours, but Cimon's Marriage with his Sister, as a great Crime; which he would not have done, had such a Marriage been allowed or usual at Athens; for then he should have condemned Solon, who permitted such things, not a private Man who conformed to the Laws of his Country. If St Cyril speaks only of the Marriage, it does not follow, that Cimon had not corrupted his Sister before he married her; besides, there are some Permissions so contrary to decency, that those who make use of them are very blameable. And besides, it is not plain, that the principal Design of this Father was to make the Pagans ashamed of the scandalous Disorders that were committed among them, and so to lash the Republic of Athens through the Sides of Solon.

I cannot dismiss this Subject, without saying one word upon the contrary Methods of Solon and Lycurgus. The former allowed them to marry their Sisters by the Father, and forbid them their Sisters by the Mother. Lycurgus, on the other hand, permitted the latter, and prohibited the former. This is ridiculous both ways, and I would fain know upon what reasons they founded this Distinction. I am afraid they are but frivolous ones; for what can be more insipid, in order to justify the Athenian Legislator, than to say, that the Relation is always certain, with respect to the Sisters on the Mother's Side; whereas a Man's Daughters by a second Marriage sometimes are nothing at all to the Children of the first? Does this extenuate the Interest? Is it not sufficient that they believe they marry their Sisters? The Egyptian Legislator justly laughs at this Scruple of these two Greeks; and, though he was very wrong to unite what they had divided, yet he was right to call their Division a Chimera. Read Philo's Words: 'Ο μὲν ἐν Ἀθηναῖος Σόλων ὁμοπατρίας ἐπέειπε ἀγοσθαι, τὰς ὁμομητρίας ἐκώλυσεν· ὁ δὲ Λακεδαιμονίων νομοθέτης ἐμπαινον, τὸν ἐπὶ ταῖς ὁμογαστρίαις γάμον ἐπιτρέψας, τὸν πρὸς τὰς ὁμοπατρίας ἀπίπεν. ὁ δὲ τῶν Ἀργυπίων, χλευάζων τὴν ἐκείνων εὐλασίαν, ὡς ἡμέτερα διατάγματα, εὐφρόνησεν εἰς ἀσέλγειαν, ἐπιδεικνύμενος δυσθεράπευτον κακὸν σωμασι καὶ ψυχαῖς ἀκερσίαν, καὶ παρσυχῶν ἀδείαν ἀπάσας ἀδελφὰς ἀγοσθαι, τὰς τε ἰδίας τῷ ἑτέρῳ τῶν γονέων, τῷδε, ἢ τῷδε, καὶ τὰς ἐξ ἀμφοῖν, καὶ τὰς ἡ νεώτερας μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρεσβυτέρας καὶ ἰσχυρὰς καὶ δίδυμοι γὰρ πολλὰς ἐγεννήθησαν, ὥς ἡ μὲν φύσις ἀμα τῇ γενέσει διήρνησε καὶ διεζεύξεν. ἡ δ' ἀκολασία καὶ φιληδονία εἰς κοινωσίαν ἐκάλεσεν ἀκοινώνητον, καὶ ἀρμόριαν ἀνάμωτον. Atheniensis Solon hoc observat in uterinis tantum germanis, eodem patre prognatis relinquit liberum: contra Lacedemoniorum legislator uterinis non interdicat connubio, sed solis eodem patre genitis: at Ægyptius ridens utriusque simplicitatem & femipsecta placita, laxavit libidinem, & auxit in corporibus animisque insanabilem malum intemperantiæ, permittit licentia ducendi sorores, five per alterutrum parentem five per utrumque cognatas, majores pariter & minores æqualeve, ne gemellis quidem exceptis, quas natura ipso natali sejunxit, intemperantia vero societate copulavit inociabili, & male comparata junctura (70). — The Athenian Legislator, Solon, allowed Sons and Daughters by the same Father, but not by the same Mother, to marry; the Lacedemonian, on the contrary, permitted those of the same Mother, but not of the same Father, to marry; but the Egyptian, as it were to ridicule these Scruples and splitting of Laws, gave a full Loose to lawless Lust, infected Mind and Body with the incurable Disease of Debauchery, by authorizing the Marriage of Sisters, whether by the one or by the other, or both Parents, elder, younger, or of the same Age, as in Twins, whom, though Nature herself had at their Birth kept asunder, this extravagant Licence joined in ill-paired Yokes, and an unnatural Union. Here are three sorts of Legislators, whom Philo condemns. But what would he have answered to those, who should have told him, that Solon only authorized a Law, which was in force in the Time of your Patriarchs, and which Abraham the Father, and Stock of your Believers, practised himself (71). It is certain, Clement, Alexandrinus (72) infers, from the Patriarch's Words, that it was no Sin at that time to marry a Sister, provided she was not by the Mother's Side.

[E] The public Envy of Themistocles's Glory was no less for his Interest. Plutarch says: 'As soon as he began to concern himself with the Government of Affairs, the People received him with great Joy, being already weary of Themistocles; for which reason Cimon was immediately advanced to the greatest Posts, and highest Honours of the City. They were charmed with the Courtesy and Integrity of the Man. Also Aristides used his Interest for his Advancement, as well upon account of his Ability and genteel Carriage, as because he designed him for a Counter-balance to the Artifice and Boldness of Themistocles (73). Thus the two Causes of Cimon's Advancement are clearly explained; his own Merit and the Pleasure of mortifying Themistocles: by this we see the Inconstancy of Men, and the Power of Envy. They are weary with admiring long the same Person, and therefore seek for new Objects of Admiration, turning to the first rising Sun that offers to their View. Nor is the Republic of Learning exempted from this Spirit of Levity and Jealousy (74). A young Author is sometimes favoured because another has too long enjoyed the public Applause. Aristides, who

(70) Philo, de specialibus Legibus quæ ad sextum & septimum Preceptum Decalogi referuntur, pag. 779, 780. Edit. Francof. 1691.

(71) See the first Remark of the Article SARAH.

(72) Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 2, pag. 421, B.

(73) Plutarch. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 431.

(74) See the Preface of Nouvelles Lettres contre l'Histoire du Calvinisme de Mr Maimbourg, who being able to save it, set it on Fire; some time after, Cimon made himself Master of the Isle of Scyros [F], from whence he sent to Athens the Bones of Theseus. His Exploits, after this Time, are much more considerable. Not contented with taking from the Persians all that they possessed in Greece, he briskly pursued them into their own Country, without giving them time to recover themselves. When use was to be made of Arms, he employed them to conquer; but if Intrigues appeared to him more likely to succeed, he used that way to gain Towns, by causing them to rebel. He had such admirable Success in all this, that no Troops of the Persian King were seen to appear in all the Country, situated between Ionis, and Pamphilia. Having been informed, that the Persian Fleet durst appear upon the Coast of Pamphilia, he sailed from Cnidus with two hundred Gallies, and, after subduing the Phaselites, he attacked the Fleet, and destroyed it, near the Mouth of the Eurymedon [G]; and, landing his Troops the very same Day, he routed the Persian Land Army (f): after this he attacked eighty Sail of Pbenician Ships, who were coming to join the Persian Fleet, and obtained such a compleat Victory over them, that not one Ship escaped. The Treaty of Peace, which was the Fruit of so many Victories, was a cruel Mortification to the Enemy [H]. When the Peace was concluded with Persia, Cimon conquered the Thracians, and the Inhabitants of the Isle of Thasos; but these Victories presenting him with a fair opportunity of seizing part of Macedonia, which he neglected, they accused him of being corrupted by King Alexander's Presents. He justified what he had done, and was entirely acquitted; but it was not so easy for him to avoid another Storm which arose against him. For he could not avoid being banished by Ostracism. He had rendered himself odious by his affection to the Lacedemonians, and his Opposition to the Power of the People. He was rather for placing the supreme Authority in the hands of Persons of Note, than to leave it at the discretion of the Multitude; this procured him many Enemies, who not only drove him from the City, but also hindered him from serving in the Athenian Army against the Lacedemonians. Before the time of his Banishment was expired, he came back to serve as a Volunteer; but, upon the complaint of his Enemies, he was forced to retire. The Athenians losing a Battle in this War near Tanagra, they were under a necessity of recalling who passed for so upright a Man, perhaps, at another Conjunction, would have contributed nothing to Cimon's good Fortune; but, in pure Opposition to Themistocles, he became the great Promoter of that young Man, who was so disgraced for his Debaucheries (75). If the Motives of most Mens Services for one another were known, it would appear, that the Intention to do good has a less Share in them, than a design to mortify others. You recommend a Person ardently, you protect him, you advance him swiftly. Is this because you love him, and are engaged by his Merit? There are two Answers to this Question; one from the Mouth, the other from the Heart. The first declares for the Affirmative, but the Heart answers in this Manner: I raise such a one to the utmost of my Power, in order to humble another; what I procure for one is just so much taken from the good Fortune of another. The Maxim of Physicians may be extended to political Actions: Generatio unius est corruptio alterius; the Generation of one thing is the Corruption of another. But whereas Nature's direct Intention is Generation, and Destruction is but by accident, in all the Offices of civil Life they seem to have Destruction directly in view: Generation is the means; Destruction the end.

(f) He made use of a Stratagem that succeeded, which is described by Diodorus Siculus, lib. 11, cap. 61, ad Olymp. LXXVII. He dressed his Soldiers like the Persians.

[F] Some time after Cimon became Master of the Isle of Scyros.] Cornelius Nepos has but ill observed here the Order of Time; for he supposes, that the Conquest of this Island was after the two Victories, which Cimon obtained over the Persians, on the same Day (76). I do not refute him by citing Plutarch, who makes the Reduction of the Isle of Scyros prior to these two Victories; but by citing an Author, who is more exact in Chronology than Plutarch. This is Thucydides; by reading him you will find, that this Island was subdued immediately after the Action upon the River Strymon (77). This Error of Cornelius Nepos is in Moreri, and has not been observed by any Commentators I have consulted (78).

[G] He destroyed the Persian Fleet near the Mouth of the Eurymedon.] This is another Error of Cornelius Nepos, adopted by Moreri; it is a Geographical Error, which the Commentators have observed (79). This Historian assures us, that the Naval Battle, and Land Battle, that Cimon gained the same Day, were fought near Mysale. He is mistaken, whether he understands, by Mysale (80), a maritime City of Caria, or an Island of Ionis. Both this City and Island are too far from Pamphilia to excuse Cornelius Nepos, by supposing, that he only differs from other Historians, in determining a true place which they had not put down. It often happens, that the same Battle has two or three Names. An Author is not to blame when he prefers one of those Names to all the rest, and makes no mention of the others; but in such a Case the Action must happen near two or three Places, whose names may serve to describe it. This cannot be said of Mysale, or the River Eurymedon, or any other part of the Coast of Pamphilia. Now the Circumstances shew, that those two Battles were both fought by Cimon upon that Coast. I easily believe Cornelius Nepos, is led into this Error by his confused Ideas of the Victory obtained against the Persians near Mysale (81), the same Day that Mardonius was defeated in Bæotia (82).

[H] The Treaty of Peace, which was the Fruit of so many Victories, was a cruel Mortification to the Enemy.] Nothing is more shameful than the Conditions of Peace, which the Greeks imposed upon them. Plutarch says: 'This Exploit so humbled the Pride of the Persian King, that he entered into the Treaty of Peace so famous in ancient Histories: By which he engaged, upon Oath, that his Armies should come no nearer the Grecian Sea, than the Career of a Horse, and that no Gallies, or Ships of War, should sail beyond the Cbelidonian and Cyanean Islands. Nevertheless, Calisthenes, the Historian, writes, that this was not an Article of the Treaty; but the King, terrified by that great Defeat, observed it, and that afterwards he kept from the Grecian Seas; that when Pericles with fifty Gallies, and Ephialtes with thirty Gallies only, sailed beyond the Cbelidonian Islands, they found no Barbarian Fleet to oppose them. However, this Treaty at length is to be found in the public Records of Athens, collected by Craterus, as a certain Truth; and upon this Occasion the Athenians built an Altar to Peace, and bestowed the highest Honours upon Callias, who had negotiated this Peace with the King of Persia (83). Diodorus Siculus mentions this Treaty; but does not agree with Plutarch as to

(80) See the Theaurus Geographicus of Ortelius, at the Word Mysale.

(81) See Herodotus lib. 9, cap. 99, & seq.

(82) At Platæa.

(83) Plut. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 486, 487.

(75) See Plutarch, an seni fit gerenda Respublica, pag. 795, C.

(76) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(77) Thucyd. lib. 1, pag. m. 53.

(78) Cybertus Longolius, Janus Gebhardus, Georgius Gasper Kirchmayer.

(79) See Kirchmayer upon this place of Cornelius Nepos: He cites two other Commentators, Christianus Fridericus Frankensteinius, and Joannes Andreat Bosius.

(g) Taken from Plutarch in Vita Cimonis.

(h) See Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 4. Cicero de Officiis, lib. 2, cap. 13. Plot. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 484. Athenæus, cap. 12, pag. 533, citing the tenth Book of Theopompus.

recalling him. Upon his return, his chief care was to restore the Peace; and he succeeded in it [I]; but finding their Thoughts were bent on nothing but War, and fearing this Martial Humour, if it was not employed against the Barbarians, should excite fresh Troubles among the Greeks, he made the necessary Preparations to attack the Island of Cyprus, and Egypt: he obtained a Naval Victory against the Persians, upon the Coast of Pamphilia, and, if he had not died at the Siege of Citium, in the Island of Cyprus, it is thought he would have subdued all Egypt (g); his Liberality to every Body, and his Charity to the Poor, were admirable (h), as may be seen in Moreri. Suidas ascribes an excellent Book to him, concerning the Method of knowing Horses (i).

(i) Ἐγγραφεὶν ἱπποτικῶν Στράβων βασιλεύοντι. Admirabilem librum de cognoscendis equis agentem scripsit Suidas, in Κίμων.

(84) Diod. Sicul. lib. 9, cap. 61.

(85) Id. lib. 12, cap. 4.

the Time: He does not say it was concluded after Cimon had obtained those two Victories on the same Day in Pamphilia: He places those Victories in the LXXVIIth Olympiad (84), and the Treaty of Peace in LXXXIth Olympiad (85). It is true, he supposes, that, a little before the King of Persia consented to these shameful Conditions, the Athenians, under the Conduct of Cimon, had won two Battles very near together, one by Sea, the other by Land; one in the Sea of Cyprus, and the other upon the Coast of Cilicia. The News of this Disaster, continues he, obliged the King to command his Generals to conclude a Peace upon the best Terms they could. For that purpose they sent their Embassadors to Athens; and their Proposals were accepted by the Athenians, who immediately nominated Callias for their chief Plenipotentiary, and it was concluded as follows: 'Ut Græcis per Asiam civitatibus universis libertate ac suo jure uti permittatur. Ne satrapæ Persarum trium dierum itinere inferius ad mare descendant. Ne longa navi intra Phaselidem & Cyaneas excurratur. Hæc ubi rex & militiæ præfecti rati habuerunt, Athenienses contra jurarunt, se in provinciis Artaxerxis arma non expedituros (86). — That all the Grecian Cities in Asia should enjoy their Rights and Liberties. That the Persian Lords should not approach nearer than three Days Journey to the Sea. That no Ships of War should pass Phaselis and the Cyaneæ. These Articles being ratified by the King, and his Generals, the Athenians, on their Part, swore never to carry Arms into the Territories of Artaxerxes.' As Diodorus Siculus is more exact than Plutarch in ascertaining time, it may be presumed he is in the right. It must be confessed, that Plutarch is no good guide in Chronology; he transposes, sometimes, Events, as if he was writing an Epic Poem, and aspired to the Praises Horace bestowed upon Homer (87).

[I] After his Return, his chief Care was to restore the Peace; and he succeeded in it. I have followed Plutarch (88), rather than Cornelius Nepos, who seems to say, that, before his Return to Athens, he went to Lacedæmon, to adjust the Differences between these two Cities. Ille, quod hospitio Lacedæmoniorum utebatur, satius existimans contendere Lacedæmonem, sua sponte est profectus, pacemque inter duas potentissimas civitates conciliavit (89). Æschines, the Orator, observes, that Cimon, who enjoyed the Right of Hospitality at Sparta, concluded a Truce of fifty Years, which lasted but thirteen Years (90). This Number I suspect, when I consider, that Thucydides mentions only an Alliance of five Years (91). Note, that Cimon's Exile, which was to be for ten Years, continued but five (92).

(87) In mediæ res Non secus ac notus auditorem rapit. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 148.

(88) Plut. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 490.

(89) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(90) Æschines, de falsa Legatione, pag. m. 270.

(91) Thucyd. lib. 2, p. m. 59, 60.

(92) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(86) Id. ibid. pag. m. 413.

CINYRAS, King of Assyria according to some, or of Cyprus according to others, is celebrated for nothing, but having had Adonis by his own Daughter Myrrha [A]. We observe elsewhere (a), that this Incest was involuntary on his part, not knowing the Maid, they brought to him, was Myrrha; as soon as he knew it, he attempted to kill her, and would have done it, if he had not been prevented. It is said, that grief for this Incest caused him to kill himself (b); but others account for his Death in another manner; for some say he perished for disputing with Apollo the Prize of Music (c), after he had violated his Promise to the Grecians [B]. He was to have furnished them Provisions during the Siege of Troy; but not performing his Agreement (d), Agamemnon loaded him with Curfews, and what was worse, the Greeks made themselves Masters of Cyprus, and expelled him (e). The long life Anacreon gives him (f) does not agree with the Music Dispute I have mentioned; for who can believe that an old Man, of One hundred and sixty Years, would enter the Lifts with Apollo on such an Account? The Mythological History is full of varieties concerning the Father, the Sons, and Daughters of Cinyras (g); they say he had fifty Daughters, who were all metamorphosed into Halcyons (h): others say that Juno changed them into Stones, which served for the Steps of her Temple (i). He was much beloved by Apollo (k), and acquired such Wealth, that he became a Proverb like Cræsus (l). He

(a) In the Articles ADONIS and MYRRHA.

(b) Hygin. cap. 242.

(c) Suidas, in Κινύρας.

(d) Eustath. in lib. 10. Iliad.

(e) Theopompus, apud Photium, pag. 389.

(f) Apud Plinium, lib. 7, cap. 48.

(g) See Meursius in Cypro, cap. 9.

(h) Eustathius, in Iliad. lib. 10.

(i) Ovid. Metam. lib. 6.

(k) Pindar. Pyth. Od. 2.

(l) Id. Nem. Od. 8. Plato de Legibus, lib. 2. Suidas, in Κινύρας.

[A] He is celebrated for nothing, but having Adonis by his own Daughter Myrrha. Not that there are no other remarkable things in his Life; but the School Books, the Historical Dictionaries, and the Compilers of common Places, not speaking of them, as they do of Myrrha's Adventure, Cinyras is little known to the Republic of Learning, but by this Accident. Some very learned Men believe, that Pindar is over-burthened with the Luxuriety of his Subject, when he is speaking of Cinyras (1); and they understand of That Prince these Words of Pindar: Πολλὰ γὰρ πολλοῖς λέλεκται. — Many Authors have spoken much of him (2): But the Sequel of the Discourse has nothing in it to justify such a sense of the Words.

(1) Pindar. Nem. Od. 8.

(2) Meursius upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 398. Benedictus in Pindari Nem. Od. 8. Meursius reads πολλὰ γὰρ πολλοῖς λέλεκται. Many and many things are said of him.

[B] After he had violated his Promise to the Grecians. Palamedes was dispatched to him to obtain Auxiliary Troops from him; but, instead of demanding them, he persuaded him not to join the Greeks. He returned loaded with Presents, all which he kept for himself, except one wretched Cuirass, which he gave Agamemnon as from Cinyras: he gave them reason to hope, that the King of Cyprus would send a Fleet of One hundred Sail; but those hopes proved vain. This is part of what Alcidas accuses Palamedes of; but he was wrong to speak so contemptuously of the Cuirass, if it resembled the Description Homer has left us of it (3). Some have said, that all the Ships Cinyras sent the Grecians were Earthen-Ware, and manned with Glass Men, except one (4); those who will have the Cinyras of the Pagans to be Noah of (5) the Scriptures, will find it a hard Matter to make what we have said, and shall say, of Cinyras, tally with Noah. I do not pretend they cannot bring it to bear; for where has not Mr Huë's (6) Skill discovered Moses?

(3) Iliad. A.

(4) Eustath. in Iliad. A. apud Meursius in Cypro, pag. 111.

(5) Bibliot. Universelle, Tom. III, pag. 18.

(6) Bishop of Avranches.

[C] The

was also very handsome (m), and received many favours from Venus. The Fathers of the Church, who wrote against the Abominations of the Pagans, reproach them, that the Venus they adored in Cyprus had been a Whore to Cinyras [C]. The chief Temple of Venus, in that Island, was at Paphos: indeed there was an ancient Tradition, that it was built by King Aërias (n); but, according to modern Tradition, Cinyras consecrated it, and the Goddesses landed there at her Birth; but it was not Cinyras, who instituted the Science of the Aruspices, or Soothsayers; it was Thamyras, who came from Cilicia; afterwards an Order was made, that the Descendants of Cinyras, and those of Thamyras, should preside at the sacred Rites. In process of Time, the latter yielded up their Right to the former, that there might be no reason to complain, that the Royal Family had no Prerogative above a Foreign Family. Tacitus observes (o), that none but the Cinyrades (p) were consulted. Cinyras united in his own Person the Priesthood and the Royal Dignity (q); so that afterwards the Priesthood of the Paphian Venus was always in the hands of a Prince of the Blood; and therefore Cato thought he made a very advantageous offer to King Ptolemy, when he proposed to make him Priest of Venus, upon his surrendering up the Island to the Roman People (r). Mention is made of another Temple, which Cinyras built upon Mount Libanus (s); he also built three Cities Paphos, Cinyrea, and Smyrna, which last he named after his Daughter (t). He was the inventor of several things, as Tiles, Pincers, the Hammer, the Lever, and the Anvil (u). He was also the first that discovered the Copper Mines in the Isle of Cyprus. He is reckoned among the ancient Diviners (x). Clemens Alexandrinus (y), citing the History of Philopater, composed by Ptolemy, the Son of Agararches, observes that his Tomb, and that of his Posterity, was in the Temple of Venus at Paphos. Some say he was not born in the Island of Cyprus, but came thither from Affyria, where he was King. See the Remark [A] of the Article

ADONIS.

[C] The Fathers of the Church — have reproached them, that the Venus, they adored in Cyprus, had been a Whore to Cinyras.] Arnobius first of all will give us an account of it. Numquid rege à Cypro, cuius nomen Cinyras est, ditatam meretriculam Venerem Divorum in numero consecratam (7). — Have you not heard (says he) that a Cyprian King, named Cinyras, made his Whore a Goddess? Firmicus Maternus expresses himself with no less force (8). 'Audio Cinyram Cyprium templum amicæ meretrici donasse, ei erat Venus nomen. Initiasse etiam Cypriæ Veneris plurimos & vanis consecrationibus deputasse, statuisse enim ut quicunque initiari vellet secreto Veneris sibi tradito, assem in manum mercedis nomine Deæ daret. Quod secretum quale sit omnes taciti intelligere debemus, quia hoc ipsum propter turpitudinem manifestius explicare non possumus. Bene amator Cinyras meretricis legibus servit, consecratæ Veneri à sacerdotibus suis stipem dari iussit, ut scorto. — I find that Cinyras, the Cyprian, dedicated a Temple to his Whore, whose name was Venus; and that by ridiculous Ceremonies he admitted many Cyprian Potatoes to this Venus. For he enjoined that, whoever desired to be initiated in her Mysteries, entrusted to him, should pay a piece of Money as an Acknowledgment to the Goddess; the Nature of which Mysteries should be conceived in Silence, since Modesty will not allow an Explication of them. Well did this gallant Cinyras keep up the wanton Trade in assigning his Priests to pay a Hire to his deified Venus, as to his Whore.' What Confusion! What Corruption! Mysteries instituted, whose Ritual appoints, that whoever is initiated, shall receive a handful of Salt, and a Phallus, and should offer a piece of Silver to Venus (9). What a strange Ribbon or Collar of an Order was given there! Consult Clemens Alexandrinus, who informs us, that Cinyras was the first, who durst raise from Darkness these filthy Ceremonies in Honour of a Courtesan of his Country. Οὐ γὰρ με ὁ Κύπριος ὁ νησιώτης Κινύρας παρὰ πάλαι ποτ' ἂν τὰ περὶ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην μαγικὰ ὄργια ἐκ νυκτὸς ἡμέρα παρὰ δύναιτολμήσας, φιλοῦντες δὲ θεῖσαι πύρην πολιτίδα: Non enim Cyprius insularis Cinyras mihi unquam persuaserit, libidinosa quæ circa Venerem fiebant orgia ausus ex nocte diei tradere, dum meretricem civem vellet in Deos referre (10). — Never shall Cinyras, the Cyprian, persuade me, who dared to bring the lewd Orgia of Venus from Darkness to Light, and endeavoured to make a Whore a Goddess. See also Arnobius, at the One hundred and sixty ninth Page of the Fifth Book, where he says. 'Nec non & Cypriæ Veneris abstrusa illa initia prætereamus, quorum conditor indicatur Cinyras rex fuisse, in quibus fumentes ea certas stipēs inserunt ut meretrici, & referunt phallos propitiū numinis signa. — Let us likewise pass over these abstruse Mysteries of Venus, which Cinyras is said to have instituted, to whom those that entered made Presents, as to a Whore, and carried back some Emblem (Phallus) of the Goddess's Favour.' Who can doubt but this is he, whom Lucian (11) pairs with Sardanapalus, and gives as the Model of an effeminate Man.

CINUS or CYNUS, a famous Civilian, of a Noble Family of Pistoia [A]. He flourished in the XIVth Century: his Commentary on the Code was finished in 1313: He writ also upon some parts of the Digests. He was no Friend to the Interpreters of the Canon-Law, and often censures them; for which he is blamed by Nicolas de Tudeschis (a). He died at Bologna, and was interred near his Master Dinus (b) [B]; his Death is placed in the Year 1336 (c). He was no less celebrated for [A] He was of a noble Family. Forsterus calls it, Familiam Sygibaldorum (1): others use the Word Sigibuldi (2), Leander Alberti makes use of the Italian Word Simbaldi (3), and Mr Crescimbeni uses the Word Sigibaldi (4).

[B] He was interred near his Master Dinus.] It was without any honourable Distinction. Juxta Dynum pari, hoc est, ignobili & vulgari sepulchro terræ conditus (5). — He was interred near Dinus, in such another common Grave. Some say, these two Civilians, and Florianus de Sancto Petro, lie all in the same Tomb, in the Dominican Cloister at Bologna (6). Note, that Cinus had been Professor of Laws in the University of that City (7). They mention this Epitaph. Sino, eximio Juris Consulto Bartolo Præceptore dignissimo, Populus Pistoriensis B. M. posuit. This gives room to believe, that his Countrymen were willing to make reparation for the neglect

(m) Anthol. lib. 4, cap. 1. Hyginus cap. 270.

(n) Tacit. Hist. lib. 2, cap. 3.

(o) Ibid.

(p) That is, the Descendants of Cinyras.

(q) Scholiast. Pindari in Pyth. Od. 2.

(r) Plutarch. in Vita Catonis.

(s) Lucian. de Dea Syria.

(t) Hygin. cap. 275.

(u) Plinius, lib. 7, cap. 56.

(x) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 1, pag. m. 333. Meursius, de Cypro, p. 110.

(y) Admon. ad Gent. pag. 29. Arnob. lib. 6, pag. 193.

(9) Clem. Alexand. Admon. ad Gent. p. m. 10.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) In Rhetor. Præcept.

(a) This is he that is so well known by the Name of Panormitanus.

(b) Taken from Forsterus, Hist. Juris Civilis, pag. m. 498, 499.

(c) König. Bibl. pag. 193, 753.

(6) Leand. Alberti, Descript. d'Italia, fol. 41.

(7) Id. ibid.

(d) Madonna Ricciarda de' Scivaggi

(e) Taken from Crescimbeni, Ist. della volgar. Poesia, pag. 87.

for his Italian Verses, than for his Lectures on the Civil-Law; and he is reckoned among those, who began to give a grace to the Tuscan Lyric Poetry. Petrarch may pass for his Disciple, and has made no scruple to steal some Thoughts from him. The Canzoniere of Cinus is still extant, for which we are obliged to a Lady (d), whom the Author tenderly loved (e). I shall produce one Passage, to prove he was subject to this Passion [C].

neglect of the Inhabitants of Bologne, who had put no Inscription upon his Monument. One Word must be corrected in that Epitaph: instead of Bartolo, read Bartoli; for Cinus was the Master, not the Scholar of Bartolus (8).

(8) Forster. Hist. Juris Civ. p. 593. Crescimbeni, Istoria della volgar. Poesia, pag. 87.

[C] I shall produce one Passage, to prove he was subject to this Passion. Julius Clarus, having said, that if a Woman lies with her Footman, she deserves to be punished; but a servant Maid, that lies with her Master, ought not to be punished, but rather rewarded; adds, this gave Cinus the Lawyer reason to maintain, that Presents ought to be made by the Persons who love, and not by the Persons who are loved; the rest of the Passage must rather be expressed here in Latin, than in English. 'Unde sumit argumentum Cynus in d. l. r. quod amatores debent donare amatis suis, non e contra, subdens: Et crede experto, quod donum magis valet quam suspirium, imò suspirium nihil valet sine

‘ dono: ferrum tamen præponitur auro, nam secundum Juven. Ferrum est quod amat: Quod (ut ipse ait) quidam exponunt, id est, ferrum membrum, propter cuius ferri fortitudinem insignes etiam servis vilissimis se exponunt (9). Upon this Head, Julius Clarus observes, that Doctor Cynus was very amorous, and a good Poet. Quæ verba D. Cyni sunt notanda, quia licet effect excellens Doctor, fuit etiam maximus Amator, & egregius Poëta, ut Franc. Petrarca attestatur in his carminibus, in quibus ipse mortem deplorat. Et extant adhuc cantiones & alia carmina amatoria D. Cyni non insulsa (10). — Which Words of Cinus deserve notice, who, though an Adept in Law, was no less such in Love, and an excellent Poet, as F. Petrarca testifies in his Poems, where in be laments his Death; and there are still extant some agreeable Odes and Love-Songs of his composing.

(9) Julius Clarus Recept. Sentent. lib. 5, cap. de Fornicatione, n. 20, p. m. 23.

(10) Id. ibid.

(a) This Article is communicated by Mr. FERDINAND LEWIS DE BRESLER of Aschembourg, Translator and Continuator of Moreri in Higb-Dutch. See the Article BIBLIANDER, Citation (f).

(b) Villi & plebeio loco Cracoviae natus. Stanislai Lubienksi Vita & Series Episcoporum Plocensium; in Operibus ejus Antwerpæ, Ann. 1643 excusis, pag. 370. Erasmus Cioleum hominem plebeium, quem admodum creditum est, appellat. Mart. Cromer, de Origine & Rebus gestis Polonorum, lib. 30, cap. ult.

CIOLEK (a) (ERASMUS), in Latin Vitellius [A], Bishop of Ploczko in Poland, was a Native of Cracovia, of low and mean Extraction (b), neither his Birth nor Education being known to any Body (c). Nevertheless, what was wanting to him in Birth, which indeed was very low, was abundantly made up to him by a penetrating Mind, by his Wisdom, his Learning, and his Eloquence [B]. He was in great favour with Alexander King of Poland; and it is thought That Prince, from the time he was made Duke of Lithuania, admitted him to an intimate Friendship with him, and was chiefly governed by his Counsels (d). Alexander, ascending the Throne of Poland (e), after the Death of his Brother John Albert, was resolved to reward his faithful Minister Ciolek, and gave him the Bishopric of Ploczko in 1504, which Vincent I Przerabski had had before him. He is charged by some with instilling into his Master Principles of Tyranny (f). Otherwise he gave many Proofs of his Fidelity, in the good Services he did in several Embassies to the Emperor Maximilian I, and at the Court of Rome (g). But his Patron, who advanced him, died two Years after (h), and his Brother, Sigismund I, succeeded him in the Government, who also employed him, and found him, as his Brother had done, faithful and diligent. He sent him several times to the Emperor, and the Pope; but his chief Negotiation was at the great and celebrated Diet of Augsburg in 1518, where he appeared as Ambassador of the King of Poland, together with Raphael Castellan of Lenden, and Boguslao Marshal of Lithuania. It was in this place (where all the great Men of Germany, and many Ambassadors, and Persons of Distinction, from Foreign Parts, were met) that Ciolek displayed his great Capacity. Friday the Twentieth of August, he made a Speech in the most considerable

(c) Lubienksi, Operum, pag. 369. Quo genere quævis stirpe genitus fuerit Erasmus Ciolek, unde prodierit, quomodo creverit, & illa ipsa, qua vixit, ignoravit ætas.

(d) Crometus, de Orig. & Rebus gestis Polon. lib. 30, cap. ult.

(e) Ann. 1504.

(f) Lubienksi, Oper. pag. 370.

(g) It is very likely Cromer is mistaken here, and has transposed the Embassies which he made under Sigismund I.

(h) In 1506.

[A] In Latin Vitellius. The Art of metamorphosing names is not unknown to the Poles, and they seem to have good skill in it, if they can make Vitellius out of the Word Ciolek, which has some relation to the Polish Word for a Calf. Martin Cromer, who declines this Word by a Latin termination, calls him Cioleum (1): there is still in Poland a very considerable noble Family, of the name Ciolek, and called in Latin Vitelliana; they came out of Italy, in the Year 971, in the time of Micislau, and are descended from Robert Archbishop of Gnesna, of the race of the Vitellins, Paulinus, the Brother of Robert, very much encreased his Family in Poland; from whence are derived several Archbishops of Gnesna, and other Persons of Distinction (2). It will not be amiss to add here what Okolski relates of one of this Family (3). I shall give you his own Words, that you may have from the Fountain Head a remedy, which is very suitable to a Polish Subject. He says then: 'Stanislau Ciolek seu Vitellius, nobilis Polonus, circa sec. XV. clarus, fertur ante consuetum tempus natus, quapropter 4. septimanas in adipe apri conservabatur, crevit in maximum Virum, Castellanum Sendomir, Marechallum Curie &c. — Stanislau Ciolek, or Vitellius, a noble Pole, who flourished in the XVth Century, is said to have been born before the usual Time; wherefore he was kept four Weeks in the Fat of a Boar, and

(1) Mart. Cromer, de Origine & Rebus gestis Polonorum, lib. 30, cap. ult.

(2) Simon Okolski, in Orbe Polono, Tom. I, pag. 108, & seq.

(3) Ibid. pag. 114.

'grew to be a very great Man, Castellan of Sendomir, Marshal of the Court, &c.'

[B] By his Eloquence. James Spiegel (4) has given an excellent Description of him, in his Letter to Erasmus, as the most learned, and most eloquent, Man of his time, and adds this Character. Singularis Integritatis vir. — Of singular Integrity of Life. Richard Bartholin confirms the same (5): Episcopus Plocensis vir literatus & gravis orationem habuit latinam plane & rei satis accommodatam, in qua sapienter & erudite de expeditione contra Turcas suscipienda disputavit. — The Bishop of Ploczko, a learned and grave Man, gave us in Latin an Oration very much to the Purpose, where in he argued with great Judgment upon the Expedition designed against the Turks. And in another Place: 'Hac mihi Reverendissimus Episcopus Plocensis, apud Cæsarem Poloniæ Regis Oratorem agens, recitavit, vir gravissimus & literatus, & cui sine controversia fides adhibenda (6). — This I was told by the Bishop of Ploczko, (a Man of great Learning and sound Judgment, whom without doubt we may credit) when he spoke before his Majesty the King of Poland.' Stanislau Lubienksi (7) gives him indeed the Character of a wife and prudent Man, since he says, that he obtained by his Address the Bishopric of Ploczko. Yet it looks as if Lubienksi did not give much Credit to what Spiegel mentions

(4) In his Letter to Erasmus. See Remark [C].

(5) In Concinnæ Descriptione de Conventu Augustensi edita à Conrado Adelman de Adelsmannsfelden, Canonico Augustano, Anno 1518. in 4to.

(6) In Concinnæ Descriptione, &c.

(7) Operum pag. 370, & seq. Tantum ingenio valuit, ut Episcopatum Plocensem adipisceretur.

considerable Assembly to the Emperor, and the States of the Empire, with so much Life and Energy, that many of the illustrious Assistants wept [C]. For which Reason James Spiegel got it printed. To conclude, Ciolek finished his Life during his Embassy to the Court of Rome (i). For, being sent to Rome by Sigismund I. to negotiate some secret Affairs with Pope Leo X., after having obtained certain Privileges of the Pope for his Church, he died there, the same Year that the Pope also died, in the Year 1521, and was buried in the Church of St Maria del Popolo. Raphael Leszynski succeeded him in his Bishopric (k).

(i) See Remark [C], at the end.

(k) Lublinski, Oper. pag. 379.

(8) Ibid.

mentions of his Integrity; since he says (8), Vasrum fuisse hominem & callidum, & qui Regi, cujus gratia forebat, (Alexandro) tyrannidem suaderet, plerique credidere.

[C] That several of the Assistants wept. This is a very particular Circumstance, which is observed by James Spiegel, Counsellor and Secretary to the Emperor (9); and I believe few Orators were ever able to do by Words what Ciolek did, especially in presence of such an Auditory. James Spiegel has so much Faith in the force of this Speech, that he doubts not, but it will make those weep that shall read it. As the expressions in his Letter to Erasmus are remarkable (10), and give an ample Description of this Circumstance, as well as of Ciolek's Eloquence, and his chief Auditors, I shall here insert them at length: 'Reverendissimus Dominus Erasmus Vitellius Episcopus Ploccensis, singulari integritate vite, raraque doctrina, Romanaque facundia insignis: vel eo mihi nomine precipue colendus, quia cognominis, de te perquam egregiam frequenter facit mentionem. Primam (ut aulicus aulico utar verbo) audientiam coram Cæsare, sacri Imperii Electoribus omnibus, & cæteris Germaniarum Principibus proceribusque obtinuit. Sic ornate, sic graviter oravit, ut ad intima usque præcordia auditorum vehementia sententiarum penetraverit, pluresque ad sietum concitaverit, ei vero docto simul & facundo omnes docti & eloquentes palmam tribuunt. Aderant enim viri non pauci, tum exquisiti docti, tum in judicando naris emundissimæ. Antistes Torgestinus, Peutingerus, Huttenus, Bartholinus, Spalatinus, & Statius ille in nullo doctrinæ genere non verisatus. Henricus Stromer Medicus, & Laurentius Zochius Jurisconsultus, Cardinalis Maguntini, Florentissimi Principis, Cancellarius. Igitur facta mihi primum præ cæteris elegantissimæ hujus orationis copia. Quia digna multorum lectione visa fuit eruditorum calculo, & ab omnibus desiderata, imprimendam curavi sub augustulo tuo nomine: non dubito quin ut audientibus lachrimas commovit, ita hæc eadem legentibus magis copiosas excutiet, & in rem christianam propensiores eorum animos reddet.'

(9) In Epist. ad Erasum. Rotter. Oratorum Vitellii præmissa.

(10) Ex Augustæ Vindelic. prid. Kal. Sept. Ann. 1518.

'Court before His Imperial Majesty, all the Electors of the Empire, and the other Princes and Lords of Germany; he spoke with so much Strength and Elegance, that the force of his Discourse pierced the very Hearts of the Audience, and drew Tears from many of them. To this Man of Learning and Eloquence all the learned and eloquent allow the Prize to be due. There were present Men of exquisite Learning, Judgment, and Penetration. The President of Torgau, Peutingier, Hutten, Bartholinus, Spalatinus, and Statius, versed in every kind of Literature; Henry Stromer the Physician, and Laurence Zochius the Counsellor, Chanceller to the most Illustrious Prince, the Cardinal of Mayence. Having therefore had the happiness of procuring this beautiful Oration, which, in the Opinion of the learned, well deserves to be read, and which every one seems desirous to read, I took care to have it published under the Protection of your august Name; and I doubt not but, as it drew Tears from the Hearers, it will make them flow more copiously from the Readers, and incline their Hearts more zealously to the Cause of Christianity.' To give a further Idea of the Magnificence of the Assembly of the Diet, in which Ciolek spoke, I shall produce what John Müller, the famous Printer at Augsburg, who printed Ciolek's Speech, has added by way of Appendix. 'Aderant, says he, in hoc conventu tres reverendissimi Domini Cardinales, Cajetanus, Guraniensis, & Maguntinus, pluresque Regum Oratores, & omnes fere Germaniæ Duces, cum magna parte Episcoporum & nobilitatis suæ primariæ; qualis in Imperio supra 30. annos visus non est. — There were present, in this Assembly, which was the greatest the Empire had known for above thirty Years, three Cardinals, several Embassadors of crowned Heads, with most of the Bishops, and chief Nobility.' As to the Edition of this Speech, James Spiegel, as is observed before, printed it in 4to at Augsburg 1518, under the Title of: 'Oratio per R. P. Dominum Erasmus Vitellium Episcopum Ploccensem in celeberrimo Augusti Conventu ad Cæsarem Maximil. nomine victoriosissimi Regis Poloniæ Sigismundi habita, coram omnibus S. Imp. Electoribus plurimisque Germaniæ Principibus, die veneris, 20 Aug. A. Dom. 1518.' After this it was reprinted ex Bibliotheca Joh. Pistorii in Corpore Historiæ Poloniæ (11) Tomo III. p. 5. — 7. Marquardus Freberus (12) says it is also to be found in Reusneri Antiturnico.

(11) At Basil, in 1582, in Folio.

(12) In Indice Autorum, Tom. II, Rer. German. Scriptorum, præmissio.

CIPIERRE (PHILIBERT de MARCILLI Lord of) was born in the Mâconnais (a). He gave so many Proofs of his Courage and Prudence in the Service of Henry II., both in France and Italy, that That Prince made him Governor to the Duke of Orleans, his second Son, who afterwards reigned by the Name of Charles IX. It is pretended, that if others had not spoiled the excellent Education he gave that young Prince, he would have proved a very great King [A]. When Charles IX. came to the Crown, they found it necessary, in order to do him the greater Honour, to have always a Prince of the Blood with him, to observe his Conduct; and they gave this Post to the Prince de la Roche-sur-Yon (b); but Ci-

(a) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. I, p. 526.

(b) Idem. taken from Brantome.

[A] If others had not spoiled the excellent Education, he gave Charles IX., he would have proved a very great King. Brantome charges upon his Manners, and not upon his Governor, Charles's two ill Qualities, Swearing and Dissimulation. He maintains, that Cipierre was as brave a Lord, as ever was Governor to a King, honest, free, and open, without Lies or Hypocrisy, and that he had well instructed him, without teaching him the Principles of Dissimulation (1). He adds, among other things, that he taught Charles to express himself eloquently. In my Opinion, says he (2), Mr de Cipierre spoke French, Spanish, and Italian, better than any Gentleman, or Military Man, that ever I knew, and therefore the King was desirous to imitate him, rather than du Perron, afterwards Marshal de Retz, who certainly spoke well. He says in another Place (3), that Cipierre told a Story the best of any Man in the World: he knew how to describe every thing with the greatest Grace, and in the best Language, so perfectly was he accomplished in all things.

(1) Brantome, cited by Laboureur, Tom. I, pag. 374.

(2) Id. Tom. II, pag. 866.

(3) Id. Tom. I, pag. 528.

[B] But

VOL. II.

6 N

pierre was still continued in his Employment [B]. The two Governors preserved a good understanding together: The Prince yielded in many things to Cipierre, knowing him to be of as great a Capacity as any Lord in France: on the other Hand Cipierre, who was a very wise Man, shewed a great deal of Honour and Respect for the Prince, - - - and it was a Pleasure to see those two Governors maintaining their Rank in a becoming Manner near the King's Person, one superior, the other a little inferior to him. Cipierre was created a Knight of the Order by Francis II, in 1560 (c). They, say that finding himself seized with a mortal Disease, and preparing to set out for Aix to drink the Waters, he earnestly intreated the Queen-Mother to pacify the difference between the Guises and the Colignis, and thereby to destroy the Root of a Faction, which would be in a Condition to ruin the Kingdom (d). He died at Liege, in September 1565, without being able to reach the Waters. Those of the Reformed Religion were ill satisfied with his Conduct [C]: they made pretty sharp Verses against him, both before and after his Death (e). It was he that informed the Prince of Condé at Orleans, in 1560, that the Renaudie's Plot was discovered (f). It was he that was charged, some Months after, to secure the City of Orleans (g), which was suspected of being disaffected: he commanded for some Days the French Army, at the Siege of that City, after the Duke of Guise was killed (h), and obtained leave of the Pope's Legate for the Soldiers to eat Flesh during Lent [D]. He married Louise de Halluin (i), by whom he had one Daughter, that was afterwards the Wife of Francis de la Magdalene, Lord of Regni, Grandfather of the Dukes of Lesdiguières (k). His Father married N - - - of St Amour, Lady of Cipierre (l).

[B] But Cipierre was still continued in his Employment. Brantome's Words, which I have quoted, are a proof of it: yet it is certain he lost it for some time, and afterwards was re-called: for Languet affirms, he was removed from the King, and was not restored, though the King of Navarre interceded for him. Languet makes mention of this within two Days after it happened, in a Letter from Paris, dated February the first, 1562. What he says of the cause of that Governor's Disgrace is so curious, and so much a secret History, that I cannot help relating it. The Fact is, Charles IX. was so grievously offended, that Cipierre had taken a Book of Divinity from him, that he declared he would no longer have him for his Governor. The Words, which Languet uses a little before, are a proof to me, that the Book, he took away from the young Monarch, was, in Cipierre's Opinion, an heretical Book; for this Author had just said, there was reason to believe, that Charles IX, and his two Brothers, would soon declare themselves Protestants; that the Duke of Orleans had already sufficiently made it appear, that he was of that Party, and that the Duke of Anjou, in the presence of several Persons, had requested of the Queen-Mother, that for the future he might have no Domestic, but what were Lutherans. Regina cautius sua administrat, nam accomodat se temporis, & ostendit se nobis additorem quam antea. Rex & fratres videntur brevi transitori ad nostras partes. Hæc si non sunt matre impellente, sunt saltem ipsa non nolente, nam si vellet posset hoc impedire. Aurelianensis jam satis ostendit se esse à nostris partibus. Andegavensis, planè puer, nuper petiit à matre coram plurimis, ne deinceps daret ei Ministros, qui non essent Lutherani. Hæc verba mater excepit risu. Rex habuit gubernatorem nobilem virum (nomine Sipierre) natum in Burgundia, qui ex tenui fortuna sua industria pervenit ad magnas opes, & fuit admodum charus Regi Henrico. Is cum nuper Regi Librum Theologicum eripuisse, ita offendit eum, ut diceret matri, se nolle amplius habere eum gubernatorem. Mater itaque eum removit à filii gubernatione, & ei suffecit Principem de la Roche sur Yon. Cum Navarrus pro remoto apud Regem deprecaretur, illa respondit, hoc non sua, sed filii voluntate esse factum qui nolit eum habere gubernatorem. Hoc nudius tertius primum accidit. Referunt & alias causas, quare sit remotus; nam fuit valde addictus Guis (4). — The Queen acts with greater caution, agreeable to the Times, and appears more in our Interest than formerly: The King, and his Brothers, seem ready to come over to our Party; though this may be without the Direction of the Queen, it cannot be against her consent; since, if she would, she might prevent it. The Duke of Orleans has already sufficiently declared for us. The Duke of Anjou, though a Boy, lately desired the Queen, in the presence of several Persons, to give him for the future no Servants, but Lutherans; at which she smiled. The King had for Governor one Sipierre, a Person of Distinction, born in Hungary, who was much caressed by King Henry, and, by a steady Application to Business, had raised himself from mean Circumstances to an ample Fortune. He, having lately taken from this Prince a Book of Divinity, had so exasperated him, that he told the Queen he would have him no longer for Governor. Upon which the Queen removed him from his Office, and placed the Prince de la Roche sur Yon in his stead. When the King of Navarre solicited the Queen to restore him, she answered, it had not been done by her own, but by her Son's direction, who refused him for Governor. This happened but two Days ago. There are other Causes assigned for his removal; for he was strongly attached to the House of Guise. If you consult the Passage of the Memoirs of the Queen of Navarre, which you will find in her Article (5), it will appear, that Languet had no ill Intelligence of the French Court.

[C] Those of the Reformed Religion were ill satisfied with his Conduct. Monsieur Le Laboureur gives no other reason for this, than the Commission Cipierre had to disarm Orleans (6); but the Verses, he quotes, suppose that this City was cruelly treated, and that Cipierre's severity extended both to the Walls, and to the Men. Thuanus, who otherwise praises Cipierre, yet observes, that he was devoted to the Guises (7). In a Word, when the Protestants exhibited their grievances after the first Peace, they complained, not only that Burgundy had been ill treated by Savannes, and Guienne by Montuc, but also that Orleans had suffered by Cipierre (8).

[D] He obtained leave of the Pope's Legate for the Soldiers to eat Meat during Lent. The Cardinal of Ferrara, the Pope's Legate, was then in the Queen-Mother's Army. He looked upon the request made to him as a detestable thing, at a time when they were at War with Hereticks, who were Enemies to Lent; but, having considered the matter, he answered, that, as to Flesh, it was an abominable thing, not to be mentioned, that he would only allow them to eat Butter, Cheese, and Milk (9). Mr de Cipierre answered: 'Sir, you must not think to govern our Military Men, as you do your Ecclesiastics; for it is one thing to serve God, and another thing to serve in the War; give me leave to tell you the Truth; it is not proper, at such a time as this, and in such an Army, formed of various sorts of Men, to raise these scruples: for, as to your Butter, your Cheese, and your Milk, our French Soldiers will not touch them, as your Italians and Spaniards do. They will eat Flesh and good victuals, to sustain themselves the better. Whatever prohibition you lay upon them, they will eat it privately, and by stealth. Wherefore be advised, and give them leave to eat it; give them a good Dispensation

(c) Le Laboureur, Additions à Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 374.

(d) Thuan. lib. 38.

(e) Mr. Le Laboureur sets down some, Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 374.

(f) Mezerai Abrégé Chronolog. Tom. V, pag. m. 19.

(g) Beza, Ecclef. Hist. lib. 3, pag. 290. Thuan. lib. 26.

(h) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, Tom. I, p. 132.

(i) Le Laboureur, Additions aux Memoires de Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 374.

(k) She died at Paris, July 2, 1656, according to Father Anselm, Hist. des Officiers, p. 243.

(l) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Castelnau ubi supra.

(5) In Remark [B].

(6) Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 529.

(7) Thuanus, lib. 26, pag. m. 520.

(8) Vraie Hist. des Troubles, fol. 4, verso, at the Year 1563.

(9) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, Tom. I, p. 132.

(4) Languet, Epist. 68, lib. 2, pag. 201, 202.

'Dispensation and Abolution: for if they dispense with it of themselves, your Authority will be lessened thereby; whereas, on the contrary, it will be encreased if you give them a Permission, and all will say, the Legate, honest Man, gives us a Dispensation; which will sound better every where (10)'. The Legate relished this wholesome Advice, and granted what Cipierre desired (11). What Brantome had reported a little before, is so proper to confirm the Opinion of all good, pious, and wise Men, as to War, that I cannot forbear copying it. 'Charles the fifth, to excuse brave and gallant Men, such as himself, said, that being courageous, ambitious, and war-like, he could not be religious and conscientious. And this is what the Illustrious Marquis de Pescayre said once, in the Wars of Lombardy, to the Legate, who was afterwards Pope Clement, concerning reforming the Disorders and Debaucheries of the Soldiers. Mon Sennor Legado, no ay cosa mas dificultosa à los que exercen la guerra, que con igual disciplina servir en un mismo tiempo à Mars y à Christo, porque el uso de la guerra en esta corruption de militia parece ser todo contrario à la Justicia y Religion. That is to say; Sir, there is nothing more difficult than for those, who are employed in War, to serve, at the same time, and with equal Discipline, Mars and CHRIST, because the practice of War, in this corruption of the Soldiery, is quite contrary to Justice and Religion (12). This is the Judgment those make of War, who are best acquainted with it, and since unicuique in sua arte credendum est. — Every one is to be believed in his own Profession, we must conclude, that, to conduct an Army according to the Laws of the Christian Religion, is a Platonic Idea, an Utopia of Sir Thomas More, a Philosopher's Stone, which will never be found.

(12) Id. ibid. p. 131.

CIPIERRE (RENATUS de SAVOIE Lord of), Son of Claudius de Savoie, Count de Tende, Governor and Great Seneschal of Provence, had by Frances de Foix, his second Wife, a Son and a Daughter, whom their Mother brought up in the Reformed Religion. He was also himself very much suspected of inclining to the same; either because his Lady openly professed that Religion, or because he would not suffer any violence to be committed, in his Government, against those called Heretics. This Moderation stirred up against him the Count de Sommerive, his own Son by a former Marriage, and obliged him to take Arms, in his own defence, against one he had given Life to. He was defeated, and forced to abandon his Government to this unnatural Son. Cipierre, who had supported his Father's Cause with the utmost Vigour, being made by him a Colonel of Horse (a), whilst Cardel his Brother-in-Law (b) served as Colonel of Foot, was unhappily assassinated by a Party of the Rebels at Frejus [A], Anno 1568. Returning from Nice, where he had been to compliment the Duke of Savoy, they laid an Ambush for him in a Wood; but, not being able to prevent his escape to Frejus with all his Followers, they pursued him thither, and, ringing the Alarm Bell, surrounded his Lodgings. The Consuls did their utmost to save him; they prevailed upon the Marquis of Arzi, who was chief of that mutinous Troop, to retire, upon Condition, that Cipierre and his Domestics should lay down their Arms. But the Mutineers presently returned, and put those poor People to the Sword, unable to defend themselves. The Marquis, not seeing the Body of Cipierre among the Dead, for the Consuls had secured him, pretended great concern for him, and protested that the only way to save his Life was to put him into his Hands. The Consuls, believing his promises, delivered him up, and immediately they stabbed him in a thousand Places [B]. *Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum! Such devilish Acts Religion could persuade . It was not doubted but the Court, and the Count de Sommerive, had a hand in that exploit, and that Cipierre was thus severely treated out of hatred to the Reformed Religion; the Prince of Condé, the Admiral, and all their Friends, were exceedingly concerned for this Action (c).

(a) Beza, Hist. Eccles. lib. 12, pag. 319.

(b) He was of the House of Salluces, and had married the Daughter of the Count de Tende, and Frances de Foix. Beza, ib. pag. 318.

* Lucret. lib. 2.

(c) Ex Thuanus, lib. 44, ad Ann. 1568.

[A] He was assassinated — at Frejus.] Thus I translate the Forum Julii of Thuanus. D'Aubigné (1) calls this Place Fourques (2), and pretends, that Arzi, who was Governor of it, when he caused Count de Tende to be killed, and Twenty nine others, said aloud, He had positive Orders for what he did. It is not easy to reconcile this Historian with Thuanus; for if Gaspar de Villeneuve, Lord of Arzi, or Arzi, Arzi Regulus, had been Governor of the Town where this Massacre was committed, as D'Aubigné pretends, he would have been under a Necessity of using a Stratagem to get the Count delivered up by the Consuls, especially when he had entered the Town, at the Head of the Mutineers, according to Thuanus.

[B] They stabbed him in a thousand Places.] Thuanus attributes this base Execution to an Insurrection of the Mob. 'Ab irruente multitudo innumera pugnum ictibus confodit, dehonestato etiam post mortem repetitis vulneribus cadavere (3).

— He was stabbed in a Multitude of Places by an enraged Mob, who even after he was dead repeated their barbarous Strokes on his Body.' Brantome, who had a confused Idea of this infamous Murder, charges it only upon one Person. 'He was killed, says he (4), in time of Peace, entering in a quiet Manner into a City of Provence. I have seen, a hundred times, the Villain, who murdered him, carrying Lemons to the Queen-Mother; but I have forgot his Name, and the City where it happened. The Huguenots, he adds, of Provence, had a great Confidence in him, for he was a brave and gallant Lord, and if he had not been taken off would have been very active.' He had said before, 'he was a brave and valiant Gentleman, who was a Huguenot, and had sometimes Quarrels with his half Brother the Count de Sommerive, but at other times they were mutually kind and friendly.'

(4) Brantome, Discours du Comte de Montmorency.

CYRIL, Deacon of the Church of Heliopolis, near Mount Libanus, was a great Iconoclast, under the Empire of Constantine. Inflamed by the Love of God (a), he broke to Pieces several Images, which the Pagans worshipped. The latter did not fail to remember this, when their Religion prevailed under the Reign of Julian, but revenged themselves with great fury. They killed Cyril, and, ripping open his Body, eat his Liver. But all, who were engaged in this Fact, were punished in an astonishing Manner. First, their Teeth rotted away, then their Tongues, and at length their Eyes (b); Alcyonius assures us, that Cyril, before this Exploit against against the Idols, was banished to the Isle of Naxos, and that he was slain by the order of Julian himself [A], his Courtiers feeding upon the Entrails of this Holy Man. I do not find this in Theodore.

(a) ὁ ἀγαπῶν τοὺς θεοὺς Divini amoris ἔστιν inflammat. Theodoretus, Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 7.

(b) Taken out of Theodoret. ibid.

[A] Alcyonius assures us, that Cyril — was banished — and slain by order of Julian himself. His Words are: 'Cyrillus quoque sempiterna laude videtur decorandus, qui levissime suum in Naxo insula exilium toleravit, idque principatu Magni Constantini, apud quem postea tanta gratia & auctoritate valuit, ut cum bona ejus venia complura veterum Deorum simulacra subverterit; quo defuncto, cum potestas rerum omnium penes Julianum esset, illius iussu dissectus est, mandavitque insuper crudelissimus tyrannus, ut Purpurati sui viscera sanctissimi & innocentissimi hominis epularentur (1). — Cyril seems no less worthy of immortal Honour, who, with uncommon Equanimity, bore his Exile in the Island of Naxos, and That under Constantine the Great, in whose Favour he afterwards had so great a share, that, by his Permission, he destroyed many Statues of the ancient Gods. After whose Death, the sole Authority being lodged in Julian, he was by his Command cut to pieces; and the inhuman Tyrant, moreover, ordered his Grandees to feed on the Entrails of this most innocent and holy Man.' Perhaps the Matter is a little amplified; but if his Design was particularly to blacken the apostate Prince, by some probable Additions, why did he not also suppress some things? his Rhetorical way of writing permitted it. Why should he mention the Idols which Cyril broke to pieces? This Circumstance extremely abates the Gentile Cruelty. The Catholics may judge of it by their own Practice. When the Duke of Alva put so many Protestants to death in the Low Countries, his Scruples, upon that Account, were easily removed, by remembering, that they were Enemies to Images. It must be granted, that Martyrs obtain a pure Crown, when they can not be reproached to have made use of Hatchets against consecrated Statues, &c.

(1) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato priore, fol. 104.

CYRUS, Son of Darius Notbus, King of Persia, became famous for his Noble Qualities, but much more so by the War he undertook against his Brother Artaxerxes. Darius, their Father, perceiving his Death approaching, re-called him from the Government of a Province he had committed to him. Cyrus brought with him Tissaphernes, in whom he entirely confided; but That Man deceived him; for he persuaded Artaxerxes, who succeeded Darius, that Cyrus was contriving something against him. This so provoked the King, that he would have destroyed Cyrus, if Parisatis their Mother had not warded off the blow; not content with saving his Life, she also procured for him the Government of the Province he had before obtained of King Darius. Cyrus was no sooner returned, than he began to form designs of Ambition and Revenge, making all necessary Preparations, both to revenge his Brother's ill Treatment, and seize his Crown. He took care to engage in his Service some good Greek Captains, who had fled from their own Country, to whom he gave Orders to raise Troops, and thus began his March, concealing his real Intention under divers Pretences. His Money soon failed him; but, without being discouraged at it, he had the happiness to meet a Queen, who did not satisfy herself with bringing him Money [A]. Although his mercenary Troops created him much uneasiness, yet he passed the Euphrates, and promised himself a decisive Victory. In the mean time Artaxerxes, who had been well informed, by Tissaphernes, of Cyrus's Preparations, had neglected nothing to be in a good Condition to receive him. He marched to meet him with a fine Army; the Battle was fought near Babylon, and it is believed, Cyrus would have been Conqueror, if he had not perished in it, by fighting with too much Courage, and too little Caution (a) [B]. Aspasia, his Concubine, fell into the Hands of Artaxerxes, and was considered as one of the chief parts of the Body. We shall give you an Abridgment of her History, in the Remark [C]. She did not abuse

(a) Taken from the first Book of Xenophon's History of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger. The Battle between the two Brothers, in which Cyrus was killed, was fought the 3d Year of the 9th Olympiad, which answers to the 353d Year of Rome, according to Calvisius.

[A] He met with a Queen, who was not contented to bring him Money. Her Name was Epyaxa: she was Wife of Syennesis, King of Cilicia. She came very seasonably to Cyrus; for he owed almost four Months Pay to his Troops, and found himself every Day teized before his Door by Crouds of Soldiers, demanding their Arrears. As it was not his Custom to send them away without Money when he had it, he was much embarrassed, fearing they would conclude, that, since he used to pay well when he could, his Treasures were entirely exhausted. Such an Opinion might cause his whole Enterprize to miscarry. Epyaxa put him out of his Pain; for, upon her Arrival, he gave the Army four Months Pay; and, either out of Gratitude to her, or because the Queen would not confer her Favours by halves, he freely cohabited with her. At least this was the common Opinion. Εὐλαγία δὲ Κίον καὶ συγχεῖσθαι τῇ Κιλίσσῃ (1). It is commonly reported that she lay with Cyrus. To oblige her, he reviewed all his Troops before her, and made them perform their Exercise; and the Greeks, making a shew of charging the Barbarians, and routing them, the Queen was seized with fear, and fled also. She returned to Cilicia, with a good Guard, which Cyrus gave her, and arrived, five Days before him, at Tarbis, the capital City of the Kingdom of Syennesis. But, notwithstanding all the Favour and Service she had done him, the

(1) Xenophon de Cyri Exped. lib. 1, pag. m. 146.

City was pillaged by the Soldiers, and, which is strange, Syennesis would not trust himself with Cyrus, though he had trusted his Wife with him. At length, by his Wife's Persuasion, he paid Cyrus a Visit, and received some Presents from him, which cost him dear; being obliged to furnish a good Sum of Money to subsist his Troops, and preserve his Country from plunder (2).

[B] He was killed in fighting with too much Courage, and too little Caution. The Greeks that were in his Pay had so routed the Persians, who opposed them, that Cyrus, overjoyed, was saluted King by all about him. He had with him a Body of Six hundred Men to observe the main body of Artaxerxes's Army; as soon as he perceived them in Motion, he immediately charged them with this Troop; and, breaking through the first Ranks, routed Six thousand Men of the Regiment of Guards, and killed their Leader; after which, seeing the King, his Brother, he spurred his Horse towards him, and wounded him with his Lance (3). The Fight was sharp, and Cyrus, attended by a very few, was overpowered and slain (4).

[C] We shall give you an Abridgment of her History in the Remarks. Aspasia, was the Daughter of Hermotimus, and born at Phocæa (5). According to Ælian's Description of her, she must have been a most accomplished Woman, in Body and Mind. Her Name was Milto, before she came to Cyrus; but

(2) Taken from Xenophon's first Book of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger, p. m. 145, 147.

(3) Ctesias, who was in Artaxerxes's Army, says in his History, that he dressed the Wound. Xenoph. de Cyri Expeditione, lib. 1, pag. 157.

(4) Taken from Xenoph. lib. 1. See also Plutarch's Life of Artaxerxes.

(5) Φωκαία. Plut. in Pericle, pag. 165. Amiot has ill translated native of the Phocæa.

the Complaisance of Cyrus, and behaved with so much Art, that she obtained the Love

(6) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist.
lib. 12, cap. 1.

but that Prince made her change it, giving her the Name of Pericles's celebrated Mistress (6). Hermotimus, whose Wife died in Child-bed of our Aspasia, gave her an Education agreeable to the Meannets of his Estate. During her Infancy she underwent a great uneasiness; she was the finest Child in the World; but a Tumour happened to break out on her Chin, which terribly disfigured her. And a Physician, her Father brought her, too cruelly refused his Assistance, upon his not being able to pay him his Price. She returned home disconsolate, her Glass helping to encourage her Grief. Ἀπλάσσα ἔξω ἔκλειπεν ἔχουσα ἐν τοῖς γόνασι κάτοπτρον καὶ ὁρῶσα ἑαυτὴν ἐν αὐτῷ σφόδρα ἠλγει. A medico digressa in acerbissimo luctu versata est, et speculum in genibus tenens, seque in ipso contemplata

(7) Ælian. ibid.

gebementer doluit (7). At length, by a Dream, she learned a Remedy which cured her; and afterwards became the finest Woman of her Age. Her Hair was light and curled, she had large Eyes, a hawked Nose, small Ears, a delicate Skin, a lovely Complexion of white and red, her Lips were of an admirable red, her Teeth whiter than snow, her Feet and Legs perfectly well shaped, and her Voice so sweet, that, when she spoke, one would have thought he had heard the Sirens sing. Her extraordinary Beauty was purely owing to Nature; for neither her own Humour, nor her Father's Fortune, would allow her to encrease it by borrowed Charms. The Governour of those Parts under Cyrus, the King of Persia's Son, took her against her own, and her Father's Will, and brought her to Cyrus, together with other beautiful young Women. She was presented to that Prince, just as he rose from Table; and was sitting down to drinking, according to the Custom of the Country. There were three other Greek Girls with her, who were not at all of her Temper; they suffered themselves readily to be painted, and dressed up, having admirably well retained the Lessons their Nurses had taught them, in what manner to behave when Cyrus should come to them, to play with, caress, and kiss them. Ὅσων δὲ καὶ ὑπὸ τὸν περὶ αὐτὴν δίδασκοντο, ὅπως τε ὑποδραμεῖν χρὴ τὸν Κύρου, καὶ τίνα τρόπον ὁπνεύσαι, καὶ προσεῖν αὐτῷ μὴ ἀποσσεσθῆναι, καὶ ἀπλομενῶς μὴ δυσχερῶσαι, καὶ φιλεῖν ὅπως οὐκ ὀφείλουσι, ἐταίρικα δὲ μὴ καθήματα, καὶ διδάγματα γυναικῶν καπιλικῶς τῷ κάλλει χερμαίνον ἔργα. Et à nutricibus acciperent documenta, quemadmodum erga Cyrum se gerere deberent: quomodo insinuare se illi & adblandiri, & non refugere, si accederet, neque si tangeret, ægere ferre, & osculum admittere eas oportere, omnibus denique præceptis & institutis amatoriis, quibus uti mulieres, quibus sua venalis est forma, solent, instructæ (8).—They had learnt from their Governesses how to receive Cyrus, in what manner to make their Court to him; not to turn aside at his Approaches, or seem afflicted at a Touch, but to allow his Kisses, with all the wanton Lectures, and Instructions, in which Women, who set their Charms to sale, are usually instructed. They strove who should please him most; but Millo expressed so much Aversion to the State she was designed for, that they were under a Necessity to force her, by blows, to put on the Habits that were given upon such Occasions; and whilst her Companions, by ogling and smiles, did all they could to charm the Prince, she only wept, not daring to lift up her Eyes; such Shame did her native Modesty cause in her to see herself in that Condition. When Cyrus bid them sit down by him, the other did at the first word; but our Aspasia not without Force: The rest permitted Cyrus to touch them, as much as he pleased; Aspasia alone would not allow the least Freedom, and even threatened Cyrus; as soon he but touched her with his Finger, and, upon his laying his Hand on her Breast, she rose up, and endeavoured to fly from him. Cyrus, in Justice to her, declared that of all who had been brought him she was the only one that was truly a Novice in those Affairs; and he entertained a stronger Passion for her than for all the Women he had ever enjoyed. Ἀφραγὰς τῇ χειρὶ μόνον τὴν Κύρου προσελάμνατο, ἐξελθούσα τε καὶ ἑαυτὴν οἰμώζεσθαι τοῖς αὐτὰ δρῶντα, ὑπερηγάθη τούτοις ὁ Κύρος. ἔπα-

(8) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(9) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(10) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(11) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(12) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(13) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(14) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

(15) Plut. ibid.
Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 1, pag. m. 543, 544.

νισαμένης τε αὐτῆς καὶ περὶ αὐτῆς φερούσης, ἔπει καὶ τῶν μαζῶν προσήλατο, ἀλλ' ἐν ταύτῃ μὲν ὑπερηγάθη τὴν εὐγένειαν & Περσικῶς ὁ τῷ Δαρείῳ, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀποβλέψας πρὸς τὸν ἀγορεύον, ταύτην μόνην, ἔρη, ἐλευθέραν καὶ ἀδιάρθεον ἠγάγετο. αἱ δὲ λοιπαὶ καπιλικῶς ἔχουσι καὶ τὴν εἶδος ἐπὶ, καὶ τὸν τρόπον πολλόν, ἐκ δὲ τούτων ὁ Κύρος πλεον ταύτην ἠγάπησεν, αἷς οὐκ ὀκνήσας ποτὶς ἀνθρώποις. Si enim extrema manu fateretur Cyrus attingeret, exclamabat, dicebatque eum non impune laturum, quod talia fecisset. Ea re supra modum delectatus est Cyrus, & quum attrectante mamillas, illa surgeret, & se in pedes conjiceret, contra Persarum consuetudinem ardente amore Cyrus erga ingenuitatem ejus flagare coepit, respiciensque ad emptorem: hanc, inquit, solam ingenuam & incorruptam adduxisti: reliquæ verò tum facie tum magis etiam moribus fucatæ sunt. Quamobrem Cyrus eam plas amavit omnibus cum quibus unquam consuetudinem habuisset (9).—If Cyrus touched her with a single Finger, she cried out, and threatened Revenge, at which he was extremely pleased; but if he offered to stroke her Breast, she arose and endeavoured to quit the Room; here Cyrus was transported in a manner unusual to the Persians, and, turning to the Merchant, said, This is the only accomplished, and unstained, Beauty you have brought, but the Charms of the rest are artificial, and their Minds are still more evidently debauched. Wherefore Cyrus had a greater Affection for her, than for any Woman with whom he had ever conversed. Plutarch says almost the same thing. It is true, he says not, that Aspasia threatened Cyrus, but those that would bring her to him: Βυλομένην δὲ προσέλαυν τῶν καλῶν τῶν, οὐκ ὀκνήσας μὲν τοῖς τούτων (ἴπαι) ὅς ἄν ἐμοὶ προσελάυν τὰς χεῖρας. Παρὰ τούτοις ἀδύνατον ἴψαν cubicularίῳ, ὡς εἰ, inquit, mibi qui admovent manus (10).

(9) Ælian. ibid.
pag. 545.

(10) Plut. in Aspaxerxes pag. 1024, 1025.

She was useful to Cyrus, not only in the Pleasures of Love, but also by her Counsels. He consulted her in the most difficult matters, and never repented, that he followed her Advice: her Capacity was therefore as great as her Beauty. Thus qualified, a Prince's Mistress commonly goes very far; and if she has not the substantial Part of Government and Sovereignty, she wants but a little of it. As to Rank and Dignity, Cyrus lived with Aspasia, almost as with a lawful Wife; and it is believed, after he once knew her, he had nothing more to do with other Women. It cannot therefore be thought strange, that the Rise of a Greek Maid to such a Degree, should make so much noise at the Court of the great King (11). This Reputation was of great Service to Aspasia; for, after Cyrus was killed, they diligently sought for her, by Artaxerxes's Order. They found her disconsolate, and, in spite of her Opposition, they put on her the Robes the King sent her: she appeared so charming in this Dress, that he fell desperately in Love with her, and, though he thought it a Point of Honour to make her forget his Brother, it was long before he could succeed. Aspasia alone was able to comfort him for the Loss of Teridates, the most beautiful of his Eunuchs (12).

(11) So they filled the Persian King. See Remark: [A], of the Article ARTABAN IV.

(12) Taken from Ælian. lib. 12, cap. 1.

Xenophon relates one thing, which is not very consistent with what we have said, that Cyrus was content with Aspasia alone. He mentions two Concubines of that Prince, one of Phocæa, the other of Miletus. This was younger than the other, and made her escape from the Persians, the Day that Cyrus was killed. She of Phocæa remained in the Enemy's Hands. The Historian says, she had Wit and Beauty. βασιλεὺς δὲ καὶ οἱ σύν αὐτῷ τὰ τε ἄλλα πολλὰ διατρέχοντες καὶ τὴν Φοκαῖδα τὴν Κύρου παλλακίδα τὴν σοφὴν καὶ καλὴν λεγόμενὴν εἶναι, καμῆσαι. ἡ δὲ Μιλήσια ἡ νεώτερος ἀφῆκε τὴν ἐξ αὐτῆς βασιλέα ἐκτρέφει γυνὴν πρὸς τῶν Ἑλλήνων. (Rei interim cum suis castra diripit, ac Cyri ipsius palli, cum Phocæam eximia specie ac prudentia etiam, uti fama ferebatur) mulierem abducit. Namque altera natu minor Milefia à regia cohorte capta nuda efugit (13).—The King and his Party ransacked the Tent, and carried off one of the Concubines

(13) Xenophon, lib. 1, Exped. Cyri, sub. fin.

Love of Parysatis [D]. As she looked upon this Favour, as a Blessing from Heaven upon her, she did not fail to return public Tokens of her Gratitude to the Goddess Venus [E]. If all be true that is reported of her, her Beauty must have continued with her a prodigious while [F]. For the rest, it appears by Cyrus's Letter of Cyrus, a Phoecean, and (according to Report) of extraordinary Beauty and Discretion. But the other, a Milesian, and younger, made her escape naked from the Guards, after she had been taken. This was our Aspasia. It is not likely, that Cyrus should bring with him two Concubines, and leave the youngest neglected. If he had brought a Regiment of them, it might be said, the greatest part were only for show; but it cannot be supposed this was the Case, when they were only two. Besides, does not Xenophon say, it was thought that Cyrus lay with the Queen of Cilicia. This refutes Ælian's Tradition; for Aspasia had been with Cyrus long before that. Observe, that Xenophon used the word σὸν differently from Plutarch: the latter uses it in a manner, that is more honourable for Aspasia: he does not say, as Xenophon, that Aspasia was reported to be wife; but he says, that Cyrus called her the Wise (14).

to

(14) Plut. in Artaxerxe, p. 1025.

[D] She obtained the Love of Parysatis. One Day Cyrus had a Present made him of a very fine Necklace, she shewed it to Aspasia, and told her it was worthy of the Daughter, or Mother, of a King. She confessed it was; upon which, he commanded her to take it, and wear it; but she artfully refused, telling him it was fitter for the Queen-Mother, and advising him to send it her; for, continues she, you will find my Neck fine enough without this Ornament. Cyrus lent the Necklace to his Mother, and writ her the whole Conversation. Parysatis received the Letter with as much Joy as the Present; being extremely pleased to see that Aspasia did not desire a greater share of Cyrus's Affection than she herself had. She sent her magnificent Presents: all which Aspasia gave to Cyrus, telling him he wanted them more than she. Such a Conduct is very praiseworthy, few Women using their good Fortune with so much Moderation. Ἀσπασία μὲν ἔμεγαλοφρόνως, καὶ ὑπὲρ τὰς γυναῖκας εὐαίμωνες τὰ ἐν αὐτῇ ἐδεχσέναι ὑπὲρ εἰσθᾶσι γυναῖκας δρᾶν. φιλόκοσμοι γὰρ εἰσι δεινῶς. Aspasia itaque animi magnitudine præstans, contrarium reliquis regum uxoribus faciens, eas longe superavit. Sunt enim illæ rerum ad ornatum mundumque pertinentium plus æquo studiosæ (15). — Aspasia acted with a greatness of Soul, superior to what we find usually in Women: who are too fond of adorning themselves. Aspasia was contented with the Heart of Cyrus, and made this only use of his Favour, to enrich her Father Hermotimus (16), (which did not require any great Sum of Money) and to testify her Gratitude to Venus, as we are going to see.

(15) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12, cap. 2, p. 548.

(16) Id. p. 547.

[E] She did not fail to return public Tokens of her Gratitude to the Goddess Venus. In her Infancy she often dreamed, that she should be exalted to a high Fortune (17). After the Physician had refused to cure her, she dreamt she saw a Pigeon, which, being changed into a Woman, told her the true Remedy for her Illness was to take Nosegays of Roses, consecrated to Venus, and apply them to the Tumour, when they were dried. She did it, and they dissipated the Tumour (18). Seeing herself so powerful with Cyrus, she concluded, that Venus had long ago honoured her with her Protection. Therefore she offered Sacrifices to that Goddess; she consecrated to her a Statue of fine Gold, placing before it a Pigeon, glittering with Jewels, and every Day recommended herself to this Idol, by Prayers and Oblations (19).

(17) Id. p. 540.

(18) Id. p. 547.

(19) Id. p. 547.

[F] If all be true that is reported of her, her Beauty must have continued a prodigious while with her. Artaxerxes lived Ninety four Years, and reigned Sixty two (20). Some Years before his Death, he declared his Son Darius his Successor (21). Darius was then fifty Years old. There was a Persian Law, that whoever was nominated King, should ask a Present, and he that nominated him King should give it him, if possible. Darius asked Aspasia. The King, his Father, was vexed at that Demand, though, besides his Wife, he had, at that Time, Three hundred and sixty very beautiful Con-

(20) Plut. in Artaxerxe, sub fin.

(21) Id. p. 1024.

bines. He answered, that Aspasia was at Liberty; if she pleased, she might give herself to Darius, but no Violence should be used. Aspasia, being called, declared her Intention of going with Darius, and, accordingly, she was delivered to him; but after Artaxerxes had made this Present to his Son, he found out this Stratagem to refuse it. He made her Priests of Diana, by which Office she was bound to Continency, and a single Life. Darius was so enraged at this, that he conspired against his Father, and thereby absolutely ruined himself. Thus Plutarch informs us (22). Justin relates the same in Substance; only he does not say, as Plutarch does, that Aspasia was made Priests of Diana Anitis, who was worshipped at Ecbatane, but Priests of the Sun, and thereby Continency was enjoined her. Hanc patrem cedere sibi fecit regnum Darius postulaverat: qui pro indulgentia sua in liberos primo facturum se dixerat: mox penitentia ductus, ut honeste negaret quod temere promiserat, solis eam sacerdotio præfecit, quo perpetua illi ab omnibus viris pudicitia imponebatur (23). — Darius had requested her of his Father with the Kingdom, who, out of an common Indulgence to his Children, readily consented; but afterwards, repenting his too hasty Compliance, made her Priests of the Sun (whereby she was enjoined a perpetual Chastity), that he might, with Honour, retract his Promise. This is very surprizing; for Aspasia, as Plutarch observes, was Cyrus's favourite Mistress, before she had the same Place with Artaxerxes. All Historians agree, that Cyrus's Expedition was in the first Years of Artaxerxes's Reign. We will suppose, with Calvisius, that the Battle, in which Cyrus lost his Life, was fought the third Year of this Reign. We will suppose, that Artaxerxes chose Darius for his Successor in the Fifty eighth Year of his Reign; it does not appear, by Plutarch's Account, that That Prince lived above two or three Years after Darius was crowned King. Then Aspasia must have been Artaxerxes's Concubine Fifty five Years. She could not be less than twenty Years old at Cyrus's Death. She must be Seventy five Years old, when the new King requested her as a particular Favour, and when the King, with whom she had lived Fifty five Years, could not part with her. So that, at such an Age, she must have had still extraordinary Charms. Is not this strange? can one imagine, without laughing, that a Woman of almost eighty Years must be made a Priestess, that no Man might enjoy her? at such an Age must one be bound to Continency by a religious Vow? is not such an Age a much surer Rampart against the Desires and amorous Addresses of Men, than the venerable Office of Priestess? I do not remember, that any Critic urges these Difficulties against Plutarch, or observes that this Lady must have preserved her Beauty a long time, but I find this Remark in a Book written by a Courtier. We read, says he (24), that Artaxerxes, of all his Women, loved Aspasia the best, who was very old, and yet very fair, and who had been his late Brother's Mistress. Darius, his Son, fell in love with her: so beautiful she was, notwithstanding her Age, that he demanded her of his Father, at the same time that he divided the Kingdom with him; the Father, out of Jealousy, that he might not partake of this Dainty, made her Priests of the Sun, because, in Persia, those, who are in that Office, are entirely devoted to Chastity. It was not Brantome's Interest to criticize upon Plutarch; on the contrary, it was his Business to find, in this Author, the foregoing Chronology. You must know Brantome mentions several Ladies, who had been very charming in the latter Season of their Lives, even to the Winter of their Age, to their seventieth Year. This he affirms of the Duchess of Valentinois, and of another, mentioned before (25). For the rest, the great Wildom, for which Aspasia has been commended, does not appear in her Choice of Darius. She prefers the Son (22) Id. p. 1024; & seq.

(23) Just. lib. 10, cap. 2.

(24) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, p. 227.

(25) In Remark [G], of the Article ARRAGON (JOAN of).

to the Lacedemonians, that he did not stick, when it was necessary, to make the usual Promises of Princes in such Cases [G].

to the Father, the rising Sun to the setting Sun, forgetting the constant Friendship Artaxerxes had had for her so many Years. This verifies in her the Spanish Proverb, Que ningunas damas lindas, o a lo menos pocas, se bajen viejas de la cinta hasta a bacco; that is, That none, or at least very few, Ladies, grow old below the Girdle. Brantome says, (26), that hearing this Proverb mentioned to a certain Lady, she asked her how she understood it, 'Whether it meant, that old Age did not destroy the Beauty of the Body below the Girdle, or that the natural Appetite and Desire did not decline at that time of Life? She replied, she understood it of both, for, tho' Age weakens the Strength of Concupiscence, it is not entirely destroyed till Death.'

(26) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 198, 199.

(27) Μισθὸς τοῦς ἐρατευομένοις καὶ ἀρβύρων ἀλλὰ μίσθον ἵστοῦται. Stipendium militibus non annumeraturum sed admenstrum. Plutarch. in Artaxerxe, pag. 1013, F.

[G] It appears, by Cyrus's Letter to the Lacedemonians, that he did not stick, when it was necessary, to make the usual Promises of Princes in such Cases. He wrote to them for Troops, and, in his Letter, promises so many Advantages to all that would join him, that every Man had reason to conclude, that he should make his Fortune by entering into his Service. They shall not receive their Pay, says Cyrus, by Tale, but by Measure (27).

He made no Secret of his Design, boasting he was more worthy of the Throne than his Brother.

I have more Courage, says he, than He (28), I (28) Id. ibid.

I am a better Philosopher, I understand Magic better, I can drink better, and bear more Wine than He can (29). He is an effeminate Coward, that durst not even ride on Horse-back when he hunts, nor dares He, in time of Danger, sit on his Throne.

The Ingenuity of Cyrus is very extraordinary: he does not conceal, from the Lacedemonians, his Intentions of dethroning Artaxerxes; he did not tell them, as is the Practice in all Civil Wars, that he had no design upon the Crown, but only to drive evil Counsellors from the King, who abuse his Name to oppress the People, and overthrow the Laws. He knew the Lacedemonians would be glad that the Crown of Persia should be upon the Head of one, under great Obligations to them; for this reason he did not hide from them his true Design. No doubt, when his Interest required it, he made the accustomed Protestations; and I am persuaded, at this Day, no Scruple would be made to communicate such a Secret to any neighbouring Princes, who might hope to be Gainers by such a Change.

(29) Οἶνον δὲ πλείονα πίνειν καὶ φέρειν. Vinum potare & ferre largius. Id. p. 1014, A.

CLARUS (JULIUS) one of the best Civilians of the XVIth Century, was born at Alexandria, in the Milanese, of a Patrician Family. He undertook a great Work, and what is called, by the Civilians, The received Opinions, Receptæ Sententiæ; that is, such as most of the Doctors commonly follow. His public Employments not allowing him sufficient time to finish such a Work [A], he published part of it [B], and at length declared his Resolution to give it over (a), since, being obliged to follow the King Spain, he had not leisure to revise what he had wrote, which would also require a greater number of Books, than he could carry with him (b). He set out from Madrid, upon his Travels into Italy, and being arrived at Carthagena, he was seized with a Distemper, which carried him off the thirteenth of April, 1575: he was buried at Milan, in the Church of Peace, in a Tomb he had built for himself, Anno 1566 (c): he was born the sixth of January 1525 (d).

(a) Julius Clarus, Prefat. lib. 5, Sentent. Recept.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Konig, deceived by the date of Julius Clarus's Epitaph, falsely believed he died in 1566; but it is the Date of the setting up the Monument.

(d) Taken from Ghilini, Parte I, pag. 131, 132.

[A] He undertook a great Work - - - which his Employments did not allow him Time to finish. The War having forced him to retire to Mantua, he employed himself in revising his Work, in order to publish it; but, hearing the King of Spain had made him Counsellor of the Senate of Milan, he gave it over (1). Some Years after, he was made President of the extraordinary Questors, and Prefect of the Annona (2), and Master of the Waters. While he discharged his Duty, with the utmost Diligence, in these Places, they sent for him into Spain, where Philip II made him Counsellor in the supreme Council of Italy. He therefore quitted his Country, his Wife and Children, and was obliged to travel thro' France, Spain, and Flanders, and leave the best part of his Writings unfinished (3).

(1) Julius Clarus, Epistola dedicata Tractat de Testamentis, &c.

(2) As much as to say Intendant of the Provisions.

(3) Julius Clarus, in Prefat. lib. 5, Recept. Sentent.

[B] He published part of it. His Design was to publish a Work Receptarum Sententiarum, in seven Books. In the first he treated De Legibus & Constitutionibus; in the second, De Jure Personarum; in the third, De Materia Successionum & ultimarum voluntatum; in the fourth, De Contractibus; in the fifth, De Maleficiis; in the sixth De Civilibus Judiciis; the seventh was to contain good Indexes to the whole Work, together with some Tracts not directly relating to the six preceding Books. But he only published, first, a Treatise of Feudis, three Years (4) after he was preferred to be Counsellor of Milan: it was a Fragment of the fourth Book. Some time after, he published a Tract de Testamentis, being part of the third Book, which he dedicated to Antony Perrenot Bishop of Arras; the Dedication is dated from Milan, May 1, 1559: this was followed by a Treatise de Donationibus & de Jure Emphyteutico, Parts of the fourth Book. At last he published the fifth Book entire, concerning Criminal Matters. All these Tracts are collected together in the Edition of Frankfort, in Folio, in 1572, by the Care of John Fichard, a Civilian, and Syndic of that City. There have been several Editions (5) in different Places, and sometimes with Additions borrowed from other Writers. Mr Moreri, copying Ghilini, without quoting him, gives the Titles of Julius Clarus's Writings very wrong. His Words are: 'He composed several Tracts: Opera Juridica. Receptarum Sententiarum Opera omnia. Volumen in quo omnium Criminum materia sub acceptis sententiis copiosissime tractatur.' This is saying nothing in particular, but repeating the same thing three or four times in different Terms. The work is, it is believed all the Works he mentions differed one from another, which is a great Mistake. The Praises that John Fichard bestowed on our Julius Clarus are just, and ought not to be suspected of Flattery, on Pretence, that he advised his dear Companion, Sigismund Feyrabend, to reprint the Works of that Author.

Inter illos jam recitatos (Jurisperitos) cum hic Julius Clarus vir multis certe nominibus insignis, five generosos natus - - - five eruditionem (in Jure potissimum civili) plane raram, five dexteritatem denique in his quæ tractanda sibi sumit felicissimam spectemus, facile princeps sit, &c. (6). — Far superior to all these (Lawyers) was Julius Clarus, a Man eminent in many Accounts, for his Birth, - - - for his uncommon Knowledge (especially in the Civil Law), and a peculiar Happiness in handling his Subjects. This Pretence is sometimes good; for when a Man is obliged to praise for the Honour of his own Judgment, and the Benefit of a Bookseller he favours and directs, the Expressions of Approbation he bestows on the Author, are not always in a just Proportion to his Merit.

(5) Mine is the Edition of Frankfort, 1582, in Folio.

(6) Jo. Fichard. Epist. Dedicatoria Operum Julii Clari.

CLAUDIUS

CLAUDIUS, in Latin Tiberius Claudius Drusus, the Roman Emperor, ascended the Throne after the Death of Caligula his Nephew, in the Year of Rome 794 (a). Mr Moreri speaks largely of him. I shall examine another time what he says, and what I could add to it. At present, I shall content myself with observing, that this Emperor would suffer none in public Employments, who did not understand the Latin Tongue. For this Reason he discharged a Magistrate descended from one of the most Illustrious Greek Families, and reduced him to the Condition of a Foreigner. Rome had long expressed this Jealousy for the Majesty of her own Language, and the same Passion hath passed into other Countries [A].

However

[A] He would not suffer any in public Employments, who did not understand the Latin Tongue.

----- Rome had long expressed this Jealousy for the Majesty of it's Language, and the same Passion hath passed into other Countries.] I have already prepared (1) my Readers for some Facts concerning the Zeal of People for their own Language. I will begin with proving what I have said of the Emperor Claudius.

'Splendidum virum, Græciæque provinciæ principem, verum Latini sermonis ignorantum, non modo albo judicium erat, sed etiam in peregrinitatem redegit (2). — He not only

'struck out of the List of Judges, but likewise disfranchis'd an eminent Man, and a Deputy of the Province of Greece, but ignorant of the Latin Tongue.' Sitting upon an Affair of Consequence, concerning the Lycians, he asked something of one of their Deputies, who was born in Lycia, but had obtained the Freedom of Rome; he asked it in Latin, and finding the Deputy did not understand him, he deprived him of his Freedom, saying, They ought not to be Romans who were ignorant of the Roman Language. Εἰπὼν μὴ δεῖν Ῥωμαίων εἶναι τὸν μὴ καὶ τὴν διδασκὴν αὐτὸν ἐπιστάμενον. Dicens Romanum eum esse non debere qui sermonem eum nesciret (3). Observe here an Error of Cassaubon: he supposes that this Deputy was born at Rome (4), and perhaps consulted the Latin Version with more Care than the Greek Text. For if he had examined well the Force of these Words: Λυκίς μὲν τὸ ἀρχαῖον ὄρος, Ῥωμαῖς δὲ γέγονός. A Lycian originally, but at that time a Citizen of Rome; he would have known, that, considering the following Words, they were ill translated Lycium quidem origine, Romanum tamen natum.

----- Of a Lycian Family, but born at Rome. Xiphilin's Translator has done better in giving them this turn: Qui olim Lycius, tum Civis Romanus erat (5). Valerius Maximus observes, as a Proof of the ancient Gravity of the Romans, that the Magistrates always answered the Greeks in Latin, obliging them to make use of an Interpreter. They did this not only at Rome, but also in Greece and Asia, and, that we may see the whole extent of their Politics, I will produce the Passage of that Author, in which the Ambition of the Romans is observable, with respect to the Propagation of their Language. 'Magistratus vero prisci quantopere suam populi que Romani majestatem retinentes se gesserint, hinc cognosci potest, quod inter cetera obtinendæ gravitatis indicia, illud quoque magna cum persequerantia custodiebant, ne Græcis unquam, nisi Latine responsa darent. Quinetiam ipsa linguæ volubilitate, qua plurimum valent, excussa, per interpretem loqui cogebant; non in urbe tantum nostra, sed etiam in Græcia, & Asia: quo scilicet Latine vocis honores per omnes gentes venerabilior diffunderetur. Nec illis deerant studia doctrinæ, sed nulla non in re palium togæ subjici debere arbitrabantur: indignum esse existimantes, illecebris, & suavitatē literarum imperii pondus & auctoritatem domari (6). — How zealous the old Magistrates were of maintaining their own, and the Majesty of the Roman People, may hence be learnt, that, amongst other Instances of enforcing their Grandeur, they laid it down as an unalterable Maxim, never to treat with the Greeks but in Latin; and obliged them moreover to deliver, by an Interpreter, what had flowed from a Volubility of Tongue peculiar to that People; and that not only in Italy, but in Greece and Asia; that the Honour of the Roman Language might be diffused with greater Majesty through all Nations. Nor yet were they wanting

'in the Studies of Language, but thought, that Greece ought to submit to Rome in every thing; and that the Force and Majesty of Empire ought to have the Preference of Delicacy and Sweetness of Language.' A little after he observes, that the Orator Molo, who taught Cicero Eloquence, was the first that was allowed to speak Greek in the Senate, which afterwards became a Custom. 'Quis ergo huic consuetudini, qua nunc Græcis actionibus aures curiæ exfurdantur, januam patefecit? ut opinor, Molo rhetor, qui studia *M. Cicero*nis acuit. Eum namque ante omnes exterarum gentium in senatu sine interprete auditum constat. Quem honorem non immerito cepit, quoniam summam vim Romanæ eloquentiæ adjuverat (7). — Who first introduced this Custom, by which the Ears of the Court are stunned with Pleadings in Greek? I believe it to be Molo, the Rhetorician, who first improved Cicero's Studies. For it is certain he was the first Foreigner, who was heard in the Senate without an Interpreter. Of which Honour he was not unworthy, having improved the utmost Force of Roman Eloquence.' Dion confirms what Valerius Maximus says, that they pleaded Causes, in Rome, in Greek, under the Empire of Tiberius (8). Nevertheless, the Emperor would not suffer, that a native Greek Soldier should give his Evidence before the Judges in his own Tongue (9); according to Dion. Suetonius also speaks of this; but it is not likely he should say what is found in the Editions: 'Militem quoque Græce testimonium interrogatum nisi Latine respondere vetuit (10). — He ordered, that a Soldier, though interrogated in Greek, should give his Evidence only in Latin.' It ought rather to be read Græcum than Græce; for it was as much unworthy the Majesty of Rome to interrogate the Witnesses in Greek, as to suffer them to answer in Greek; wherefore we ought to conclude, that if Tiberius permitted the one, he would not forbid the other; and that since he hindered them from answering in Greek, he would not suffer them to be examined in the same Language. Suetonius relates how scrupulous he was when under a Necessity of using a Greek Word in the Senate (11); he rather chose they should be guilty of a Circumlocution in the Edicts than insert a foreign Word (12). But we must not expect here a general Rule, without Exception; nor is an exact Uniformity of Conduct to be found in the best regulated States. Therefore we must not be surprized to hear the Roman Ambassador make his Speech, to the Tarentines, in Greek. He pronounced the Language ill; they laughed at him; and That was one of the Indignities that he suffered, and which the Roman Republic resented very much to their own Prejudice (13). The Romans had not then the Ascendant, as when they reproached Cicero as guilty of an unpardonable Fault, for speaking Greek in a Greek Senate. 'Ille negat & ait indignum facinus esse quod ego in Senatu Græco verba fecissem, quod quidem apud Græcos Græcè loquutus essem, id ferri nullo modo posse (14). — He maintains it to be an unpardonable Offence in me to speak in an Assembly of Greeks; and that my using the Greek Language before the Greeks was not to be born.' This was the Complaint against him, and not that he spoke Greek, in his House, with Carneades, and the other Ambassadors of Greece. He that represents this matter thus betrays the grossest Ignorance: 'In Verbinis etiam invenimus Marco Tullio quasi crimen obiectum quod domi cum Carneade cæterisque Græciæ legatis Græcè colloquutus fuisset (15). — In the Orations against Verres, we find it objected to Cicero, as a Crime, to have spoken

Greek,

(1) See Remark [F], of the Article ATTILA.

(2) Suet in Claudio, cap. 16.

(3) Dio, lib. 60, ad Ann. 796, pag. m. 777.

(4) De Legato Lyciorum quodam oriundo quidem è Lycia sed nato Romæ. Cassaub. in Sueton. Claud. cap. 16.

(5) Xiphil. in Claudio, pag. m. 143.

(6) Valerius Max. lib. 2, cap. 2, n. 2, pag. m. 147, 141.

(7) Id. ibid. n. 3, pag. 142.

(8) Dio, lib. 57, p. 702, ad Ann. 796.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Suet. in Tiberio, cap. 71.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Dionysius Halic. in Excerptis Legat.

(14) Cicero, Orat. 4, in Verrem, cap. 66.

(15) Bretus, in Ordine periti quo Judiciorum Civilium, c. 63, fol. 85, verso.

However this Emperor had a great value for the Greek Tongue (b), and even made use of it to give Answers to Embassadors in the Senate.

(b) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 42.

'Greek, at his own House with Carneades, and the other Græcian Embassadors.' Cicero was born long after the Embassy of Carneades: but this is not the only Blunder to be found in Quotations from Mr le Bret. We must not pass by one Instance, which Cajaubon has turned to an ill use. Paulus Æmilius, having subdued the Macedonians, published his Commands to that conquered Nation in Latin; but immediately Octavius, the Pretor, explained them in Greek. 'Silentio per præconem facto Paulus Latine quæ Senatui, quæ sibi ex concilii sententia viva essent pronunciavit: ea Cn. Octavius Prætor (nam & ipse aderat) interpretata sermone Græco referebat (16).' Cajaubon pretends to prove, by this Passage of Titus Livius, that the Roman Magistrates used their own Tongue, because they could not express themselves well in Greek (17); for, continues he, those who spoke Greek readily used it upon every Occasion, and immediately alleges the Pretor Octavius. This is plainly to suppose, that Paulus Æmilius could not speak Greek, and that, if he could, he would have given his Orders in that Language; but this is false: he spoke it when he pleased (18), and if he then used the Latin Tongue, it was to give his Words a greater Mark of Authority, as being the Language of the Sovereign.

An infinite Number of Authors have taken notice of a Passage of St. Austin, which I shall copy, concerning the Policy of the ancient Romans, who, together with the Yoke of Servitude, imposed that of their own Language upon all the Nations they subdued. 'Opera data est ut imperiosa civitas non solum jugum, verum etiam linguam suam domitis gentibus per pacem societatis imponeret. Per quam non deesset imo & abundaret etiam interpretum copia (19).' It appears, by a Passage of Gregory Thaumaturgus, that, in his time, it was necessary to study the Law in Latin; for he says, he had almost forgot Greek, because the Roman Laws were writ in a Language that gave him much trouble. 'Ἐκφρασθέντες δὲ καὶ παρὰ δόξιν τῇ Ῥωμαίων φωνῇ καὶ ἀπληκτικῇ μὲν καὶ ἀλαζονίᾳ, καὶ συσχηματισμένῃ ἀντὶ τῆ ἐξουσίας βασιλικῆς, φορτικῇ δὲ ὅμως ἐμοί. Conceptæ verò sunt ac traditæ Romanorum lingua terribili illa quidem, superba, & imperium quod obtinent præ se ferente; cæterum mihi molesta & barbara (20).'

They are compiled and delivered in the intricate, pompous, Language of the Romans, such as speaks their Power, but is very perplexing to me. Tripbanus, the Civilian, observes, that all the Decrees of the Pretors were to be in Latin (21).

The Care Rome took to extend its Language succeeded so well, that in Plutarch's Time there were very few who did not speak Latin (22), and Libanius expresses great concern, that the Greek Tongue would be lost, the Sovereignty belonging to those, whose natural Language was Latin (23). The Popes concurred with the Princes in the same Care; and if the Emperor Marcian, who was a Greek, preferred the Latin Tongue to the Greek, in the Council of Chalcedon, where he spoke first in Latin, and then in Greek (24), we also find, that the Pope's Deputies, at the Councils, always read their Dispatches in Latin, and they looked upon it as a Piece of Complaisance, whenever, at the Request of all the Fathers, they suffered them to be explained in Greek (25). The public Records were made in Latin, for several Ages, almost all over the West, and even after they had withdrawn their Obedience from Rome in Temporals. This will appear hereafter, when I shall speak of some States that abolished this Custom. I refer you to Melchior Inchofer's Book Historia Sacre Latinitatis, where you will find several curious things, and among others this, that it is probable, that Jesus Christ sometimes spoke Latin, seeing he paid so exact an Obedience to the Civil-Laws, and the Romans having every where established their Language, it is not likely, that he would exempt himself from this Law. Besides, being examined in Latin by Pontius Pilate, without doubt he answered in Latin (26). This does not well agree with what Arnobius says, who assures us, to wit, that Jesus Christ spoke but one Language, which every one of his Auditors took to be his own natural Tongue, how different soever they were in their own Language from one another. 'Unus fuit è nobis qui cum unam emitteret vocem, ab diversis populis & diversa oratione loquentibus, familiaribus verborum sonis & suo cuique utens existimabatur eloquio (27).'

Let us now speak of the Affection, which other Nations have expressed for their own Language. The Greeks signalized themselves in that Respect. I might bring several remarkable Instances, but shall content myself with one. They commended Themistocles (28), for condemning to death the Interpreter, who had followed the Persian Embassadors, and explained, in Greek, the Command of those Barbarians, that the Earth and Water should be delivered up to the King, their Master (29). He thought that such a Prophanation of the Greek Language, to declare the Will of a Barbarian, could not be expiated but by the Death of the Author of such an abuse. No doubt Greece was extremely concerned to hear what was done at Carthage, in the Time of the first Dionysius, when a Decree was made to forbid all Carthaginians studying the Greek Tongue. The Cause and Design of this Prohibition was this; Suniatius had written a Letter in Greek to the Tyrant Dionysius, and they were resolved to prevent any one's speaking to the Enemy without an Interpreter: 'Dux belli Hanno Carthaginienſis erat: cujus inimicus Suniatius, potentissimus ea tempeſtate Pœnorum, cum odio ejus, Græcis literis, Dionysio adventum exercitus, & segnitie ducis familiariter prænuſtialſſet, comprehenſis epistolis, proditiſſimis damnatur: facto ſenatus conſulto, ne quis poſtea Carthaginienſis, aut literis Græcis aut ſermoni ſtuderet; ne aut loqui cum hoſte, aut ſcribere ſine interprete poſſet (30).'

Hanno, the Carthaginian, was General in this War, whose Enemy Suniatius, a Man of great Power in Carthage, out of hatred to him, expressly informed Dionysius, in Greek, of the Army's March, and the General's Inactivity; but his Papers being intercepted, he was condemned for holding a treasonable Correspondence with the Enemy, and a Decree made, whereby every Carthaginian was strictly prohibited to study Greek, that he might not converse with an Enemy, or write without an Interpreter. I have spoke, elsewhere (31), of what is said of Attila's Ambition for the Glory of his Language. The same has been related of some Saracen Princes: 'The use of the Greek Tongue began to be neglected in Egypt, after the Conquests of the Arabians, in the Reign of Caliph Valid, who resided at Damas, because that Prince forbade the Greeks to make use of any other than the Arabian Language in their public Transactions, which very much increased the Ignorance (32), that became so gross at that time in Greece and Italy (33). The Respect the Turks have for their Language is very singular, if that be true which I have read in the Life of Bajazet II. 'The Sultan threatening to make War with the Venetians, the Republic dispatched an Embassador to him, to desire Peace. He granted their Request, and sent them the Articles of it, written in Latin; but Andrew Gritti, a Venetian Gentleman, who lived long at Constantinople, and was perfectly acquainted with all the Turkish Customs, assured the Embassador, that the Turks never stood to any Agreement, which was not written in their own Language. Therefore the Embassador did his utmost to get the Treaty changed into the common Language of the Country; but it was all lost Labour: and he was no sooner gone, but Bajazet's Fleet set sail, with a Design to attack the Venetian Towns in Morea (34). Another Author says; 'The Turks maintain, that their Language is the only good one in this World, that in Paradise they will speak the Arabian Tongue; and that the Jargon of the Persians, their mortal Enemies, is designed for Hell (35). It is a Privilege of the Sclavonian Tongue, that if a Gentleman does not understand it, he cannot enjoy an Inheritance, nor possess certain Lands in Moravia and Bohemia.

6 P

(27) Arnob. lib. 1, pag. m. 27.

(28) Plutarch. in Themist. pag. 114.

(29) Ἐργον δὲ οὐκ ἀλλὰ βῆναι διὰ ψήφισματος ἀνέκταιν ὅτι Φωνὴν Ἑλληνίδα βαρβάρους προσημασιεῖται. Interpretem ex plebiscito comprehensum necavit, quod sermone Græco mandata edere barbarorum fuisset ausus. Id. ib.

(30) Just. lib. 20, in fin.

(31) In the last Rem. of the Article ATTILA.

(32) Compare this with the Passage of Maritima, in Rem. [E], of the Article CASTILE (ALPHONSUS).

(33) Comparison de Platon & d'Aristote, Parte 4, cap. 3, pag. m. 388.

(34) Du Verdier. Abrégé de l'Histoire des Turcs, in Bajazet's Life. See also Bembo. Hist. Venet. lib. 3 fol. 91, verso. Edit. Paris 1551.

(35) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. XIII, pag. 259.

(16) Tit. Livius, lib. 45, cap. 29.

(17) Cajaubon in Baronii Exercit. 9, Art. 3, pag. m. 199.

(18) Hæc Græco sermone Perſeo (Paulus) Latine deinde suis, exemplum infigne cernitis, inquit, &c. Livius, lib. 45, cap. 3.

(19) August. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 19, cap. 7.

(20) Gregorius Thaumaturgus, in Laudat. Origin. apud Cajaubon. Exercit. 19, in Baron. pag. 199.

(21) Triph. lib. 48, ff. de re judic.

(22) Ὁ γὰρ μὲν Ῥωμαίων ἀδ- γῶν οὐκ ἔστι τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀλλ' οὐκ ἔστι τῶν ἀνθρώπων. Quo (Romanorum) sermone universi ferè mortales nunc utuntur. Plutarch. in Quæst. Platonicis circa fin. pag. 1010, D.

(23) Libanius, de sua Fortuna, apud Cajaubon. Exercit. 19, in Baron. pag. 201, 202.

(24) See Baron. ad Ann. 16, n. 3.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) Melchior. Inchofer. Hist. Sacre Latinit. pag. 230, Edit. Monach. 1633.

VOL. II.

(36) Forsterus, in Tacitum, pag. m. 179.
 * Apud Bohemos & Moravos lex est ne cui Illustri vel Equestri ordine nato cujusquam hæreditatem cernere, prædiave quæ nos Landgutter appellamus, possidere liceat, nisi linguæ Slavonicæ perito (36).
 The same Author says, that, in the XVIth Century, the King of Spain obliged the Moors to renounce their Mother Tongue, and speak Spanish.

But, on the other hand, there are Nations so indifferent for their Language, that it was long before they would use it in public Writings. The Spaniards (37), and Germans (38), began to do this in the XIIIth Century, and the French in the XVIth (39).

(37) See Remark [E], of the Article CASTILE (ALPHONSUS).

(38) See Remark [A], of the Article FRANCE CIS I.

(39) See the same Remark.

(a) He was a Minister, and having served the Church of la Sauvetat, he served that of Montbazillac and Courc, near Bergerac.

(b) Mr Martel's Answer was not printed at Rouen, in 4^{to}, in the Year 1673.

CLAUDE (JOHN) Minister of the Church of Paris, born in the Year 1619, at la Sauvetat in Agenois, was one of the greatest Men of his Order. He studied Classical Learning under his Father (a), and having afterwards performed his Course of Philosophy and Divinity at Montauban, he was admitted Minister in the Year 1645, and had a Church called la Treine. He served it a Year, and then he served the Church of Sainte Afrique in Roüergue, and Eight Years after That of Nismes. The Protestants had an Academy in this last Town, and so he had an Opportunity to exert one of his chief Talents, which was, to explain a piece of Divinity well. He made some private Lectures to the Students, so well fitted for the use of the Pulpit, and the understanding of the Scripture, that they were of great use. He had undertaken to confute Cardinal de Richelieu's Method [A]; but understanding that Mr Martel, Professor of Divinity at Montauban, had been ordered by a Synod to do it (b), he laid aside that Undertaking. Having opposed, in a Synod of the Lower Languedoc, a Man, whom the Court had gained to attempt a Re-union, he was punished for it by a Decree of the Council, who forbade him to exercise his Ministry in Languedoc. He had exercised it eight Years at Nismes. He went to Paris, in order to have that Prohibition taken off; and during that Journey he composed a little Book, which occasioned the most famous Dispute that ever was seen in France between the Protestants and the Catholics [B]. Having [A] He had undertaken to confute Cardinal de Richelieu's Method. It will not be amiss to say here, that the said Method was printed off the first of February 1651. This, I say, will not be useless, because many might think of another Date by reading in the Acta Bruditorum, that it appeared when Mr Claude was already Minister of Nismes. 'In hac ætate Isaacum suscepit 5. Mart. 1653. eoque tempore ad Ecclesiam Nemaufensem --- vocatus fuit, sed laboriosissimum erat munus illud, tum quod conciones quotidie habendæ essent, tum ob alia negotia pastoralia. Nihilominus ingenium & assiduitas viri non tantum occupationibus illis suffecit, sed & studiis continuandis: ita ut editum tunc à Cardinale Richelieu contra Reformatos librum qui Methodus dicitur, refutandum suscepit (1) --- Here his Son Isaac was born the fifth of March, 1653, at which time he was called to the Church of Nismes, a most laborious employ, being obliged to preach every Day, and attend likewise on other Pastoral Duties. But so great were his Genius and Industry, that he not only discharged all the Duties of his Province, but continued his Studies, so that he undertook to answer a Book entitled, The Method, THEN published by Cardinal Richelieu against the Reformed.' He could not be a Minister there before the Year 1653; for before he was so, he had served the Church of Sainte Afrique eight Years (2); and before he served the Church of Sainte Afrique he had been a Year Minister of la Treine (3). Add these Nine Years to 1645, which is the Year of his Reception into the Ministry (4), and you will find the Year 1654.

When Mr Claude's Library was sold at the Hague, it appeared that he had wrote many things on his Copy of that Work of Cardinal Richelieu; which was the Reason that some Persons had a great mind to buy it. I have heard say that it was soon after sent into France to be put in the King's Library.

[B] He composed a little Book, which occasioned the most famous Dispute that ever was seen in France, between the Protestants and Catholics (5). The Gentlemen of Port-Royal were very busy at that time to bring over Mr de Turenne to their Religion; and they found out a cunning way of arguing. They pretended to shew, that the Doctrine of the Church of Rome concerning the Real Presence had been the constant Doctrine of the Christian Church from the very beginning. They gave him a little Book, wherein they pretended to prove, that such a Change of the Belief of the Church, as the Protestants supposed, was impossible. Madam de Turenne, who always feared what happened after her Death,

I mean, that her Husband would change his Religion, strengthened him as much as she could; which was the Reason that she caused an Answer to be made to the Book of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal. Mr Claude was charged to do it, and succeeded admirably well. It appeared so ingenious, so delicate, and so strong, that many Copies were made of it

(6). The Gentlemen of Port-Royal, having heard of it, thought they could not avoid refusing it. This produced the famous Work, which they published in the Year 1664, intitled, The Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church concerning the Eucharist. It contains the first Piece, and the Reply to Mr Claude's Answer. That Minister, who was then at Montauban, composed a Reply, that was printed with his first Answer in the Year 1666 (7). That Work is intitled, An Answer to the two Treatises intitled, The Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church concerning the Eucharist. It made an extraordinary noise, inasmuch that many Country Parsons, who had never heard of du Moulin or of Daille, knew that the Minister Claude had wrote against the Holy Sacrament in a dangerous manner. The most famous and the meanest Preachers in the Provinces affected to preach, during the Octave of the Holy Sacrament, and upon other occasions, against the Possibility of the Innovation: the Pulpits then resounded only with the Names of Paschasius, Lanfranc, Ratramnus, &c. It is certain, that the fine Turn, the Politeness, and the Wit, which attended Mr Claude's solid Arguments, contributed extremely to the great noise his Book made; but it is no less certain, that the condition, Janseuism was in at that time, was one of the chief Causes of that great noise. Many Bishops were professed Friends to Port-Royal; many others favoured them under-hand; that Party had every where some choice learned Men, who durst speak; (for they were not silenced till the Year 1668) and the Janseuists made it their business to cry up the Books of their Party: which moved them, for their own Glory, to preach up Mr Claude's Name and Merit every where. On the other side, their Enemies commended very much, though by indirect and secret ways, that Minister's Work (8): they were not unwilling that he should triumph, provided the Gentlemen of Port-Royal should be humbled by it. Doubtless this contributed very much to make Mr Claude's Book famous. So important it is to appear in print at certain times (9), and against certain Persons, rather than in other Circumstances. Mr Arnauld undertook to confute Mr Claude's Book, and published a large Quarto in the Year 1669. That Volume was followed by two others some time after: but before that first Part came

(6) The following Words are to be found in the Preface to the Perpetuity. Those of his Party cried it up mightily, and got so many Copies of it, which were dispersed at Paris, and in the Provinces, that it was very near as common as if it had been printed.

(7) See above, Citat (58), of the Article ARNAUD (ANTONY), Doctor of the Sorbonne.

(8) It was sold in the Shop of the Book-seller of the Archbishop of Paris. See the Preface of Mr Claude's Book against Father Noëlet.

(9) Quantum interest in quæ tempora cuiusque viri tus inciderit!

(1) Acta Erudit. Lips. 1687, pag. 658. Note, that these Words, conciones quotidie habendæ essent, ought not to be understood as if Mr Claude had preached every Day. It is only said in the Abridgment of his Life, that there was a Sermon preached every Day at Nismes; but that Church had three or four Ministers at least.

(2) Abridgment of his Life, pag. 25.

(3) Ibid. pag. 10.

(4) Ibid.

(5) See above, Remark [O], of the Article ARNAUD (ANTONY), Doctor of the Sorbonne.

ving tarried six Months in Paris without obtaining any thing, he went to Montauban, where he preached the next day after his coming (c), and was made Minister of that Church. Four Years after, the Court forbid him to exercise his Office in Montauban, which obliged him to make another Journey to Paris. He was there almost nine Months, without being able to obtain leave to return to Montauban — During that Interval, he was invited by the Church of Bourdeaux: but That of Charenton would not be deprived of a Man of so great Merit (d); they chose him for their Minister in 1666. From that time until the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he did that Church, and the whole Body, very considerable Services by his excellent Works, and by the particular Examination of the Affairs which the Deputies of the Provinces communicated to him. No Man was ever more fit than he to be at the Head of a Consistory, or of a Synod [C], or to dispute extempore. This last Qualification appeared in the Conference, at which Mademoiselle de Duras desired to be present [D]. He was distinguished from other Ministers by the manner how the Court would have him to retire into Foreign Countries [E]. He made choice of Holland for the place of his Retreat, where he was very well received, and honoured with a considerable Pension by the Prince of Orange. He preached now and then at the Hague: His last Sermon was on Christmas-day 1686. He succeeded in it as well or better than ever: The Princess of Orange was very well pleased with that Sermon. He fell sick on the same Day of a Sickness that carried him off, January 13, 1687. He gave many Proofs of his Piety on his Death-bed, as also of the Sincerity wherewith he had professed the Reformed Religion (e). His Death afflicted the whole Party, and was the more sensible to wife Men, because few besides him were able to bring into the right way the credulous People, whom some rash Writers had led astray, and to ballance the Faction of those Men. It has been the opinion of many, that if he had lived longer we should not have seen so many scandalous Quarrels break out, at which the Roman Catholics rejoiced; but others believe that nothing would have been able to put a stop to those Quarrels, which had already begun before Mr Claude died.

I cannot

came out, Father Noët, a famous Jesuit, entered the Lists, and published a Book against Mr Claude, to which the latter made an Answer (10), which some prefer before his other Books, and which he looked upon himself as his favourite Book (11). Father Noët made no Reply; he only published a Letter of Sixty Pages in 8vo (12). The Author of the Journal des Sçavans had a Fling at Mr Claude, when he gave an Abstract of that Jesuit's Book (13). He enlarged very much upon the Genius of that Minister, and his manner of disputing: and what he said being no ways obliging, Mr Claude had not patience enough to be silent. He published a very witty Letter (14) against him, which the Journalist answered some time after (15). Things went no farther. As for what concerns Mr Arnauld, Mr Claude was obliged to undertake a very laborious Work; for he was obliged to examine the Opinion of the Greek Church, and that of the Schismatics of the East; he was obliged to read many Travellers, and to build many Hypotheses. Mr Claude's great Capacity appeared as much as ever by the Answer that he published to Mr Arnauld's first Volume. The Jansenists made but a general Answer to that Book of Mr Claude. It is true that, as to what concerns the Opinion of the Greeks, Father Paris a Monk of St Genevieve came to their Assistance against that Minister. The matter of the Dispute was changed some time after. Those Gentlemen published their Prejugés légitimes contre les Calvinistes, which Mr Claude confuted by one of the best Works that he or any other Minister ever wrote, and which remained unanswered till the Year 1684. (16). Mr Nicolle at last replied, that Year, in his Pretendus Réformez convaincus de Schisme.

[C] No Man was ever more fit to be at the Head of a Consistory, or of a Synod. This cannot be better commented upon, than by the following Words. Mr Claude excelled particularly at the head of an Assembly: Thus he distinguished himself many Years in the Consistory of Charenton, and in some Synods of the Ile de France, where he was Moderator. — When any Business intricate in it self, and more intricate still by the Ignorance and the Shifts of the Parties concerned, was in agitation in a Synod, Mr Claude had such a Discernment, that he cleared that Chaos in a moment: he formed a clear and plain Proposition, as if the Question had run only upon a Yes or No: a Character that never deceives, when we are to judge of a Man, that presides in a Company, seeing the choice of Matters, and the clear Light wherein they are put, is a certain sign of the Presence, Neatness, and Force of a great Genius (17).

[D] — or to dispute extempore. This Qualification appeared in the Conference, at which Mademoiselle de Duras desired to be present. That Lady (18) would not abjure her Religion without hearing the Bishop of Meaux and Mr Claude dispute together in her Presence. She had the Satisfaction she desired: those two illustrious and brave Champions entered the Lists at the House of her Sister, the Countess de Roi, on the first of March 1678. Each of them wrote the Relation of the Conference, and ascribed the Victory to himself. At first those Relations were handed about in Manuscript, but at last the Bishop of Meaux published his in the Year 1682: that of Mr Claude followed it soon after. The Journalists of Leipsic have not distinguished the time of the Conference from that wherein the Relations were published. Postea, say they (19), anno 1683, occasione illustri Durassæ à Reformata ad Romanam religionem transeuntis, colloquium cum Episcopo Condensensi, postea Meldensi, habuit, cuius relationem, ut notum est, uterque didit. — Afterwards, say they, in the Year 1683, upon the Illustrious Mademoiselle de Duras quitting the Reformed Religion, for that of the Church of Rome, he had a Conference with the Bishop of Condorn, afterwards Bishop of Meaux: an Account of which, as is well known, they both published.

[E] He was distinguished from other Ministers, by the manner how the Court would have him to retire into Foreign Countries. In Page 100 of the Abridgment of his Life, are these Words: 'He had fifteen Days allowed him, as the other Ministers, to go out of the Kingdom: the Clergy found a way to shorten that time; for on a Monday, the Twenty second of October (20) 1685, which was the Day wherein the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was registered in the Parliament of Paris, Mr Claude received an Order, at Ten o'Clock in the Morning, to depart in Twenty four Hours (21). He obeyed with a profound respect, and went away with one of the King's Footmen, who was to conduct him to the Frontiers of France; and who, performing his Commission faithfully, was nevertheless very civil to Mr Claude: so true is it that a great Merit works upon those very Persons

(c) It was upon a Communion Day.

(d) Abridgment of the Life of Mr Claude, pag. 43.

(e) Taken from the Abridgment of his Life, written by Mr de la Deuze, Minister at the Hague. I have rectified his Mistake about the Year that Mr Claude was born in.

(17) Abridgment of his Life, pag. 75, & seq.

(18) Sister to the Marquis de Duras, and the Marquis de Lorraine.

(19) Acta Erudit. tor. 1687, p. 661.

(20) It is December in the Abridgment of his Life. In the Abstract of it, published in the Acta Erudit. 1687, pag. 661, there is die 7 Decemb.

(21) He says so himself, pag. 92, 93, of the Plaintes des Protestans.

(10) It was printed in 1668.

(11) See the Abridgment of his Life, pag. 49.

(12) It is inscribed to Mr Claude, and dated October 1, 1668: and therefore what he says, pag. 5, is hard to be understood, viz. that his Answer to Mr Claude had taken up that Minister near three Years; for Noët's Book did not come out till about the latter end of the Year 1666. The Booksellers put 1667 in the Title.

(13) In the Journal of the 28th of June, 1667.

(14) It is an anonymous Letter, intitled, Lettre d'un Provincial à un de ses amis sur le sujet du Journal du 28. Juin, 1667.

(15) In the Journal of Decemb. 26, 1667.

(16) It is intitled, Défense de la Réformation. It was first printed in 4to, at Rouen, in 1673, and then at the Hague, in 1700, in the Year 1682.

(ff) Non nostrum inter vos tantas
componere lites.
Virg. Eclog. 3.
ver. 108.

I cannot tell which of those two Opinions is the best (f). He left a Son, who was a Minister [F], and who took care to publish several fine Works of the deceased. I would enlarge on the Praises of Mr Claude, and confute the Calumnies published against him, were it not that I find in Moreri's Dictionary, of the Dutch Edition, all that can be said in a Dictionary upon such a Subject. I shall take notice of some Faults of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary according to the Edition printed in France [G]. Mr Paulian has very much abused Mr Claude in his Animadversions upon Mr Jurieu's Pastoral Letters, and falsely ascribed a Book to him, and

(22) Abridg. of his Life, p. 101. who do not love our Religion. — He took Coach at Paris for Brussels: His Name that went before him procured him many Civilities in his Journey (22). He went through Cambrai, where he lay: He was presented with some Refreshments from the Jesuits there: The Father Rector honoured him with a Visit: He returned that Civility, and the difference of Religions did not interrupt those Compliments, and those Marks of a reciprocal Esteem.

(23) Ibid. p. 14. [F] He left a Son who was a Minister. He married at Calvres in the Year 1648 (23). From that Marriage was born Isaac CLAUDE, at Sainte A-(24) Ibid. p. 15. frique, the fifth of March 1653 (24). His Father loved him tenderly, and was very glad to see that his Inclination led him to the Ministry, and that the Choice he had made, and which ought to be very free, was answerable to his Desires. He had the Satisfaction to see him improve by his Knowledge and Example. He studied in the Academies of France under the best Masters, who took great care of him. He returned to his Father, who completed his Education, particularly with regard to Preaching: after which he was examined at Sedan in the Month of September 1678, and judged very worthy to be admitted into the holy Ministry. He was desired by the Church of Clermont in Beauvoisis, within fourteen Leagues of Paris, in the Synod of the Isle of France, and his Father had the Satisfaction to impose his hands on him the ninth of October 1678 (25), and to find him Minister of the Walloon Church at the Hague, when he fled into Holland in the Year 1685. Isaac CLAUDE died at the Hague the Twenty ninth of July 1695. He was from Father to Son the fourth of his Family who had exercised the Ministry, for his great Grandfather was a Minister. This Particularity has been omitted by Mr de la Devezze. He left one or two Sons, who are brought up to Study.

(26) It should be La Sauvetat. [G] I shall take notice of some Faults in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, according to the Edition printed in France. I. La Sauvetat (26), where Mr Claude was born, is not a small Town of the Upper Languedoc, not far from Calvres. It is not true that his Father, passionately desiring to see him quickly a Minister, did not stay till he was Twenty five Years of Age to get him admitted into the Ministry. Mr Claude was made a Minister in the Year 1645, and therefore he was Twenty six Years of Age when he was admitted into that Office. Now that is an Age, wherein those who are designed for the Ministry, and are not yet Ministers, begin to pass for old Students of Divinity (27). So that it is false that Mr Claude's Father acted like an impatient Man. III. It is absurd to suppose that, to satisfy his impatience, he was obliged to make use of his Credit in the Upper Guienne and in the Upper Languedoc. Had he had any Impatience, it would be only grounded on his Son's being made a Minister, having studied Divinity but three Years; but a Student of as much Wit as he was, and of his Age, improves more in three Years than others do in four or five. IV. Mr Claude did not read any public Lectures of Divinity at Nismes: He never had the Degree of Professor there; he only read some private Lectures; it is said so in the Abridgment of his Life (28). V. It is false that he ever declared, that he only undertook his first Journey to Paris to shew that he had no kind of Repugnancy to the Project of Re-union that was contriving in France. VI. The Supposition of the Author of the Supplement, that Mr Claude was forbidden to exercise his Ministry in Languedoc by a Decree of Council, because he was averse to the Project of Re-union, agrees with the Narrative of Mr de la

(27) The Age of 27 Years, which the Leipzig Journalists have very well observed, following the Narrative of Mr de la Devezze, should have made them attend to the Place which they have translated thus: Maturus — impetuose pater qui filium functioni sacra MATURE addidit operatur. Acta Erudit. 1687, pag. 658.

(28) Pag. 18.

Devezze (29). But if it be supposed that the King's Decree contained that Reason, it is a great Mistake. Now this must have been supposed by the Author of the Supplement, since he says, that Mr Claude could not pretend to justify himself, but by shewing an Inclination to the Re-union. Consider well the words of the Supplement, wherein the Author pretends to shew, that Mr Claude did a deceitful Action in that Journey: which he endeavours to prove by this Remark, viz. that he wrote a Book against the Perpetuity of the Faith. I say, consider well this Passage, and you will see, that the Continuator of Moreri supposes plainly, that Mr Claude endeavoured to have the Prohibition taken off, only declaring, that it had been surreptitiously procured, and that it was not true, as it was supposed in the Decree, that he was against the Project of a Re-union. If a Minister had spoke thus at Court, and in the mean time had writ such a Book of Controversy as that of Mr Claude, he would without doubt have been a Cheat. But it is false that he took such a Course to justify himself at Court. VII. I believe the Reason, that is given in the Supplement, why he did not engage with the University of Groningen, to be very false. I have always heard say, that it was only the Consistory of Charenton, and the Requests of many private Persons, that made Mr Claude resolve to thank the Gentlemen of Groningen. VIII. It is not true, that his Sermons were never accounted excellent by the Huguenots themselves: for they contained all that the Huguenots desired; a great Order, a profound Divinity, a great Sublimity, and a great deal of Eloquence and Solidity. The Protestants do not value the worldly Ornaments, and the soft and effeminate Rhetoric where-with the Popish Preachers adorn themselves. All that can be said is, that Mr Claude had no pleasing Voice, which occasioned a witty Saying of Mr Morus (30): but, notwithstanding this, his Sermons were very much esteemed. IX. Nothing is more false than to maintain, that those among the Calvinists, who were clear sighted, have acknowledged, that Mr Claude's Character was properly that of an ingenious Sophister, and of a cunning Declaimer. X. It is a ridiculous thing to prove this by what the illustrious Viscount of Turenne might have said; for every body knows, that That Hero, who had a wonderful Genius for what concerned Martial Affairs, and the Functions of a General, did not pretend to Learning, and could not be a competent Judge in controversial Writings. XI. There is nothing more like a Romance, I say a Romance forged against all Probability, than That pretended Project of Mr Claude, wherein the Ministers were to desire a Conference with the Bishops. It is a notorious thing, that in the Reign of Mr Claude, if one may be permitted to speak so, he and the other Ministers looked upon all Proposals of Disputes, or Conferences, as a Snare. One of them (31) published a Book on that Subject (32), wherein he shewed, that great care ought to be taken not to fall into that Trap. XII. I have nothing to say concerning the mysterious Conference that Mr Claude, as it is said, desired to have with the Archbishop of Paris. The Confutation of it is to be found in a Memorial, which the Son of that great Man caused to be inserted in the History of the Works of the Learned (33). See also Moreri's Dictionary, of the Dutch Edition. It is a shame for our Age, that such a Romance should have been published in an Historical Dictionary at Paris, and that such a Boldness has not been punished. XIII. It was the Twenty second of October, and not the Twenty second of December, 1685, that Mr Claude left Paris to go to the Hague. XIV. Lastly, it is false, that Mr Claude granted the Infallibility of the Church.

(29) Abridgment of the Life of Mr Claude pag. 19.

(30) When the Church of Charenton began to think of having Mr Claude for one of their Ministers, they made him preach. The Sermon being over, Mr Morus said, All the Voices will be for him, except his own.

(31) It is the same who has published the History of the Edict of Nantes.

(32) That Book has been mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, May, 1685, pag. 574. of the second Edition. See also December in the same Year, pag. 1333.

(33) November, 1689, pag. 133. & seq.

[H] Mr

and the design of another Book [H]. He has also been so bold as to publish, that the Author of those Pastoral Letters was very glad to hear that he was dead.

[H] Mr Paulian — falsely ascribed a Book to him, and the Design of another Book. He says he is the Author of a Letter of some pacific Protestants that appeared in the Year 1685. He says, that Mr Claude owns it himself in some Letters, and that a Lady, with whom he was intimately acquainted, had publickly acknowledged it. He quotes in the Margin a Letter to Mademoiselle Dangeau and Madam de la Garde (34). These Proofs seem to be strong, and yet it is very false, that Mr Claude wrote the Letter of the pacific Protestants; and I am very much persuaded, that he never writ to any body that he was the Author of it. The Animagadverter upon the Pastoral Letters is no less mistaken, when he says (35), that Mr Claude took upon him to write the History of the Persecution under the Title of Histoire Dragonnale, but that he died before he had finished it. Mr Claude was too great an Author to use such a Title: he was not writing the History of the last Persecution, but that of the Princes of Orange. (35) Pag. 16.

(34) It is about the latter end of the Book.

CLAVIUS (CHRISTOPHER) a German Jesuit, born at Bamberg, excelled in the Knowledge of the Mathematics, and was one of the chief Instruments that was made use of for the Correction of the Calender, of which he also undertook the Defence against those who found fault with it, and particularly against Scaliger. I do not believe that the latter laid down his Arms so humbly as a modern Author relates it [A]; nor that Clavius died in the manner mentioned by another modern Writer [B]. The extraordinary Humility, which Alegambe ascribes to Clavius [C], does

[A] I do not believe, that Scaliger laid down his Arms so humbly, as a modern Author relates it.] Joseph Scaliger was one of those who found fault with the new Calender, 'and of the most understanding — But Clavius gave him such pertinent Reasons for it, that this learned Critic left off writing against him, and even declared, that he thought it a glory to yield to a Man of that Reputation (1). I wish it had pleased Mr Bullart to quote the Book wherein Scaliger declares this; for if the Quotation was true, we should find a piece of Modesty, and a Contradiction in it. As for the Modesty, the thing speaks of itself; and as for the other point, if you consult the Scaligerana, you will see Clavius very little esteemed in it. He is called there an Ass, a Beast, a tun-bellied German (2), a dull Pate, a Man who eat two Breakfasts, and who was a great Drinker. He is but little better used in Scaliger's Letters: 'Infantorem, imperitior rem & magis ridiculum reperies neminem (Christophoro Clavio) si quidem unius Geometriæ scientiam excipias, quam in eo etiam si stipes esset propter longum tempus quo illud saxum volvit ali-quam oportet esse. Quinquaginta enim annos publice Euclidem legit. Hoc unum excipe, tantus est stupor hominis ut in eis etiam quæ ad Mathesin ipsam pertinent lætissimè & turpèssimè sit (3). There is not to be found a more childish, illiterate, or ridiculous Person than Christopher Clavius, if we only except the Science of Geometry, in which, though he were a Log, he must have some skill from the long time he has laboured in it; for he has publicly read Euclid fifty Years. Take this away, and so great is the Stupidity of the Man, that in those very things which relate to Mathematics he is blinder than a Beetle.' Let us see what he says in another Book: 'Certe non video quid mathematica studia Clavio contulerint, qui in his adeo infans est ut mediocriter literis humanioribus tinctus hæc melius intelligat, quam ille qui toto vitæ suæ tempore nihil præter mathematica tractavit (4). — I cannot find what advantage Clavius has made of his Mathematical Studies, since in them he is still so much a Child, that a Man tolerably versed in polite Learning may understand them better than he, who has toiled at them all his Life.' It may be some body will tell me, that notwithstanding all these hard words, Scaliger might have owned, that Clavius had admirably well maintained the Cause of the Gregorian Calender, and that is the Matter in question in Bullart's words; but this Objection will soon be answered: 'Nihil vidi ineptius, jejuniis, falsius & impudentius libro Clavii in elenchum nostrum de anno Juliano. — I never met with any thing more trifling, jejune, false, and impudent, than Clavius's Remarks upon my Dissertation on the Julian Year.' Thus Scaliger speaks of him in his Twenty ninth Letter. In another place he speaks of him thus: Clavius has committed so many Mistakes concerning the Papal Year; de his ad Eusebium. Clavius is also mistaken in his Correction, he has done worse than before. — Quæ scripseram graviora tacuit, leviora refutavit, sed nunc omnia ostendam in Eusebio (5). — He has passed over the stronger Arguments, answered the weaker; but I shall now prove all by Eusebius. (5) In the Scaligerana.

If Mr Bullart went upon Richeome's Testimony, he has made it appear that he did not take the Sense of an Author exactly: for that Jesuit alleges only a Piece written before Clavius's Answer, in which consequently Scaliger did not confess, that he acquiesced in the Solutions of his Adversary. These are the words of Richeome: 'I omit — the Works upon all sorts of Mathematics of Christophorus Clavius, praised not only by the late Monsieur de Candal, the Euclid of our Age, but also by Joseph Scaliger', so far as to say, that he had rather be reproved by him than praised by another: This Commendation of a Jesuit by a Protestant, no Friend to our Society, is the more to be regarded (6).

* Scaliger. in Castig. Calendæ.

[B] — nor that Clavius died in the manner mentioned by another modern Writer.] Paganinus Gaudentius affirms, that Christophorus Clavius, visiting the seven Churches of Rome, was thrown down by a wild Ox, who run over him and killed him. Christophorus Clavius dum septem urbis templa in-visit à bubalo humi afflitus contemnitur & occiditur (7). Such a kind of Death of a Jesuit, who was a famous Man, and Seventy five Years old, is too singular not to have been observed by all those who wrote an Encomium upon that celebrated Mathematician. Now it is certain, that Alegambe, Southwell, Lorenzo Crafft, John Nicius Erythraeus, and Bullart, say nothing of it. The following words of Nicius Erythraeus do plainly shew, that Gaudentius has published a Lie. 'Verum in istud etiam tantum atque immortalitate dignum ingenium, fæva mors, cui nihil est eximium, nihil intactum, nihil sanctum, vim & crudelitatem suam exercuit; sed in eo sævitæ suæ modum adhibuit, quod non antea est illi ausa manus asferre, quam maturitatem suam adeptum eum esse vidisset: nam senex Romæ in collegio suæ Societatis est mortuus (8). — Dea: b, who has no regard to Greatness or Sanctity, exercised his Cruelty and Power on this great Man, though worthy of Immortality; but with such Forbearance did he delay the Stroke, as though he was afraid to lay his violent Hands upon him, before he saw him ripened into Years. For he died at Rome, in an advanced Age, in a College of his own Order.' Would an Author, who moralizes in this manner upon the mitigated Cruelty of Death, have forgotten the tragical Accident mentioned by Gaudentius? I shall set down likewise the words of Alegambe: 'Tandem ætate meritisque gravis Romæ vitæ defunctus est die vi Februarii anno mdcxii. ætatis lxxv. — He died at Rome, loaded with Years and Merit, the sixth of February, in the Year 1612, aged Seventy five.' Correct Lorenzo Crafft, who says the sixth of January.

(6) Richeome, Plaine Apologétique, pag. 31.

(7) Paganinus Gaudentius in oratione de Philosophorum quorundam luculose exitu.

(8) N. Erythraeus, Pinacoth 1, pag. 177, 178.

[C] Alegambe attributes to him an extraordinary Humility.] In quo illud maxime admirandum exterit,

VOL. II.

(1) Bullart. Academie des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 118, 119.

(2) Cardinal de Perron made the same Judgment of him. Clavius, says he in the Perroniana, who is so much cried up by the Jesuits, is a heavy and dull-witted Man, he has no Subtlety nor Gentleness, he is a German Horse.

(3) Joseph. Scaliger, Epist. 106.

(4) Id. Canon.ilog. lib. 3.

(a) Lcr. Craſſo
Elog. part. 1,
pag. 143.

does not agree with some other Qualities that Lorenzo Craſſo gives him, representing him as a Man abounding in his own ſenſe, and very touchy when reflected upon (a).

‘titerit, quod cum tanta eruditionis fama ac nominis fui claritudine tam infignem pietatem ac modum ſtiam perpetuo conjunctam retinuerit, ut nullum ſibi hominem unquam, ſe ipſum aliis omnibus poſtponeret (9). — What is chiefly to be admired in him is, that, though no Man was ever more remarkable for his Piety, Modeſty, and Learning, yet he preferred all Men before himſelf.

(9) Alegambe,
in Bibliot. Scient.
Jefu, pag. 74.

[(5a) He who won the Battle of Plataea, and was afterwards puniſhed as a Traitor. See his Life in Cornelius Nepos. REM. CRIT]

CLEONICE, a young Lady of Byzantium, whom Pausanias (§a) had a mind to enjoy, and whom he killed by a Miſtake. It is ſaid that the Ghoſt of that Lady haunted him every night [A], as ſhall be ſeen more at large in the Remark.

[A] Pausanias — killed her by a Miſtake. It is ſaid, that her Ghoſt haunted him every Night. They report of Pausanias, that, one Day, when he was in Byzantium, he ſent for a young Lady of a noble Family, whoſe Name was Cleonice, to debauch her. Her Parents dreading the cruel Humour of the Man, were forced to conſent, and ſo abandoned their Daughter to his Embraces. Cleonice deſired the Servants to put out all the Lights; ſo that approaching ſilently, and in the dark towards his Bed, ſhe ſtumbled upon the Lamp, which ſhe overturned and ſpilled. Pausanias, who was fallen aſleep, awaked, and ſtartled with the Noiſe, thought an Aſſaſſin had taken that dead time of the Night to murder him; ſo that haſtily ſnatching up his Poiſard which lay by him, he wounded his ſuppoſed Enemy to Death. After this he never enjoyed himſelf, but was diſturbed in his Thoughts: for his dear Miſtreſs haunted his Bed, and would not let him ſleep, but interrupted his Repoſe with theſe angry words:

*Villain, be juſt and of thy Crime repent,
Or dread the Hand that brings thy Punishment.*

This tragical Accident gave the laſt ſtroke to his Ruin: for after this the Allies joining their Reſentments and Forces with Cimon's, beſieged him in Byzantium; but he eſcaped out of their Hands, and fled to Heraclea. Here coming to a place which might be called the Oracle of the Dead, where they raiſe up Spirits to know future Events, he ſolemnly invoked Cleonice, and intreated her Ghoſt to be reconciled: Accordingly ſhe appeared to him, and answered him in theſe words, As ſoon as thou com'eſt to Sparta, thou ſhalt be freed from all the Miſfortunes which now affli't thee. Hereby obſcurely foretelling, in my Opinion, That imminent Death he was to ſuffer. This is the Hiſtory that is told of him (1). No ſuch thing has been ſaid of poor Dido, who was worſe treated than Cleonice; for Aeneas was not only the Cauſe of her Death, but alſo robbed her of her Honour. She deſigned to revenge herſelf on him after her Death, and to return from Hell to purſue him from place to place; but it is not ſaid her Ghoſt did ever perſecute Aeneas. Let us ſet down her Threats; they are conceived in ſuch terms as may be criticized.

— ſequar atris ignibus abſens;
Et cum frigida mors animã ſeduxerit artus,
Omnibus umbra locis adero: dabis improbe pœnas;
Audiam, & hæc manes veniet mihi fama ſub imos (2).

(1) Plutarch, in Cimon's Life,
pag. 482. See
alſo Pausanias,
lib. 3, cap. 17,
pag. m. 252.

(2) Virgil. Æn.
lib. 4, ver. 384.

*Dido ſhall come in a black ſulph'ry Flame,
When Death has once diſſolv'd her mortal Frame.
Shall ſmile to ſee the Traitor vainly weep;
Her angry Ghoſt ariſing from the deep,
Shall haunt thee waking, and diſturb thy Sleep.
At leaſt my Shade thy Punishment ſhall know,
And Fame ſhall ſpread the pleaſing News below.*

DRYDEN.

If Dido's Ghoſt was to be every where with Aeneas, what need was there that ſhe ſhould wait in Hell for the News of Aeneas's Miſfortune? Could he not learn in this World, when any Diſaſter happened to that unfaithful Man? You will tell me that ſhe was ſo troubled, that Virgil ought to make her ſpeak without minding what ſhe ſaid. Let it be ſo. The Grammarian Servius will ſhew you another Evasion.

CLEONYMUS, cotemporary with Pyrrhus King of Epirus, left Lacedæmon on public and private Diſcontents. He was the Son of Cleomenes II, King of Sparta (a); but, becauſe of his violent and imperious Humour, the Lacedæmonians had no Affection for, nor Confidence in him, and left all the Royal Authority to Areus his Brother's Son. Thus much for the public Diſcontents; here follow the domeſtic ones. Being already advanced in Years, he had married Chelidonis [A], a Princeſs of the Blood, and Daughter of Leotychides, a very beautiful Woman; but ſhe loved very paſſionately Acrotatus, a very beautiful Youth, the Son of King Areus. That Marriage occaſioned a great deal of Trouble and Infamy to the unfortunate Cleonymus; for every body knew the conduct of his Wife, and that ſhe deſpiſed him. So that, being full of Grief and Anger, he left Lacedæmon, and went to ſolicit Pyrrhus to make War with the Lacedæmonians. Pyrrhus came near the City with a numerous Army (b), and might have taken it at the firſt Onſet, if he had followed the Advice of Cleonymus, which was to attack it immediately, without giving the few Inhabitants, that Areus had left there, time to recover their ſurpriſe. Areus was at that time in the Iſle of Crete to aſſiſt the Gortynians. Pyrrhus, fearing the City would be plundered if he entered it in the Night, deferred the Attack till the next day. He was ſo vigorouſly repulſed in all the Affaults that he gave, either before or after Areus's Return, that he found himſelf obliged to give over his Enterpriſe. We muſt not forget the Courage that the Women of Lacedæmon ſhewed on that occaſion [B]. It was reſolved to ſend them away

(a) Plut. in Agid. & Cleom.
Pauſan. in Lacon
Father Labbe,
Chron. Franc.
ad Ann. Romæ 481, is in the wrong to ſay that Areus was Cleonymus's Brother.

(b) In the Year of Rome 480, the 3d of the 126th
Olympiad.

[A] He had married Chelidonis. Parthenius ſpeaks of that Woman, and of her Amours with Acrotatus, in the Twenty third Chapter; but ſhe is called Cbilonis there, either for want of Memory in Parthenius, or by a Miſtake of his Tranſcribers.

[B] We muſt not forget the Courage that the Women of Lacedæmon ſhewed on that Occaſion. Calviſtus attributes to them all the Reſiſtance that was made the firſt day; and ſays, that the Men returned the next day, and deſtroyed Prolemy the Son away in the Night to Crete, but they opposed it; and Archidamia came with Sword in hand into the Senate, complaining in the name of all the rest, that they were thought capable to survive the Destruction of their Country. They laboured all the Night on the Intrenchment that was made against the Enemy. Chelidonis was the only Woman that remained shut up. She put a Rope about her neck, that in case of necessity she might prevent her falling alive into the hands of her Husband. Her Gallant Acrotatus did Wonders; and as he returned from the Place where he had repulsed the Enemies Assaults, and was proud of his Victory, he seemed taller and more beautiful than ever to the Women of Lacedæmon, so that they cried out that Chelidonis was very happy to be beloved by such a Man. The old Men followed him with a thousand Acclamations, exhorting him to continue to kiss well Chelidonis (c) [C].

CLEOPATRA. CLEOPHIS. COCHLOEUS.

523

(c) Ta'en from Plutarch, in the Life of Pyrrhus.

(1) Calvis. ad Ann. Mund. 3777.

Son of Pyrrhus, and the most considerable Part of his Army (1). He cites Justin and Plutarch for it, but neither of them says what he ascribes to them. Justin does not speak of the Return of the Men, nor of two Attacks one after another; he says in general, that the Women had a greater share in the Resistance than the Men, and that Pyrrhus lost his Son Ptolemy with his choice Troops (2). As for Plutarch (3), he only says, that the Women did work on the Intrenchment, encouraged the Men, and performed such other Services of the second Order: and, according to his Account, Ptolemy was not killed but when the King of Lacedæmon charged the Rear of Pyrrhus, on the way to Argos, that is, when Pyrrhus abandoned Laconia. That Prince fully revenged his Son's Death by a great Slaughter of the Lacedæmo- nians. He performed some Actions that Day that seem to be a little romantic. This Ptolemy was a Man of such a bold Courage, that Pyrrhus, hearing of his Death, said, that he had been killed a little later than his Rashness deserved, or later than he, his Father, apprehended (4).

[C] The old Men --- exhorted him to kiss well Chelidonis.] Go Acrotatus, said they to him, make much of Chelidonis, and get brave Children by her for Sparta. Here are the Greek Words: ἄκροταί, καὶ οἱ τοὺς τῶν Χελιδονίδων μόνον παῖδας ἀγαθὰς τὰ Σπάρτῃ ποιεῖς. Perge Acrotate, & coito cum Chelidone, gignito tantum egregios filios Spartæ (5). They were very plain People, since they made such Acclamations along the Streets. See the Margin (6).

(4) Aliquanto tardius eum quam timuerit ipse, vel temeritas ejus meruerit, occisum esse. Justin. ibid.

(5) Plutarch, in Pyrrho, pag. 402. C.

(6) The Greek Word used by Plutarch, is so coarse, that our Boors do not use a more obscene one at Country Weddings.

(2) Justin. lib. 5, cap. 4.
(3) Plut. in Vita Pyrrhi.

CLEOPATRA, Sister of Alexander the Great. See the Remark [A] of the Article Denys.

CLEOPHIS, an Indian Queen, was deprived of her Kingdom, by Alexander the Great, but restored again, as a reward for submitting to his Lusts; thus she recovered, by her Lewdness, a Crown, which she could not preserve by her Courage (a). The Son she had by that Conqueror, was named Alexander, and was King of India [A]. But the Mother, after she had prostituted herself to Alexander, was called the Royal Whore (b); thus Justin relates the matter (c). See also Quintus Curtius. Book viii. Chap. x.

(a) Concubitu sedemptum regnum ab Alexandro receptit illecebris consecuta quod virtute non potuerat. Justin. lib. 12, cap. 7.

(b) Propter prostitutam publicitatem, Scortum regium ab Indis exinde appellata est. Id. ibid.

(c) Ibid.

(1) Quint. Curt. lib. 8, cap. 10.
(2) Ibid.

[A] The Son she had by the Conqueror --- was King of the Indies.] Her eldest Son Affacan was dead before the Invasion of Alexander (1). She had also another Son, whom she carried to that Prince (2); he died perhaps before her Son, by Alexander, was fit to reign; or perhaps was preferred to the Throne on account of his Father's Fame. Moreri assures us, that this Son of Alexander and Cleopbia (3) was murdered or poisoned by Cassander. But neither Diodorus Siculus, nor Quintus Curtius, that he quotes, say any thing of it.

(3) So Moreri calls her.

COCHLOEUS (JOHN), Doctor of Divinity, Canon of Montz and Worms, Dean of the Church of our Lady at Frankfort, was born at Wendelsheim, near Nuremberg, about the Year --- (a) --- He was not so attached to Books of Controversy, but he composed some Works of another Nature; for he wrote a History of Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths [A], which was printed at Ingolstadt 1544; and a History of Totila, which was never published (b).

(a) The Nova Maris Baltici, Feb. 1699, pag. 41, says in the Year 1502.

(b) He mentions it in his Preface to the History of Theodoric.

[A] He writ a History of Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths.] The Journalist of the Baltic, for the Month of February, 1699, says, that they were printing, at Stockholm, Vita Theodorici Regis Ostrogothorum & Italiae, Auctore Joanne Cochleæ, Germano, cum Additamentis & Annotationibus, quæ Sues-Gothorum ex Scandia expeditiones & commercia illustrat, operâ Johannis Peringskiöldi. This Book of Cochleæ was very scarce. The Person, who has undertaken to give a new Edition, with proper Notes to it, has compared the Edition of Ingolstadt with a Copy taken from the Manuscript at Prague, and collated with the Manuscript in the Library at Hamburg (1). The same Journalist, in the Month of November 1699, informs us, that this new Edition was finished.

(1) Taken from Nova Literaria Maris Baltici & Septentrionis mensis Feb. 1699, pag. 41.

COLLATIUS (a) (PETER APOLLONIUS) a Priest of Novarra, lived towards the end of the XVth Century. This can no longer be doubted of, since the Journey that Father Mabillon took into Italy, in the Year 1686 [A]. Collatius wrote

(a) Moreri speaks of him under the Words Apollonius Collatius, p. 294, and then, pag. 295, he makes a Title of him, and refers the Reader to Collatius.

[A] He lived towards the end of the XVth Century. This can no longer be doubted of, since the Journey that Father Mabillon took into Italy, in the Year 1686.] Mr Magliabechi presented Dom Mabillon with a Poem of Apollonius, in Epic Verse, on David and Goliath, and shewed him, that the same Poem is dedicated to Laurence de Medicis, and that there are with it some Epigrams of the same Author, whereof one is the Epitaph of Paul II, and the other that of Sixtus IV. Dom Mabillon, inserting this in the Relation of his Journey, observes judiciously, that, for the time to come, it cannot be doubted wrote several Latin Poems, and one among the rest upon the Destruction of Jerusalem, which was inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum by Margarinus de la Bigne. It had, before that, been printed at Paris [B], by the care of John Gagney Doctor of Divinity; and another Edition of it came out at Leyden in the Year 1586, by the care of Adrian vander Burch, who had revised and corrected the Text. This is a Proof that Collatius was taken for a very ancient Author. Scaliger, the Father, was not in that Error; for he ranked him (b) among the modern Poets, below Andrew Alciatus and Balthasar Castiglione, and above Lancinus Curtius, Faustus Andrelinus, and Erasmus. One may easily perceive that he did not place those Authors according to an exact Chronology; but nevertheless he shewed plainly enough, that Collatius was a modern Poet. He ascribes some Fasti to him, and does not speak well of them [C]. Several learned Men have taken so little notice of that Place of Scaliger, that they have quoted Collatius as an ancient Author [D]. Vossius (e) wonders that Gyraldus said nothing of this Priest of Navarra. Father Briet spoke of him for the use of this Dictionary [E]. It is not long since the Poem of our Apollonius upon

(b) Vol. Cæf. Scælig. Poët. lib. 6.

(c) Vossius de Histor. Lat. p. 812.

(1) Mabillon. Musæum Ital. Tom. I, pag. 294.

(2) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 811.

(3) In indice chronologico veterum Ecclesiæ Scriptorum in Tom. I, Bibl. Patrum.

(4) Adversar. lib. 23, cap. 27.

(5) Hist. Collège Navarr. pag. 685.

(6) Epist. ad Reinesium, pag. 27.

(7) In the Acta Erudit. 1692, pag. 558, it is placed in the Year wherein Mr de Launoi, places it.

(8) In the Bibliotheca Patrum.

(9) Vossius de Hist. Lat. p. 811.

(10) Launoi, Hist. Gymn. Navarr. pag. 681.

(11) Aſta Erudit. Lipſient. 1692, pag. 558.

doubted that Peter Apollonius lived about the end of the XVth Century. But what he says of Vossius is not so exact as I could wish it were. These are his Words: 'Quo ex carmine discimus ætatem hujusce auctoris quem alii ad sæculum septimum, alii ad decimum, alii ad alia tempora referunt, ut videre licet apud Gerardum Vossium de Historicis Latinis ubi Petrus Apollonius Collatius appellatur (1). --- From which Poem we learn the Age of this Author, whom some place in the VIIth Century, others in the Xth, and others in other Times, as we find in Vossius, where he is called Petrus Apollonius Collatius.' First of all, Vossius does not call him Collatius, but Collatius (2); and in the second Place, he does not say, that some make Collatius to live in the VIIIth Century, and others in the Xth, and some others in other times; he says only, that Margarinus de la Bigne (3) placed him in the VIIth Century, about the Year 690, and that some great Men of our Age quote him as an ancient Author. He adds, that he takes him to be a modern Author, cotemporary with, and later than, the Year 1490, and that Barthius (4) believes him also to be a modern Writer. Vossius's Reason is, that he does not think he ought to be distinguished from Apollonius Collatius, of whom Scaliger speaks in his Poetics. It is therefore manifest, that Dom Mabillon has not quoted Vossius right.

[B] His Poem on the Destruction of Jerusalem had already been printed at Paris. I have not set down the Year of that Edition, because I perceived some Difference between Mr de Launoi (5), and Mr Daumius (6); the latter, who believes, that it was only the second, and that the first had appeared in Italy, places it in the Year 1546; the other places it in the Year 1540 (7). Mr Daumius reckons that of Margarin de la Bigne for the third Edition (8), and that of Adrian Vander Burch for the fourth, whom he blames for saying that his Edition of Leyden 1586 was the second. He pretends, that he ought to have said that it was the fourth. But neither would this have been right; considering the Edition of 1540 which Mr de Launoi mentions, and that of Paris, 1575, which is in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library. I do not speak of the Edition that Vossius looked upon as the first (9), (which is, according to him, that which was published at Paris, in the Year 1516, by the care of John Gagney) for it is plain that he is mistaken as to the time. Gagney did not begin to study Divinity, 'till the Year 1524 (10). So that it is not likely he should have published Collatius in 1516. Vossius tells us of an Edition made by Christophor Plantin at Antwerp, revised by Vander Burch: it is doubtless the same as that of Leyden, in 1586; and if Vossius had seen Antwerp in the Title of his Copy, it ought to be imputed to the Custom the Bookellers have, to print many Titles, and to put, in some of them, some Years and Towns, that differ as much as they please from the Years and the Towns mentioned in the others. How many times have they, by that means, occasioned the Number of Editions to be increased by the Bibliographers, without any reason? Daumius was in the right to think that the Paris Edition came out after an Edition of Italy; for that Work was printed at Milan, in 1481 (11).

[C] Scaliger ascribes some Fasti to him, and does not speak well of them. These are his Words: 'Apollonius Collatius fastos edidit, in quibus pietatem laudes, frigidiusculus tamen poetæ est: & cum discedit ab elegiaco etiam infelix (12). --- Apollonius Collatius published Annals, wherein, tho' the Piety of the Author is commendable, yet the Poetry is dull, and when he leaves the Elegy is entirely flat.'

[D] Several learned Men — have quoted Collatius as an ancient Author. Vossius says only, without naming any body, that the great Men of this Age commonly quote him as such (13); but Barthius does not use so much Caution: he says, that Collatius has been quoted as an ancient Christian Poet by Joseph Scaliger in his Notes on Eusebius; by Casaubon, in his Commentary on Suetonius; by Francis Juræ, in his Notes on S. Paulinus; by Christopher Colerus, in his Observations on Tacitus; by Thomas Dempster, in his Notes on Corippus; by Murſius, in his Glossary; by John Savaron, in his Commentary on Sidonius Apollinaris; by Buſſengerus, in his Treatise, de Imperatore, and elsewhere (14). The learned Reinesius, who was not sorry to censure Barthius, pretends (15), that there was no reason to find Fault with those great Men, since they say nothing of the Age that Collatius lived in, and they might well quote an Author, who appeared to them a Modern: that in particular it is an absurd thing to censure Joseph Scaliger for it: Could he be ignorant of what his Father had taught him concerning Collatius's Age? Read the Answer of Daumius to these Objections of Reinesius (16): I am sure you will find, that Barthius was in the right.

A Carmelite, named Daniel, of the Virgin Mary, has likewise taken Collatius for an ancient Christian Poet (17); and it seems that he had a mind to shelter himself under the Authority of Casaubon. The Marquis d'Agropoli censures him for it, and overthrows at the same time what the Carmelites would infer from a Passage of that Poet.

[E] Father Briet spoke of him for the Use of this Dictionary. He does not determine the Age that Collatius lived in, but he has committed some Faults. I. He says, that Margarin de la Bigne places him in the time of Charlemagne, and makes him flourish about the Year 690 (18). It is Margarin de la Bigne, who assigns him that Year; why then does Father Briet impute to him to have placed him under Charlemagne, whose Reign did not begin till the Year 768, and his Empire 'till the Year 800, or 801. It is evident, that this Jesuit took the Year 690, and the time of Charlemagne, for the same thing, which is a Mistake. II. He says, that Vossius rejects the Opinion of Margarin de la Bigne, and places Collatius in the beginning of the XVth Century; so that he makes him live in the time of Politian. Vossius sets down expressly the Year 1490, which is towards the end, and not in the beginning, of the XVth Century; and it would be a chronological Mistake to pretend that an Author, who had flourished in the beginning of the XVth Century, should have lived at the same time with Politian. III. Father Briet rejects Vossius's Opinion, because he does not find Collatius's Style lofty enough for the Age that Politian lived in, which is that wherein Learning was revived. He finds false

(12) Jul. Cæſar Scalig. poetica. lib. 6.

(13) Ut antiquus à summis ſeculi hujus viris poſſima laudatur. Vossius de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 811.

(14) Barth. Commentar. ad Claudian. pag. 795. In his Commentariis upon Statius, Tom. II, pag. 436, he quotes the lost Commentator upon Petronius. I suppose he means Goldastus.

(15) Epist. ad Daumium, pag. 15, 16.

(16) Ibid. p. 27. (17) Daniel à Virgine Mariæ, vinea Carmeli, part. 3, cap. 16, n. 358, apud Marchionem Agropolitum in Examine Divinitæ in Carmelo consultæ, Art. 12, pag. m. 11.

(18) Briet. de Poët. Lat. lib. 5, pag. 63.

upon the Combat of David and Goliath was printed at Milan, with some Elegies and Epigrams [F].

Quantity in Collatius, and an Ignorance of the Greek, which does not agree with the Age of Politian. That Reason is very insignificant; for all the Authors of the XVth Century did not equally improve by the Increase of Learning in Italy: Some of those who endeavoured to polish their Style, either for Verse or Prose, made but an indifferent Progress, and learned the Greek Language but very imperfectly. IV. That Jesuit finds a little more Loftiness and Politeness in Collatius's Style, than there was in the time of Charlemagne; from whence he concludes, that Vossius and Barthius bring him too low, cum nimis deprimunt. If he means, that they despise him too much, he is mistaken; for they only take him for a modern Poet. If he means, that they make him a little too modern, he confutes himself; for according to his way of arguing, in our third Observation, the more a Poet raised himself above the Barbarity of the VIIIth Century, the more he deserves to be placed in Politian's Century.

[F] The Poem on the Combat of David and Goliath was printed at Milan, with some Elegies and Epigrams. I have said, already, what Father Mabillon learned, concerning this matter, from the illustrious Mugliabecchi, and I shall say here what we find in the Journal de Leipsic (19). We are told there, that Mr Magliabecchi gave Mr Pufferla, Keeper of the Ambrosian Library at Milan, some Poems of Apollonius; and that Pufferla gave them to Mr Lazarus Augustin Catta, a Civilian of Novarra, who got them printed at Milan, in 1692, in 8vo. That Collection contains the Combat of David and Goliath, and a Complaint of JESUS CHRIST against the Jews, in Epic Verse, an Elegy on the Pleasures of a Country Life, and divers Epigrams; but the Epitaphs of Paul II, and Sixtus IV, that were in Father Mabillon's Copy, were suppressed. Our Apollonius is called Collatinus in the Work published by Mr Catta Ricciolus must be placed in the Number of those that took him for an ancient Christian Poet; for he placed him in the VIIIth Century (20).

(19) Menf. Decemb. 1692. pag. 558, 559.

(20) Ibidem.

COLOGNE (PETER de) in Flemish Van Ceulen [A], Minister of Metz in the XVIth Century, had a great share in the Friendship of Calvin and Beza. He was of Ghent. We say in another place (a), that Robert Stephens, with whom he was familiarly acquainted at Paris, was the Cause of his going to Geneva; where Calvin, having put the last hand to his Instruction, perswaded him to devote himself to the Ministry of the Word of God. He performed the first Exercises of it at Metz, in the Year 1558. Clerwant brought him thither for that Function from Geneva (b). That Church was dispersed in the Reign of Francis II. Clerwant, who was a Gentleman of great Worth, and very zealous for the Cause, retired with his Family to Strasbourg; Peter de Cologne retired to Heidelberg (c), from whence the Protestants called him back again to Metz in the beginning of the Reign of Charles IX (d). He preached privately from House to House till the fourth of May 1561, when he was taken Prisoner as he was preaching. Some days after he was put out of the City, but he returned again a little while after; for on the Twenty fifth of May of the same Year the Protestants begun to preach publicly, by the King's Leave. It is true that Senneterre, who commanded in the City, would not suffer that Minister to return thither: so that, after he had preached, the Protestants were obliged to conduct him back again under a good Guard to the Village of Grizi. This lasted but till the Return of Vieilleville, Governor of Metz (e); for he caused Cologne to come in again. The King, having received at Metz the News of the Battle of Jarnac, that was fought in 1569, wherein the Prince of Condé was killed, permitted the demolishing of the Temple, and the Ministers could not get out of the City but with great Trouble and Danger (f). Peter de Cologne retired into the Palatinate, and was Minister at Heidelberg. He died in the Flower of his Age. He had composed some Books [B] during his abode at Metz. His Son DANIEL COLONIUS was Principal of the Walloon College at Leyden (g). He published some Theses on Calvin's Institution in the Year 1628. Heinsius dedicated to him his Aristarchus sacer.

(a) In the Remark [A] of the Article DIEU. (LEWIS DE).

(b) Beza Hist. Eccles. lib. 16. pag. 444.

(c) Ib. pag. 446.

(d) Ib. pag. 449.

(e) Ib. pag. 452.

(f) Ib. pag. 464.

(g) Orat. Funerbr. Ludov. de Dieu.

(1) Vide Oratio- nem funebre- m Ludov. de Dieu.

[A] In Flemish Van Ceulen.] He was the first of his Family who latinized this Name by that of Coloni (1). It was his Schoolmaster's Fancy; but in France he was called Cologne.

[B] He had composed some Books.] La Croix du Maine durst not venture to give the Titles of them. He wrote, says he, several Treatises, printed at Lyons in the Year 1564, by John de Ogeroles, the Titles of which Books I will not name, for a certain Reason. Du Verdier Vau-Privat, who was not a Huguenot like him, had more Resolution. Not being suspected, he did not think himself obliged to use so much Circumspection. He says, that Peter de Cologne translated, out of German into French, The Conformity and Agreement of the Holy Scripture, and of the ancient and found Doctors of the Church, and of the Confession of Augsburg well understood, concerning the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper, by the Divines of the University of Heidelberg. At Geneva 1566, in 8vo. He translated also, from the German Language, Thomas Brasius's True and Right Understanding of these Words of the Lord's Supper, This is my Body. At Lyons, 1564, in 8vo (2). As these Books are not now to be found, I think, that, tho' I had great Libraries at command, I could not say which of them Mr Ancillon meant in the Life of Farel. Peter de Cologne, says he, made a Translation of a Treatise of the Lord's Supper, and dedicated it to Monsieur de Clerwant. None of these three Authors speak of the Answer that Peter de Cologne made to Francis de Beaucaire de Peguillon, Bishop of Metz, printed at Geneva, in the Year 1566 (3).

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 1001.

(3) See the Remark [A] of the Article DIEU. (LEWIS DE).

(a) His Name was John Colomies; He had a fine Library.

(b) See l'Esprit de Mont. Arnaud, Tom. II. pag. 297, & seq.

(1) They reproach him with omitting some, and particularly Casaubon. See Ancillon Mélanges de Littérat. Tom. II. pag. 95.

[Casaubon was born at Geneva, and therefore was not a Frenchman. R. N. M. C. A. T.]

* The Italia & Hispania Orientalis were published at Hamburgh, by John Christ. Wolfius, in 1730.

(2) 1. A Collection of Observations in Latin.
2. A Collection of curious Particulars in French.
3. Clavis Epistolæ Scaligeri, Casauboni, Salmasii & aliorum.
4. A Key to the French Letters writ to Scaliger.
5. Notes upon Quintilian.

(3) Rather at Roan, tho' London is in the Title Page.

(4) See in the 136 Volume of the Bibliotheca Universalis, pag. 337, an Extract of this Book intitled Pauli Colomiesii Observations Sacrae, Editio secunda, auctior & emendatior. Accedunt ejusdem Paralipomena de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, & Passio S. Victoris Massiliensis ab eodem emendata. Editio IV & ultima, prioribus longe auctior & emendatior. Londini, 1689, in 12mo, p. 34.

(5) It is the Appendix, Observationum ad Pomponium Melam Accedit tertias P. Simonis Observationes Respons.

COLOMIÉS (PAUL), in Latin Colomesius, cultivated the Study of the Belles Lettres with great Application, and communicated several curious Observations to the Public [A]. He was of Rochelle, and the Son of a good Physician (a). Among the learned Persons he knew, there was none that he had more intimate Acquaintance with than Isaac Vossius; and I think that, if he went betimes into England, and before the Protestants of France felt the greatest Blows of the Storm that swallowed up the Edict of Nantes, it was because Isaac Vossius was become Canon of Windsor. The Praises, he bestows upon that learned Man, exposed him to an insult, which he bore with the utmost Meekness [B]. He had not been long in England, before he expressed a dislike of the Presbyterian Party, and an inclination to Episcopal Communion. He made a little Collection of certain select Passages, which he called Theologorum Presbyterianorum Icon, which created him many Enemies; no doubt he was to blame to publish that little Book, and even imprudent to write against People, whom he represents as impatient, distrustful, and obstinate; should not this very Character have obliged him to say nothing that might expose him to their resentment? the best way to confute him, was to say nothing; for such an excellent patience would have convinced the World, that they did not resemble the Picture he had drawn of them. And indeed it must be confessed, to the Honour of these Gentlemen, that they contemned this abuse: but as it is difficult, among so great a number of Men, not to find one that will break loose, so there was a Presbyterian Minister in Holland, who wrote so sharp an Invektive against poor Mr Colomies (b), that, if the whole Party were to be judged of by the Character of one Person, That would be sufficient to conclude, that the Icon Theologorum Presbyterianorum was drawn to the Life. The Author of the Icon bore this Insult without saying a word, not that it was not easy to answer the reproaches of his adversary [C]; but probably he was afraid his Condition would be made worse

[A] He communicated several curious Observations to the Public. It were to flatter Mr Colomies to say, that he made Discoveries by the Penetration of his Genius. Certainly that was not his Talent; but he knew how to improve his Reading, and to select many singular things that most Readers do not mind, and which they are glad to find when any body has brought them into little Collections. His chief Study consisted in collecting such things; so that in this respect he was a true Ferret. The first Book he published is called Gallia Orientalis: which treats of the French, who have understood the Hebrew Tongue (1). This Work is much quoted; it sells well, and is hard to be met with; it was printed at the Hague, in 1665, in 4to. The Author had prepared a second Edition, enlarged and corrected, and had composed a like Work of the Italians and Spaniards, who understood Hebrew. He even gave his Manuscript to a Bookseller of Rochelle, settled at Amsterdam, who promised to print it; but three things have hindered hitherto the Impression of these Manuscripts. I. The Death of the Bookseller. II. The Death of the Author. III. The depraved Taste of the Public, who relish nothing but Libels and Romances. Yet it is to be hoped, that something of these Works of Colomies will be printed*. The second Book he published was entitled, KEIMHAIA LITERARIA, and contains several little things (2). It was printed at Paris in the Year 1668, and at Utrecht in 1669 in 12mo. His other Works are Epigrams and Madrigals, at Rochelle in 1671, in 12mo. Remarks upon the second Scaligerana, Groningen 1669, in 12mo. The Life of Father James Sirmond, at Rochelle 1671, in 12mo. Tertullian's Exhortation to the Martyrs, translated into French, at Rochelle 1673, in 12mo. Rome Protestant, at London (3), 1675, in 12mo. Historical Miscellanies, at Orange 1675, in 24mo. Observations Sacrae, with a Letter, written by the Author to Mr Claude, concerning the French Version of the Geneva Bible, at Amsterdam 1679, in 12mo (4). Theologorum Presbyterianorum Icon, ex Protestantium scriptis ad vivum expressa, and a Parallel between the Practice of the Primitive Church, and that of the Protestants of France, in the Exercise of their Religion, 1682, in 12mo. Bibliothèque choise, Rochelle 1682, in 8vo, reprinted at Amsterdam, 1699, with Additions. Ad Guilielmi Cave Canonici Windesoriensis Chartophylacem Ecclesiasticum Paralipomena, London 1686, in 8vo. A Letter to Mr Jusfel concerning Father Simon's Critical History. This Letter was printed at London 1686, in 4to, with a Book of Isaac Vossius (5). As Mr Colomies collected, with great care, the Letters of Illustrious Persons, he published some of them at London 1687, in 8vo, together with two Epistles of St Clement, &c. The Title of the whole Volume is Sancti Clementis Epistolæ duæ ad Corinthios, Interpretibus Patricio Junio, Gottifredo Vendelino, & Joh. Bapt. Cotelerio. Reperit & Notarum Spicilegium adjecit Paulus Colomesius Bibliotheca Lambethanae Curator. Accedit Thomæ Brunonis Canonici Windesoriensis Dissertatio de Theophrasti Philonis. His subnexæ sunt Epistolæ aliquot singulares vel nunc primam editæ, vel non ita facile obviæ. The same Year he published some Letters of the Queen of Sweden (6), and, in 1690, a Collection of Vossius's Letters in Folio. He constantly followed the Rule of Maximus Callimachus, that a great Book is always a great Evil: all his Books are of a very small size, upon which Mr Baillet has made this Reflexion (7). 'The Author of L'Esprit de M. A. imagines he could not say a more stinging thing to Mr Colomies, his Brother Protestant, than by expressing his Contempt of him, and coldly rallying his small Books of few Leaves. He calls him the great Author of single Sheet Books, adding, that a Volume of a single Sheet was sufficient to make him take place among Authors of the first and second Size.'

[B] The Praises, he bestows upon that learned Man, exposed him to an Insult, which he bore with the utmost Meekness. I shall not however depend upon the judgment of Mr Colomies, who, they will say, is an Author at a reasonable rate, and retained by Mr Vossius to write little Books, wherein he hardly speaks of any thing, but the Great Vossius (8). Though Mr Colomies read this, he did not cease to applaud Father Simon, in a Letter he wrote to Mr Jusfel. A Journalist says (9): 'Mr Colomies's Letter — contains, curious remarks upon some places of Father Simon's Critical History, and has nothing in it, but what is very moderate, though Mr Colomies was not ignorant of Father Simon's being the Author of the Preface and Notes of the new Edition of his Critical History.'

[C] A Presbyterian Minister wrote a sharp Invektive against him — he might very easily have answered the reproaches of his Adversary. I have already blamed Mr Colomies for publishing his Icon. He had better have let the Passages he collects be scattered up and down; and besides, he chose a very improper time for it. He ought not, on such an occasion, to have exposed the weak side of a Country: So that if the Author of L'Esprit de Mont. Arnaud had attacked him in this manner, if he had

(5) I learn this from the Bibliothèque Universelle, Tom. 13. pag. 336.

(7) Jugem. des Savans, Tom. I. pag. 448.

(8) David A. Vossius, Notæ Criticæ, pag. 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

(9) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, May 1686, pag. 593. Edit. 2.

by a Reply [D]. He imitated the patience of those, who had been aspersed in the same confuted the main Points, without descending to personal reproaches, he would have deserved commendation; but by flying upon him with violence and fury, he becomes inexcusable himself, and does an injury to his Cause. Their Dispute furnished the Readers with a sort of Theatrical Dramatic Entertainment; but, whereas in Comedies, you have first the great Tragic Passions represented, and then the Comic Parts; on the contrary, here you have first the diverting Comic Part, and then Transports of Anger, and grave Invektive; but nothing can be more ridiculous than those places where the Author pretends to rally; and if Mr Colomies had replied to him, he must have been irrecoverably mortified on that head. I do not desire the Reader should take my Word for it; I will produce my Proofs.

I. Mr Colomies puts his Name at the head of his Works, PER PAULUM COLOMESIUM RUPELLESEM. Upon this, the Author of L'Esprit de Mons. Arnaud makes this Jest as cold as Ice. 'You see by the grandeur of this great Man's Name, that Heaven appointed him for an Author. For among all the Ancients and Moderns, you find no Name so proper to make a fine Figure at the head of a Volume, or in the Title Page of a Book (10): —'

'It must be confessed, it fills the Mouth, and the Eyes, and though there was nothing else to exhibit to the Public, it would deserve to be printed (11). This is like a Man, who for fear of falling short, cannot part with any Thought that offers, or perhaps it would be better to say, that it is a sign of great want of Judgment, and a Taste for Raillery. However it be, no Man could have better his ill Taste, than by pretending to discover the least grain of Wit in all this, and if I was to answer such a sorry Banter, I should do no more than calmly open the first Book, in a Library, that came to hand, and it would be very hard if I did not soon find Names as proper to fill the Mouth, and the Eyes, as that of Paulus Colomesius Rupellenfis.

After which, with a serious Air, I would thus bespeak my Antagonist: 'You say, that among all the Ancients and Moderns, there is no Name so proper to make a fine Figure at the head of a Work —'

'and that, though there was nothing else to exhibit to the World, yet it would deserve to be printed. If you were acquainted with many Authors, you would not talk at this rate, and it is plain, you have not much read or considered the Ancients, or the Moderns. Why do you not lament the Fate of infinite Number of Peasants, who never have their Names set at the beginning of any Book, though they deserve to be printed, on account of the many Letters they contain. This is your Foundation.' Men of true Wit never rally upon a false Fact; they never ridicule an Author for what is common to him with other learned Men, and has nothing particular in it. Are David Blondellus Catalaunensis, Dionysius Petavius Aurelianensis, Dionysius Lambinus Montroliensis, and a hundred others, I could name, more or less to be excepted against, than Paulus Colomesius Rupellenfis?

II. The Railleries, this Author grounds upon Mr Colomies being surnamed Rupellenfis, are not better. In order that Raillery be true, he, who is rallied, must deserve to be rallied: now this can never be said of any one, who follows only the common Custom. When one rallies another upon his Cloaths, he makes himself ridiculous, unless there is something odd and unfashionable in his Cloaths. (So that the Jest upon Rupellenfis is good for nothing, unless it be not the common Practice of Authors, who write in Latin, to join the Name of their City to their Family Name; but it is certain that this is their Practice, and consequently Mr Colomies only followed a settled Custom (12). Let us conclude, that all this banter reverts upon it's Author, and makes him suspected for a Stranger to the Republic of Letters.

III. But the dullest of all his Jest is this. After having put down in Capital Letters the Names and Surnames of his Adversary, he compares them with others. Aurelius Augustinus Hipponensis, says he (13), and Sidonius Apollinaris Claramontanensis (14), are nothing like it. 'I hope Posterity, who will not be so well acquainted with Mr Colomies as we are, will believe, that RUPEL-

LENSIS signifies the Bishop of Rochelle, as the Hipponensis of St Augustin signifies the Bishop of Hippo. It is a very wretched Raillery, which is built upon an absurd Foundation, and which is more shocking to those who are not concerned, than to those who are intended to be rallied by it. Nothing is more repugnant to probability than to say, the Epithet RUPELLENSIS will one Day signify, Bishop of Rochelle: and it is an injury to our Posterity to imagine them capable of such a gross blunder. Readers in the Ages to come must be a hundred times more barbarous than they were three or four hundred Years ago, if they can believe what the Author of the Esprit de Mr Arnaud hopes they will believe. It may be said, he does not believe so; but speaks ironically. I know it, but still his ironical Hope ought to refer to a probable Event. Otherwise it would be a fine Raillery to tell a Country Gentleman. You are drawn with a Sword by your side, I hope our Descendants will take you for a Duke and Peer. But in short, it may be said, in favour of our ill Jest, that, since the Hipponensis of St Augustin does signify Bishop of Hippo, so Rupellenfis may also mean, Bishop of Rochelle. The consequence I acknowledge; but the principle, from whence it is drawn, is false and absurd; for, in St Augustin's Titles, the term Episcopi is always joined to the Word Hipponensis, and That Father is never taken for a Bishop, by virtue of the latter Word, but only by the Word Episcopi (15). The Increase of Bishops might justly be dreaded in future Ages, if the Raillery of our Cenfor was good; for, as I observed before, it is a common Practice for Authors, who write in Latin, to put the Name of their Country in the Titles of their Books. The Reformers have not neglected that Custom (16). A Professor of Leyden, of his acquaintance, has indeed put a Title to his Works, which may properly fill the Mouth and the Eyes (17).

Had I not good Reason then to say, Mr Colomies might easily have confounded his Adversary on the subject of Raillery? Might he not have laughed at him, as a Man surprised and astonished at a very common thing (18), a Crime hardly pardonable in half Scholars.

It had been as easy to confound him upon a more considerable Point, than upon Railleries. He is accused of being Pensioner of Isaac Vossius, and even his Parasite. This Observation was due to the great Isaac, to reimburse him for the Pension and Lodgings, he furnishes Mr Paulus Colomesius Rupellenfis with; for our Author lives with him. It must not be wondered at, that Mr Colomies is attached to the Party of the Canons, who live at their ease on the fatness of God's House, since he gathers the crumbs that fall from their Table, and dwells in a Land flowing with Milk and Honey — (19). It is a vile Compliance to sacrifice his Brethren to the Passion of those, who give him perhaps a meal — (20). I know not what Religion that Man is of; but this is certain, he is of the Parasites Religion, always for him that gives most (21). This cruel Satire, which reflects upon the Episcopal Clergy on one hand, and Colomies on the other, might easily be refuted. I have read a Letter, written at that time by Mr Jusfel, in which he says, they were very wrong to treat Mr Colomies as a Parasite: the Behaviour of that Man, and his way of subsisting in England, fully confuted the Accusation of the Esprit de Mr Arnaud.

[D] But probably he was afraid his Condition would be made worse by a Reply. I never heard of any ill reports against the Honour of Paul Colomies, or his Relations; but after all, where are the Men, whose Youth and Family are totally free from all stain, great or small, or have nothing to fear from the abusive Memoirs of an Enemy. I imagine that Colomies considered, if he farther provoked the Author of the Esprit de Mr Arnaud, he would oblige him to write to Rochelle for some Memoirs, which would be furnished from thence, to cry down a Man that had endeavoured to render the Presbyterian Party odious to all Europe. Therefore he was silent, that he might not expose himself assest to the Slander of so dangerous an Enemy. See what we have observed before on this head (22).

(10) The Author puts in three Lines, and large Characters, PER PAULUM COLOMESIUM RUPELLESEM. This last Word is in a small Character in the Title of the Icon.

(11) Esprit de Mons. Arnaud. Tom. II. pag. 298, 299.

(12) The Title of Beza's Works is Theodori Bezae Vezellii Volumen primum Tractationum Theologicarum.

(13) ANDREAE RIVETI PICTAVI SAMAXENTINENSIS THEOLOGAE DOCTORIS ET SACRARUM LITTERARUM PROFESSORIS Opera.

(14) This Author has been often charged with this Fault in the Books concerning the Chimerical Cabal of Rotterdam.

(15) Esprit de Mons. Arnaud, Tom. 2. pag. 302.

(16) Ibid. pag. 303.

(17) Ibid. pag. 304.

(18) Remarques [A] of the Article ARNAULD, Doctor of the Sorbonne.

(f) See above,
Citation (7).

(23) See Mr
Baillet, Jugem.
sur les Poëtes,
Tom. IV. pag.
9. citing 28 Rag
guagli of the 15
Century of Boccalini.

(25) See the Preface to the Chimera demonstrated, pag. 65.

(26) In Remark
[E] of the Article TAVER-
NIER.

(27) Jugem. det.
Scavans, Tom.
II, num. 69.
pag. 32.

(28) Ibid. num
137. pag. 179.

(29) Add to this his Elegium in the Journal des Savans, Aug.

m. 213. In the
Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig, Tom
III, pag. 314;
and in the Mé-
langes d'Histoire
& de Littérature par M^{ons}. de Vigneul-Mar-
ville, pag. 269.
Edition of Roan
1699.

(37) His capacity is well known, by a Sermon he preached at London, on the Peace, Sept 23, 1697, which was printed afterwards, at that Place.

(24) Horat. Epist.
I, lib. II. ver.
354.

[A] Bishop of a great Number of Places.] His Titles in Oldoini and Mandof are: ' Archiepiscopus ' Montis Regalis in Sicilia, & Rossanensis, Episcopus Reatinus, Sarfenis, Interamnenfis, Acer- renfis, Aquilanus, Potentinus, Averlanus, Mon-

'tis Marrani, & Catanensis. — Archbishop of ' Mont Real in Sicily, and Rossa, Bishop of Reate,
' Sarfina, Terano, Acerræ, Aquila, Potentia, Avel-

[B] The

a great mixture of good and ill. He knew how to wear equally well the Cardinal's Hat, and Warriour's Helmet, and tried more than once the Vicissitude of good and and ill Fortune. Julius II degraded him from all his dignities; Leo X restored him, made him a Cardinal, and trusted him with several Embassies. Clement VII stripped him of the Purple, but restored it soon after. It is pretended that to him he owed his Promotion to the Papal Chair, which Obligation he would not return by gratifying him in all his demands. The Answer Clement VII one day made him deserves to be mentioned here [B]. Pompey Colonna died Viceroy of Naples, in the Year 1532, and was buried without Pomp, or Epitaph, in the Convent of the Olivetian Monks. He is the Author of several Poems, in which he celebrates the Beauty and Charms of Isabella Filamarini, the Prince of Salerno's Wife. He was her Admirer, but protests he had no dishonourable Designs upon that virtuous Lady. This is perhaps one of those poetic Protections, which are as little to be regarded as the Perjuries of Lovers. He wrote another Book more serious, and more laboured, in Honour of the fair Sex, de Laudibus Mulierum [C], which he consecrated chiefly to the Glory of Victoria Colonna, his Relation. This Article deserved to be made longer, but I would not repeat what every one may find in Moreri.

[B] The Answer Clement VII one Day made him deserves to be mentioned here.] * Cardinal Pompey Colonna, having, by his Intrigues, raised Clement VII to the Papal Throne, in Opposition to * Cardinal Franciotto Orsini, received many Favours from the new Pope; but imagining no thing would be denied him, and soliciting one Day for something, which was not only unjust, but dishonourable to his Holiness to grant, Clement refused his Request. Colonna, provoked by his Denial, began to reproach him, that by his Interest

he had obtained the Papacy. His Holiness replied, it was true; but then he desired him to let him be Pope, without being so himself, and not take from him what he had been instrumental to procure him (1).

[C] He wrote a Book - - - in Honour of the fair Sex, de Laudibus Mulierum.] Father Oldoini (2) says, the Manuscript is in the most Christian King's Library. See also the Bibliotheca Romana of Prosper Mandosi.

(1) Meynier Responses livres aux Demandes curieuses, pag. 279. 280.

(2) In Athenæo Romano.

COLONNA (VICTORIA) a learned and illustrious Lady. See VICTORIA COLUMNA.

COLUMNA or COLONNA (JOHN), a Dominican born at Rome, was made Archbishop of Messini (a), Legate and Governor of Tauromine, by Alexander IV, 1255 (b). Therefore it is wrong to place him after the Year 1325 (c), or in the Year 1313 (d). He wrote a History intituled, Mare Historiarum, the Sea of Histories [A], which reached from Adam to the Year 1250 (e). Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, quotes it sometimes. Possevin mentions one JAMES COLUMNA, a Dominican and Historian, and he pretends, that this Archbishop of Florence

(4) And not in the Year 1337, as La Croix du Maine presents, pag. 36.

(5) Sammarthani sub 75 Enife. Constan. Normann. allegant Vitam Caroli VII. Reg. Franc. per Joannem Quadrarium Monachum S. Dionysii lib. 4. Marii Hist. & in Patriarchio Bituricensi, cap. 26. allegatur Joannis du Cortilis, Mare Historiarum, capitulum 24, §. 3. libri primi de origine Francorum. Sandius, Animadv. in Vossium de Hist. Lat. pag. 170. 171.

(6) Trithem. de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. pag. 226. Vossii de Hist. Lat. pag. 480. (7) Du Chesne Biblioth. des Hist. de France, pag. m. 57. (8) In his Hist. de Tournai.

(9) Vossius de Hist. Lat. pag. 431. (10) Trithem. de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. pag. 226. See the Biblioth. of Gesner, fol. 408, v. 10.

(11) Sandius Animadv. in Vossium de Hist. Lat. pag. 172. (12) Volaterran. lib. 22. initio.

[A] He wrote a History, intituled, Mare Historiarum, The Sea of Histories.] There is a Mistake in those words of the Jesuit Gautier, Johannes de Columna, Autor Matris Historiarum (1). He says this in his Table of the XIVth Century; which shews, that he did not know the Age of our Columna. The French Translator not suspecting they had printed Matris, instead of Mariis, translates it, Author of the Mother of Histories. Father Gualtier has copied these two Faults from Genebrard's Book. Johannes de Columna, autor libri cuius titulus est Mater Historiarum (2). This Work was translated into French, in the Reign of Charles VIII. The Translator informs us, that he had added all that concerned the Kings of France, having formed this Design, because he had brought down his Translation to the Foundation of the French Monarchy, when Charles VIII ascended the Throne. He calls himself a Frenchman, a Native of Beauvoisin. And adds, he was confirmed in this Design, by the virtuous Exhortations, and eminent Reasons of the noble Andrew de la Haye, Lord of Chaumont, and Receiver of the Taxes, and Payments of the Troops, Towns, and Election of Sans. The Edition I have is printed at Lyons, by John du Pre, 1496, in two Volumes, in Folio, and reaches to the Death of Lewis XI, in 1483. I have seen a Copy of it, belonging to a Canon of Antwerp (3), in which are written these words, Borchardus autor bujus operis, ut patet ex 120 capite bujus voluminis, folio 702; — Borchard is Author of this Book, as appears by the Hundred and twentieth Chapter of this Volume, pag. 702. Accordingly in that Page is written what follows: * And because I Borchard, Doctor and Professor of that holy Divinity, being willing to satisfy the Desire of those, who, by a great Inclination and Devotion, go over the Sea, to visit the Places of the said Holy Land, through which I have passed and walked many times, having described it according to my best Capacity, without saying, or adding any thing but what I myself have seen, being present in the said places, or on the Mountains from whence I could consider them. But this proves only, that the Translator, or some Continuator, has inserted into that Sea of Histories Bonaventure Borchard's Description of the Holy Land, which he visited about the Year 1280 (4). They have inserted in it abundance of other things (5), and even took the Liberty to change the Oeconomy of it. It was divided into Books, by John Columna (6); but in the French Version it is divided into six Ages, each of which contains several Chapters. Du Chesne, who says nothing of the Edition I use, mentions three others. * The great Sea and Flower of Histories, says he (7), printed in the beginning of the Reign of Charles VIII, King of France, in two Volumes, in Folio, and since continued to the Year 1543, at Paris, by Ambrose Giraults; * Lastly, augmented with a third Volume, down to 1551, by John le Gendre Aurelianus.

This Sea of Histories has been quoted by an infinite Number of Authors, especially by John Cousin, who set a great Value on it (8).

Vossius observes, that an anonymous Author, who wrote, in Italy, in the Year 1381, a Treatise de Hierarchia subcelesti, has ranked John Columna among the Authors, who have writ the History of the Popes (9); but this does not necessarily infer, that he composed a Book expressly upon the Popes; it may only mean what he has inserted relating to them in his Mare Historiarum. He published also a Volume of Letters (10). It is said also, that he composed a Treatise, de Viris Illustribus Et Christianis (11). If he had writ a particular History of the Popes, I cannot think, that Volaterran would have omitted it in his List (12), where he sets down LANDOLF COLUMNA, who dedicated his Works to Pope John XXII.

[B] Bat

(f) At the end of Remark [B].

Florence copies him in many Places. Vossius is not of his Opinion [B]. I shall observe a small Error of Andrew Rivet (f).

[B] Possievin mentions one James Columna ----- copied by Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence ----- but Vossius is not of his Opinion.] Thus he expresses himself: 'Possievinus diversos facit, Joannem & Jacobum, Columnas, utrumque Ord. Præd. utrumque Historicum: atque addit, B. Antoninum plura ex Jacobo derivasse in Historiam suam. Puto falli. Sane Antoninus Joannem Columnam testem advocat, cum alibi, tum Tit. xix. Cap. i, ubi Sermo ei de Innocentio III, qui prius Lotharius vocabatur. At Jacobum Columnam Historicum, quantum meminisse possum, plane nescit: nec fuisse ejus nominis Historicum censo (13). ----- Possievin makes two Columnas, John and James, both Franciscans, and both Historians; and adds, that Antoninus had borrowed many things from James which he had put into his History. I believe he is mistaken. For Antoninus quotes John Columna several times, and particularly in the sixth Tit. of Book 1, where he speaks of Innocent III, whose former Name was Lotharius. But, as I remember, he knew no such Historian as James; nor do I think there was any Historian of that Name.' Sandius objects to him, that Naucerus relates something on the Authority of James Columna (14). He might have added, in Confirmation of his Criticism, that the Fact, for which Naucerus cites James Columna, is not to be found in the Mare Historiarum (15); and observe, that several Authors make mention of this James. JACOBUS COLUMNA Ordinis Sancti Dominici Historicus eruditus, quem pluries citat Sanctus Antoninus in suis Historiis. Scriptis mandavit Chronicon à creatione Mundi, usque ad sua tempora 1340. Est Jacobi mentio apud Lufitanum, Plodium, Fernandez, Fontanam de Romana Provincia, & Ambrosium de Altamura in Bibliotheca Ordinis Prædicatorum (16). ----- JAMES COLUMNA, of the Order of St Dominic, a learned Historian, who is often cited by St Antoninus in his History. He wrote a Chronicle from the Creation of the World to his own Times 1340. Mention is made of this James by Lufitanus, Plodius, Fernandez, Fontanam of the Roman Provinces, and Ambrosius Altamura in his Bibliotheca Ordinis Prædicatorum. These are the words of Prosper Mandosi, who forgot our John Columna, in his five first Centuries Bibliotheca Romanæ.

Give me leave to add here one little part of the Controversy concerning Pope Joan. Mr du Plessis having quoted Antoninus, who tells us the Tale of that Female Pope, Coeffeteau charged him with altering the Passage, and suppressing this Limitation; 'If what is reported, and what Martinus says, be true. It is added also, that they erected a Marble Statue in Memory of her; but Vincent de Beauvais, and John de Columna makes no mention of it (17). Rivet, in his Answer to Coeffeteau, uses these words: 'Concerning the Marble Statue, Antoninus opposes to those, who commonly add it, Vincent de Beauvais, and John de Columna, who do not mention it. But he shews, by this particular, that they make mention of the rest of the Story (18). Rivet is mistaken; for those two Authors say nothing of the She-Pope; and therefore Antoninus could not say, they only omitted what concerned the Statue. He ought to have consulted them, before he had determined the meaning of Antoninus's ambiguous Expressions.

(6) Prosper Mandosi Bibl. Romanæ, cent. I, num. 11, pag. 14, 15.

(17) Coeffet. Reponse au Mythe d'Iniquité, pag. 508.

(18) Rivet. Remarq. sur la Reponse au Mythe d'Iniquité, Part I. pag. 594.

(13) Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 359, and lib. 12. pag. 369.
(14) Id. lib. 12. pag. 383.
(15) Id. lib. 12. pag. 369.

COMANA. There were chiefly two Cities of this name, one in Cappadocia (a), and the other in the Kingdom of Pontus (b). Both were consecrated to Bellona, and observed almost the same Rites in the Worship of that Goddess. One was built upon the Model of the other, That of Pontus upon That of Cappadocia (c). It was in the latter that Orestes established this Religious Worship (d) [A]. In each City the Temple of the Goddess was endowed with a great many Lands, and a great number of Men officiated there under the Authority of a Pontif, a Person of Credit, and

[A] It was in Comana of Cappadocia, that Orestes established that religious Worship.] Τὰ δὲ ἱερὰ ταῦτα δοκεῖ Ὀρέστῃ μετὰ τῆς ἀδελφῆς Ἰριγενείας κομίσθαι διὸς ἀπὸ τῆς Ταυρικῆς Σκυθίας τὰ τῆς Ταυροπόλεως Ἀρτέμιδος. These words of Strabo (1) signify, 'that it was believed Orestes, and his Sister Iphigenia, brought thither this Religion from Scythia Taurica, being the same Worship they paid to Diana Tauropolos.' He adds, that Orestes, who had let his Hair grow in token of Mourning, left it in this same place of Cappadocia, which, for that reason, was named Comana. Now, as he says in another place (2), speaking of Comana, a City of Pontus, that it was consecrated to the same Deity with Comana of Cappadocia, and had its Origin from it (3), he plainly shews, either that he did not know, or did reject, the Competition there was between the two Cities, and that he disregarded the Pretensions of the Inhabitants of Pontus. Nevertheless, it is certain, they did not yield to the others the Title of Chief, and also boasted they had the true Statue of Diana. In which they were rivalled not only by the Cappadocians, but also by the Lydians; so that it was not under Christianity, that the Practice first began of quarrelling about the Possession of a Relic; for, long before they began to claim in several Places the Possession of the true holy Handkerchief, or John the Baptist's Head, several Pagan Cities had disputed the Possession of the Statue of Diana Taurica. The Lacedæmonians pretended to have it. The Athenians maintained, that Iphigenia had left it in their Country (4). The Inhabitants of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Lydia, disputed the same Relic. Διαμμένοντες ἔτι καὶ νῦν τηλικύτῳ ὄνομαι τῇ ταυρικῇ θεῷ ὅς ἐστι ἀμφοτέρωθεν μὲν Καππαδοκίας καὶ οἱ τὸν Εὐξείνου οἰκῶντες τὸ ἀγαλλμα εἶναι παρὰ τῇσιν, ἀμφοτέρωθεν δὲ καὶ Λυδῶν οἷς ἐστὶν Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν Ἀναΐτιδος. Cum adhuc illustre sit Tauricæ Dianæ nomen; ut Cappadoces cum Euxini accolis penes utramque gentem ejus Deæ signum inter se certent, & Lydi etiam illi apud quos Anaitidis Dianæ sanum est rem controversam faciunt (5). ----- The Name of Diana of Tauris is at this Day so famous, that the Cappadocians, and they of Pontus, still contend who has the Possession of her Statue; and the Lydians likewise, with whom remains the Temple of Diana Anaitis, still contend for the same. As to the Statue of Diana, Dion gives all the Honour of it to Comana of Cappadocia; he says nothing of the Competition of the Lydians, nor of the Inhabitants of Pontus. He says only, that in Cappadocia there were two Cities of the same Name, which were not far asunder; each boasted of the same Things, told the same Tales, and shewed the same Rarities; each pretended to have the true Knife of Iphigenia. Μεβολογῶσι καὶ δεικνύσι τὰ τε ἄλλα πάντα ἐν τῷ ὁμοίῳ, καὶ τὸ ξίφος ὅς αὐτὸ ἐκείνο τὸ τῆς Ἰριγενείας, ὃν ἀμφότεροι ἔχουσι. Cum reliqua omnia similia utrinque fabulantur ostentantque, tum utraque urbi gladium habet quem verum Iphigeniæ esse autumant (6). There is no doubt but he means that these two Cities of Cappadocia were named Comana. Now as no Historians, or Geographers, mention two Comana's in Cappadocia, near one another; perhaps Dion was mistaken, in not placing, as Strabo has done, one of the two Comana's in Cappadocia, and the other in the Kingdom of Pontus. Ortelius is mistaken, when he assures us, that Dion makes mention of the Pontic Comana, and Comana of Cappadocia (7). Perhaps Dion has confounded together Comana and Castabala: for it is true, there was a tellus in Thelasia City in Cappadocia named Castabala, where the things said of Orestes, and Diana Tauropolos, were pretended

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Dio, lib. 35.

(7) Abrah. Ortelius in Thelasia 10 Geo. graph.

and of such Consideration, that the King only was superior to him [B]. His Dignity was during Life (e). Several Dictionaries, and other Books, make Strabo say, that, in his time, there were above Six thousand Persons consecrated to the service of Bellona, at Comana of Cappadocia, who, at certain annual Feasts of the Goddesses, beat and wounded one another. I cannot think Strabo has said any thing more (f), than that, when he travelled there, the Ministers of Bellona were above Six thousand, both Men and Women. What they say of those Fights is built upon another Foundation [C]. He says of Comana of Pontus, that it was a populous and trading City; that it was thronged by great numbers of People, at the Festival of Bellona going out, and that, at all Times, there were abundance of Strangers, who resorted thither to pay their Vows, or to offer Sacrifices to the Goddesses of the Place (g). This without doubt was one of the things that drew Strangers thither; after the Mithridatic War, the Romans in a manner secularized this Pontificate [D], and pretended to be transacted. The Diana, who had a Temple in this City, was surnamed Perafa; this served as a Proof. For the rest, the Priestesses, in this place, boasted of being able to walk on burning Coals without hurt. Ἐν τοῖς Κασαβάλαις ἐστὶ τὸ τῆς Περσείας Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν ὅπου πασι τὰς ἱερείας γυμναίει τοῖς ποσὶ δι' ἀνθεκαίας βαδίειν ἀπαθείς, καὶ ταῦτα δὲ τινες τὴν αὐτὴν θρύλλουσιν ἰσορίαν τὴν περὶ τῶ Ὀρέου καὶ τῆς Ταυροπόλεως. Περσείαν καὶ κληῖσθαι φασκόντες διὰ τὸ πείθεσθαι κομισθῆναι. Apud Castabala Perafae Dianæ fanum est, ubi aiunt sacrificas mulieres illæsis pedibus per prunas ambulare: atque ibi sunt qui autument gesta quæ de Oreste & Tauropolo Diana feruntur: diætamque Perafiam quod trans mare eo pervenerit. (8). — At Castabala is the Temple of Diana Perafa, where it is reported, that her Priestesses walk unburt on burning Coals, and here is told the Story of Orestes and Diana of Tauris, who, they say, was called Perafa (the Foreigner) because she was brought from abroad.

[B] The Temple of the Goddesses — was served under the Authority of a Pontif — that the King only was superior to him.] The Inhabitants of Comana were reputed the King's Subjects, but were obliged to obey the Pontif: Ἄλλως μὲν ὑπὸ τῷ βασιλεὶ τελεργμένοι, τῷ δὲ ἱερίῳ ὑπακούουσιν. Regi quidem alias subditi, sed Pontificis tamen dicto audientes. Thus Strabo speaks of him in pag. 369. He adds, that the Pontif was Lord of the greatest Part of the Temple, and of all the Ministers of holy Things. He received all the Product of the Lands belonging to the Temple; in a word, throughout all Cappadocia he was honoured next to the King; for this reason, he was almost always of the Royal Family. Ἐστὶν ἔτι δευτέρῳ κατὰ τιμὴν τῇ Καππαδοκίᾳ μετὰ τὸν βασιλέα. ὡς δ' ἐπίστολον τὰ αὐτὰ γένος ἦσαν οἱ ἱερεῖς τοῖς βασιλεῦσι. It secundum regem in summo est inter Cappadoces honore: plerumque ex eadem familia sunt Pontifices et Reges. Strabo observes almost the same thing of the Pontif of Comana in Pontus. This Pontif was next to the King, and twice a Year he wore the Royal Diadem, when they celebrated the going out of the Goddesses. Ἡνίκα δὲ τὰ ἔτος κατὰ τὰς ἐξόδους λεγομένης τῆς θεᾶς διαδήμα ἐτυγχάνει φορεῖν ὁ ἱερεὺς, καὶ ἢν δεύτερῳ κατὰ τιμὴν μετὰ τὸν βασιλέα. Cum bis quotannis in exitu quem vocabant Deæ Diadema Pontifex gestaret et honore secundus à Rege esset (9). I have made these Remarks for two Reasons: I. To shew, that the same Spirit, which, under Christianity, has procured the Clergy so much Honour and Wealth formerly, prevailed also under the Pagan Religion. So that, tho' Men may change their Opinions and Principles, yet Nature will recover it's Rights. What is founded upon Mechanical Passions is an inalienable imprescriptible Demesn. In the great Revolutions of Religion, Nature may be dispossessed for a Time; but sooner or later she recovers her Possessions. This is my first Motive. My second is, That it appears to me, that Father Noris has committed a Fault, when he says, in a general and unlimited Manner, that the same Man was Prince and Pontif of Comana. 'Hunc Archelaum Pompejus Sacerdotem Bellonæ ac Comanorum principem (UTRAQUE enim dignitas UNI EIDEMQUE conferebatur) constituit' (10). — — — Pompey made this Archelaus High Pontif of Bellona, and Prince of Comana; for both Honours were conferred on ONE AND THE SAME PERSON. I do believe, that Pompey conferred these two Characters upon Archelaus at the same time; but non sic erat ab initio, — — it was not so from the beginning. I shall give two Instances in the Remark [D], to confirm what I have said of the great Power of these Pontifs.

[C] What they say of these Fights is built upon another Foundation.] The Priests of Bellona had this in common with the Priests of Cybele, that, at certain Seasons, they counterfeited the Enthusiasts, and expressed, by extravagant Postures, a great Distraction of Mind. Far from sparing their own Bodies, they cut themselves till the Blood ran down, and this was a part of their divine Service. Lactantius reproaches the Heathens with this. 'Ab isto genere sacrorum non minoris insanie judicanda sunt publica illa sacra; quorum alia sunt matris Deum; in quibus homines suis ipsi virilibus litant: amputato enim sexu nec viros se, nec feminas faciunt: alia Virtutis, quam eandem Bellonam vocant, in quibus ipsi Sacerdotes non alieno, sed suo cruore sacrificant. Sectis namque humeris, & utraque manu distictos gladios exerentes, currunt, efferrunt, insaniunt (11). — From these Solemnities we may infer, that the rest are not less infected with Madness; as those of Cybele, where Men sacrifice Virility, by Castration, making themselves neither Men nor Women; and those of Virtue, whom they also name Bellona, at which the Priests offer no Blood but their own. For with a drawn Sword in each Hand, and streaming Shoulders, they are guilty of all the wild Extravagances of Men possessed.' It is very likely these Rites were observed in Comana, where Bellona was had in such Veneration; yet Strabo does not mention it. He says indeed, at Comana in Cappadocia there were many inspired or fanatic Persons; but he does not say, that the Priests of Bellona were either castrated (12), or that they wounded one another. Some pretend, that Valerius Flaccus affirms both the one and the other; for instead of Comatos, they read Comanos, in his seventh Book, about the end.

Qualis ubi attonitos mœstæ Phrygas annua matris Ira, vel excoctos lacerat Bellona Comanos.

As when the Phrygians Cybele inspires,
Or her Comanians War's great Goddesses fires,
An unmann'd furious Tribe, &c.

[D] The Romans secularized in a manner this Pontificate.] We have proved before, that the Pontif of Comana did not enjoy the Sovereignty. The King was superior to him, and the Inhabitants of Comana were properly the Subjects of the King. But when Pompey had finished the Mithridatic War, he gave that Pontificate to Archelaus, without imposing any other Dependence upon him, than that which the Roman People referred to themselves when they gave a Country. Appian, enumerating the Kings and Princes, placed, by Pompey, in several Parts of Asia, does not forget Archelaus: 'Ejus etiam Deæ quæ à Comanis colitur Archelaum fecit flaminem, cuius dinastæ parem opibus (13). — He made Archelaus High-Priest to the Goddesses of the Comanians, who has a Revenue not inferior to any Princes.' He forbade him only to sell the Inhabitants, and as for the rest, commanded them to obey

(8) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 370.

(9) Ibid. pag. 384.

(10) Noris, Cœnotaphi. Pisan. pag. 255. See Remark [C], of the Article ARCHELAUS, King of Cappadocia.

(e) Ib. pag. 370.

(f) Ib. pag. 369.

(g) Strabo, lib. 11, pag. 335.

(11) Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. 1, cap. 21.

(12) On the contrary he mentions their Wives: ἄνδρες ὁμῶς γυναῖκας. Viri una cum mulieribus. Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 369.

(13) Appian in Mithridat. pag. m. 163.

Upon his Departure, he gave the Box to the King, in the Presence of a great many People, and desired him to keep it till he should return. He told him, that he had put something in it that he valued more than Gold and Silver, and that was as dear to him as his own Life. The King put his Seal to the Box, and gave it to his Masters of the Wardrobe to keep. The Queen's Journey lasted three Years, and did not fail to produce what Combabus had foreseen. She became desperately in love with that young Man, and did what she could to keep the Decorum of her Quality; but Silence did but increase her Love: At last she was forced to discover it, first by Signs, and then by Words. 'Tis true, that being unwilling to have a Confident, and wanting Courage to desire a Cure for her Evil, she supplied her want of Boldness with some Glasses of Wine [A]. Having made herself drunk, she went to Combabus's Chamber, discovered her Love to him, and most humbly desired him not to be cruel to her. He put her off, under Pretence, that she was drunk; but because she would not hear any Reason, and threatened to do some desperate Action, he declared to her, that it was impossible for him to satisfy her, and, lest she should be incredulous, he made her an Eye-witness of his Impotency. After that Sight, Stratonice was not so fond of Combabus: nevertheless, she continued to love him [B], and would be perpetually with him: She endeavoured, by seeing and speaking to him, to comfort herself for the Misfortune of not being able to carry the Intrigue farther. In the mean time, the King, being informed of their Conduct, re-called Combabus. That Order did not astonish the young Man; for he remembered that his Justification was deposited in the King's Closet; so that he returned boldly. He was put into Prison immediately, and some time after the King sent for him into his Chamber, and accused

[A] Stratonice ----- being desperately in love with him ----- supplied her Boldness with some Glasses of Wine. Lucian supposes that Three Reasons induced her to make herself drunk (1). I. She hoped that then she should be bold enough to discover her Passion. II. She would not be so much ashamed of a Refusal. III. People forget what they do in that Condition. He might have added a fourth Reason, which is, That a Man does not conceive so much Contempt for a Woman, who runs into such excess of Impudence, when she has drunk too much, as for a Woman that should make the same Declaration in her right Senses.

[B] He made her an Eye-witness of his Impotency; nevertheless, she continued to love him. I must observe, for that Queen's Honour and Glory, that Lucian, a Man who was not afraid of what he said, tells us, That she had only Conversations with her Gallant; they were indeed frequent, but nevertheless pure and harmless. Ἰδέσθαι δὲ ἢ στεγασθῆναι τὰ ἐπὶ ἐλπίσιν, μάλιστα μὲν ἔτι ἐκείνης ἐρχέσθαι, ἔπειτα δὲ ἑδάμῃ ἐλπίσιν, ἀλλὰ πάντα οἱ συνέστα ταύτην παρρησίῃ ἐποίεσθαι ἐπὶ ἀπρὶκτοῖς. Stratonice his visits quæ nunquam futura putasset, à furore quidem illa in præsens destitit, amoris autem haudquaquam oblita est. Sed perpetua conversatione cum illo ita infectum amorem solabatur (2). — Stratonice, having seen what she so little expected, abated the Violence of her Passion, yet ceased not to love him; but, being perpetually in his Company, thus soothed her unaccomplished Desires. It must not be said, That, in the Condition that Combabus had put himself in, he could give her nothing but Words; for the Relations of the Levant inform us of the contrary. How excessive soever the Jealousy of Men may be, yet it is not so copious in Inventions as the Love of Women. They believed, that if they should put their Wives under the Guard of Eunuchs, I mean of certain Men, whose Genitals were cut off, they might sleep quietly; but they found themselves mistaken. Those Eunuchs were not only good for something, but were also preferred to other Men in many Places:

Sunt quas Eunuchi imbelles ac molliæ semper Oscula delectant & desperatio barbæ.
Et quod abortivo non est opus.

There are, who in soft Eunuchs place their Bliss,
To shun the scrubbing of a bearded Kiss,
And 'scape Abortion. —

DRYDEN.

It was therefore necessary to have recourse to other Remedies, and to cut the Eunuchs close to the Skin: they would not trust them in Turkey, if they had the least part of their Genitals left (4). But this Precaution proves still ineffectual; for, notwithstanding they are cut close, as the Emballador de Breves speaks, yet he affirms, that some of them marry several Wives, to serve them for abominable Impurities (5). St Basil was not ignorant, that there is no trusting to the completest Mutilations: He says, they do not make him, that was a Male, to become a Female; he is still a Male: Just as an Ox, whose Horns are cut off, continues to be an Ox, and does not become a Horse. He carries the Comparison much farther: He says, That an Ox, whose Horns are cut off, does not cease, when he is angered, to make all the Postures that he made before, and even to strike with that part of his Head where his Horns were. The other part of the Comparison may be seen in these Latin Words.

V O L. II.

“Masculina corpora, licet illa Eunuchorum sint, caute vitanda sunt virginibus. Sit enim ille licet Eunuchus, vir tamen per naturam est. Sicut enim cornutus bos, cum illi prædantur cornua, non tamen sublati cornibus equus efficitur; sed absint licet cornua, bos tamen est: ita & masculus, abscissis genitalibus omnibus, ea tamen mutilatione sua mulier effectus non est, sed masculus (ut est natura conditus) permanet: ac sicuti bos recisus cornibus, sic quoque, furore cornu petit, (cervicem quippe incurvans, & caput ad ferendi impetum formans, gaudet intentare minas) ac sæpius ea parte capitis ferit qua cornibus antea fuerat armatus: satisfaciuntque furor per actus imaginem, (ita enim afficitur correptus iræ impetu, non ut casu feriens vulnere, sed ut prius ictu cornuum scindens, ac dividens;) ita & masculus, quamvis abscissus genitalia, vitiosa tamen concupiscentia masculus est. Quocirca & ipse ad actum seditatis similiter formans, amorem spirat, incredibilemque vesaniam: imo & ad coitum fervens, etiam si ea parte non violet, scemina turbulenti incumbens; ipse tamen ac si corruerit satisfeceritque cupidini, ita sceleris imagine affectus est. Eam vero ad peccatum vehementius irritans, totum quidem corrumpt animum, corpusque ad corruptionis actum inclementer instigat (6).”

St Basil is not the only Father of the Church, who charged Women to have a care of Eunuchs, and to be persuaded that they are able to commit a thousand lascivious Tricks with them. I speak of such Eunuchs as were cut close. See Father Theophilus Raynaud's Book, which I have quoted. The Examples and Passages of the Fathers, alledged by that Jesuit, make him laugh at Peter Abelard's Apology. I have already observed this (7), and shall perhaps say something more of it in the Article HELOÏSA. But let us return to Stratonice and Combabus, and observe, that she is much to be praised, if, after entertaining a criminal Love for another Man, she confined herself within the Bounds of meer Conversation.

6 T

(4) Bosquet, Letter 3, apud la Vayer, Letter 112, Tom. XI, pag. 527.

(5) La Mothe Vayer. ibid.

(6) St Basil, libro de Sancta Virginitate, ad finem, apud Theophilum Raynaudum in Tractatu de Eunuchis, cap. 5, art. 2, n. 17, pag. m. 147.

(7) See above in Remark [T] of the Article ABELARD.

(1) Lucian. de Syria Des, pag. 892, 893, Tom. II.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 893.

(3) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 364.

(b) He spent the remaining Part of his Life in the holy City, where the Temple was built. Lucian. de Syria Dea, pag. 896.

(c) Taken from Lucian in his Treatise de Syria Dea, Tom. II. Oper. pag. 876, & seq. Note, that That Treatise, which is ascribed to Lucian, is not written in the Attic Dialect, as the other Treatises of that Author, but in the Ionie Dialect.

(*) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 83.

(g) So Lucian calls the Town whither Stratonice went to build a Temple.

(10) Lucian. de Syria Dea, Tom. II, pag. 894.

(11) Pag. 893.

(12) Pag. 895.

(13) Theophilus Raynaud, ubi supra, pag. 148, it is in the wrong to say, Hoc Stratonice à Combabō excocho accidisse — narrat Lucianus, that is, what St Basil speaks of.

cused him of Adultery, Perfidiousness, and Impiety [C], in the Presence of those who had seen the Box given. Witnesses were produced, who deposed, That they had seen him enjoy the Queen [D]. He made no Answer till they were going to lead him to the Place of Execution. Then he said, That he did not die for having defiled the King's Bed, but because the King would not return the Box that he had put into his Hands at his Departure. Whereupon the King commanded the Box to be brought. They opened it, and the Innocency of the Accused appeared, and he told the Reasons that made him commit That Violence upon himself. The King embraced him, and seemed much concerned at that Disaster: he caused the Accusers to be punished, loaded him with Favours, and granted him the Privilege of speaking to him at all times, even when he was conversing with the Queen [E]. Now as his first Commission imported, that he should have the care of building the Temple, which Stratonice was ordered to build to Juno; he desired leave to return to that Place, to finish the building of that Temple. He obtained leave, and returned no more to the Court (b). His Statue of Brass was placed in the Temple, by the King's Order, to do him Honour. They had given that Statue the Air of a Woman, and the Dress of a Man; yet it has been said, that in compassion to Women he left off the Dress of a Man [F], and dressed himself like them (c). We shall tion. Virgil's Dido would not have been so honest, since, in her Lover's Absence, she wanted a more solid Amusement than Words, which was the Son of Aeneas in her Lap.

--- illum abens absentem auditque videtque,
Aut gremio Acanium, genitoris imagine capta,
Detinet, infandum si fallere possit amorem (8).

Absent, her absent Hero sees and bears,
Or in her Bosom young Acanius bears;
And seeks the Father's Image in the Child,
If Love, by Likeness, might be so beguiled.

DRYDEN.

[C] The King charged him with Adultery, Perfidiousness, and Impiety. The first and second Crimes are obvious, since the King made choice of Combabus as the Queen's Guardian. The third Crime is not very hard to be understood, if we consider that the King had commissioned Combabus to build a Temple to Juno. That Journey to the Holy City (g), in order to build a Temple, was a Work of Devotion, and a kind of Pilgrimage. So that it was profaning a holy thing, to make Love during that Time. *Δύων τεσσά Κομβάβον ἀδικεῖν μοιχὸν τε ἐόντα, καὶ ἐν πύλιν ὑβρίζοντα, καὶ εἰς θεῶν δόξα τὴν ἐν τῷ ἑρῷ τοιαύτῃ ἐπύρζε. Dicens Combabum triplicem injuriam intulisse, ut qui adulterium commississet, fidem violasset, & in Deam impius fuisset, cujus in opere talia perpetrasset (10). Alledging Combabus was guilty of a threefold Crime, of Adultery, a Breach of Faith, and Impiety towards the Goddess, in whose Service he had done it.*

[D] Witnesses were produced, who deposed that they had seen him enjoy the Queen. I have followed Benedictus's Translation, both here, and where he speaks of Stratonice and Combabus's Conversations. In both Places Lucian makes use of the same Verb, *παύσασι συνεύσε, perpetua conversatione cum illo (11). ἤλεστον ὅτι ἀναφανδὸν σφάας ἀλλήλοισι συνεύσε εἶδον. Coarguebant ipsum quod manifeste ipsos congregientes vidissent (12). They deposed that they had seen them publicly in the very act. But that Verb does not signify the same thing in those two Places: In the first it signifies, to be together, and, in the second, to lie together. If one should judge of Things by Appearances, the Accusers might be in the right; nevertheless it ought not to be affirmed, since Lucian does not affirm it (13). It is probable, that since the Queen did not cease to love Combabus, but, on the contrary, saw and spoke to him very often, to allay, in some measure, her disappointed Desires by that means, she was not contented with meer Words. And as Combabus was certain that he had his Justification sure and ready with the Prince, how malicious soever the Accusers might be, it is very likely that he did not refuse the Queen any thing that she could obtain of him. The Box secured them both against the ill Offices of the Accusers, and, doublets, That made them take less heed whether they were observed; so that per-* haps the Accusers saw enough to convince themselves of the Crime whereof they accused Combabus. Let us remember the Passage of Basil, to which I add another. Εὐνυχος quibus exstinguitur tota virilitas, negat S. Basilus (14) impudicitiae flammam liberari: sed quamvis corpore nihil possint, tamen ait. animo desiderioque jugiter in ceno, porcorum more, convolvi, & post abscissionem esse impudiciores servos voluptatis, qui liberi metu ne deprehendantur petulantiam licenter foedis attackibus & amplexibus exultant, ut possunt non ut volunt lascivientes. — St Basil says, that Eunuchs, stripped close to the skin, are not free from loose Desires: for though impotent in Body, yet in Mind and Inclination they wallow, says he, like Swine, eternally in the Mire; and after Abscission are the more abandoned Slaves to Lust, who, free from Fear of Discovery, glut their wild Desires by wanton Touches, and loose Embraces, not agreeably to their Inclination, but to their Power. And who knows whether Stratonice never said to him, as the Woman, of whom Petronius speaks; Languii tu gratias ago, in umbra voluptatis diutius lusimus. — Thanks to your Impotence, we have swamtoned longer in the Shade of Pleasures.

[E] The King — granted him the Privilege of Access to him at all Hours, even when he was conversing with the Queen. Those that know the ancient and modern Ceremonial of the Eastern Princes, are not ignorant what sign of favour it is to have free access to the King at any time. The Privilege of Combabus went farther; it contained express Orders to the King's Officers to admit him, though he should interrupt the King's and Queen's Pleasures. Ἀτίξεσθαι δὲ παρ' ἡμέας ἀνεύχοντες, ἵδὲ τις ἀπέρξῃ σε ἡμετέρῃς ὀψίῃ, ἢ γυναικὶ ἅμα ἐνδύομαι. Ad nos venies non vocatus, neque te quisquam à nostro conspectu arebit, non si cum uxore concubam (15). Those who abolished the Tyranny of the Magi, after the Death of Cambyses, the Son of Cyrus, were contented with a lesser Privilege than that, viz. that they might come to the King without asking leave, except when he lay with the Queen. Παύσας ἱς τὰ βασίλεια πάντα τὸν βυλόμενον τὸν ἐπὶ ἀνεύχοντες, ἵδὲ μὴ τυγχάνῃ εἶδον μετὰ γυναικὸς βασίλειος. Ut regiam introire unicuique à seipso sine intermissione liceret, nisi forte cum uxore cubaret rex (16).

[F] It has been said, that in Compassion to Women he left off the Dress of a Man. During the Celebration of the great Festival, a Woman that was a Stranger found Combabus so handsome, that she fell very much in Love with him. But hearing afterwards that he was an Eunuch, she was so vexed at it, that she killed herself. Combabus, considering the Misfortune of his Impotency, left off Man's Apparel, that Women might no more be deceived on his Account in such a displeasing or fatal manner. I remember a witty Saying, that is in the Menagiana: Madam Cornuel knew that M. de L. — was impotent, and did not know him by sight: he was a very handsome Man. Having met him at M. de Rambouillet's shall see in the Remarks the Variations that concern this History [G], and the Error of those, who have said, that the Courtiers castrated themselves, to have a share in Stratonice's Favour [H].

(14) Lib. de vera Virg. sub fin. apud Theoph. Raynaudum, ubi supra, n. 12. pag. 143.

(15) Lucian de Syria Dea, Tom. II, pag. 896.

(16) Herod. lib. III. cap. 84.

* Rambouillet's House, she asked who he was? and being told that he was the Marquis de L.; — Ah! said she, who would not have been deceived in him (17)?

(17) Menagiana, pag. m. 107.

[G] We shall see the Variations that concern this History.] Some say, that Stratonice herself accused Combabus, and writ to the King, that he had solicited her to violate her conjugal Faith. Lucian rejects this as a Fable (18); and even does not believe what is related of Sthenobœa and Phædra. Έγὼ δὲ μὴ ἐν ἰδέ Σθενεβοῖν πείθομαι, ἰδέ Φαίδραν, τοιαύτῃ ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, εἰ τὸν ἱππολύτου ἀντρακίως ἐπὶ τοῦ Φαίδρου. At credo neque Sthenobœam, neque Phædræ, talia perpetrassæ, si Hippolytum Phædra verè concupiscebat (19). — (18) Lucian, de Syria Des, Tom. 11. pag. 894.

(19) Id. ibid.

I do not believe that Sthenobœa, or Phædra, if really desirous to enjoy Hippolytus, ever did such things. It is reported, that to revenge themselves for the ill Success of their Advances, they complained to their Husbands of having had their Honour attempted, the one by Bellerophon, and the other by Hippolytus. I do not see why Lucian doubts of these Stories; for it is not only very possible that the Passion of those Women, as violent as you please, should be converted into Hatred, thro' Indignation at a Refusal, but it is also most likely it should be so. Such a Refusal is a bloody Affront: It is a mortal Offence to despise the Advances made by a Sex that is used to be courted and not to court. Corrupt Nature breathes nothing but Revenge at the sight of such an Affront. The holy History informs us, that Potiphar's Wife changed, upon such an account, her Love into a most revengeful Anger towards the Patriarch Joseph (20). One of Constantine's Wives did the like towards Crispus her Husband's Son. So that I believe Lucian did not shew his Judgment on this Head. He seems to me more reasonable on the other; he did well not to believe that Stratonice accused Combabus; for she had no reason, like Phædra, to think herself despised. She might flatter herself to have appeared the most lovely Person in the World, in the Eyes of him whom she courted. Why should she have been angry with him? He could not have been more tractable for the finest Woman in the Universe. Sthenobœa, Phædra, Potiphar's Wife, Fausa, could not say this of the Objects of their Love: the Infensibility that was shewed them was not an unconquerable Fault.

(20) Gen. chap. xxxix.

[H] The Error of those, who pretend, the Courtiers castrated themselves, to have a share in Stratonice's Favour.] The Love of many Women for Eunuchs is so common, that all Histories give some Examples of it. That Passion was so much the more remarkable in Stratonice for Combabus, after he became so, that all the Queen's Courtiers gelded themselves out of Complaisance, to acquire the Favour of both. La Motte le Vayer says this (21). He has committed three Faults: I. He gives us to understand, that the Love of Stratonice began after he knew that Combabus was gelt; which is a great Mistake. If Stratonice had known the Execution that he had performed on himself, she would have cast her Eyes elsewhere: and it is certain, that the Knowledge of a certain Imperfection is able to hinder the growth of a Passion, but not to smother it when it is become very strong. II. He ought not to have said, that all the Courtiers castrated themselves; for Lucian says it only of Combabus's most intimate Friends. III. Much less ought he to have said, that all the Courtiers castrated themselves, to acquire Stratonice's Favour; for Lucian says not a word of it. He says only, that those, who loved Combabus most, castrated themselves, to comfort him under his Disgrace. Δέσειν δὲ τῶν φίλων τὸς μάστιγα οἱ εὐνοούμενοι ἐς παραμυθίην τῷ πάθῳ κοινωνοῖν ἐλπίσαι τὴν συμφορὴν, ἔμενον γὰρ ἑαυτοῖς. Feruntur & illius amici qui erga ipsam maxima benevolentia fuerunt affecti in solatium ejus quod ille passus fuit, ejusdem affectionis societatem si-

(21) Letter 112, Tom. XI, pag. 525, 526.

bi elegisse, nam & seipsos castrarunt (22). It is a Consolation for the Unfortunate, to have Companions in their Misfortunes. Two things must be observed; the one is, that, after the opening of the Box, Combabus acquired the Prince's Favour in the highest Degree; the other, that he desired leave to return to the Holy City, where he lived the rest of his Days. Add to this, that three Years were spent in the Building of the Temple (23). It must be supposed, that Stratonice returned to her Husband at those three Years end; and consequently she was separated from Combabus: so that the Persons, who castrated themselves out of Complaisance to Combabus, could not pretend to please Stratonice. I confess, that Lucian does not say, whether it was at the King's Court, that Combabus's Friends castrated themselves, or whether it was in the Holy City; but he insinuates clearly, that it was in the last place: for he will have it, that their Conduct served for a Foundation to a Custom that was observed every Year; which was to castrate several People in the Temple that Stratonice and Combabus had built (24). The Author of a French Dictionary (25), transcribing the Mistake of la Motte le Vayer, made it worse; these are his Words: 'We read in History, that several Women have been passionately in Love with Eunuchs. Stratonice could not live without her Combabus, who was castrated; inasmuch that the Courtiers of that Queen castrated themselves, to have also a share in her Favour. Cæsar Scaliger Exercitat. 277.' This is to out-do the Fault of la Motte le Vayer; for he does not alledge Stratonice for the only Motive of what was done by the Courtiers: and moreover, he does not quote Scaliger, who says nothing of it. As for the rest, the Copier is guilty of the same Faults with la Motte le Vayer. His Example of Stratonice is not well chosen, because she did not fall in Love with Combabus, after she knew that he was an Eunuch. Since Lucian does not declare, whether it was at the King's or at the Queen's Court, that they had the Complaisance to conform themselves to Combabus; it is an inexcusable Rashness in a modern Author, to be so bold as to determine that it was at the Court of Stratonice. Observe well, that Combabus was a Favourite in both those Courts, but that he was not at the King's and at the Queen's Court at the same time, after Stratonice's Love for him; for, ever after, he was either with the King in the Queen's Absence, or with the Queen in the King's Absence. I add, that Lucian does not say, that those, who made themselves like Combabus, were Courtiers; but, on the contrary, he says, that they were true and intimate Friends of Combabus, and that they imitated him, to comfort him. Why then should we be told, fifteen hundred Years after, not only that those, who castrated themselves, were Stratonice's Courtiers, but also that their only Aim was, to make that Queen in Love with them? I confess this Criticism is not a thing considerable in itself: I have insisted upon this Subject, to cure, if it be possible, a Disemper that prevails but too much among Authors. They relate what the Ancients tell us with a thousand Alterations and Additions. I am sure that there are a hundred Paradoxes in our modern Authors, attended with their Citations in the Margin, that are not better grounded than this of la Motte le Vayer, concerning the pretended manner, wherewith Stratonice's Courtiers acquired her Favour.

(22) Lucian, ibid. supra, pag. 897.

(23) Id. pag. 892.

(24) Ibid. pag. 897.

(25) César de Rochefort: His Dictionary was printed at Lyons 1685, in folio. The Passage which I quote is in Page 168.

I shall conclude with this Note: It has been said that Junio, out of Affection for Combabus, inclined many Persons to castrate themselves, that he might not be the only Person that should lament the loss of his Tackling. Δέσιντες ὡς ἢ ἡν φιλέεσα Κομβέδον πολλοὶ τὴν τομὴν ἐπὶ νόον ἔβαλλε, ὅπως μὴ μόνον ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνασθενίᾳ λυπέοιτο. Dicentes Junonem, cum amaret Combabum, multos ad se castrandum impulsisse, ne solus ille laceret quod eviratus esset (26).

(26) Lucian, ib. pag. 897.

COMENIUS

(a) Scholæ Præ-roviensis Præ-fatus. Præf. Oper.
um Didacticorum
Comenii.

(b) Epist. dedicat.
Oper. Didact.
Comenii.

(c) Præfat. Oper.
didact.

(d) George Sadowski de Slaup-na.

(e) Ex Præfa-tione Operum Didacticorum.

(f) The Forerunner of Universal Science.

(g) Lewis de Gœr.

COMENIUS (JOHN AMOS), a Grammarian, and a Protestant Divine, in the XVIIth Century, was born in Moravia, the 28th of March, 1592. Having studied in several Places, and namely at Herborn, he returned into his Country, in the Year 1614, where he was made Rector of a College (a). He was made a Minister in the Year 1616 (b), and had the Church of Fulnek given him in the Year 1618 (c). At the same time they gave him the Direction of the School, that was newly erected in that little Town. One of his greatest Designs at that time was to introduce a new Method of teaching Languages. He published some Essays of it in the Year 1616, and had prepared other Writings on that Subject, that were lost in the Year 1621, when the Spaniards plundered his Library after they had taken the Town. The Proscription of all the Ministers of Bobemia and Moravia, by an Edict of the Year 1624, interrupted his Project; but he took it in hand again at the Request of one of his Brethren, to whom a Protestant Baron (d) had given his three Sons to be instructed in the Year 1627. Some Ministers, and Comenius among the rest, kept themselves concealed in that Baron's House, in the Mountains of Bobemia. The Persecution increased in such a manner the following Year, that they were obliged to leave this Retreat. Comenius fled to Lesna, a City of Poland, where he taught the Latin Tongue. The Book that he published in the Year 1631, with the Title of Janua Linguarum reſerata, acquired him a wonderful Reputation [A], inſomuch that thoſe, who governed Sweden, wrote to him in the Year 1638, to offer him a Commiſſion to reform all the Schools in that Kingdom. He did not think it proper to accept that Offer; he only promiſed to aſſiſt thoſe, that ſhould have the Commiſſion for it, with his Advice: and from that time he put into Latin, what he had compoſed in his Mother-Tongue, about the new Method of inſtructing Youth (e). A Specimen of it was published under the Title of Panſophiæ Prodromus (f), which made him be looked upon as a moſt able Perſon to be the Reſtorer of the Schools. The Parliament of England deſired to make uſe of him, to reform the College of the Nation. Comenius came to London in the Month of September 1641, and would have been admitted into a Committee, to propoſe his Plan of a Reformation, if the Parliament had not been too much taken up with other Buſineſs. The Civil-Wars of England, and the Diſorders of Ireland, ſhewed him, that the Times were not favourable to him. He went into Sweden, whither he was invited by a Perſon of Merit (g), and a great Lover of the Public Good. He arrived there in the Month of Auguſt, 1642. He conferred with Chancellor Oxenſtiern concerning his Method; and at laſt all ended in this, that he ſhould ſettle himſelf at Elbing in Pruſſia, and labour on his Method. I forgot the beſt of the Buſineſs. The Patron, whom I have mentioned, was very liberal: he provided Comenius with a conſiderable Maintenance: and the latter, being free from the Fatigue of Teaching [B], employed himſelf only in finding out ſome general Method for thoſe who had the care of Youth. He beſtowed four Years upon it in Elbing; after which, he went again into Sweden, to give an Account of his Work. His Book was examined by three Commiſſioners, who judged it worthy to be printed, after the Author ſhould have put the finiſhing hand to it. Comenius went about

[A] The Book that he published — with the Title of Janua Linguarum reſerata, acquired him a wonderful Reputation. Though Comenius had published no other Book but that, he would have immortalized himſelf. It is a Book, that has been printed a great many times, and tranſlated into I know not how many Languages: there have been many Polyglot Editions of it. I do not doubt but that Comenius ſpeaks ſincerely, when he owns, that the Succeſs of that Work was much above his Expectation; for who would not be ſurprized, that ſuch a Book ſhould have been tranſlated not only into twelve European Languages, but alſo into Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, and Mogul. The moſt vain of all Authors would never have expected ſuch a thing. 'Factum eſt, quod futurum imaginari non poteram, ut puerile iſtud opusculum univerſali quodam eruditi Orbis applauſu fuerit exceptum. Teſtati ſunt id permulti variarum Gentium Viri, tum literis ad me datis, quibus inventioni novæ impenſe gratulabantur, tum translationibus in Linguas vulgares quaſi certatim ſuſceptis. Non ſolum enim in omnes Europæas linguas (1) (xii) numero, quarum editiones publicas vidimus, nempe Latinam, Græcam, Bohemiam, Polonicam, Germanicam, Suedicam, Belgicam, Anglicam, Galicam, Hiſpanicam, Italicam, Hungaricam ſed & in Aſiaticas, Arabicam, Turcicam, Perſicam, adeoque Mogolicam, toti Orientali Indiæ familiarum (ut ex literis ad Jacobum Golium, Orientalium L. L. Lugduni Veſtræ Profeſſorem, à Petro Golio fratre, Aleppo Syriæ Anno 1641, datis, patet) tranſlatus eſſet idem Libellus noſter (2). --- It has happened indeed, beyond my Expectation, that this ſmall Piece ſhould meet with an univerſal Approbation from the learned World. This has been confirmed to me by Letters from ſeveral learned Men of different Nations, wherein they beſtow great Compliments on the Invention; as alſo by Tranſlations into various Languages, carried on by a ſort of Emulation. For it has been tranſlated, not only into all the European Languages, in number twelve, in which it has appeared, namely, Latin, Greek, Bohemian, Polish, German, Swediſh, Dutch, English, French, Spaniſh, Italian, Hungarian; but alſo into the Aſiatic, Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, and that of the Mogul, familiar to all the Eaſt Indies; as appears from the Letter of Peter Golius, dated at Aleppo, 1641, to James Golius, Profeſſor of the Oriental Languages at Leyden. [B] Comenius being free from the Fatigue of Teaching. Whereas before he was only to teach one School, he was then to take a general care of all the Colleges; juſt as if a Curate ſhould be made a Cardinal. 'Factis mihi, ſays he (3), à Mœcenate meo beato otii, conſtitutaque honeſta (ut particulari ſcholæ miniſtrandi functione exemptus, communioribus poſſem vacare ſtudiis) ſuſtentatione, elaboravi ſexennio. --- Having obtained, by the Indulgence of my good Patron, Leiſure, and a competent Subſiſtance, (that, being diſengaged from the Management of a particular School, I might purſue a more extenſive Study) I have laboured fix Years.'

(2) Comen. Epist. Dedicat. Operum Didacticorum Consulis Amsterd. pag. 10

(3) Comen. Epist. Dedicat. Consulis Amsterd.

[C] He

about it the two following Years, in the same City of Elbing; after which he was forced to return to Lesna (b). We are come to the Year 1648. I find that two Years after he went to the Court of Sigismund Ragotski, Prince of Transylvania, where they desired to confer with him concerning the Reformation of the Schools. He gave that Prince some Writings, which concerned the manner of regulating the College of Patak (i), according to the Plan of his Panfophia; and for the space of four Years he was allowed to propose what he pleased concerning the good Order of That College (k). Afterwards he returned to Lesna, where he remained 'till the Month of April 1656, when the Poles burned it [C]. He lost all his Manuscripts there, except what he had writ on the Panfophia, and St John's Revelation (l). He fled into Silesia, and afterwards into the Country of Brandenburg, than to Hamburg, and at last to Amsterdam (m), where he found some very charitable Persons. The Golden Shower, that fell upon him in this City, obliged him to stay there all the Remainder of his Days [D]. In the Year 1657 he printed there the different Parts of his new Method of Teaching, at the Expence of his chief Mæcenas (n). It is a Book in folio, divided into four Parts, which cost the Author watchful Hours, and much Money to others, and from which the Republic of Letters drew no manner of Profit: neither do I believe that there is any thing usefully practicable in the Author's Scheme (o). The Reformation of Schools was not the chief thing of which he was fond; he was yet more infatuated with Prophecies, and Revolutions, the Fall of Antichrist, the Millenium, and such like Whims of a dangerous Fanaticism: I say dangerous, not only in relation to Orthodoxy, but also in relation to Princes and States. He collected the Visions of one Kotterus, those of Christina Poniatovia, and those of Drabicius, with a wonderful Care, and published them at Amsterdam. Those Visions promised Wonders to those, who would undertake to exterminate the House of Austria, and the Pope. Gustavus Adolphus, Charles Gustavus, Kings of Sweden, Cromwell, and Ragotski, had been foretold as the Executors of those magnificent Prophecies; but the Event did not answer. Comenius, not knowing any longer which way to turn, bethought himself, as it is said, to make his Address to Lewis XIV, King of France [E]. He sent him a Copy of Drabicius's Prophecies, and intimated, that God promised That Monarch the Empire of the World, by the Defeat of the Persecutors of JESUS CHRIST. He composed some Books at Amsterdam, under a malignant Planet. This may be said particularly of that, which he published against Maresius concerning the Reign of a thousand Years. He drew a thundering Answer upon himself; wherein the Author pretended to have unmasked him. 'Ita Deo dispenfante evenit, ut tua importunitate coactus, larvam tibi detraxerim, & quam hactenus egeris personam in hac scena mundi toti mundo ostenderim (p).

— Thus

[C] He remained at Lesna, till the Poles burnt it. We shall see below (4), that Comenius was reproached for having been the Cause of that Disaster (5); and that, if he might have followed his own Inclination, he would not have staid in that Town, although he persuaded others not to fear any thing, and assured them they should have a speedy Deliverance.

(4) In Rem. [K].
(5) Post Lesnae incendium quod sua πολυπραγμοσύνη illi misere urbi concivit, ut etiam illi publice exprobratum est: . . .
After the burning of Lesna, which Calamity was brought on the City by his Pride, and with which he was publicly reproached. Maresius in Antirrhethico, pag. 8.

(6) See Nicolaus Arnoldus, in discursu Theologico contra Comenium, in the Last Page.

[D] The Golden Shower, that fell upon him in Amsterdam, obliged him to stay there the remainder of his Days. Some took it ill, because his Office of Superintendent of the Churches of Poland and Bohemia required he should be elsewhere. It is likely that his ambulatory Life would have continued longer than it did, if he had not found a plentiful Harvest in Amsterdam. He found some charitable People there, and some rich Merchants, who were in hopes he would teach their Children Latin in a shorter and easier Method, and who thought they ought to pay a Man largely, that saved the Time and Labour of the Youth. No doubt he said within himself, it is good to be here, let us therefore build here our Tabernacles. 'Mercatoribus quibusdam Amsterdamensibus gratus vivit, qui delicatulis suis filiis, ejus opera habitum latinæ nullo labore, & majore æris quam temporis dispendio, infundi posse sperant. Et sic ille auream apud eos messem metit; at vero ubi manet cura Ecclesiarum Polonicarum & Bohemicarum, quarum Senior & Superintendens est, & quas in tam misero statu reliquit, sibi consulens (6)? — He lives in the good Graces of some Merchants at Amsterdam, who imagine, that by his means their pretty Masters may easily attain a habit of speaking Latin, and at a less expence of time than Money. So he reaps a Golden Harvest amongst them. But where is the regard due to his Churches of Poland & Bohemia, of which he is Elder and Superintendent, and which he has left in such miserable Circumstances, to shift for himself? The paternal Tenderness of the Dutch has been very well represented in few Words in this Passage of Mr Arnoldus.

[E] Not knowing which way to turn, he bethought himself, as it is said, to make his Address to Lewis XIV, King of France. All that I can affirm is, that I have heard several Persons say so. But as for the Promise itself, I have an Author to alledge who has read Drabicius very much; so that he may be credited in the things that he assures us to have found in him. Let us hear him then: 'The Spaniards may cry up, if they please, the great Advantages the House of Austria gains over its Enemies; as for us (he speaks in the Name of the Protestants) if we have no great reason to be satisfied with the present, we have great things to hope for the future. There is a Prophecy that promises the Empire to the King. It was made by one Drabicius a Bohemian, who prophesied about twenty Years ago, that the King would be Emperor, that the House of Austria would be destroyed, that Vienna would be taken by the Turks, that the Turks would take Carinthia and Stiria, and destroy the State of Venice, and the City of Rome; and that the King, being created Emperor, would give Peace and Liberty of Conscience to all Europe. It appears, that, within these fifteen or sixteen Years, Heaven labours to perform its Promise: and certainly, we shall do what we can to fulfil those Prophecies. The House of Austria is already humbled, and almost destroyed. The King is Master of the great City of Strasburg, of all Alsatia and Friburg. He has all the Country of the Rhine, and five Electors, three Ecclesiastical, the Palatine of the Rhine, and that of Brandenburg, at his disposal. The War with the Turks is not yet ended; and who knows how far all this will go (7)? This Author has very much altered his System since (8).

[F] He

(b) Ex Prefatione partis II. Operum Didact. corum.

(i) Sufannah Loranthe the Mother of Sigismund Ragotski concerned herself particularly in that School. See Comenius Part. III. Oper. Didact. p. 70.

(k) See the third part of his Opera didact.

(l) Historia Revelationum, pag. 181.

(m) Ibid. pag. 182.

(n) Laurence de Geer, the Son of Lewis.

(o) Sorbieri has given a true Character of him and his Panfophia. See the Sorbieriana, pag. 51.

(p) Maresius in Antirrhethico, pag. ult.

(7) Esprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. II. pag. 209, 291. The Book was printed soon after the raising of the Siege of Vienna.

(8) See la Cabale Chimerique, pag. 133 & 134, of the second Edition; where, among other things, you will find this: How quickly did he change his System! He should be ashamed of having made us, as much as in him lies, the Horror of the Christian Name, and of the good Allies of this State, by declaring that we would do all we could to have the House of Austria, the Republic of Venice, and the City of Rome, destroyed by the Turks, and to put the Imperial Crown upon the Head of Lewis XIV. Quantum mutatus ab illo!

Thus, by the Providence of GOD, I have performed what your Importunities compelled me to undertake and unmasked you, and exposed to the World the Part you have hitherto asked. He was represented as a Spurger and a true Sharper [F], who made an admirable use of the Character of a Fugitive for his Religion, and of the pompous Ideas of his Method of Teaching, in order to empty the Purfes of well-disposed Persons. He was also laid open in some other Respects [G].

He

(9) Marefius in Antirrhethico, pag. 5.

[F] He was represented as a Spurger, and a true Sharper. These are his Adverfaries Words: 'Agnoico hominem esse ingenii eximii & admodum inventivi, ac plane ei convenientis qui diceret, con Parte e Pinganno, io vivo mezzo l'anno: con Pinganno e Parte, io vivo l'altra parte. Nam ut nullo hoc sæculum tulit mysticum æruscatorum illo subtiliorem, ita nullum protulit scriptorem in trichotomiis excogitandis feliciorum (9). — I own him to be a Man of fine Parts, and uncommon Invention, such as would suit with him who should say; By Art and Deceit I live half the Year; By Deceit and Art I live the other Part: for, as this Age has not produced a more expert mystical Juggler, so neither has it known one of a happier Dexterity at nice and needless Distinctions.' See what he says concerning the Craft Comenius made use of with Levis de Geer, to be the only Possessor of his Liberalities, and to make them last long. The Pan-sophia that he promised, and which never came out, was always retarded, said he, by memorable Occurrences; so that, by his long Delays, he made it altogether useless according to his Principles; for he pretended, that the Reign of a thousand Years would begin in the Year 1672 (10). Marefius says (11), that his Wages were not the fourth part of the Sum, that Comenius made his Patron spend every Year. 'Aufim dicere Comenium triplo vel quadruplo quotannis amplius constitisse uni familiæ Dege-rianæ, dum eam fraudulentè lætatur spe Pan-sophica, & pascit five fascinat potius fumo Chiliaftico, & revelationum Drabicianarum, quam soleo consequi in meum stipendium annuum ex ærario publico. — I dare affirm, that Comenius cost that one Family of de Geer three or four times as much yearly, as I receive for my Salary, out of the public Treasury, whilst he amuses them with Pan-sophic Hopes, and seeds, or rather insatiable, them with the vain hopes of his Millenium, and the Revelations of Drabicius.'

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 55.

[G] He was also laid open in some other respects. I. He was accused of an excessive Pride; and the Author observes, that it is the general Fault of those who pretend to be inspired: And indeed that Favour is of so great a value, that it is no wonder if those, who persuade themselves, that GOD honours them with such a Distinction, use the ordinary Teachers with the greatest Contempt. But at the same time they discover that they boast wrongfully of being inspired: for if GOD did them that great Honour, he would not refuse them the Spirit of Christian Humility; they would not conceive so great an Indignation against all those that will not believe their Dreams. 'Ut est sui plenus (says Marefius (12), speaking of Comenius) & grandia sentit de seipso, prout solent omnes isti Visionarii, qui speciale cum numine commercium sibi intercedere gloriantur, esse superbissimi, non potest æquo ferre animo suas non dicam solum nœnias, & quinquillas, sed fanaticas & enthusiasticas cogitationes improbari. — Bigg with a high Opinion of himself (thus des Marefius speaks of Comenius) as it is usual with all those Visionaries (who boast an immediate Intercourse with the Deity) to be haughty, he cannot with any Patience bear his anile Trash, or rather his Fanatic and Enthusiastic Dreams, to be called in question.'

(12) Ibid. pag. 5.

II. Marefius charges him with being much enraged because he had been convicted of a Contradiction. He had written against one Felgenbæverus, who vented some Prophecies like those of Drabicius (13): he had refuted him with the same Reasons that confuted the Visions of Drabicius: so that he had confuted himself before-hand, and they need only to oppose his own Arguments to himself, to render him ridiculous. This touched him to the quick. This is the fate of Infatuation, and of those that become Fanatics by a passionate adherence to some particular things. Their first Works overthrow their last; and if any Body dares blame them for their Contradictions, they fall into a furious Rage. We have seen so glaring an Instance of it, since the Death of Comenius, that it is not necessary to mention it. III. He was accused of want of Judgment: Marefius did not deny that he had Wit and Memory; and to prove that he had no Judgment, he told him that he meddled with too many things, that he was a restless Man, and even that he had no settled Notions in things belonging to Grammar. 'Non mirum est quod in Comenio summa ἀκρίβεια summæ ingenii dexteritati conjungatur. Illam comprobant ἀκρίβειαν constans ejus πολυπρᾶξις μόνον, genus vitæ defultorium, & ἀκαταστάσια perpetua, quæ maxime in suis Grammaticationibus fingendis & refingendis per totos 30 annos eluxit (14).'

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

He was accused of Inconstancy in Matters of Religion. He was told, that he had for a long time revolved in his Head the Pacification of the Church in concert with the Socinians (15). Zwickerus, who was of That Sect, upbraided him publicly with it. Marefius adds, that he had a wonderful Cunning to accommodate himself to the Humour of the Party with whom he was to live; but that, if one might believe the common Report, he communicated with none. He was reproached with his Coldness to confute the Papists, as never having wrote any thing against them but a little Book against the Capucin Valerian Magni, to which he did not set his Name without disguising it according to the mysterious Rules of the Cabala. 'Ita tepidus est in propugnanda protestantium causa contra Pontificios, ut non nisi semel tale quid fecerit adversus Valerianum Magnum Capucinum, suo ordinario nomine dissimulato, & assumpto Cabalistico Huldrici Newfeldii, quod præfixit illi paucularum plagarum opusculo (16).'

(15) Ibid. pag. 6.

(16) Id. ibid.

He justified himself in the second Edition, by saying that he had never loved Disputes. In that second Edition he would have added a Project of Re-union between the Protestants and the Catholics; but his Friends obliged him to leave it out (17). Marefius forgot to alledge, as a Proof of his Inconstancy, the Books that he published against the Irenicæ Irenicorum of the Socinian Zwickerus (18). But he did not forget to tell him, that during the Life of his two Patrons, he had spoke always civilly of Cartesius; whereas after their Death he published an Invektive against that great Philosopher. V. The chief thing he blames him for, is Fanaticism: Sed præsertim est Comenius Fanaticus, Visionarius, & Enthusiasta in folio (19). — But above all, Comenius is a Fanatic, Visionary, and Enthusiast of the first Magnitude. Comenius pretended that the Prophecies of Drabicius ought to serve for a Rule to all the Princes of Europe; which was the Reason that he wrote Letters to the Pope, to the Emperor, to Kings and Cardinals, to recommend that Work to them as the Rule of their Conduct.

(17) The Book is intitled, Ab-surditatum Ecclæ. The second Edition was printed in 1658.

(18) See the Remark [M].

(19) Marefius, ubi supra, pag. 9.

'Datis ad Papam, ad Imperatorem, ad Reges, ad Cardinales literis has nœnias illis de meliori nota commendare atque exinde quid facere, quid cavere, quid metuere debeant illis prescribere (20).'

(20) Id. pag. 10.

He was always watchful over the Events of Europe, to make them agree to the System of his Visions. It is the Property of those Men, as we know by fresh Instances, to amend their Predictions according to the News of the Gazette. Comenius, being uncertain whether the Plenipotentiaries of England and Holland, who were to treat of the Peace at Breda in the Year 1667, could conclude it, sent them one of his Angels, to signify unto them that they should end the War, and thereby facilitate the coming of the Reign of JESUS CHRIST, that Reign of a thousand Years, that should bring the Golden Age again, and restore Innocency. He published a Book intitled, Angelus pacis ad Legatos pacis Anglos & Belgas Bredam missos, indeque ad omnes Christianos per Europam, & mox ad omnes populos per orbem totum mittendus, ut se sistant, belligerare desistant, pacisque Principi Christo, pacem gentibus jam loquuturo locum faciant. He promised two other Books, which were to be the double Morning of the Great Day

He owned, at last, the Vanity of his Labours [H], and of the Trouble he had given himself, since Providence had made him leave his Country. And indeed he would have been more worthy of Praise, if he had, during his Exile, employed his Thoughts only upon his own Salvation, rather than to be always intent upon the Events of Europe, to find in the Interests of Princes, in their Wars, in their Alliances, &c. wherewith to flatter himself with the Hopes of being restored to his Country, and of revenging himself. This made him run into Fanaticism. He died at Amsterdam the 15th of November 1671 (9). If he had lived but a little longer, he would have been a Witness of the Fulfillment of his Promises concerning the Millenium [I]. He was in the 80th Year of his Age when he died. Some Persons have been surpris'd that he lived so long [K], and

(7) Epist. Danielis Comenii Joh. Amosii filii apud Spizelium in Infel. Literat. pag. 1028. Konig is mistaken when he places the Death of Comenius in the Year 1670.

- (21) Id. ibid. Day ready to rise (21). VI. He was told, that he and such other millenary Fanatics have no other aim than to stir up the People, and that he left no Stone unturned to induce Cromwell to cause some Insurrections in Bohemia. Ne obiciam Comenio quæ ipse quondam per tertium molitus est apud Cromwellum ad res turbandas in Bohemia (22). VII. Lastly, Maresius charged him with chusing rather to expose the Authority of the Scriptures, than to own himself in the wrong. He had formerly concluded (23), that since the Event did not answer to the Prophecies of Pelegenbauerus, they did not come from God; but as for those of his three Seers (24), he defended them with might and main, though the Event had contradicted them; and he compared them with those of the Old Testament. 'Nunc verò suas pugnat etiam ab eventu fuerint destitutæ, imò eas im-
'pie, profanè & sacrilegè cum prophetiis V. T. audit conferre (25).'

- (22) Id. ibid. pag. 66. [H] He owned at last the Vanity of his Labours. See the Book that he published at Amsterdam, intitled, Unius necessarii, in the Year 1668, and the Praises that Spizelius bestowed upon him (26) for that Confession, and for his Resolution to mind nothing for the future, but the great Affair of his Salvation.

- (23) In Epistola ad Stolcium, anno 1640.
(24) Cotterus, Poniatovius, Drabicius.
(25) Maresius, ibid. pag. 66.
(26) In Infelice Literato, pag. 1024, & seq.
[I] If he had lived but a little longer, he would have been a Witness of the Fulfillment of his Promises concerning the Millenium. He said that the Reign of a thousand Years was to begin in the Year 1672, or in the Year 1673 (27). So that there is scarce any Body but believes he died very seasonably, since he avoided the confusion of seeing the vanity of his Prophecies. I am persuaded that he did not gain much by it. He was so used to such Disappointments, and minded so little what People would say of it, that he could have born this last Check without any trouble. Those Gentlemen are of an admirable Constitution: nothing puts them out of Countenance; they appear as boldly in Company after the Expiration of the time as before; they neither fear Raileries, nor the most serious Complaints; they are always ready to begin again: in a Word, they are Proof against the justest Mortifications. We must not lay altogether the Fault of it on the particular turn of their Wit, and of their Inclination; the Public is more to be blamed for it than they are, because of it's prodigious Indulgence. It is a common Saying, That God forgives every thing, and that Men forgive nothing: but that Maxim is false, with respect to the Commentators on the Revelation: it is very probable that God has not the same Indulgence, as the Public, for the Boldness wherewith they handle his Oracles, and expose them to the Contempt of Infidels. A learned Divine observes, that Comenius lost nothing of his Credit, though he had deceived the People a hundred times by his Visions: he always passed for a great Prophet; so true it is that Men are pleased to be deceived in some things (28) I have said already, that Comenius continued to spread the Predictions of Drabicius as divine Prophecies, tho' the Event had declared against them. Here is an instance of it. He was the Coadjutor of Drabicius, and was to be one of those, who in the Presence of that Prophet should put the Crown of Hungary on Prince Ragotski's Head at Presburg (29), after Drabicius had been in Transylvania to proclaim there that Prince King of Hungary, and to anoint him before all the People, after the Sermon that he was to preach on this Text, I HAVE ANOINTED MY KING UPON ZION THE HILL OF MY HOLINESS.

- (27) Maresius, Antizhet, pag. 8.
(28) Interea toties ineptiis ejus decepti cum pro magno Propheta habere persequuntur, nec quicquam inde detrimenti autoritas ejus sentit. Sic mundus vult decipi. Arnoldus in the Appendix to the Discursus Theologicus, pag. ult.
(29) Scribe Adjuncto (Comenio) illum fure unum de illis qui regio capiti coronam imponente quoque præsentente. Revel. 155, ver. 3, 4. apud Arnoldum Discursus Theol. contra Comenium, pag. 37.

exercitu quem ad ipsum collegi ungas & proclames Regem terræ hujus. Sed præmittas concionem super verba Psalmi secundi, Ego unxi Regem meum, &c. quam concionem statim meditare, peractaque illa effundes oleum unctionis olei Balsamini (quod reperies in aula principis) in conspectu totius populi super caput principis (30). — Make the best of your Way to the Prince, to anoint and proclaim him King of this Country, before the whole Army, which I have gathered to him. But first preach a Sermon on these Words of the second Psalm, I have anointed my King, &c. To the composing of which set yourself immediately; after the delivery of which, pour the anointing Oil of Balm (which you will find in the Prince's Court) on the Prince's Head, in the sight of all the People. He lived long enough to be convinced that this could not happen.

[K] Some Persons have been surpris'd that he lived so long. It is difficult to conceive, that a Man of Reputation can long out-live the Shame of having been a Promoter of Prophecies, which the Event had confounded in such a manner, that they seemed expressly designed to contradict them. Comenius found himself liable to other Mortifications, that were not less grievous than that.

They reproached him with having done a great Prejudice to his exiled Brethren (31). Most of them had saved a great deal of Money, and instead of preserving it by good Husbandry, they spent it prodigally in a little time, because Comenius assured them that they should quickly return home; and because they thought, by virtue of his Promises, that they needed not be sparing, and that it was better for them to free themselves from every thing that might incur them in their Journey. This was the Cause that, notwithstanding all the great Hopes wherewith they fed themselves, they soon fell into Beggary. Besides, they reproached him with (32) having been the Cause of the plundering and burning of Lefna (33), a Town of Poland, where they had found a Retreat, and as it were their Pella: with being, I say, the Cause of it, by reason of the Panegyric that he unseasonably made upon Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden, at the time of the Invasion of Poland. He prophetically declared him the approaching Destroyer of Popery, whereby he rendered the Protestants of Poland extremely odious to the Catholics of that Kingdom; and he seemed not to be undeceived, when the King of Sweden soon after turned his Arms against Denmark. Comenius made a second Panegyric upon him (34), wherein he congratulated him no less for the new Invasion, than he had done for the foregoing: It was a great Illusion to think, that That Prince had a Design against the Church of Rome. The Elector of Brandenburg writ to Richard Cromwell, that the Swedes had ruined the Protestant Religion in Poland (35), and no Prince contributed so much to dispossess Charles Gustavus of the Conquests that he had made, as the Protestants. There was a time when the Faith of Comenius did stagger; for though it has been said (36), that the Faithful of Lefna, relying upon his Promise, expected a sudden Deliverance, which made them neglect to withdraw themselves with their Effects into a place of Security; he himself informs us, that he designed in due time to shelter himself from the Storm; but that not being able to obtain his Leave from his Church, and being unwilling to retire without their Consent, which would have been an ill Example, as they told him, he was surpris'd with the rest by the Polish Army. Equidem subducere me

(30) Revel. 304 v. 4, apud Arnold. ibid.

(31) See Arnoldus, Discursus Theolog. contra Comenium.

(32) Ibid. & pag. 83.

(33) It was burnt about the end of April, 1656.

(34) Arnoldus, Discursus Theol. pag. 69.

(35) That Letter contains some very remarkable things. It is dated the 28th of Decemb. 1658, and it to be found in the Præstantium & eruditiorum virorum Epistolæ, pag. 897, Edit. 1684.

(36) Arnoldus, pag. 87.

and that the Vexation of having succeeded so ill in his Predictions did not shorten his Days. Mrs Bourignon and he esteemed each other cordially and spiritually [L]. I ought not to forget that he published something against the Socinians [M]. It is said, that the Author of a Book, intituled JANUA COELORUM RESERATA, made choice of that Title, because there is none to which the Ear is more used than to that of Janua Linguarum Referata of Comenius [N]. The Articles of DRABICIUS and KOTTERUS contain several things that may pass for a Supplement to this.

me mature volui metu five talis alicujus tragici exitus, five diuturnioris belli - - - fed impetrare à meis dimissionem non potui; cum scandalo autem deferere gregem (malo prorsus exemplo, ut dicitur) statim nolui (37). He lost his House, his Goods, his Library, and several Manuscripts, in the writing of which he had spent about forty Years. Only part of the Apocalyptic Treatises, and some others (38), escaped the Flames; they had time enough to throw them into a Hole, and to cover them with Earth, and they were found again ten Days after the Fire (39).

[L] Mrs Bourignon and he esteemed each other cordially and spiritually.] He broke with Mr Serarius, because he had acted with so much Passion and Injustice against her. He continued to esteem her all the rest of his Life, and desired her on his Death-bed to come and give him the last Visit, saying to those who spoke to him of her, O the holy Maid! Where is she then? Let me have the Happiness to see her once more before I die. All the Knowledge and Learning that I have had, are only the Productions of Reason, and the human Mind, and the Effects of human Study; but she has a Wisdom, and a Light that proceed immediately from God alone, by the HOLY GHOST. After she had been to see him, according to his Request, he said, with great Transports of Joy, to those that came to see him, I have seen an Angel of God: God has sent me his Angel this Day. He died some time after in the Grace of God, as Mrs Bourignon did not question; having often said, that she had never seen a learned Man better and more humble than he (40).

[M] He published something against the Socinians.] One of that Sect wrote a Book, intituled, Irenicum Irenicorum, seu reconciliatoris Christianorum bodiernorum norma triplex, sana omnium hominum ratio, Scriptura sacra, & traditiones, and dedicated it to the Pope. Neither the Author's Name, nor the Time or Place of the Impression, appear in it; but we know that a Physician, born at Danzig, whose Name was Daniel Zwickerus, composed it, and had it printed at Amsterdam, in the Year 1658 (41). Comenius refuted him in a Book intituled, De Irenico Irenicorum, hoc est conditionibus pacis à Socini secta reliquo Christiano orbe oblatis, ad omnes Christianos facta admonitio: It was printed at Amsterdam in 1660, and refuted soon after; for Zwickerus published in the same Town, in 1661, his Irenicasmix perpetuo convicius & confutatus, seu nova confirmatio infallibilitatis Irenici Irenicorum per ostensam inutilitatem criminosa COMENIANÆ refutationis. It was not long before Comenius's Reply came out; and it was soon followed by a Piece of Zwickerus, intituled, Irenicasmix posterior iterato viciis & confutatus imo obmutescens, seu novum & memorabile exemplum infelicitissimæ pugnae Dn. Job. Amos Comenii, contra Irenici Irenicorum Autorem. Comenius entered the Lists once again: his Adversary did the same; for he published Irenicasmix pars specialis, seu finalis confutatio Comenii, Hoornbeekii, & aliorum (42). Note, by the by, that Dr Bull has refuted several Passages of the Irenicum Irenicorum, and that he has been blamed for not having seen the other Books of the same Author; for want of which, he condemns Daniel Zwickerus for several things, whereof he would have found him innocent, if he had consulted the Irenicasmix perpetuo convicius, &c. This I find in a pseudonymous Piece, printed at London, in the Year 1697, and intituled, Fides primorum Christianorum ex Barnaba, Hermas, & Clemente Romano, demonstrata, defensionis Fidei Nicenæ D. Georgii Bulli opposita (43).

[N] The Author of a Book, intituled, Janua Coelorum referata, made choice of that Title, because of that of the Janua Linguarum referata of Comenius.] That Book being little known, it is fit to say something of it here, that all my Readers may learn in general what it is, without looking for other Books, or stirring from their Place.

It is a Book (44), the Author whereof was pleased to call himself Carus Larebonius. He attacks Mr Jurieu's System of the Church, in the Style of a peripatetic Philosopher, and quite overturns it, since he clearly shews, that, according to that Minister's Hypothesis, a Man may be saved in all Religions. This was an unlucky thing for Mr Jurieu; for it was stripping him of the best Feather in his Plume, since the best Book that he writ, and which was most esteemed, came to nothing by that means. Among so many Writings of Mr Jurieu, Mr Nicolle found none but this that deserved to be answered. He divided the rest into two Classes, and he placed in the first the Books, wherein he pretends, that Mr Jurieu says nothing new; and in the second those, wherein he pretends, that Mr Jurieu says some new things (45). He will have it, that those of the first Class are only meer Collections and Dispositions of what had been already said by the Writers of the Party; and that those of the second contain only heaps of Calumnies against all sorts of People, or empty Visions and Imaginations, or passionate Declarations. Now he thought that the Makers of Collections ought to be left unanswered, and to be given up to the Judgment of the Public, who soon bring them to Reason by the Dispute they conceive against such Books; and that Silence and Contempt are the Punishment that best suits the Vanity and Passion of those who write Books of the second Class. He thought particularly concerning Mr Jurieu's Accomplishment of Prophecies, that he no more would advise a Man to undertake the Refutation of it, than to apply himself seriously to refute the Centuries of Nostradamus (46); but as for the System of the Church, which, he says (47), was not looked upon as a despicable Work, he found, after having well thought of it, that he ought to refute it. I only relate these things historically.

It must not be thought strange that Mr Jurieu should have expressed, in very angry words (48), the Trouble he was in to see his darling Book thoroughly confuted; and none but those, who are ignorant of that sort of fatherly Tenderness, can take it ill that he should endeavour to allay his Grief by inveighing against both the Book written against him (49), and the Person to whom he imputes it.

- - - - - folatia lucus

Exigua ingentis, misero sed debita patri (50).

- - - - - a weak Relief,

And far inferior to a Father's Grief.

Consult a little Book printed at Amsterdam in the Year 1692, and intituled, Nouvel Avis au petit Auteur des petits Livrets; — New Advice to the little Author of the little Books. You will find (51) a Letter in it full of curious Reflexions, which may serve as an Apology for Mr Jurieu's Anger, and which will prevent your wondering that neither he nor his Friends have been able to answer the Janua Coelorum referata. Whoever criticizes Larebonius under pretence that several of his Words and Phrases are not taken out of Classical Authors, is over nice, and even ridiculous. His Work is of the Nature of those, whose Imperfection consists only in wrong Arguments or Fallacies; and none can deny him the Privilege, which all the Authors of common Places of Divinity and public Theſes enjoy, which is, not to trouble themselves whether their Latin is flat or not.

(44) Printed at Amsterdam, 1692, in 4^{to}.

(45) Nicolle, Preface to his Book concerning the Unity of the Church, pag. 22.

(46) Ibid. pag. 27.

(47) Ib. pag. 1.

(48) See his second Apology.

(49) He finds fault even with the Latin Style of it, and insinuates, that such a Negligence of Style is a Miracle of the Divine Justice (for he has always Miracles at hand), and does not take notice that Larebonius says, in the beginning and at the end of his Book, that he had pitched upon the Style of the Schoolmen.

Iniquum est, said Mr Amyraut upon such an Occasion, id est in aliquo reprehendere in quo data opera neglexit diligenter elaborare. - - - It is unjust to object the want of Accuracy, where an Author on purpose declines being elaborate. Mr Jurieu has been so prudent as to judge of the Latinity only by Proxy; for he was not ignorant that his Incompetence in that matter was known even before he wrote against Mr Scalutus. (See Mr Simon, Rep. à la Def. des Sect. pag. 191.) His Proxy, or Substitute, is very likely a mean Scholar, since he finds Larebonius's Arguments obscure and intricate, though nothing can be clearer than his Book.

(50) Virgil. Æncid. lib. XI, ver. 62.

(51) Pag. 58, & seq.

COMMANDINUS

COMMANDINUS (FREDERIC) born at Urbino in Italy, of a Noble Family, was one of the learned Men of the XVIth Century. His great Knowledge of the Mathematics was attended with a great Skill in the Greek Tongue, which enabled him to translate the Greek Mathematicians into Latin. He published and translated many of them, which never had been translated before. Francis Maria, Duke of Urbino, who understood those Sciences very well, was a most affectionate Patron to him for that very reason. Commandinus died in 1575, being Sixty six Years of Age, and was buried in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors; and Anthony Toroneus made his Funeral Oration (a). I shall give a Catalogue of the Books, which Commandinus translated and commented upon [A]. He is very much praised by Blancanus (b), and others, and deserves it. It is no small Glory to him, to have had Bernardin Baldus and Guy Ubaldus among his Disciples; for they were excellent Authors, and indebted to him for their great Improvements. I shall make a short Observation upon his Translation of Euclid [B].

(a) Ex Thuan. lib. LXI, pag. 139.

(b) Chronol. Mathem. p. 61.

[A] I shall give a Catalogue of the Books he translated and commented on.] Archimedis circuli dimensio, de lineis spiralibus, quadratura parabolæ, de conoidibus & spheroidibus, de arenæ numero, Venice, for Paul Manutius, 1558, in fol. Ejusdem Archimedis de iis quæ videntur in aqua, Bologna, 1565, in 4to. Apolonii Pergæi Conicorum libri quatuor una cum Pappi Alexandrini lemmatibus, & commentariis Euticii Ascalonitæ, &c. Bologna, 1566, in folio (1). Ptolemæi planisphærium, Venice, 1558, in 4to. Ejusdem de Analemmate liber, Rome, 1562, in 4to. Elementa Euclidis, at Pefaro, 1572, in fol. Aristarchus de magnitudinibus ac distantis solis & lunæ, at Pefaro, 1572, in 4to (2). Hero de spiritalibus (3), at Urbino, 1575, in 4to. Machometes Bagdedinus de superficierum divisionibus, at Pefaro, 1570, in fol. Pappi Alexandrini Collectiones Mathematicæ, at Pefaro, 1588, in fol. &c. This last Work would not have been printed so soon after the Death of the Author, if the Duke of Urbino had not vigorously concerned himself in it: had it not been for that, the Law-Suit which the two Daughters of Commandinus commenced against each other, would have occasioned a long delay, as his Son-in-law Valerius Spaciolus acknowledges (4). He published also some Books of his own compiling, a Treatise De centro gravitatis solidorum, Bologna, 1565, fol. Horologiorum descriptio, Rome, 1562, &c (5).

[B] I shall make a short Observation upon his Translation of Euclid.] Mr Teiffier observes, that Commandinus translated the Works of Euclid into Italian; and he cites Vossius de Mathem. pag. 68. (6). But it is certain, that Vossius does not say that it was in Italian. I find no body that says it was. Doubtless it is the Fault of Teiffier's Printer, that instead of Heronis Alexandrini Spirituum liber, we read in pag. 470, which I have quoted, Heronis Alexandrini Spirituum liber. In Blancanus (7), they have put Neronis instead of Heronis. Thus the Printers multiply Writers. Some Compilers, to shew that they out-do those that went before them, will perhaps give out, as a rare Discovery, that there was anciently an able Mathematician, whose Name was Nero, of whom we have still some Works.

(4) Vossius, ibid. pag. 59.

(5) Oxford Catalogue.

(6) Elog. tirez de Mr de Thou, Tom. I. pag. 470.

(7) Chronol. Mathemat. pag. 61.

(1) Ex Ant. Verderio, Supplem. Epitom. Geomet.

(2) See the Catalogue of the Public Library of Oxford.

(3) See Vossius de Mathem. pag. 290.

CONCINI (CONCINO) known by the Name of MARSHAL D'ANCRES, abused the Goodness of the Queen-Mother, Mary de Medicis, so excessively, that, in order to stop his Ambition, it was thought fit to make away with him, without any Trial [A]. It would have been too dangerous a thing to undertake it in due form; which is alone sufficient to shew that he was a wicked man [B]. He was born at Florence, where his Father, from a meer Notary, came to be Secretary of State. He came into France with Mary de Medicis, the Wife of Henry IV; and at first he was only Gentleman in Ordinary to that Princess, but he afterwards became her Master of the Horse, and raised himself prodigiously by the Credit that one of the Queen's Maids, whom he married, had with her Majesty (a). He bought the Marquisate of Ancre (b), a little after the Death of Henry IV. He was Governor of Amiens, Peronne, Roie, and Mondidier: He became first Gentleman of the King's Bedchamber, and afterwards Marshal of France (c). He endeavoured to have the Government of Picardy; but the Duke of Longueville, having the Choice of that Government, and of that of Normandy, chose the first, and by that means the Marshal d'Ancre was excluded from his Pretensions, and even forced to yield the Government of Amiens to that Duke; for that Resignation was stipulated by the Treaty of Loudon, if the Duke of Longueville should chuse the Government of Picardy. The Marshal d'Ancre had at the same time the Government of Normandy bestowed upon him. He caused Quillebeuf to be fortified in that Province, notwithstanding the Parliament had forbid it: He got the particular Government of Pont de l'Arche, and endeavoured to have also that of Havre de Grace (d). In short, there was no longer reason to doubt that he designed to have all things at his

(a) Leonora GALLIGAI. See her Article.

(b) In Picardy.

(c) Baptiste le Grain, Decade de Louis le Juste, B. 4. towards the end.

(d) Id. lib. IX.

[A] It was thought proper to make away with him, without any Trial.] I am not ignorant that le Grain, and some other Historians say, that the King ordered the Sieur de Vitri to apprehend the Marshal, with an Intention to have him tried in his Parliament of Paris (1); but I find the particular Relation of the Death of the Marshal d'Ancre more credible (2). It imports, that the King, finding too great a Danger in the Project of the Trial, took another Resolution, which was, to command Vitri to cause the Marshal to be killed.

[B] Which alone shews, that he was a wicked Man.] For a Subject cannot, without a Crime, form the Design of making his Master fear him; and if he compasses that Design, he must have made use of a thousand unjust ways; he must have turned those out of their Places that did not please him, and advanced others upon whom he could depend: that is, he must have degraded good Men, to raise those, who sacrifice every thing to Fortune. How many Extortions must one make, to heap up as much Money as is necessary to have Spies and Creatures every where? Our Marshal never went abroad without having two hundred Gentlemen about him, besides the Men to whom he gave Wages, whom he called his thousand Liores Paltrons (3). We shall speak hereafter (4) of the Slavery wherein he kept the King.

(3) Le Grain, ubi supra.

(4) In Rem. [D].

[C] The

6 X

(1) Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, B. 10, pag. m. 387.

(2) It is printed together with the History of the Favourites, collected by Peter du Paul.

VOL. II.

his Disposal; for he removed the wisest Heads from the King's Council, and filled their Places with his own Creatures. He disposed of the Finances, he distributed the Offices, he got Friends every where, both in the Armies and in the Towns, and terrified those, who opposed his Faction, by Examples of a severe Revenge. There was no other Remedy for all those great Disorders, than that of killing him. That Commission, given to Vitri, one of the Captains of the Life-Guards, was executed on the Drawbridge of the Louvre on the Twenty fourth of April 1617, where several Pistols were fired at That Marshal. The next day, the Mob, having taken the Body out of the Grave, in the Church of St German de l'Auxerrois, dragged it up and down the Streets, and discharged their Anger all manner of ways [C]. The Parliament proceeded against the Memory of the deceased, and declared him convicted of High-Treason, both divine and humane, condemned his Wife to be beheaded, and declared their Son Ignoble, and incapable of holding any Office in the Kingdom (e). Strange things were discovered in their Process concerning their Judaism and Sorcery. I speak of it elsewhere (f). This Man's Insolence is a sad Example of that Fatality, which attends the French Monarchy more than any other Country in the World; which is, that the Queens there preserve almost always the foreign Heart which they bring with them, and are commonly the Instrument that God makes use of to humble and chastise the Nation. Here are already two Queens, descended from the House of Medicis (g), who did almost overthrow That Monarchy in favour of the Spaniards. That Part of the French History is shameful for the French Name. Why did they suffer that the King should be several Years a Slave to a Florentine [D]? Was it not a base thing to bend the Knee, as they did, before that Idol, whilst they inwardly detested it [E]? There

(e) Ibid. lib. X.

(f) In the Article GALLIGAI, Rem. [D] and [E].

(g) Catherine the Mother of Charles IX, and of Henry III, and Mary the Mother of Lewis XIII.

(5) He was a Gentleman of Normandy, called Hortevan, who was beheaded at Paris the 21st of March 1617. Le Grain, ubi supra, lib. IX. sub. fin.

(6) Le Grain, ubi supra, lib. X, pag. 399, 400.

(7) Relation, pag. 53.

(8) Ib. pag. 56.

(9) Ib. pag. 57.

(10) Le Grain, ubi supra, pag. 392.

[C] The Mob - - - discharged their Anger all manner of ways. The Footman of a Gentleman, who had been lately put to death (5), to gratify the Marshal, begun the Tumult in the Church of St German de l'Auxerrois. They cried out, that the Body of that Excommunicated Jew ought to be taken out of his Grave, and thrown on a Dunghil. They went about it immediately, with so much Fury, that, if any one had represented to them that they ought to have some Respect for the Holiness of the Place, they would have buried him alive in the Marshal's Grave. When they had opened the Coffin, they dragged the Body to the end of the Pont-neuf, and hanged it by the Heels on one of the Gallows, that the deceased had caused to be set up for those that should speak ill of him. They cut off his Nose, his Ears, and his Privy-parts; a little after they took him down again, they dragged him to the Grève, and to the other Places, and then they dismembered him, and cut him into a thousand Pieces; every one would have some part of him; his Ears were sold very dear; his Entrails were thrown into the River; part of the Body was burnt before the Statue of Henry IV, on the Pont-neuf, and some roasted part of his Flesh with that Fire, and made their Dogs eat it (6). The Author of the Relation, printed with the History of the Favourites, relates some things that are still more surprising. The Great Provost, appearing with his Archers, to put a stop to the beginning of the Tumult in the Church of St German de l'Auxerrois, was threatened to be buried alive, if he advanced farther (7). That Author adds, that a Man, in a scarlet Dress, was so enraged, that, having thrust his Hand into the dead Body, he took it out again all bloody, and licked the Blood, and swallowed also some little Pieces that he had tore from the Body; that another pulled his Heart out, and broiled it on some Coals, and eat it publicly with Vinegar (8). That Author relates the Particulars of the Conduct of the Mob, according to the several Stations where the Body was hanged, dismembered, and burnt; he says, that on the next Day the Ashes were sold for fifteen Pence an Ounce (9). It is certain, that a Herd of mad Bulls will as well hearken to Reason, and are less to be feared than a mutinous Mob.

[D] Why did they suffer that the King should be several Years a Slave to a Florentine? These are not Slanders invented either by the Marshal d'Ancre's Enemies, or by those of Lewis XIII, since that Prince owns his Servitude himself, in the Letters that he writ to the Governours of the Provinces, the Day that the Marshal was killed. 'I make no doubt, says he (10), that in the whole course of Affairs, ever since the Death of the late King,

' my Lord and Father, (whom God absolve) you have easily observed how the Marshal d'Ancre, and his Wife, abusing my Youth, and the Power they acquired by degrees over the Mind of the Queen, my Lady, and Mother, have projected to usurp all the Authority, to dispose absolutely of the Affairs of my State, and debar me from the Knowledge of them: a Design, which they have carried so far, that there was nothing left to me hitherto but the Name of King, and that it would have been a capital Crime for any of my Officers and Subjects to see me in private, and to entertain me with any serious Discourse. Which God of his infinite Goodness having made me sensible of, and of the imminent Danger that my Person and State would be exposed to by such exorbitant Ambition, if I had given any sign of my Resentment, and of the extreme Desire I had to give the necessary Orders against it: I have been forced to dissemble, and to hide my good Intentions by my outward Actions, waiting till it should please the same Divine Goodness to prepare the way, and afford me an opportunity to remedy it.' The Author of the Relation says, that, when the King heard that the Marshal was dead, he looked out at the Window, and said, I thank you, I thank you, now I am a King (11). He went afterwards to other Windows, and cried out, To Arms, To Arms, my Friends; and said, God be thanked, now I am a King (12). The Lieutenants, Ensigns, and the Exempt of the Guards, which he sent into the Streets of Paris to prevent any Disorder, cried out all over the City, Long live the King, the King is King (13). The Bishop of Luçon, who was afterwards Cardinal Richelieu, had been one of the Marshal's Favourites, and performed at that time the Functions of first Secretary of State. He came into the King's Chamber, some time after the Execution was done; Sir, said the King to him, God be thanked, this Day we are freed from your Tyranny (14). He did not know at that time that his Deliverance would not continue long, and that he spoke to a Man, who was destined to leave him only the Title of Sovereign. However it be, it is certain, that the Marshal had usurped a great Power over the King's Person. He took from him the Liberty of going to the fine Houses that are about Paris, and reduced his Diversion of hunting to his walking only in the Tuilleries (15). The Protection of a Queen-Regent inspires a proud Man with too much Boldness.

[E] To bend the Knee — before that Idol, whilst they inwardly detested it. The Marshal said one Day, that 'the People of France are not what they are thought to be; for although they speak very ill of me, yet as soon as I come into any part of (11) He spoke those Words to the Men that attended Paris.

(12) Relat. pag. 28.

(13) Ib. pag. 29.

(14) Le Grain, pag. 391.

(15) Relat. pag. 4, & 5.

There are no finer Verses of Malberbe than those which he made on the Fall of that Idol. He pretends that it justified Providence, which was, if one may say so, arraigned, and in reatu, during that Marshal's Prosperity [F]. Thus the Poets give themselves the Liberty to touch upon great Mysteries under Metaphors and bold Figures. It is surprizing that the Marshal d'Etrec should have extenuated the Faults of Marshal d'Ancre so much as he has done [G]. The Italian Author, who published at Lyons an History of Lewis XIII, in the Year 1691, is not guilty of that Excess [H]. Mr de Beauvais-Nangis (b), who knew the Court of Lewis XIII very well, is far from clearing our Concini, and rather confirms the common Reports.

(b) See his History of the French Favourite, pag. 100, & seq.

(16) Ib. pag. 43. 'the Provinces, all the Officers make Speeches to me as to the King (16).' Such a base Flattery did not only deserve to be mentioned, but also to be described with more Indignation than there is in the following Passage. 'We must not omit (for Truth belongs to History) that many Princes and Lords of the Court, many Deputies of the States-General, many of the chief Magistrates, a great part of the Nobility, a great number of the Officers and Citizens of Towns, did not only bear, but were not ashamed to advance the Grandeur of that Tyrant with all their Might, in order to obtain his Favour; and in the mean time they neglected the Love and Fidelity, which God commands us to shew to our King and Country, and the ancient Generosity, being banished from the Hearts of the French, was intirely employed to support the foreign Usurper (17).'

(17) Le Grain, pag. 385.

[F] Providence — was arraigned, and in reatu, during that Marshal's Prosperity.] Malberbe introduces the God of the Seine cursing the Marshal, and foretelling him his approaching Ruin.

Tes jours sont à la fin, ta chute se prépare,
Regarde moi pour la dernière fois.
C'est assez que cinq ans ton audace effrontée,
Sur des ailes de cire aux étoiles montée,
Princes & Rois ait osé défier;
La fortune t'appelle au rang de ses victimes,
Et le ciel accusé de supporter tes crimes,
Est résolu de se justifier.

(18) In his Sonnet Chretien, pag. m. 239. Balzac made some Reflexions on that Piece of Malberbe (18). Perhaps I shall touch upon them in the Article of RUFINUS (19), on occasion of the words of Claudian, who says, that the Prosperity of Rufinus was a Trial between God and Man, which God gained only by the Ruin of Rufinus.

(19) Rem. [C].

[G] It is surprizing that the Marshal d'Etrec should have extenuated the Faults of the Marshal d'Ancre so much as he has done.] Read the Memoirs of the Regency of Mary de Medicis, printed in the Year 1666, and you will not find there any of the Marshal d'Ancre's Actions, that deserve that a Page should be whipt for them; and you will see, in the Conclusion, a Character of him more like a Panegyric than an Apology. Against my Custom, I shall not here refer my Readers to Moreri, but set down the same Words he has cited. 'When I consider (the Author of the Memoirs speaks) (20) the Circumstances of the Death of Marshal d'Ancre, I can only attribute it to his ill Fate, having been advised by a Man whose Inclinations were very mild; and as he himself was naturally good natured, and had disoblged but few Persons, it must needs be his Star, or the State of Affairs, that raised so many People against him. He was agreeable in Person, skillful on Horseback, and in all other Exercises; he loved Pleasures, and chiefly Gaming; his Conversation was sweet and easy; he had high and ambitious Thoughts, but he hid them carefully; he never came nor affected to come into the Council; nay the King has often been heard to say, that he did not mean he should be killed.' I should act impudently, should I prefer the Testimony of this Author before that of so many Writers, who have spoke ill of Concino Concini. Not but that I think it very possible, that, with indifferent Faults, a

(20) Pag. 244, 245.

Man, who has a great Imprudence, and many Enemies, may become the Aversion of the People, and pass for a very wicked Man. A cunning, malicious, and powerful Enemy, will make the Mob believe many Lies. Nay, I believe that many things have been strained concerning that unfortunate Florentine, and that no fewer Obstacles must be overcome to discover the Properties of the Loadstone, than to know exactly, and with the nicest Distinction, the Truth of Concini's Affairs: And on this occasion I shall observe, that, in many Cases, Historical Truths are not less impenetrable than Physical ones.

[H] The Italian Author — is not guilty of that excess.] I mean Count Alexander Roncoveri (21). He says, that Concini shewed some very good Qualities when he began to be in favour; but he adds, that afterwards they were stifled by the bad ones, and appeared no more, and could do no Service. 'Asferiscono le memorie di quel tempo, che ne' principii della sua potenza era uomo di buona legge, di grata compagnia, di confacevole humore, disinteressato, ma profondamente ambizioso, e violento; difetti, che nel progresso confondendosi con le prime buone qualità in ultimo le soffocarono di tal maniera, che quelle non poterono apparire, e meno giovargli (22).' Had he but mentioned the Particulars of that Marshal's great Estate, it would have been sufficient to know that he was a wicked Man; he would have given him a satirical Stroke. I take Juvenal to witness.

(21) He is a Native of Placentia.

(22) Aless. Roncoveri, Storia del regno di Luigi XIII, lib. V, pag. 205.

Patricios omnes opibus cum provocet unus,
Quo tondente gravis juveni mihi barba sonabat,
Cum pars Nilivæ plebis, cum verna Canopi
Crispinus Tyrias humero revocante lacernas,
Ventilet æstivum digitis sudantibus aurum,
Nec sufferre queat majoris pondera gemmæ:
Difficile est satyram non scribere — — —
— — — — — facro nec cedat honori
Nuper in hanc urbem pedibus qui venerat albis.

(23) Juv. Sat. I. ver. 24, & 110.

When all our Lords are by his Wealth outery'd,
Whose Razor on my callow Beard was try'd;
When I behold the Spawn of conquer'd Nile,
Crispinus, both in Birth and Manners vile,
Pacing in Pomp with Cloak of Tyrian Dye,
Chang'd oft a Day for needful Luxury;
And finding oft Occasion to be fann'd,
Ambitious to produce his Lady Hand.
Charg'd with light Summer Rings his Fingers sweat,
Unable to support a Gem of Weight.
Such fulsome Objects meeting every where,
'Tis hard to write, but harder to forbear.

And he who lately barefoot trod the Streets,
To sacred Honours won't submit.

Oltro un miglione di lire, che valevano i suoi stabili in Francia, ne haveva un' altro di contanti in cassa, seicento mila feudi sopra Paideau, quattrocento mila fra Roma, è Fiorenza, è non ostante il facheggio della sua Casa, mobili, gioie, argenti, e cariche per due miglioni senza quella di Luo-gotenente del Re nella Normandia, di primo Gentiluomo della Camera del Re, e d'Intendente della Casa della Regina (24).'

(24) Aless. Roncoveri, ubi supra, pag. 199, 200.

CONDREN (CHARLES DE) Superior-General of the Fathers of the Oratory, in the XVIIth Century. I shall add but one thing to what Moreri has said of him, him, viz. That they have collected as many of his Writings together as they could; and that this Collection contains two Parts, the last of which was reprinted by it self at Brussels, by Francis Foppens, in 12mo, in the Year 1659. These are pious Letters, and will be very acceptable to the Mystics.

CONECTE (THOMAS) a Monk of the Order of the Carmelites, born in Bretagne, was burnt at Rome for an Heretic, in the Year 1434 (a), after he had been followed by the People as the greatest Preacher of his Time. Having been much admired in his own Country, he left the Convent of Rennes, and went into Flanders. He acquired such a Reputation there by his Preaching, that one cannot sufficiently express the Honour that was done him in all the Places that he went through [A]; nor the Concourse of People that came to his Sermons [B]. He declaimed vehemently against the Vices of the Clergy, and against the Luxury of Women, especially against their Head-Dresses, which were of such a prodigious Height [C], that the highest Top-knots now are but Dwarfs to them. He reformed that Excess, and obliged the Ladies to dress themselves modestly; but it was not so much by the Force of the Reasons wherewith he represented the Evangelical Duties to them, as by exhorting the Boys to insult the Women that would not reform themselves [D]: and therefore, as soon as he left the Country, they put on their Head-dresses again, with higher Toppings [E], as it were to make themselves amends

(a) Argentré, Hist. de Bretagne B. 10, cap. 42. Others, as Spondanus, place his Death in 1431.

[A] One cannot sufficiently express the Honour — that was done him in all the Places that he went through.] When it was known that he was to come to any place, 'The Nobles and all sorts of People' went to meet him, and accompanied him bare-headed, holding the Bridle of his Mule as far as his Lodgings; and happy was he that could lodge him (1). Paradin will tell us more of it: 'Brother Thomas Conette had acquired so great a Reputation of Holiness, that every body ran after him, so that one half of them could scarce see him. When he travelled, he was mounted on a little Mule: many other Monks of his Order, and many Priests, followed him on foot, as his Disciples, and Secular Priests in great Number. The Clergy, the Nobility, and the Burghers, met him out of the Cities and Boroughs, honouring and reverencing him as much as if he had been an Apostle of JESUS CHRIST: insomuch that, where-ever he came, he went always attended with a great Multitude of People, who went out a great way to meet him, as if he was descended from Heaven. And when he came into any Town, commonly the most noble, and the most considerable, Person, holding the Bridle of his Mule on foot, conducted him with the whole Multitude to his Lodging, which was generally got ready for him in the best House. And his Disciples were also lodged in the other best Houses, as it is practised in the Retinue of Princes: and every body took it as a great Honour to lodge him, or any of his Attendants (2).'

(1) Argentré Hist. de Bretagne liv. X, cap. 42.

(2) Paradin, Annales de Bourgogne liv. III. ad ann. 1428, p. m. 700.

(3) Paradin says, that about twenty thousand People went frequently to hear him preach.

(4) Argentré, ubi supra.

(5) Paradin Annales de Bourgogne, pag. 700. Argentré Hist. de Bretagne, lib. X, cap. 42, says, that he preached before he said Majé.

(6) Argentré, ibid.

(7) Argentré, ibid.

(8) We are now returned to the Hennins under another Name, I mean, under that of Top-knots. I have not yet seen the Treatise that was published at Paris in 1694, concerning the Extravagancy of Head-dresses; but I do not question that this Reflection was made in it.

[D] He reformed that Excess — by exhorting the Boys to insult the Women that would not reform themselves.] I shall explain this by the words of Paradin: 'But what was remarkable in his Sermons, says Paradin (9), was, his way of crying down the Head-dresses of Women; for at that time every body was very extravagant in Cloaths, and the Women wore very strange Ornaments on their Heads. They were about an Ell long, and as sharp as Steeples, with long Crapes, set off with rich Fringes, hanging down behind their Backs, like Standards. This Preacher was so angry with those Head-dresses, that he used to inveigh most bitterly against them, abusing the Ladies at a strange rate for wearing those Hennins, as he called them. And to make them more odious to the People, he gave some small Presents to little Children, where-ever he preached, to cry out against and hoot at those Hennins. Those little Children were so well taught, that when ever any Woman came to hear the Sermons of Brother Thomas, they cried out against their Hennins, as loud as ever they could, till they pulled them off, or went away; and then they would run after and hoot at them: nay, some would throw Stones at them, which occasioned a great deal of Disorder; for some great Ladies were very much abused by those Children, to whom the Preacher granted many Pardons for their Hootings, pretending to have a Power to do it. Those Hootings lasted so long, that the Ladies durst not appear in Public, and were forced to come to Brother Thomas's Sermons in a Disguise, with a Linnen Head-dress, as ordinary Women.'

[E] As soon as he left the Country, they put on their Head-dresses again, with higher Toppings.] It may be said, that they only bowed down their Heads like a Bulrush, which is the Emblem of a Repentance that lasts no longer than the Day, that is designed for an extraordinary Fast. But Paradin made use of another Comparison, that seems yet more proper to me. These are his Words (10): 'No more Hennins were to be seen wherever Brother Thomas went, such was his Hatred against them. This was useful for some time, till that Preacher went away from the before mentioned Countries. But after his Departure, the Ladies lifted up their Horns again, and did like the Snails, which, when they hear any Noise, pull in their Horns, but, when the Noise is over, suddenly raise them again higher than before (11). So did the Ladies: for the Hennins were never larger, more pompous, and magnificent, than after the Departure of Brother Thomas. Thus we see what it is to be obstinate against the Oblivion of some Persons: Could any one believe, that three or four

(8) See, above, the Remark [G] of the Article ANDROMACHE.

(9) Paradin, ubi supra.

(10) Paradin Annales, de Bourgogne, pag. 701. Note, Monstrelet, Tom. II, of his Chronicle, folio, m. 38, verso, says almost the same thing.

(11) The Women did not long comply with his Exhortations. Immediately after his Departure they put on their Horns again, and made amends for the time past. Argentré, ubi supra.

amends for their lost time (b). He burnt superfluous Cloaths, Tables, Dice, Cards, &c. (c), and let no body see him but in the Pulpit. It was a prudent thing; for he might perhaps have forgot himself in familiar Discourses, which would have lessened the great Opinion People had of him. Having made a sufficient Stay in the Netherlands, he went into Italy, and reformed the Order of the Carmelites at Mantua (d), not without meeting with some opposition [F]. From Mantua he went to Venice, where he was very much taken notice of; for the Embassadors of the Republic at the Court of Eugenius IV, whom he followed to Rome, recommended him to that Pope, as a Man of a holy Life, and full of Zeal: but they verified the Maxim, Pessimum inimicorum genus laudantes, although they went with a good Intention about it. The Pope, knowing that this great Preacher of Reformation was at Rome, ordered that he should be tried. He was found guilty of the most dangerous Heresies that could be taught in those times: He blamed the dissolute Life of the Clergy, and that of the Court of Rome; he had said, that many Abominations were committed in that Court; that the Church stood in need of a Reformation; that the Pope's Excommunications ought not to be feared, when People serve God; that the Monks might eat Flesh, and that the Clergy, who had not the Gift of Continency, might marry. He was burnt, and shewed a great Constancy, nor did he retract. Some great Persons among the Catholics have not scrupled to say that he was unjustly put to death. Baptista Mantuanus (e), who was General of the Carmelites, made a true Martyr of him (f). The Protestants take care not to forget him, when they make a List of those, who at several times have desired the Reformation of the Church. But I must observe, that some Protestants speak of him as of a meer Hypocrite [G].

(b) See Remark [E], in the Margin, Citat. (11).

(c) See Remark [E] towards the end.

(d) In the Year 1432.

(e) His Words, taken from the Book De Vita Beata, have been quoted by Bertrand d'Argentre, ubi infra.

(f) Taken from Bertrand d'Argentre's Histoire de Bretagne, Book X, chap. 42.

four Lines after, this Author should tell us, that Brother Thomas prevailed so much with the Ladies, that they themselves brought their Ornaments to him, whilst he was preaching, and burnt them publicly on his Scaffold in a great Fire that he kindled near his Pulpit? Is not this a manifest Contradiction? He might easily have avoided that Contradiction; it was but saying that all the Ladies did not leave off their Drefs for fear of being hooted at and stoned; but that some of them had a true compunction of heart.

(12) In the beginning of October, 1699.

Whilst this is Printing (12), the Gazettes inform us, that at the Court of France, a little Word that the King spoke by the by has been more effectual against the extraordinary height of Head-dresses, than all the Eloquence of the Preachers. They have for the space of twelve or fifteen Years cried out in vain against that part of Women's Luxury; they have attacked that Colossus with all the Figures of Rhetoric, supported by the most solid Arguments of Religion, and instead of overthrowing it, or at least of breaking some part of it, they have seen it encrease Monthly. They saw a new kind of Amphitheatre round about their Pulpits, which would have been very regular, if Women of the same Condition had sat down in the same Ranks, and if the Ranks had been less distant from the Preacher, according as the Top-knots exceeded each other: but because Places are not distributed according to that proportion, the Amphitheatre had no Symmetry. It is therefore better to compare this with a Wood of lofty Trees, wherein those that reach nearer the Clouds are mixed with those that do not reach so high. However it be, the Preachers did not fight absent Enemies; they had a full sight of them, and though they approached to the very Mouth of their Cannon, and in the very Face of their Thunder-bolts, yet they encreased and multiplied. Their two-edged Sword struck and cut, but the Effect it produced was like the Labour of a Gardener that prunes a Tree; his Strokes make it greater and fairer; whereas the Efficacy of the Royal Word has been to quick and powerful, that it has almost in one Day levelled those proud Mountains even with the ground.

Duris ut illex tonsa bipennibus
Nigre feraci frondis in Algidio,
Per damna, per caedes, ab ipso
Ducit opes animunque ferro (13).

(13) Horat. Od. IV. lib. IV. ver. 57, & seq.

As soon as the Women heard, I will not say a Prohibition or some Threatening, but only a hint of dislike, they laboured all night on that Reformation, and the next Day they appeared before the Monarch in another Drefs. That Reformation makes a surprising Progress; it passes from the Court to the City; and because it would be, they say, like rusticity and meanness not to conform to it, there is good reason to believe, that in a few Months there will remain no footsteps of the fashion that has lasted so long. This shews, that if crowned Heads knew their Strength in that respect, or if they would make use of it, they would do more with a Word, than all the Preachers and Confessors with a Multitude of Words (14). Shall not we see a Medal about this? As for a Song, we cannot miss of it; and I do not question but that some Poets will make Allusion to those Kings of Jadab, who did not take away the high Places, and thereby left the Restoration of Religion imperfect. Veruntamen excelsa non abstulit, adhuc enim populus immolabat & adolebat in excelsis incensum (15). Here, will they say, the Reformation begins with the Destruction of the high Places. The ingenious Writer, who makes Monthly Reflexions on the News (16), will doubtless tell us some pretty thing on this Adventure. The Abuse was so great, that it required a new Thomas Conelle.

(14) Compare this with Remark [M] of the Article LEWIS XII.

(15) Lib. IV, Regum, cap. 12, ver. 3, & alibi passim.

(16) Since the Month of June, 1599. His Book is intitled L'Esprit des Cours de l'Europe.

(17) Argentre, ubi supra.

[F] He Reformed the Order of the Carmelites — not without meeting with some Opposition.] Nicolas Kerton, an Englishman, Provincial of the Carmelites, wrote against this Reformation, and dedicated his Writings to John Facius, General of the Order (17).

[G] Some Protestants speak of him as of a mere Hypocrite.] John Chassanion, a zealous Huguenot, having said 'that Hypocrisy thrusts and mixes itself with the pure and lawful Service of GOD, and that it does the like with respect to Superstition and Idolatry, even with Pomp and Ostentation, brings in Brother Thomas as an Instance of it; who, with a vain Shew and a specious Zeal, did so deceive the World under pretence of a Reformation of Manners, that every Body took him for a holy Man (18). He relates that Preacher's Travels, &c. on the Credit of Enguerrand de Monstrelet. 'To act his Farces, says he (19), they built him Scaffolds in the best and most convenient Places, richly hung and adorned: on which having said his Mass, he preached his Sermons; wherein he reproved every Body for their Vices, especially the Clergy for their Concubines and Whores (20). He did well in that: But it was a Monkish Trick, a piece of Madness, and a sacrilegious Impudence, to stir up little Children against Women on account of their Drefs; promising them certain Days of Pardon, as if he had been a GOD.' Lastly, he says that he was condemned as an Heretic, and burnt. And then he adds: 'By which means GOD, who makes use of all Instruments, was pleased to chastise, and punish the Hypocrisy of that Monk, who, pretending to be a holy Man, was a hair-brained and ambitious Fool (21).'

(18) Chassanion, Histoire Memoires des Huguenots & merveilles Jugemens de Dieu, cap. 21, pag. m. 119.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 121.

(20) Paradin, ubi supra, pag. 750, observes the same thing: He preached, says he, very long Sermons, making great Dissections against the Vices of all Orders of Men, and even against the Fornication and Lewdness of the Clergy, who kept Concubines, Strumpets, and Whores, at Bed and Board, contrary to the Oath of Chastity they had taken.

(21) Chassanion, ibid. pag. 124.

(a) Apollonius Pergæus in epistola ad Attalum præfixa Libro IV Conicorum.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Ex Vossio de Scient. Mathem. cap. 54. n. 5. pag. 327, 328.

(e) In the 1866 Chapter.

(f) Vossius de Histor. Græc. lib. 1, cap. ult. pag. m. 162.

(g) Joseph. cont. Apionem, lib. 1. pag. 1051.

(h) Apollon. Schol. in lib. I.

(i) Servius in Æneid. lib. VII. ver. 738.

CONON, a Mathematician and Astronomer, was of Samos (a). He flourished about the CXXXth Olympiad. He died before his Friend Archimedes, who had a great Esteem for him, and communicated his Writings to him, and sent him some Problems [A]. He had some Disputes with the Mathematician Nicoteles, who writ against him, and treated him with a little too much Contempt (b). Apollonius Pergæus confesses it, though he acknowledges that Conon was not lucky in his Demonstrations (c). He invented a kind of Volute, which differed from that of Dinostratus; but because Archimedes explained the Qualities of it more clearly, the true Name of the Inventor was forgotten: for it is not called the Volute of Conon, but the Volute of Archimedes (d). As for Conon's Astronomical Knowledge, I refer you to Catullus [B], who describes it in the beginning of his Poem on Berenice's Hair, who was the Sister and Wife of Ptolemy Evergetes. Note, That Conon was so great a Flatterer, as to give out that the Hair of that Queen was changed into a Constellation. We find in Photius (e) the Extracts of a Book, that contained about fifty Narratives of the fabulous Times. The Author's Name was CONON: he dedicated that Work to King Archelaus Philopater, from whence Vossius (f) took the Liberty to make him live towards the beginning of the VIIIth Century of Rome; for he believes, that Strabo, Dion, and the other Historians, afford some Arguments, from which it may be inferred that the same King Archelaus was one of the Princes that followed Mark Antony's Party against Octavius. If it were so, That Conon ought to be distinguished from him, who, as Josephus tells us, had made mention of the Jews (g). Indeed it would have been ridiculous in Josephus to glory in the Testimony of so modern an Historian. That which is most probable is, I. That CONON, Author of a Book concerning the City of Heraclea, quoted by the Scholiast on Apollonius (h), is the same with CONON, who writ a Piece concerning Italy, quoted by Servius (i). II. That Conon mentioned by Photius, or Conon mentioned by Josephus, are the same with him.

[A] He died before his Friend Archimedes, who had a great Esteem for him — and sent him some Problems. We have the Proof of this in Archimedes's Writings: 'Debemus Conone vivente ipsa e-mittere in vulgus: hunc enim accepimus talia potissimum posse deprehendere, & ipsis accommodatam proferre demonstrationem (1). — These things ought to be published whilst Conon is living; for he, as I understand, comprehends them with ease, and can give a proper Demonstration.' This is what is found in one of Archimedes's Letters, in the beginning of one of his Books. What follows is to be found in another Letter: 'Antea quidem mihi mandasti scriberem eorum problematum demonstrationem quæ prius ipse proposueram Cononi (2). — You formerly demanded of me a Demonstration of those Problems, which I had proposed to Conon.' He says elsewhere: 'Quot in Geometria theoremata visa primum impossibilia, tempore perfectionem capiunt? Conon quidem non sufficiens tempus sortitus in eorum disquisitione, vitam cum morte commutavit, & ea dubia reliquit: quamquam omnia invenerat, ut & alia multa quibus plurimum Geometriam adduxit. Scimus quippe in illo fuisse non vulgarem Mathematicarum artium peritiam, laborisque supra modum tolerantiam (3). — How many Theorems in Geometry, which at first seemed impossible, have in time been brought to perfection? Conon, not being allowed a sufficient time to investigate them, died, and left them in the dark, tho' he had invented them all, and many more, whereby he has enriched Geometry: For in him we found an uncommon skill in Mathematics, joined to an extraordinary Patience and Application.' Here is another Passage: 'Cum audiissem defunctum esse Cononem qui nobis reliquus erat in amicitia, tibi que admodum fuerat familiaris, puta in Geometria maxime versatus; virum quidem mortuum amare planxi, ut amicissimum & hominem in Mathemat-cis plane mirabilem. Atque tunc repente statui mittere ad te, sicuti antea ad Cononem solebam, geometricum theorema, quod nemo quidem prius est contemplatus, &c (4). — Having heard of Conon's Death, with whose Friendship I was honoured, and with whom you kept an intimate Correspondence, as he was thoroughly versed in Geometry, I greatly lamented the loss of a sincere Friend, and a Man of surprising Knowledge in Mathematics: I then determined to send to you, as I had before done to Conon, a Theorem in Geometry, hitherto observed by no Body.

[B] As for Conon's Astrological knowledge, I refer you to Catullus.] Here is the beginning of his Poem:

Omnia qui magni dispexit lumina mundi,
Qui stellarum ortus comperit, atque obitus:
Flammeus ut rapidi solis nitor obscuretur,
Ut cedant certis sidera temporibus,
Ut Trivium furtim sub Latmia faxa relegans
Dulcis amor gyro devocet ærio:
Idem me ille Conon cælesti lumine vidi
E Bereniceo vertice cæsariem
Fulgentem clarè (5).

Who scann'd each Object of the starry Sphere,
Knew when they rise, and when they disappear:
Who knew why Darknes' dims the World's great Eye;
Why Stars, at certain Periods, seem to die:
Who knew why Cynthia from her Orb should move
The Plains of Latmos, and Endymion's Love:
Conon, the same who view'd me from that Height,
Whence Berenice spreads ætherial Light.

CONON, General of the Athenians in the Peloponnesian War, made himself so famous by his brave Exploits, that they gave him the Command over all the Islands [A]. He commanded the Naval Forces the last Year of the War; but

[A] They gave him the Command over all the Islands.] It is thought that Cornelius Nepos has committed a small Anachronism (1); for other Historians do scarce begin to speak of Conon, but by saying that he was put in Alcibiades's place: now from that time to the end of the War, they do not say that he had the Command in question; and the Athenians were not in a condition to give it: after all, whoever had been invested with it would not have made such Conquests as Conon did: In qua potestate Pharas cepit coloniam Lacedæmoniorum (2). — In which Post he took Phera, a Colony of the Lacedæmonians.

(1) See Kirchmayer's Commentary upon Cornelius Nepos in Conon. pag. m. 433, 434.

(4) Id. in libro de quadrat. Parabolæ.

(5) Catullus, Epigr. 67. pag. m. 134.

(2) Corn. Nepos in Conone, c. 29.

but was not present at the Fight which was so fatal to the Athenians [B]. His Absence contributed very much to the decisive Battle, which the Lacedæmonians won (a) under the Conduct of Lyfander, near the River Ægos (b). Conon, after this Misfortune, hearing of the Loss of his Country, retired to Pharnabazus Governor of Ionis and Lydia [C], and insinuated himself in his Favour, that he might annoy the Lacedæmonians. The latter broke with Artaxerxes King of Persia, and carried the War into his Country under the Conduct of Agessilaus. They made great Progresses; and it is likely they would have subdued all the Provinces on this side the Taurus, if Conon, by whose Counsels the Persian Army was directed (c), had not thwarted their Designs [D]. He easily perceived, that Tissaphernes betrayed the King of the Persians: the thing was plain; nevertheless the King, who was under some Obligations to Tissaphernes, was so prepossessed in his behalf, that he would not believe him to be guilty. This obliged Conon to take a Journey to the Court of Persia. He shewed the Treason of that General so plainly, that he convinced the King of it. He received a Commission to cause a Fleet of Ships of War to be fitted out against the Lacedæmonians; and by that means he had a Fleet under his Command, which obtained (d) a signal Victory over them (e). His chief care was, to make use of that Opportunity in favour of his Country [E]: He sailed towards Athens with part of the victorious Fleet; he distributed the Money, that Pharnabazus had given him, among the

(a) Hunc (Agessilaus) adversus Pharnabazus habitus est imperator; re quidem vera, exercitui præfuit Conon, ejusque omnia arbitrio gesta sunt. . . . Pharnabazus had indeed the Name of General, but in reality Conon was Chief, and all things were done by his Direction. Id. ibid. cap. 2.

(d) The second Year of the XCVIth Olympiad, according to Diodorus Siculus.

(e) Hos Conon, apud Cnidum adortus magno prælio fugat. Corn. Nepos, ib. cap. 4.

(a) In the fourth Year of XCIIIth Olympiad.

(b) Apud Ægos flumen. Corn. Nepos in Conone, cap. 1.

(4) See Justin. lib. V. cap. 6.

(4) Cornelius Nepos in Conone, cap. 4.

(5) Xenoph. lib. 4. de rebus gestis Græcor. pag. m. 314.

(6) Id. ibid. lib. 11, pag. 268. See also Plutarch in Lyfandro.

(7) See Kirchmayer in Corn. Nepos Conon, pag. 334.

(8) Nepos, c. 2.

Lacedæmonians. It was much in those times, if they could keep on the defensive (3). So that it is thought that the Historian anticipates and confounds the times, and that Conon had not that Authority over all the Islands before he received it from the King of Persia. If that Author had committed this Fault, he performed the Duties of an Historian very ill. He would be in some manner excusable, if he had taken one time for another with respect to a Dignity that the Republic of Athens had conferred; but supposing the Censure to be right, he has done worse: he is mistaken both as to the Time, and those who conferred that Command; he ascribes to the Athenians what was only done by Artaxerxes, and yet he speaks separately of what Artaxerxes did. 'Hinc magnis muneribus donatus (Conon) ad mare est missus, ut Cypriis & Phœnicibus cæterisque maritimis civitatibus naves longas imperaret (4). — Conon, loaded with presents, was sent to Sea, to take upon himself the Command of the Fleet of the Cyprians, Phœnicians, and other Maritime Powers.' Perhaps I may be answered, that he does not say from whom Conon received that Office, and that therefore Charity requires that we should suppose that he means the Command which Artaxerxes conferred on Conon: but nothing can be more absurd, nor more against the Laws of History, than to mention in that place the Command wherewith the King of Persia honoured that illustrious Athenian. We must therefore acknowledge, that Cornelius Nepos intangled himself. Xenophon says in express Words, that Pharnabazus and Conon ravaged the Territory of Phera (5). It was some time after the Defeat of the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus.

[B] He was not present at the Fight, which was so fatal to the Athenians. Here is a new Fault of the Historian. There is no Reader but will think, by virtue of his Words, that the Athenian Fleet was attacked whilst Conon was upon a Journey, or whilst he was carried to some Town for his Health; but there is no such thing: Conon's Absence consists in this; he foresaw that the Enemy would obtain a complete Victory, and so he made his Escape in time with nine Ships (6). It is true that it was not out of Fear, but because he found that by reason of the ill Discipline of the Troops, they were not in a condition to make a Resistance. The Commentators, who endeavour to justify Cornelius Nepos, do it pitifully (7).

[C] He retired to Pharnabazus, Governor of Ionis and Lidia. Here is another Fault of the Historian. He does all that is necessary to persuade his Readers that Conon, not seeking a place of Security, but a place where he might do his Country Service, went directly to the Court of Pharnabazus. Non quæsit ubi ipse tuto viveret, sed unde præsidio posset esse civibus suis (8). This Account is deceitful: Neither the Thing, nor the Reason of it, is true; for that General fled directly to the Isle of Cyprus, to King Evagoras, a good Friend of the Athenians: I say, he fled thither both for his own Security, and to take new measures with that Prince for the Good of his Country. 'Ὡς Εὐαγόραν ἤλθε νομίσας καὶ τῷ σώματι βέλαιότατον εἶναι τὴν παρ' ἐκείνου καλάρυγιν, καὶ τῇ πάλαι τάχιστα ἐν αὐτὸν γενέσθαι βοηθόν. Ad Evagoram se contulisse, quod putabat se apud eum & salutis suæ rectissime consulturum, & Republicæ erigendæ adiutorem quamprimum habiturum (9). All the Historians speak of that Retreat of Conon (10); and some Authors say, that he was yet in Cyprus when Agessilaus ravaged Asia. Isocrates tells us, that Conon, for some time, minded only his private concerns in the Isle of Cyprus. Χρόνον μὲν τινα περὶ τὴν τῶν Ἰσίων ἐπιμέλειαν διέτεκεν (11). He was yet in Cyprus, according to Justin (12), when it was discovered that Tissaphernes, betraying the King of Persia, had suffered the Lacedæmonians to commit some Hostilities in Asia. If Cornelius Nepos has committed a Fault in not speaking of that Retreat of Conon, he was mistaken likewise when he undertook to speak of it. He says, in the Life of Chabrias, that it is the common Fault of Republics, to envy a Man of distinguished Merit. 'Est hoc commune vitium in magnis liberisque civitatibus, ut invidia gloriæ comes sit, & libenter de his detrahant quos eminere videant alius.' For which Reason, says he, several Great Men have voluntarily absented themselves from Athens, and Conon lived a long time in the Isle of Cyprus. This Example is wrongly alledged; for Conon retired into that Island after such a lamentable Defeat, that he was either afraid (13), or ashamed (14), to return to Athens. Add to this, that that City fell a little while after under the Yoke of Lacedæmon.

[D] The Lacedæmonians would have subdued the Provinces on this side Taurus, if Conon . . . had not thwarted their Designs. A political Craft, which his Historian does not mention, proved a hundred times more useful to him than all his Skill in War. He persuaded the King of Persia to send large Sums of Money to the Orators of Greece, in order to raise a War against the Lacedæmonians. Each of those Orators, thus gained, stirred up the People of their several Cities in such a manner, that a formidable Confederacy was made against the Lacedæmonians (15); and then Agessilaus, being recalled into his Country, was obliged to give over all his Projects of Conquest, to think on the Defence of the States of Lacedæmon. There is nothing better for those that would begin, or cause a War to continue, than to have the Tongues of Orators at their Devotion. Accordingly it appears that they take great care to win the Affection of such Persons.

[E] His chief care was to make use of that Opportunity in favour of his Country. Justin and Cornelius Nepos make use of too strong Expressions, when they speak of the condition from which Conon delivered Athens. Justin supposes that, when the Lacedæmonians lost the famous Battle of Cnidus, they held the City of Athens under the Yoke of Servitude; that they had a Garrison in it; in a Word, that it was one of their conquered Countries. 'Vidit Lacedæmonii fugam capeflunt, præsidia hostium Athe-

(9) Isocrates in Evagora, pag. m. 292.

(10) Justin. lib. V. cap. 6. Xenoph. lib. 11. Diodor. lib. XIII. Plutarch in Lyfandro, pag. 433. In Artaxerxe, pag. 1021.

(11) Isocr. Orat. ad Philip. pag. m. 137.

(12) Justin. lib. VI, cap. 1.

(13) Crudelitatem civium metuentis ad regem Cyprium concedit. Id. ib. V. cap. 6.

(14) Ἀτυχίας ἐν τῷ ναυμαχίᾳ . . . οὐκ ἔσθ' ἀνὰ φρεσὶν κατὰ τοὺς νόμους. Cum navis prælio . . . male pugnatum esset redire domum erubuit. Isocrat. ibid. pag. 138.

(15) Polyænus lib. I. Strategem. sub. fin. See also Plut. in Artaxerxe, pag. 1021. & Xenophon Hist. Græc. lib. III, pag. 294. Edit. 1584.

the Inhabitants; and gave Orders to repair the Piræus, and the Walls of the City. Had he only done this, he had not been to blame; but he forgot himself so far, as to endeavour to take Ionia and Æolis from the Persians, and restore them again to the Athenians. That Plot could not be carried on so privately, but the Persians perceived it. Hereupon Teribazus, Governour of Sardes, sent word to Conon, that he had something of great moment to communicate to him; for which he would send him to the King. Conon went to Sardes, where he was made a Prisoner. Some say that he was brought to Artaxerxes, and that he perished in that Country; but others assert, that he made his Escape out of Prison, and question whether Teribazus did not consent to it (f). Morævi should not therefore have affirmed that Teribazus, jealous of his Glory, had him put to Death: for Xenophon owns, I. That Teribazus did not apprehend him, till the Crimes the Lacedæmonians charged him with were fully proved against him; II. That afterwards he sent to know of the King his Master, what he should do with him (g). Conon left a Son, whose Name was TIMOTHEUS, who was a great Captain, and who experienced the usual Ingratitude of his Country (b). That Timotheus was a Disciple of Isocrates [F]. He came off handsomely when they reproached him with his Mother's scandalous Life [G]. He left a Son, whose Name was CONON, who was condemned to rebuild part of the Walls of the City [H]. We find no great Exactness, either in Justin, or Cornelius Nepos, concerning our Conon, whether we compare them together [I],

or

(f) Taken from Cornelius Nepos
in Conon's Life.

(g) Xenoph. de gest. Græc. lib.
IV, pag. m. 315.

(b) See his Life in Cornel. Nepos.

(16) Justin. lib.
VI. cap. 3.

(17) Xenoph.
lib. II. sub. fin.

(18) According to Calvisius.

(19) Justin. ubi
supra, cap. 4.

(20) Hos Conon apud Cnidum adortus magno prelio fugit,
multas naves cap-sit, complures deprimit: qua victoria non solum Athenæ sed
etiam cuncta
Græcia, quæ sub Lacedæmoniorum fuerat imperio liberata
est. --- Conon engaging them at Cnidus gained a signal Victory, took and sunk a great Number of Ships;
by which Victory
not only Athens,
but all Greece,
was delivered from the Lacedæmonian Yoke.
Cornel. Nepos in Conone.

(21) Plut. in vita
Istac.

'nis deducuntur, populo restituta dignitate conditio
'servilis eripitur (16). --- The Lacedæmonians, be'ing routed, quitted the Field; the Enemy's Garri'son was removed from Athens, the People were 'freed from Slavery, and restored to their ancient 'Liberties.' This is not only strained, but also false; for the Athenians had recovered their Liberty, six or seven Years before Conon had defeated the Naval Army of the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus, the Dominion of the Thirty Tyrants had been abolished, the Amnely had been published, and the popular State had been re-established, &c. (17). It was Thrasylus, who produced that great Revolution in the third Year of the XCIVth Olympiad (18). But the Battle of Cnidus was fought the second Year of the XCVth Olympiad. Moreover, is it not certain, that the Year before that Battle of Cnidus, the Lacedæmonians were beaten near Haliartus by the Confederate Army? Were not the Athenians one of those People, who had confederated against the Lacedæmonians? Could they have done it, if they had had a Lacedæmonian Garrison in their City? Cornelius Nepos has not been guilty of Justin's Anachronism; he knew very well that the Thebans and the Athenians had declared War against the Lacedæmonians before the Battle of Cnidus. 'Posteaquam
'domum à suis civibus revocatus est (Agefilus) quod
'Boeotii & Athenienses Lacedæmonis bellum in'dixerant, Conon nihilo secius apud præfectos re'gis versabatur. --- After that Agefilus was 'called home, the Boeotians and Athenians having 'declared War against the Lacedæmonians, Conon 'still continued amongst the King's Lieutenants.' After those Words, that Historian relates how Conon went to the Court of Persia, and obtained a Commission to fit out Ships of War to keep at Sea the following Year. It was with that Fleet that Conon beat the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus. Justin has confounded every thing: He falsely imagined, that the Thebans, the Athenians, and their Allies, did not declare War against the Lacedæmonians till after the Battle of Cnidus (19). It is no wonder if the Words of Cornelius Nepos are not so false as those of Justin;
the Anachronism of the latter is not to be found in the other. Nevertheless, we may say that Cornelius Nepos expressed himself ill (20); for, properly speaking, it cannot be said, that a Nation, which makes War with another, and gains Battles against another, is under the Servitude of that other. This was the case of the Athenians before the Battle of Cnidus. In the Style of an Orator, one might speak as Cornelius Nepos does; for an Orator makes no difficulty to say, that Gustavus set all Europe at Liberty, that was a Slave to the House of Austria.
But this would be very impertinent in a Historian.

[F] Timotheus his Son was a Disciple of Isocrates
(21). Cicero says, that Timotheus equalled his Father in military Virtues, and surpassed him in Learning. 'Quod idem fecit Timotheus Cononis

'filius, qui cum belli laude non inferior fuisset
'quàm pater, ad eam laudem doctrinæ & ingenii
'gloriam adjecit (22).'

[G] --- and came off handsomely when they reproached him with his Mother's scandalous Life.]
She was a Thracian Woman, and had followed the Profession of a Courtesan; but after she had left it off, no Body led a more discreet and exemplary Life than she: which is peculiar to this sort of Women, when once they are sincerely converted; at least it is the Opinion of the Author whom I quote. *Τιμοθεὺς δ' ὁ στρατηγὸς Ἀθηναίων ἐπιφανὲς, ἐταίρας ἢν ἦν, ὁρατὶν τὸ γένος, σεμνὴς
δ' ἄλλως τὸς τρόπος, μετὰ δὲ λαοῦ γὰρ αἱ τοιαῦται εἰς τὸ σῶμα, τὴν ἐπὶ τῷ σεμνυμένῳ εἰσι βελτίους. Τιμοθεὶ, qui cum magna gloria Atheniensium dux exercituum fuit, mater erat Thracia genere, meretrix, sed gravibus & lau-datis moribus. Nam ejus conditionis femine cum ad temperantiam & continentiam sese applicuerint, aliis qui ob eas virtutes gloriantur probiores sunt (23).
Timotheus, finding himself rallied for having such a Mother, answered, that he was very much obliged to her, since she was the cause that he was the Son of such an illustrious Father (24). And indeed, if that Woman had not behaved her self ill, she would not have lain with Conon, and so Timotheus had never been. He owed therefore his Existence to the Lewdness of his Mother; but that Existence was glorious, considering the Figure that Conon made in the World. This puts me in mind of what is said of the Mother of three illustrious Bastards: She did not repent of what she had done, since she had produced three Men of great Merit. See the Remark [B] of the Article ERASMUS.*

[H] CONON, his Grandson, was condemned to rebuild part of the Walls of Athens.] Cornelius Nepos makes a moral Reflexion upon it, in an ingenious Antithesis. 'Hujus (Timothei) post mortem quum
'populum judicii sui poneret, multæ novem par-
'tes detraxit, & decem talenta Cononem filium ejus
'ad muri quamdam partem reficiendam jussit dare,
'in quo fortunæ varietas est animadversa; nam quos
'avus Conon muros ex hostium præda patriæ resti-
'tuerat, eisdem nepos cum summa ignominia fami-
'liæ ex sua re familiari reficere coactus est (25).
'--- After his (Timotheus) Death, the City,
'repenting the Sentence they had passed, remitted
'nine parts of the Fine, and ordered Conon his 'Son to pay Ten Talents towards repairing a cer'tain part of the Walls. Wherein the change of 'Fortune is remarkable; for the Grandson, with the 'greatest disgrace to his Family, was compelled out
'of his own Fortune to repair those very Walls, which 'his Grandfather had, with Honour, wrested from
'the Power of the Enemy.'

[I] Neither Justin nor Cornelius Nepos are over exact, whether they are compared together ---.]
Here is Justin's Narrative (26). After the Lacedæmonians had subdued the Republic of Athens, they became

(22) Cicero de
Offic. lib. I.
cap. 32.

(23) Athenæus,
lib. XIII. cap. 5.
pag. m. 577.

(24) Id. lib. II.

(25) Corn. Ne-pos in vita Ti-mothei, cap. 4.

(26) Justin. lib.
VI, cap. 11, &
seq.

or whether we compare Conon's Life with that of Agefilas written by Cornelius Nepos

(27) More ingenui humani quod pluris habent copientes. — As the more Men possess, the more they naturally covet. lb. cap. 1.

became more ambitious than before (27), and thought of no less than the Conquest of all Asia. To perform this, they must conquer the Persians that were governed by Tissaphernes, and those that were commanded by Pharnabazus. The Attempt seemed too great to Hercylides, General of the Lacedæmonians; for which reason he bribed Tissaphernes, and made a particular Treaty with him, whereby he engaged not to attack him, provided they should give him certain Sums of Money. Pharnabazus complained of it, and represented that Tissaphernes, instead of opposing the Enemies, bought a Truce of them, which enabled them to attack the other Provinces of the Monarchy more vigorously; that the Command of the Fleets ought therefore to be taken from him, and given to Conon, who lived in Exile in the Isle of Cyprus. The King of Persia found the Remonstrances of Pharnabazus just, and ordered him to put the Naval Forces under the Command of Conon. Hereupon the Lacedæmonians desired Assistance of the King of Egypt, and obtained several Ships, and resolved to send their King Agefilas with a great Army into Asia. Thus Conon and Agefilas were set one against another in Asia. The Match was well made; they were equal in all things; for which reason the one did not overcome the other. 'Non facile dixerem quod aliud par ducum tam bene comparatum fuerit, quippe ætas, virtus, consilium, sapientia utrique prope una, gloria quoque rerum gestarum eadem: quibus cum paria omnia fortuna dederit, invictum tamen ab altero utrumque servavit' (28). — It would be difficult to find two other Generals so well matched; for their Age, their Valour, their Conduct and Experience were almost the same, and the Glory they had acquired was equal; and as Fortune had thus placed them on a level, yet she ordered it, that neither of them was conquered by the other. But because Conon's Soldiers rose up in Arms for want of Pay, and the Letters which he wrote to the King about it had no effect, he went to the Persian Court, and remonstrated so powerfully the ill management of the Finances, by the King's Ministers, that the King appointed a Man who should take care to supply Conon with the necessary Sums. Conon was sent immediately to the Fleet, and, without losing any time, he made a Descent into the Enemies Country, ravaged it, took some Towns, and struck such a Terror every where, that the Lacedæmonians resolved to recall Agefilas. In the mean time they equipped a great Fleet, and thought themselves in a condition to hazard a Battle; but they were beaten by Conon. That Victory set Athens at liberty, and encouraged the Thebans to declare War against them: they beat them, and entered afterwards with their Forces into the Territory of Lacedæmon. The Lacedæmonians recalled Agefilas to oppose that Torrent (29). Agefilas returned, and obtained a Victory, Conon, being informed that Agefilas had left Asia, made a new Descent into the Enemies Country, plundered it, and returned afterwards to Athens.

(28) Id. ibid. cap. 2. Hæ tamē in favorem an illi Legian: for it is so far from being strange, that two Generals equal in every thing did not overcome one another, that it would be a wonder, if they had. And therefore I have not said, as Justin does, and yet the one did not overcome the other; but I have used the Words for which reason instead of and yet.

(29) See the latter end of the last Remark.

(30) His vocibus regem à Tissaphernæ alienatum hortatur (Pharnabazus) ut in locum ejus navalis belli ducem eligat Conon Atheniensem, qui amissa bello patria Cypri exulabat. J. fl. lib. vi, cap. 1.

Pisander, and sent Agefilas with fine Troops into Asia to oppose Conon; so that those two great Men were matched against each other. Agefilas and Conon preserved their Honour; neither of them overcame the other. But Conon, being ill obeyed by his Soldiers, because they were not paid, was obliged to go to the Court of Persia to solicit the necessary Supplies: He received Money, and was sent back to the Fleet. Cornelius Nepos relates the thing quite otherwise: He says that Conon did not command the Naval Forces till after Agefilas had left Asia, to come to the Assistance of Lacedæmon: He says, that Conon went to the Court of Persia to accuse Tissaphernes, and not because the Soldiers were discontented. III. According to Justin, the Persian Army was only commanded by Conon; but, according to Cornelius Nepos, Pharnabazus commanded it: it is true, Conon had really the Command, because things were directed by his Counsels. The Faults of Justin's Narrative are very plain; for that Author, after having said that Conon was the King of Persia's Admiral (31), makes him appear at the Head of a Land Army, without telling us why or how the Court ordered such a Change, and even without observing that they disposed of him in another manner. No Body will deny that Agefilas made War by Land (32): It is therefore most certain that Conon, who was to fight him, according to Justin, was to command by Land. The Historian, not contented with that Fault, has committed another: He does not only mention a chimerical Admiral, who, without performing the least thing at Sea, did only appear at the Head of a Land Army; but he says also, that That General, being gone to complain that his Forces were not paid, was sent back to the Fleet. Who would not believe, upon reading this, that Conon had already appeared in the Fleet of the King of Persia? Yet it is certain, that he only appears in Justin's History among the Land Forces. These are Faults of Exactness, which cannot be justified by saying, that That Author did but abridge a great History; for a good Abbreviator never suppresses such Circumstances as those that are wanting here. Thus much concerning the critical Observations that might be made upon Justin, considering him as if he was the only Author that had spoke of these things: but I do not question, that if he was compared with the other Historians, he would easily be found guilty of some Falsities. I could wish that those, who have commented upon him, would have taken notice of the Faults of his Narrative, and of his historical Confusions. Most of them chose rather to make Grammatical Remarks upon him.

(31) Justin est (Pharnabazus), Conon classis præfere. Id. ib.

(32) Xenophon, lib. 3. pag. 304. obiter, That the Lacedæmonians sent a Commission to Agefilas in Asia to command the Sea Forces; but that he gave that Employment to his Brother-in-law.

I would not always prefer Cornelius Nepos before Justin: for although, having only written the Life of one Man, he ought to have spoke more exactly than those who met that Man in their way, whilst they were writing a general History; it is nevertheless certain, that in some things I had rather give credit to the general History of Xenophon, than to him. Xenophon is in several respects more and less consonant to Cornelius Nepos than to Justin: He neither says, that Conon commanded the Land Forces against Agefilas, nor that he occasioned the Disgrace of Tissaphernes. This is to refute Cornelius Nepos and Justin at once. He does not bring Conon upon the Stage till after the Punishment of Tissaphernes, and only to command the Van-guard of Artaxerxes's Naval Forces at the Battle of Cnidus (33). Cornelius Nepos finds nothing here to countenance him; but there is something in it that favours Justin. Xenophon acknowledges, that Conon made two Descents into the Territories of the Lacedæmonians, but both after the Battle of Cnidus, and as being Pharnabazus's Lieutenant or Colleague (34). This refutes Justin, who even names Pharnabazus, and who supposes, that the first Descent was made before the Battle of Cnidus: When the News of that Battle was brought to Agefilas, he was already in Beotia, according to Xenophon (35). If this be true, Justin is mistaken, when he says, that Conon's Exploits obliged the Lacedæmonians to recall Agefilas. He is also mistaken, when he relates, that Conon, hearing that Agefilas was returned from Asia into Greece, left the Coast of Asia, and went to make a second De-

(33) Xenoph. de Rebus Gestis Græc. lib. 4. pag. 303.

(34) Id. pag. 313, 314.

(35) Id. pag. 303.

(i) Eclog. III. ver. 40.

(k) Beroald. An. m. xiv. in Ser- vium.

Nepos [K]. The Grammarian Servius falsely believed, that our Conon was meant in these Words of Virgil, In medio duo signa Conon (i). Beroaldus (k), censuring that Mistake, observed, that, according to the Grammarian Probus, Virgil meant Conon of Samos, who is the Subject of the foregoing Article.

(36) Justin. lib. 6. cap. 5.

(37) See Mr. Per- rault, Parallèle des Anciens & des Modernes, Tom. I. pag. 275. Dutch Edit.

CORNELIUS NEPOS critici- sed.

(38) Re quidem vera exercitui præfuit Conon, ejusque omnia arbitrio gesta sunt. Cornel. Nepos in Conone, cap. 2.

(39) Populit ergo quotiescumque congressus est multo majores adversariorum copias. Id. in Agefilau, cap. 3. fin.

(40) Defecerat à Rege Tissaphernes, neque id tam Artaxerxi quam cæteris erat apertum. Id. ibid.

(41) Id. ibid. cap. 2.

(a) Matthew Bernegger, in Tuba Pacis, pag. 271.

scend into the Territories of Lacedæmon. Conon quoque audito reditu Agefilai, & ipse ex Asia ad depopulandos Lacedæmoniorum agros revertitur (36). For this second Descent having been made after the Battle of Cnidus, which was fought after the Return of Agefilau into Europe, I leave you to judge whether the Return of Agefilau made Conon resolve to make a second Descent. Some may praise the ancient Historians as much as they please, but I shall never be persuaded that they equal some of our Moderns as to the distinct Observation of the Time wherein each thing happened (37).

[K] Or whether you compare Conon's Life with that of Agefilau, written by Cornelius Nepos. We find in the first, that Conon was so esteemed by Pharnabazus, that every thing was done by his Advice. It is he who, properly speaking, commands the Army (38); Pharnabazus has only the Name of Generalissimo. It is Conon who stops the Progress of Agefilau: without him, all Asia, on this side of Taurus, would have fallen into the Power of the Lacedæmonians. Look in the Life of Agefilau, whether Conon signalized himself against him, and you will not so much as once find the Name of Conon in it. You see Agefilau always victorious; he always bubbles his Enemies; if he does not think fit to fight, none can oblige him to it; if he fights, he always gets the Victory, though he be inferior in number (39); if he does not penetrate into the Heart of the Monarchy, it is not Conon that is the Cause of it, it is because he is called home where his Presence is wanted. If Cornelius Nepos was tender of Conon's Honour, he did well not to mention him in the Life of Agefilau, where there is nothing but shame to be got by all those who resisted that Prince in his Expedition into Asia. But whilst that Historian was tender of another Man's Honour, he prostituted his own; he was not sensible of the Character he gave Conon in his Life; so that Cornelius Nepos might be strangely puzzled by this Dilemma: 'What you have said of Conon's Exploits against Agefilau, is either true or false: if it be false, you deserve to be tossed in a Blanket; if it be true, you deserve it no less: for you do not only suppress it in the Life of Agefilau, but you speak in such a manner of Agefilau's Exploits, that all your Readers plainly see the Persians did nothing considerable, and got nothing but 'shame.' Here is another Attack. In the Life of Conon, the Lacedæmonians break the Alliance they had made with the Persians; they carry the War into Asia, under the Conduct of Agefilau; and they are chiefly prompted to it by Tissaphernes, who betrays his Master, and make a secret Treaty with them. The Treason of that General is plain and certain, though the King is not willing to believe it (40). But in the Life of Agefilau, it is Artaxerxes who begins to make Preparations against the Greeks: but he is prevented with so much Diligence, that Agefilau gets with his Troops into Asia, before the Persian Governors hear of his setting out. Tanta celeritate usus est, ut prius in Asiam cum copiis pervenerit quam regis Satrapæ cum scirent profectum (41). Tissaphernes, as well as the rest, is surprized and confounded; he desires a Truce; he seems to desire it only to conclude a Peace; but at the bottom he seeks only to gain time in order to raise Troops: he obtains a Truce for three Months, but all his Thoughts are bent on War; and afterwards he makes no step that looks like a Collusion. It is true, he is not so happy in penetrating into the Designs of his Enemy, and in defending the Provinces that the King of Persia trusted him with; but he does what he can, if the Historian may be credited. I have not found any Commentators that charge him with that gross Contradiction. Lastly, in the Life of Conon, Pharnabazus has the Command of the Persians against Agefilau; but in the Life of the latter, the Name of Pharnabazus is not so much as once mentioned: and thus the same Author, in one place, gives Conon and Pharnabazus the whole care of resisting; and in another place he gives it all to Tissaphernes. It may be said, that he would have lessened the Glory of Agefilau, if he had owned the Treason of Tissaphernes. But if that Reason is good, we must not place him among Historians; he deserves only the Title of Panegyrist, with the false Rhetoric of a Sophist. If those two Lives were critically examined, one would be apt to think that they were composed by two Writers who intended to confute each other; and yet they are the Production of one and the same Pen.

The Life of Conon, written by Cornelius Nepos, differs from Justin's Relation in many things, as I have already shewed. I must farther take notice of a Difference that is to be found between Justin and the Life of Agefilau, written by Cornelius Nepos. According to Justin, Fortune managed herself lo between Agefilau and Conon, that they were equal in all things, so far that the one did not overcome the other (42). Cornelius Nepos says the quite contrary, though he affects to suppress Conon's Name. He does not only relate some Events, which shew, in a very sensible manner, that Agefilau beat the Persians, without saying that the latter ever had any Advantage; but he tells us, in express words, that it was agreed on all Hands, that Agefilau was the Conqueror (43). He adds, that That Prince, at the Head of a victorious Army, was fully persuaded that he should be able to subdue all Persia (44). I forgot to observe, that, according to Justin, the Lacedæmonians recalled Agefilau, when they found themselves blocked up by the Enemies after the Battle of Haliartus, where Lysander was killed. They were under Apprehensions for their City, says he, wherefore they recalled Agefilau, who was doing great things in Asia. Quod metuens Lacedæmonit regem suum Agefilau ex Asia qui ibi magnas res gerebat ad defensionem patriæ arcessit (45). If he had said no more than this, he would not have been much to blame; but he says, some Pages before, that the recalling of Agefilau was resolved upon before the Battle of Cnidus, and that the loss of that Battle did so encourage the Athenians and the Thebans, that they declared War against the Lacedæmonians, and that they won a Battle wherein Lysander was killed. This is overthrowing the Order of Events: the Battle of Haliartus preceded that of Cnidus by one Year. Thus it appears, that Justin fell into the Sophism à non causa pro causa, which is more common still among Historians than among the Peripatetics, as I have said elsewhere (46).

(42) I have quoted and criticized Justin's Words above in Citat. (28).

(43) Sic in Asia veritatis est ut omnium opinione victor duce- retur. Cornel. Nepos in Agefilau, cap. 3. fin.

(44) Quum victori præfuit exercitui, maximamque habere fiduciam regni Persarum potius di. Id. ibid. cap. 4.

(45) Justin. lib. 6, cap. 4.

(46) Above, at the end of the last Remark of the Article CAUSSIN.

CONRAD (HERIMANNUS). We have under this Name a Latin Speech, in which the United Provinces are very ill treated [A]. It was printed at Molshheim, about the Year 1618. The Author assures us, he had born Arms ever since the Battle of Pavia. Berneggerus thinks it is the Production of a Jesuit (a).

[A] A Latin Speech, wherein the United Provinces are very ill treated.] He accuses them of taking no Care of Religion, but as far as it appears useful to them to aggrandize themselves. 'Ordines Belgii potentissimos Atheismi præfidenter arcessit, nec Religionem curæ habere dicit, nisi quatenus ad am-plandum imperium utilis esse videtur (1). — He arrogantly charges their High Mightinesses with 'Atheism, and with want of concern for Religion, unless so far as seems calculated to promote their Power.'

(1) Bernegger. in Tuba Pacis, pag. 271.

CONRRARUS

CONRRARUS (GREGORY), the Pope's Prothonotary, was one of the learned Men of the XVth Century. We have a Letter, which Poggius writ to him, in answer to the Objections that were made against his Book de Nobilitate. Among the Letters of Candidus Decembrius, not printed, there is one written by our Conrrarus, to the learned Cicelia of Gonzaga, wherein he congratulates her for despising the Pleasures of the World, to consecrate herself to God; and exhorts her to read no longer the Poets, which Victorinus, her Preceptor, had made her so fond of, but to read the Treatises of the Holy Fathers about Virginity and Contineny. He recommends several Works of the Fathers to her, and particularly a Treatise of St Basil, which Ambrosius Camaldulensis had translated into Latin, and the Books of Salvian, de Providentia Dei, which he (Conrrarus) had found in Germany, and brought into Italy, when he returned from the Council of Basil (a). He speaks of Ambrosius Camaldulensis as of an excellent Man, who died before he attained to Old-age (b) [A].

(a) Cujus libros de Providentia Dei è Concilio Basileensi rediens, de Germanorum ergastulis in Italiam deportavi.

(b) Ex Museo Italico Mabillon. Tom. I. pag. 198.

[A] He speaks of Ambrosius Camaldulensis, as of an excellent Man, who died before he attained to Old-Age. These are his Words: 'Multa quidem utilia ex Doctoribus Ecclesiasticis egregie transtulit, & plura transtulisset, ni eum à laboribus humanis immatura mors sustulisset. — He had made an excellent Translation of many useful things from the Doctors of the Church, and he would have proceeded farther, had not an untimely Death prevented his carrying on so laudable a Work.' This may serve to refute those who make Ambrosius live till the Year 1490, and may be added to the Reasons I have alleged against them in his Article, Remark [E].

CONSTANCE, a City of Germany, situated between two Lakes formed by the Rhine, has very long preserved the Form of a Republic; and the better to maintain it's Liberty, which the Princes of the House of Austria would fain have taken from it, it entered into a Confederacy with the Cities of Zurich, Lindau, and Überlingen. It abolished Popery in the Year 1523; but, being put under the Ban of the Empire in 1548, it was so pressed by the Emperor Charles V, that it was forced to submit to him; and then the greatest Part of the Protestants, and particularly Ambrose Blaurer, their chief Minister, retired to other Places. From that time Constance has belonged to the House of Austria (a); and Moreri is very much mistaken, who says, in two Places, that it was an Imperial Town. It joined with the League of Smalcald in 1531 (b); and no doubt this was one Motive to Charles V to subdue it after he had vanquished the League. The Swedes, under the Command of Marshal Horn, besieged Constance in 1633, but could not take it. The Besieged wrote a Journal, in which they have inserted abundance of Miracles, or extraordinary Observations of the Divine Protection, which appeared in their Favour during the Siege (c) [A]. A Protestant has criticized a little upon this [B].

(a) Taken from Matthieu Dreflerus, Isag. Hist. Parte V. pag. 196, & seq.

(b) Munster in Cosmogr. pag. m. 397.

(c) Spanheim, Mercure Suisse, pag. 372.

[A] The Swedes besieged it in 1633. — The besieged wrote a Journal, wherein they inserted abundance of Miracles — which appeared in their Favour during the Siege. The principal ones were, I. The Advantages obtained in the weakest parts of the City, above their Hopes. II. The Courage and incredible Resolution of their Citizens and Soldiers, besides the good Understanding kept up between them. III. The frequent and seasonable Convoys thrown at different times into the Town, and the wonderful Concurrence of favourable Winds to forward them, although the Air of the Climate is commonly otherwise, and their Lake subject to frequent Storms in those Months. IV. The little damage done by the Grenados, and red hot Bullets, notwithstanding the prodigious Number thrown into the Town, which were sufficient to reduce the City to Ashes, and it's Inhabitants to Beggary. V. The extraordinary Height of the Rhine, which was wont to fall as soon as the Heat of the Summer was over, but now continued to swell, and furnished one of the City Mills so abundantly with Water, that they had enough to supply the Necessities of the besieged, throughout the whole Siege: which was confirmed by the Report of the Millers, that this Flood of Water ran off as soon as the Enemy were dislodged, and the Foreign Troops dismissed. VI. The most Contemplative added, that the fourth Day of the Siege they saw the Blessed Virgin, in open Day, soaring aloft over the Church of the Augustines, with infinite Splendor. The Swedish Centinels are also produced in the same Journal, as having seen the like Apparitions, and the Appearance of a Face more than Angelical, sliding along the Walls, near the Loop Holes, from the Tower of Reuenegg to the Gate of Creutzlingen (1).

[B] A Protestant has criticized a little upon this. Frederic Spanheim, who was Minister at Geneva when he wrote the Swiss Mercury, and furnished me with the preceeding Remark, adds:

The Swedes found nothing like this, neither in their Inventory, nor by the Report of their Men; and they observe, that the Author of the Journal was often forgetful, not remembering, in the Conclusion of his Narrative, what he had confessed at the beginning of it, neither the Terror of their Men, nor the Ruins of the City, nor the Numbers in the Hospitals, nor the Registers of the Dead, which are sufficient to shew the Effects of the Grenados. They reckon also, as the most dangerous Apparitions, which they saw during the Siege, the Entrance of so many Troops into the Town, by favour of the Lake, the want of Boats, and the Breadth of the Lake, preventing their People from disputing the Passage at such a Distance. Indeed the besieged themselves charged their Registers with Five thousand five hundred Men that entered the Town, during the Siege, besides Count de Wolffegg's Regiment, which was in Garrison there, before the Arrival of the Swedes. The City of Überlingen furnished them with Two hundred Men; Lindau Four hundred; Bregenz Two hundred; Colonel de Meris One thousand Two hundred; the Regiment of Embs Five hundred; the Regiment of Altringen Five hundred; Colonel Comargo One thousand; Serjeant Major de Reinach One thousand, and his Lieutenant Five hundred. The Swedes imagine that such powerful Succours, so often repeated, together with all necessary Provisions, were not only sufficient to keep their Ground behind good Curtains, against Five or Six thousand Men, who had the Face to besiege them, in the midst of so many Difficulties, and in a Foreign Country; but also to have drove them out of the Field, if these Auxiliary Troops had been as tender of their Honour, as they were of their Persons (2).

You see then that this Minister rejects as false one part of the Miracles, which the Inhabitants of this

(2) Ibid. pag. 209, and following.

(1) Spanheim, Mercure Suisse, pag. 207, and following.

this besieged City gloried in. The other part is of such a Nature, that there is no Country, where such like things may not be observed, where Winds, Rains, the Rise of Rivers, &c. have not favoured or destroyed Military Enterprizes. Now as there is no probability, that God should supersede the general Laws of Nature, but in Cases where the Preservation of his Children requires it, we ought not to take for a Miracle, what happens equally among Believers and Unbelievers. Yet in all Religions People are strangely inclined to think themselves favoured by miraculous Benefits, and perhaps if Frederic Spanheim had writ a History of a Siege, happily situated by a Protestant Town, he would have made Observations not unlike those which he now confutes (3). There are some Ministers, who see a Miracle in all Events, which concern their Party. Mr Jurieu, for example, finds one every where (4), and lately in what happened to the Inhabitants of the Cevennes (5). But People, who are acquainted with the Military Art, and know the Situation of the Country, the Disposition of the neighbouring Cities, and all the Particulars of the Insurrection of the Cevennois, discover nothing supernatural in the Continuance and Circumstances of it. I will not enter into the Question, whether a Man, who is persuaded, that a certain Concurrence of second Causes has ruined the Designs of the Enemy, ought to make others believe there was a Miracle in it, and whether he can justify himself, by pretending, that thereby he excites more confidence in the Mind, and greater thankfulness for the Divine Protection; but I dare affirm, that if he hopes by this means to engage Princes to enter into War, he will find himself greatly deceived. Mr Jurieu may cry out as long as he will, that the Preservation of the Camisars is a continued Series of Miracles. The Princes will not stir in it, if other political Reasons, which they know better than he, and do not want his Advice in, do not engage them to assist those People. They will see clearly into an Affair. Now Miracles to come are an Object of Faith, and consequently an obscure Object.

(3) Compare this with what has been said in the Continuation des Penées Diverses, pag. 312.

(4) Ibid. pag. 313.

(5) See a Book which he published in 1705, intitled Acis aux Puissances de l'Europe, &c.

COORNHERT, a Dutch Author in the XVIth Century: See KOORNHERT.

CORBINELLI (JAMES), born at Florence, of an illustrious and ancient Family [A], retired into France in the Reign of Catherine de Medicis. That Queen, to whom he had the Honour to be related, placed him near her Son, the Duke of Anjou, as a Man of a polite and learned Judgment (a). He daily read Polybius and Tacitus to him, and often the Discourses and the Prince of Machiavel, if we may believe Davila (b). He did not flatter his Master like a weak and interested Courtier, but spoke the Truth boldly, and made his Court without Meanness. He was looked upon as a Man resembling the ancient Romans [B], who were upright, and incapable of any Bafeness. He had a great share in the Esteem of Chancellor de l'Hospital [C]. He was a Friend and a professed Patron of learned Men; so far, that, though he was not very rich, yet he spent part of his Estate to get their Writings printed [D]. But his Talents were not

(a) Duplex, Hist. de Henri IV, ad ann. 1589, n. 1, says, That James Corbinelli, a Man of exquisite Learning, had been with King Henry III, in Poland, to converse with him about good Literature.

(b) Lib. vi. pag. m. 350, ad ann. 1579. The Duke of Anjou was then King of France.

[A] He was of an illustrious and ancient Family. Here are the Words of the Preface prefixed to the Maxims of Livy collected by Mr Corbinelli: 'He is originally of one of the most ancient and noble Families of Florence; and in the time of the Republic his Ancestors held the first Places among the Lords of the Government.'

See Claudius Malingre Sieur de St Lazare, in an Epistle dedicatory to the noble and illustrious Mr Peter de Corbinelli, Counsellor and Steward to the King (1). This was one of James Corbinelli's Sons.

[B] They looked on him as a Man resembling the ancient Romans. In the Preface that I have mentioned, these Words of Justus Lipsius are cited: 'Gentem vestram amavi semper, & ex ea illos maxime qui vetere illa Italia digni, qualem te esse, mi Corbinelli, video (2). — I have always had a singular esteem for those of your Nation, and more especially for them who, like you, my Corbinelli, are worthy of old Italy.' The Passage is curtailed; I must set it down entire: It will appear by it, that Peter Victorius had a great Esteem for our Corbinelli.

Qualem te esse, mi Corbinelli, non solum ex igniculis literarum tuarum quos sparsos colligo, video, sed etiam ex testimonio viri magni Victorii qui de indole tua ad virtutem magna prædicat nec vana. Such as I find you to be, my Corbinelli, not only from those bright Beams of Learning, which you diffuse, but also from the Testimony of the Great Victorius, who makes honourable mention of your virtuous Disposition. That Letter of Lipsius informs us, that Corbinelli had a Brother, who came to an unfortunate end. 'Fratri tui μεγαλοψυχῳ historiam & triste exitum legi: quid miremur? hodie illæ viæ, & nil nisi σκολιδὸν videmus à plebique his Dynastis (3). — I have read the History, and unhappy Fate of your brave Brother: Why should we wonder? Such are the present times, and we meet with nothing but Perverfeness from most of these great Men.' It is great odds, but that he perished at Florence in some Republican Enterprize.

[C] He was very much in the Esteem of the Chancellor de l'Hospital. It appears by the Epistle in Latin Verse, which that Chancellor inscribed to Corbinelli, not only that he was better pleased with his Conversation than with that of any of his other Friends; but also that Corbinelli was almost the only Courtier whom the Court had not spoiled, and who knew how to prefer useful Knowledge before Interest and Fortune. These are the Words of the Author of the Preface, and here are some of That Chancellor's Verses:

Corbinelle, libens te plus fruar omnibus uno,
Præsentisque animum sermone oblecter amici.
Tu servare modum nostri prope solus in aula,
Et præferre bonas inhonestis quæstibus artes (4).

Thee, Corbinelli, all my Soul desires,
Thy Conversation loves, thy Worth admires:
For few, like thee, in that exalted Scene,
To Virtue steady, keep the Golden Mean.

The Letter, that John Michael Brutus writ to James Corbinelli, deserves to be read: it is printed with some other Letters of that Author.

[D] He spent part of his Estate to get several Writings printed. The Book of Dante on the Italian Language was published by his Care (§a), besides many other curious Works, that would have remained in Oblivion, if he had not published them (5).

[(§a) He not only published this Book of Dante from the sole Manuscript extant, which was in his Title Live hands, but he also enriched it with Italian Annotations, which follow the Text in the Edition of Paris in 8vo, 1577. In one of the Observations of Marhal de Bassompierre upon some Lives of the Historian Duplex, which I shall set down in Remark [H] of this Article, it is supposed, as a certain Truth, that Corbinelli was banished Florence for a State-Crime, which is directly contrary to the Words of J. A. de Baif, in his Epistle in Verse to Henry III, where, speaking of this Corbinelli, he says, without any Misdemeanour banished from Florence. For the rest, this Epistle is in the fourth Leaf of the Book already mentioned, intitled: 'Dantis Aligerii præcellentissimi Poetæ

(4) Epist. 6a

(5) Pref. to the Maximes de not confined to the Exercises of the Muses. He was fit for Business, and was no less a Man of Courage and Resolution, than a Man of Management and Intrigue [E]. Rapbael Corbinelli, his Son, Secretary to Mary de Medicis, Queen of France, was the Father of Mr Corbinelli, who is at present one of the best and finest Wits of France (c) [F]. See his Elogy in a Preface, which has afforded me, not only the Materials, but also the Expressions of this Article. It is observable, that it was not known what Religion James Corbinelli was of [G]; which might make one suspect, that his Religion consisted only in being an honest Man. The Maréchal de Bassompierre inveighed against him [H].

(c) Taken from the Advertisement prefixed to a Book, intitled, Les Anciens Historiens Latins réduits en Maximes, printed in the Year 1694. Father Boubourt is said to be the Author of that Preface.

* Poetæ de vulgari Eloquentia Libri duo. Nunc primum ad vetusti & unici scripti Codicis exemplar editi. Ex Libris Corbinelli: Ejusdemque Annotationibus illustrati. Ad Henricum Franciæ Pontificem Regem Christianissimum. Paris, Jo. Borbon. 1577. REM. CRIT.]

[E] He was a Man of Courage and Resolution, as well as a Man of Management and Intrigue. * Peter Matthieu says, in his History of Henry IV, that the King came near Paris about an Enterprize contrived by his Servants, who promised to open a Gate to him. He knew by their means, adds the Historian, all that passed; and the most private Advices were carried by Corbinelli, a resolute Man, and extremely desirous to see the King's Cause triumph over Rebellion. Corbinelli, says the same Historian, wrote down all that he heard, and carried it publicly in his hand, as a Paper of common Business, or of a Law-suit. His bold and confident Face deceived the eyes of the Guards that were at the Gates; and by shewing that he trusted every Body, he was suspected by no Body (6). * Another Historian speaks of him in this manner: 'The King had many faithful Friends in the City, who gave him notice of every thing that passed, and kept themselves in a Readiness to facilitate his Entrance. Among the rest, James Corbinelli contributed to it with great Art and Diligence. He always carried his Advices in his hand like pieces of a Law-suit, to make himself less suspected by reason of his Boldness. Pressing his Majesty about the Execution of his Design, he only wrote these three Words to him, Come, Come, Come, written only in as much Paper as was needful to contain them, and he put them into a Quill sealed up, which the Messenger carried in his Mouth. — This Corbinelli was an Italian, of one of the most ancient and noble Families of Florence. He fled into France for having been accessory to the Conspiracy of Pandolfo Puccio, as Thuanus observes in his History (7).'

(7) Duplex, Hist. de Henri IV. pag. 22. ad ann. 1589.

(8) It is intitled, Extrait de tous les beaux endroits des Ouvrages des plus célèbres Auteurs de ce Temps, and printed at Amsterdam in 1681.

A REFLECTION upon the Parallel between the Ancients and the Moderns.

[F] Mr Corbinelli — is at present one of the best and finest Wits in France. The Preface does not observe that he published a Collection, in several Volumes, of the finest Passages that are to be found in the Works of the greatest Wits of this Age (8): wherefore I mention it. As for what remains, I refer my Reader to the Preface, which contains Mr Corbinelli's Character, described in a very delicate manner, and which does him a great deal of Honour. The pains, that he has taken to reduce the ancient Historians into Maxims, will contribute both to their Glory, and to the Instruction of the Public. The Author of the Preface very justly says, 'That those, who are good Judges, will take delight to see, that a vast number of Thoughts and Maxims, wherewith the Moderns adorn themselves, have been stolen from the Ancients, and that this alone will be sufficient to make the Merit of those great Men appear, and perhaps to reclaim some prepossessed Persons, who have not a due Respect and Admiration for Antiquity.' I make no doubt that, if the Ancients should be compared with the Moderns, taking their Thoughts singly and by themselves, one might easily be convinced that the Advantage does not lie on the side of the latter; for I do not believe that any body has had any noble and nice Thoughts in this Age, but what may be found in the Books of the Ancients. The most sublime

Metaphysical, and Moral Conceptions, which we admire in some Moderns, are to be met with in the Books of the ancient Philosophers; and therefore our Age cannot pretend to the Superiority, unless a whole Work of a Modern be compared with a whole Work of an Ancient. For can any one doubt, that a Work, which equals other Works, when the fine Parts of it are compared with the fine parts of them, will be inferior to them, if the weak things, contained in it, are more numerous and more gross than the weak things contained in the others. Can any one doubt, that, though Des Carter had found all the parts of his System in the Books of the Ancients, he would be more admirable than they, since he knew how to join together so many scattered things, and how to form a methodical System out of several Materials, which had no Connexion one with another?

Note, that Mr Corbinelli kept Correspondence by Letters with the Count de Bufl-Rabutin: This appears by the Letters of the latter, among which there are several Fragments of what Mr Corbinelli had writ to him: His Name is only denoted by a G.

[G] It was not known what Religion James Corbinelli was of. Thuanus says so: These are his Words; It was not known what Religion Corbinelli was of: it was a political Religion, according to the Florentine way; but he was a Man of good Morals (9). This Testimony is of great weight for two Reasons: I. Because Thuanus was a grave Man, and a Man of Probity; II. Because he was very well acquainted with Corbinelli. He had already said of him; 'I have been very well acquainted with Mr Corbinelli, a Florentine. He was a great Wit. He had a great Capacity for Business, and an excellent Judgment. He married an Englishwoman, by whom he had some Daughters, who are still at Court, in the Service of some Ladies. The Countess of Fiesque has one of them. He had but a small Fortune; but he lived very frugally, and went very neatly dressed. He was a great Friend of the Abbot d'Elbene (10).'

(9) See Thuanus, pag. m. 35.

(10) Ib. pag. 30.

[H] The Maréchal de Bassompierre inveighed against him. The Passage of Duplex, which I have mentioned above, gave occasion to it: 'There is nothing more cold and impertinent, the Maréchal censures him in this manner (11), than that whole Chapter: Was there no faithful Frenchman to be named, without alledging that Man, who was banished from Florence for Treason? What a fine Invention, to carry Advices in one's hand! They were not very important, since That, which he describes as most excellent, was Come, Come, Come. Had not the King been a very cunning Man, if he had minded such Advice? What has the History of France to do with Corbinelli's Extraction? And he must be an honest Man, since he was one of those who conspired against his Prince with Pandolfo Puccio, and was hanged on a Hook at the Palace Windows for his Crime.' Observe, that this Conspiracy, as heinous as it may be, does not invalidate what others say of Corbinelli's good Morals. State Conspiracies are the greatest Crimes that can be committed, and yet some Persons suffer themselves to be drawn into them, by Motives which they think to be very good, morally speaking: so true is it, that Man's Conscience is subject to the most deplorable Illusions. Brutus, and several of those, whom he engaged to murder Cæsar, were Men of good Morals, and of eminent Virtue.

(11) Remarques sur les vies de Henri IV & Louis XIII, de Duplex, pag. 11.

CORCEONE (ROBERT), Cardinal of the Title of St Stephen, on Mount Calvus, was an Englishman. He is spoken of in Moreri's Dictionary (a); but no mention is made there of what I am going to say. Having been sent into France by Pope Innocent III, for the Business of the Crusade, as well against the Albigenses as against the Saracens, he held a Council at Paris in the Year 1212, wherein

VOL. II

7 A

he

(a) At the Word Curson.

he caused good Regulations to be made for the Reformation of Manners. He forbade the Secular Clergy to engage themselves by Oath not to lend Books, or Houses, or other things, and not to borrow any thing, and not to be Security for any body. He forbade the Regulars to engage themselves by Oath not to lend Books, provided they took care to be indemnified, or to have the Books restored to them. He ordered them also not to lie two and two together [A]; and he made the same Prohibition to the Nuns, to avoid, as he said, the Danger of Incontinency. He held other Councils; he appointed Preachers for the Crusade, and very much tormented the Heretics; but he shewed so much Bitterness against the Clergy, and was so ready to give the Cross to all sorts of People, that Complaints were made against it at the Court of Rome. He made himself so odious by his Attempts upon the Rights of the Gallican Church, that they appealed from his Proceedings during the Council that he convoked at Beziers. The Deputies of the Clergy of France carried on their Appeal vigorously, and so confounded that Cardinal in a General Assembly held at Rome, that the Pope desired them to mitigate a little the grievous Complaints they made (b). Corceone brought many People, who had taken the Cross upon them, in the Year 1214, to Simon de Montfort, who made War with the Albigenses (c). He died in Palestine, where he had followed the Crusade, as may be seen in Moreri. Among other Works, he is the Author of a Treatise on this Question, Whether Origin is in Paradise or no.

(b) Taken from Spondanus's Ecclesiastical Annals, ad ann. 1212, n. 8.

(c) Id. Spondanus, ad ann. 1214, n. 2.

[A] He ordered them not to lie two and two together. Here is a Passage out of Peter St Romauld's Abregé du Tresor Chronologique (1): 'In the Year 1212, a Council was celebrated at Paris under Cardinal de Corceone; the Decrees whereof are to be found in Spondanus, and this among others: Interdicimus Regularibus & Monialibus ne bini, vel binæ, in lecto jaceant propter metum incontinentiæ. A little Book was printed in the Year 1643, written by a pious Priest, and approved by four Doctors: It is intituled, A Christian Advice concerning a Matter of great Importance: where, in the Author greatly desires, that the said Decree may be carefully observed, because of the Inconveniences, which he specifies as modestly as he can. That Book, though written never so modestly, must needs create an Indignation against the Law concerning Celibacy, since it produces such evil Consequences.

(1) St Romauld. Abregé Chronol. & Hist. Tom. III, pag. m. 127, 128.

CORDIER (MATURIN), in Latin Corderius, lived in the XVIth Century, and was one of the best Schoolmasters that could be desired; for he understood the Latin Tongue very well, was a Man of Virtue, and diligently applied himself to his Function; being as careful to form his Scholars to Wisdom, as to good Latin. He employed his long Life in teaching Children, as well at Paris, as at Nevers, Bourdeaux, Geneva, Neuchâstel, Lausanne, and lastly again at Geneva (a), where he died the eighth of September (b) 1564, at the Age of Eighty five Years, having taught Children of the sixth Class but three or four Days before his Death. He studied Divinity for some time at Paris, in the College of Navarre, about the Year 1528, after teaching a Class there; but he quitted that Study for his old Employment of a Grammarian (c). He taught at Nevers in 1534, 1535, and 1536 (d). Calvin, who had been his Pupil, at Paris, in the College of La Marche (e), dedicated to him his Commentary upon the first Epistle to the Thessalonians (f). The Country of Maturin Cordier is not exactly known. Some say he was of Normandy, and others of Percbe (g). He published several Books, which were very useful for the Instruction of School-Boys [A].

(a) Beza's Life of Calvin, or his Preface to Calvin's Commentary on Job, pag. m. 4.

(b) In the Latin Editions of Calvin's Life, it is 6 nonas Septembris; but it must be read idus and not nonas.

(c) Laun. Hist. Coll. Navar. pag. 200.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Beza's Life of Calvin, pag. 4. In a former Edition he had said, that it was in the College of St Barbe.

(f) Id. pag. 51.

(g) La Croix du Maine, pag. 318.

[A] He published several Books, which were very useful for the Instruction of School-Boys. Du Verdier vau Privas has given us the Titles of the following: Christian Epistles, at Lyons, in 16mo, by Loys Tachet, 1557; Sentences extracted from the Holy Scriptures for the Instruction of Children, printed in Latin and French, by Thibault Payen, 1551; Spiritual Songs, Twenty six in number, printed at Lyons, in 16mo, by John Cariot, in 1560 (1); A Looking Glass for Children, to form them to Civility and Virtue (2), at Paris, in 16mo, by John Bonfons; Cato's Latin Distichs, translated into French, printed at Lyons, in 8vo, by Thibault Payen, more than a hundred times, and since by others, being a Book Children commonly use at School (3). He adds, that Maturin Cordier's Colloquies have been translated from the Latin into French, by Gabriel Chappuis. There is no Book more useful to make Children speak Latin. It is writ in a pure Stile, and full of good Instructions. It has been printed an infinite Number of Times. La Croix du Maine observes, that (4) this Author writ, in French Verse, Remonstrances and Admonitions to the King, and the States of his Kingdom, printed in the Year 1561, at G, that is Geneva. Gesner, who published his Bibliothèque in 1545, says, that Cordier taught at that time at Neuchâstel: he gives us the Titles of some School-Books, which he had published (5), which I shall not mention, except this one, 'De corrupti sermonis apud Gallos emendatione, & Latine lo-quendi ratione, sive de Latini sermonis varietate & modis loquendi Lib. 1. adduntur autem etiam ipsæ phrasæ corruptæ, & Gallicæ interpretationes locutionum: ut in posterum videntur, earumque loco puræ ac elegantes eloquendi formulæ doceantur, quæ quidem non temere, sed secundum locos communes aliquot digestæ sunt. Plurimum sanè prodest hoc opus ad sermonem & variandum & locupletandum. In Latinis formulis sola contentum est linguæ proprietate: neque verborum fucum, neque longas & obscuras periphrases affectat, cum potissimum in puerorum gratiam conscriptum sit, propter quos etiam passim permulta pie & Christianè vivendi hortamenta interjiciuntur (6). — Of the corrupt Manner of speaking Latin amongst the French, and its Emendation; or the Variety of the Latin Language, and Forms of Speech Book 1. To which are added, the corrupt Phrases, and the French Translations; that they may be avoided for the Future, and pure and elegant Forms taught in their Place, digested in a regular Manner of Common-Place. This Work conduces much to the varying and enriching Discourse. In the Latin Forms it only aims at Propriety of Speech, not affecting a Pomp of Words, or tedious and obscure Circumlocutions, the Work being composed chiefly for the use of Boys, for whom there are also inserted many Pious and Christian Precepts of Life. Gesner informs us, that this Book was printed at Paris, by Robert Stephens, in 1536, in 4to; and at Basil, by

(1) In Epit. Cels. p. m. 596, marks the Edition of 1557, in 16mo.

(2) La Croix du Maine, pag. 318, observes, that this Book, since the Edition of Poitiers, in 1550, has been printed at Paris, by John Ruell, and others, in 1560, under the Title of Civilitæ Puérile.

(3) Du Verdier Biblioth. Franç. pag. 361.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 318.

(5) De Quantitate Syllabarum, de Latino Declinatio primum Oratio, &c.

(6) Gesner Bibli. folio 507 verso.

by Wessbemer, in 1537, in 4to. His Abbreviators ought to know, in the Year 1583, what I am going to mention. Maturin Cordier made many Emendations to this Work in the fourth Edition, printed by Robert Stephens. He was informed, that the Examples of ill Phrases, which he had set down in order to avoid them, had been a Prejudice to the young Scholars, because, by the natural Inclination we have to what is bad, they took more notice of those barbarous Expressions, which served to divert them, than of the polite Phrases. 'In Libelli nostri lectione unum esse hoc malum permulti affirmabant, quod pueri (ut natura in deteriorem partem ferre prout sumus) ridendi ac jocandi studio & libentius & sæpius in legendo corrupto sermone & Barbaris locutionibus, quam Latinis ediscendis, sese oblectarent. Ex quo fieri dicebant, ut nonnulli formandæ juventutis magistri discipulos omnino prohiberent ab ejus libri lectione: videlicet ne sermonis vitiiis, quæ nondum audierant, seinel in tenera ætate imbuti, ea vix umquam postea deponebant (7). — This Objection was made by several, that (as we are naturally prone to Degeneracy) Boys, to divert themselves, took more Pleasure, and were fonder of corrupt and barbarous Phrases, than of pure and polite Language. Whence it happened, say they, that some Masters strictly forbade their Scholars reading that Book: least, being tingured in their Infancy with a corrupt Manner of speaking, which they should not otherwise have known, they would scarcely ever after leave it. He was often advised to suppress this Part of the Book, and at last he consented to do it. The Title of this Book was altered in the fourth Edition, after this manner (8): Commentarius puerorum de quotidiano sermone, qui prius liber de corrupti sermonis Emendatione dicebatur.

(7) Matur. Cordierus Prefat. Comment. puerorum de quotidiano Sermone. (8) I know not the Date of it, the Author not mentioning it in his Preface. My Edition is of Paris. Ex Officina Roberti Stephani, 1580, in 8vo, which was made sixteen Years after the Death of Cordier: Mr de Lamoignon, Hiji. C. II. Navarr. pag. 701, makes the fourth Edition to be 1500, apud Robertum Stephanum.

CORICIUS (JOHN) lived very agreeably at Rome, in the Pontificate of Julius II, Leo X, and Clement VII. He made himself beloved by learned Men, because he had a great Affection for them; and they praised him so much, that they procured him a very great Reputation. He had them very often together in his Garden (a), and afforded a noble Exercise to all the Poets, whom the Liberality of Leo X had invited to Rome (b); for he appointed a Combat of Poetry [A]; which was celebrated every Year on St Anne's Day (c): the Subject of it was an Elogy upon that Saint, upon the Virgin Mary, and JESUS CHRIST (d). He fell into the Hands of the Soldiers, who took the City of Rome in the Year 1527; and it cost him a very great Ranfom (e). He had hid part of his Money under the Door of the Court of his House: no body knew it but the Mason, who had closed up the Hole. That Mason desired him to lend him Twenty five Pistoles, which he wanted to redeem himself out of the Soldiers Hands; and not being able to obtain them, he revealed the whole Secret to a Spanish Captain. That Captain went to Coricius's House, took the Master aside on several Pretences, and carried the Money away. Coricius complained of it to the Generals, but to no purpose; so that finding himself reduced to great Necessity, he endeavoured to get out of Rome; which he did after many Difficulties. He was maintained for some time at Verona by the Liberality of Calystus Amadeus (f); and as he was preparing himself to return to Triers, his native Country (g), he fell sick, and died overwhelmed with Grief and Vexation (h).

(a) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, lib. 2. de Litterator. infelicit. pag. m. 87.

(b) Paulus Jovius Elog. cap. 103. pag. m. 241.

(c) Pierius Valerianus, ubi supra.

(d) Jovius, ubi supra.

(e) Pier. Valerianus, ubi supra.

(f) Calysti Amadei ejus urbis propædæditi libralitate sustinetur. Id. ibid. pag. 83.

(g) Jovius, ubi supra.

(h) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, ubi supra.

[A] Learned Men praised him very much — He appointed a Combat of Poetry.] I will quote Paul Jovius for it: 'Franciscus Arfillus scripsit — lepidum item libellum de Poetis urbanis mihi tanquam veteri sodali dedicatum (1), quum Leone ingenio liberaliter aridente, multi undique poetæ illustres, nequaquam ad inanes spes, in Urbem confluxissent, & pulcherrimo quodam certamine à singulis in una tantum statuae materia scriberetur, qua carminum farragine Coritius homo Trevir, humani juris libellis præpositus, uti perhumanus poetarum hospes, ac admirator inclaruit; ea scilicet statua insigni marmorea Aureliano in templo dedicata, invitatique vatibus, ut tria numina Christi Dei, & Matris, ac Avæ uno in signo celebrarent (2). — F. Arfillus wrote an ingenious Treatise on the City Poets, dedicated to me as an old Companion; when, by Leo's great Encouragement of Wit, many excellent Poets came from all Parts to Rome, and met with favours they had been promised: The Subject of one Statue was proposed for a Trial of Poetical Skill. In the Collection of which Poems, Coritius, a Gentleman of Treves, is highly extolled for the generous Reception and Patronage he gave to Poets. The Statue was that celebrated one of Marble in the Aurelian Temple, and the Poets were invited to celebrate God the Son, the Virgin Mary, and St Anne, in the same Piece.' Longolius speaks of those Assemblies, and these Entertainments on St Anne's Day, and he even says they once quarrelled there: but does not enter into the Particulars: writing to a Man who was well acquainted with the Affair. 'De eodem Gorytio illud mihi velim diligenter perscribas, æquid faerum Annæ diem anniversario illo studiosorum hominum conventu epulisque celebravit: an vero propter anni superioris dissidium, cœnas facere omnino desierit: an sodalitatem potius illam (scis quam dico) non vocaret: reliquis cœnam dederit. Neque vero quam eos laute splendideque acceperit, quæro: novi hominis magnificentiã, sed quid dictum, quamque frequens convivium eo hominum genere fuerit, qui se academicos & esse & numerari exillimant. Subvercor interdum, ut cum illis in gratiam redierit. Contra cum mihi in mentem venit, illis & cœnas & hortos Epicuri mirum in modum probari, hunc autem mensas non sumptuose minus quam libenter instruere, jam nihil inimicitiarum reliquum esse suspicor. Tu me velim de tota diei illius ratione certior facias (3). — I desire likewise that you would carefully inform me of the same Gorytius, whether he has celebrated the Festival of St Anne, by the Anniversary Entertainment of the Wits, or whether the last Year's Quarrel has induced him to leave it off; or whether he chose not to invite a certain Fraternity, you know at whom I hint. I do not enquire with what Magnificence he entertained. I am no stranger to the Greatness of his Mind; but upon what their Conversation turned, and how oft these would-be Literati met. Sometimes I fear his Reconciliation; but when I reflect how like Epicures these Gentlemen are wonderfully devoted to Gardens and Regalio, and that he entertains with no less Chearfulness than Grandeur, I imagine their Animosity cannot long subsist; from you I desire an Account of the whole Day.'

(3) Longolius Eulst. lib. 2. folio m. 183.

CORNELIA, the Wife of Pompey. See the last Remark of the Article MUCIA.

CORNELLIUS

(a) At the Remark [B].

(b) It is 1532, beginning the Year in January.

(1) See more exactly the Title of Cornellius's Book, in the Remark [B] of the Article WECHEL.

(2) Observe, this Mr Du Bourg was of Auvergne as well as our Cornellius.

(3) Remark [A].

(a) Taken from Mariana, Chapter 17, Book XVI, of his History of Spain.

CORNELLIUS (ANTONY), Licentiate of Civil-Law, and Author of a Book, which I have mentioned in the Article WECHEL (a), was a Native of Billi [A], upon the Frontiers of Auvergne, and lived in the Time of Francis I. Father Garasse is guilty of many Blunders concerning that Book [B], which was printed off in January 1531 (b), the Author of it was then very young [C].

[A] He was a Native of Billi. I prove this by the Epigram at the end of Querela infantium (1). Guillelmi Nuri Judicis Billienlis ad Antonium Cornelli Billiensem utriusque Juris Licentiatum doctiss. Hexastichon.

Olim in te puero quiddam haud vulgare videbar
Perspicere, Antoni, talia signa dabas.
At neque destituis spem tu jam grandior istam,
Imo infinitis vincis ubique modis.
Id tibi testatur facile liber ille, puellus
Intinctos ubi litem instituisse facis

Whilst yet your Genius bloom'd, our hopes began
Of something fair, when ripen'd into Man.
Still as you grew, our Expectations rose,
But your superior Worth no limits knows.
This the strong Sense of your Complaint has shown,
Where Babes are taught a Language not their own.

[B] Author of a Book — Father Garasse has made many blunders concerning this Book. I have plainly proved this, in the Remark [B] of the Article WECHEL; but since the second Edition of this Dictionary, I have received an Analysis of the Querela Infantium, which concludes with these Words: 'Give me leave to draw from hence some Consequences: I. That his Name, Antonius Cornelli, is not a feigned Name, as Father Garasse pretends, in his Somme Theologique, pag. 19, and 298: this may be inferred from the Epistle Dedicatory. Is it credible, that a Man disguised would dare to dedicate his Book to Antony du Bourg (2), Lieutenant-Civil of the Prevostie of Paris, and afterwards Chancellor; that he should call him therein his Mæcenas, and relate some particulars between that Magistrate and himself? II. The Epigram mentioned above (3), removes all Reason to doubt, that Cornellius was not his true Name. A Man, who does not conceal his Country, and to whom the Judge of the Place address his Verses, shall he disguise his Name? The least attention to these Circumstances takes off all Suspicion. III. By what has been already said of the Treatise in question, it plainly appears, that it is not so infamous and detestable, as Father Garasse would persuade us. IV. And therefore it is false what that Jesuit says, that the Impression of that vile Book has drawn down the Wrath of God upon the Printer (4). I have observed in another place (5), that there are two Copies of this Book of Cornellius, in the Library of the Archbishop of Rheims, and that Mr Bourdelot (6) has done me the favour to send me his Copy. Since that, Mr Lancelot has informed me, that there is also one of them in the Mazarine Library, and he heard there was one in the Royal Library, and in other Places. Another Person has sent me Word, that the Copy in the Mazarine Library, N^o. 2634 is bound in Paste-board covered with red Paper, with another Book, intitled: Discurso Cattolico & Apologia Historica cavata dal Vecchio e Nuovo Testamento, & ornata de diverse Historie, composta dal eccellente Dottor Camillo Borrello sopra un Giudicio fatto intorno à quella Sentenza di Pilato che li anni passati fu trovata nel l'Aquila Città d'Abruzzo. Opera veramente utile, nella quale si descrivono diversi concetti notabili si di Teologia, come anco d'Historie e d'Annali, ove con molte Autorità e Sentenze de Scrittori approvati si scuopre se detta Sentenza è vera, o no. Drizzata alla Santità di N. S. Sisto V Sommo Pontefice, con la Tavola delle materie principali, & cose più notabili, ch' in essa si contengono. In Napoli, appresso Horatio Salviati, 1588. This Book is addressed to Paul Jovius (7); and they have taken a great deal of Pains in it, to prove that the Sentence of Pilate, found in the City of Aquila in the Abruzzo, is fictitious.

[C] The Author of it was very young. This may be inferred from these Words, in his Advertisement to the Reader: 'Quod si quid deprehenderit nota dignum pro tua facilitate in meliorem interpretare partem, ETATIQUE meae adscribe atque condona. — If you meet with any thing worthy of Censure, put a favourable Construction upon it, ascribing it to my AGE, and let that plead my Excuse.'

CORONEL (ALPHONSUS), a great Spanish Lord, mistrusting Don Pedro the Cruel, King of Castile, formed a Party in Andalusia, to be in a Condition to hold out against his King. He raised Men, fortified Places, and sent his Son-in-law John de la Cerda into Mauritania to desire Assistance. He relied chiefly on the City of Aiguilar, where he commanded. Don Pedro, having taken some other Places from him, prepared himself to lay siege to that, when more urgent Affairs obliged him to march towards Asturia, where one of his Brothers had revolted. But as soon as he had pacified that Province, and the Troubles that were elsewhere, he returned into Andalusia, and attacked Aiguilar. Coronel defended himself with great Vigour for four Months. At last the Town was taken by Assault in the Month of February 1353. He was at Mafes when News was brought him that the Enemies had entered the Town. This did not oblige him to interrupt his Devotions; but he kept there till Mafes was over, and then he shut himself up in a Tower. He was taken there, and tried as a Rebel; I mean, that he was put to Death, as being guilty of High Treason (a). Mary, one of his Daughters, was so zealous for the Preservation of her Chastity, that she chose rather to kill herself, than put that Virtue to any hazard [A]. What she did upon that account is so strange, that I must needs relate it. See the Remark [A].

[A] One of his Daughters — chose rather to kill herself, than to put her Chastity to any Hazard. Her Husband John de la Cerda having in vain sought for Assistance among the Moors of Granada, and among those of Africa, returned into Portugal, where he lived in a mournful Exile. Mary Coronel, his Wife, could not bear his Absence; and, for fear of falling into the Temptations of Nature, killed herself. I cannot express, in our Language, the Invention she made use of; and therefore I shall set down the Latin words of Mariana. 'Ejus uxor

Maria Coronellia, cum mariti absentiam non ferret, ne pravis cupiditatibus cederet, vitam posuit, ardentem forte libidinem igne extinguens adacta per muliebria titione. Dignam meliore seculo feminam, insignem studium castitatis (1). That Author does not contradict himself, in maintaining on the one side, that the Love of Virtue was extraordinary in that Lady, and in supposing on the other, that is likely she was tormented with the heat of the Flesh; for the most ardent Love of Chastity does not necessarily exclude the mechanical Dispositions

(4) Manuscript Memoir, communicated by Mr Lancelot.

(5) In the Remark [B] of the Article WECHEL.

(6) He is first Physician to the Dukes of Burgundy.

(7) It contains 144 Pages.

(1) Mariana, de rebus Hispaniae, lib. 16. cap. 17. pag. 80. Edit. Mogunt. 1619. in quæst.

sitions to Incontinency. That Lady being fully resolved to do nothing against her Duty, and sensibly affected with the Love of Purity, struggled with Nature; but she could not always prevent, nor put a stop to, Temptations. Such a Warfare seemed to her too troublesome, and too dangerous, and brought her into Despair. She exceeded the Evangelical Counsels. We find indeed in the Scripture (2), If thine Eye offend thee pluck it out, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy Members should perish, and not that thy whole Body should be cast into Hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy Members should perish, and not that thy whole Body should be cast into Hell: but we do not find there, that it is lawful to kill one's self to prevent a Temptation. She might have executed that Evangelical Precept, or Counsel, literally, without killing herself. Origen, Ambrosius Morales, and some others, performed it in the literal Sense, and did not die of it (§ 2). You have read in the Conferences of a Jesuit (3), 'What an Albanian Woman did, not to declare the Secrets of her Friends: after having endured the Rack with an incredible Constancy, she bit her Tongue off, and spit it in the Face of the Tyrant, who had a mind to know of her what she would not tell.' You have also read that Author's Reflexion upon it: That Woman had reason to fear that her Tongue would serve her an ill Turn, and she did wisely to part with it

(4). This Reflexion cannot be well applied to the Action of Mary Coronel. A more exact Parallel might be drawn between Porcia, Brutus's Wife, and the Wife of John de la Cerdá; but it would contain several Differences. Porcia, the Daughter of Cato Uticensis, and Brutus's Wife, killed herself by swallowing live-coals (5); but it was only out of Vanity, not to out-live her Husband, and to shew herself a faithful Disciple of the Sect of the Stoics, which her Father and her Husband had been so fond of.

[§ 2.] It is easy to conceive how Men may perform this Operation upon themselves; but it does not appear in what manner Women can do it. Mr Venete, in the last Chapter of his Book, intitled, Le Tableau de l'Amour conjugal, says, 'Without doubt Women may be made incapable of conceiving, by taking from them the, &c. But the Difficulty is to know, how the Ancients proceeded in this matter: and to give my Opinion, I do not believe that the Operation could be performed without great danger.' Perhaps the following Book, which I have never seen, may give some account of it. Eunuchi nati, facti, & mystici, ex sacra & humana Literatura illustrati. Zacharias Pasqualis puerorum emasculator ob Musicam quo loco habendus. Responso ad questum per Epistolam J. Heriberti. Divione 1655, in 4to. This Book is ascribed to Father Theophilus Raynaud. REM. CRIT.]

(4) Ibid. pag. 198.

(5) Valer Max. lib. 4. cap. 6. n. 5.

(2) Matth. cap. v. ver. 29, 30.

(3) Entretiens d'Ariste & d'Eugene, 3. Entretien, p. m. 197.

(2) Menétrier, Representations en Musique, pag. 232.

(b) Ib. pag. 233. & seq.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 235.

COSTA (MARGARET), was born at Rome, and lived in the XVIIth Century. She had a Genius for Poetry, and she prepared a Feast on Horse-back, in the Form of a Carrousel and of a Ballet, for the King of France. The Subject of that Entertainment was a Challenge between Apollo and Mars (a). You may find the Description of it in a Book of Father Menétrier (b). 'The Performance of that Design appearing too difficult, Orpheus was preferred before it, and represented in the Year 1647 [A]. Nevertheless, that Entertainment of Signora Costa was printed with her other Poems, which she dedicated to Cardinal Mazarin (c).'

[A] She prepared a Feast on Horse-back — Orpheus was preferred before it.] 'In the Year 1647, Cardinal Mazarin, who had a mind to introduce the Diversions of Italy into France, sent for some Actors from Italy, who represented Orpheus and Eurydice in the Royal Palace, in Italian Verse and Music, with wonderful Decorations of the Stage, and some Machines which had not yet been seen (1). You may find the Description and Analysis of that Opera in Father Menétrier (2): 'The Success of that Representation, the Novelty whereof surprised every Body, by the wonderful Changes of the extraordinary Decorations, and by the harmonious singing, as well as by the Variety of Dresses, and Comforts, occasioned the renewing of that Spectacle at his Majesty's Wedding, where Ercole Amante was acted, whose Italian Composition was translated into French Verse for the Satisfaction of those that did not understand Italian (3). It will be said, that this is needless as to Signora Margherita Costa. I grant it: but because a great many Readers will be glad to be informed of that first Essay of Opera's in the same place where I have incidentally mentioned it, I thought I ought not to suppress this Remark.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 205.

(1) Menétrier, Representations en Musique, pag. 295.

(2) Ibid. from page 195 to page 205.

(a) Second Part, pag. 174, and following, of the Dutch Edition.

(b) The Lives of some French Authors are prefixed to them. That of Cotin is to be found there, pag. 66 of the Dutch Edition, 1699.

COTIN (CHARLES) a Parisian, one of the French Academy, very ill used in the Satires of Mr Boileau: See his Apology, and several Particulars of his Life, in the Parallel of Mr Perrault (a). See also the Letters collected by Richelet (b). He died in January 1682 (c).

COTYS, King of Thrace, Cotemporary with Philip, Father of Alexander, reigned Twenty four Years. At first he gave himself over to Luxury, and to a voluptuous Life; and Prosperity having made him more proud afterwards, he became so cruel, that he split his Wife in two, beginning with the Privy-Parts (a). Athenæus, according to Dalechamp's Translation, does not relate the thing in that manner [A]; but that is an ill Version, as the learned Maussac has very well observed

(c) Mercure Galant, March 1612, pag. 143.

(a) Harpocration in voce Κόρυς.

(1) *Ος δ' αὐτὸν τῶν τῶν βασιλέων τῶν, ἐν τῇ ὁράσει γὰρ γυναικῶν, μάλιστα πρὸς ἡδονὰς καὶ τρυφῆς ὡμιῶν. Omnium Virorum quorum quotquot uoluptatibus ac delectationibus. Athen. lib. 12. cap. 8. pag. 531.

[A] He split his Wife in two — — — Athenæus, according to Dalechamp's Translation, does not relate the thing in that manner.] Having said that Cotys, the most voluptuous Prince that ever reigned in Thrace (1), did not begin to be unhappy till he had offended Minerva, he relates what I am going to say. Cotys once pretended to marry that Goddess; the Marriage Feast was given; the Nuptial-Chamber was prepared, and there wanted nothing but the Bride. Cotys, having drunk hard, waited impatiently for her; and not seeing her come, he was mad at it, and sent one of his Guards to know whether she was come to the Chamber that was prepared for her. He brought the King word that he had seen no Body there; which put that furious Prince into such a Passion, that he killed the Messenger. He sent another, who returned with the same Answer, and was served like the first. The third, whom he sent, thinking to avoid the like Misfortune, would not tell him that no Body was there; but assured him that Minerva had expected the King a great while. But his Imposture had no better Success than their Ingenuity: Cotys, being seized with a Fit of Jealousy, as if the third Messenger had made use of the Opportunity, which the Impatience of the Bride might afford him, fell upon him, and cut him in pieces, beginning with the Privy parts. 'Ο δὲ βασιλεὺς ἔτις ποτὶ καὶ ἐνδοσπύσσας τὴν αὐτὴν γυναῖκα ταῖς αὐτῇ χερσὶν ἀνέτεμε τὸν ἀσθροπὸν ἀπὸ τῶν αἰδοίων ἀρξάμενος. Tum rex zelotypia percitus ne quid in uxorem suam ausus ille fuisset, manibus suis militem conficit ac dispersit à pudendis observed [B]. Cotys died a violent Death: one Python killed him, and retired to Athens, where his Action was magnificently rewarded (b) [C]. His Brother helped him to kill that King; which they did to revenge their Father. Aristotle, who says this [D], observes, that one Adamas rebelled against Cotys, to revenge himself of an Injury he had received from him in his Youth: Cotys had caused him to be castrated. Cersobleptes, the Son of Cotys, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom: He had a Sister, who was the Wife of Iphicrates [E]. I believe this is the Cotys Plutarch made mention of in his Apophthegms [F]. He speaks elsewhere of a COTYS, King of Paphlagonia, who made an Alliance with Agesilaus, and married

(4) Demosthenes ad. crif. Aristocratem, pag. 452. A.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 532, ex Theopompo.

(1) I followed him, but rectify my Error in this third Edition, according to the Advice of Mr. Vossius la Croix.

(4) See, above, Citat. (2), the Greek Words of Theopompus, and Dalechamp's Translation of them.

(5) Philippus Jacobus Maufficus Not. ad Harpocratem, pag. 221, Edit. Lug. Bat. 1583.

(6) Demosthenes advers. Aristocratem, pag. m. 445. C. See the following Remark.

(7) Demosth. ib. pag. 446. C.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid. pag. 445. C.

(10) Plutarch. de sui laude, pag. 542, E. & de gerenda Republica, pag. 816, E.

(11) Lib. 9, n. 65.

(12) Demosth. ubi supra, pag. 445. B.

(13) Valer. Max. lib. 7, cap. 7, circa finem.

prudens exorsus (2). This is Athenæus's account, if we follow his Translator: but he is not to be followed (3); he does not observe, that the Words, 'Ο δὲ Γερσίππος ἐπὶ τῷ ποταμῷ, are the beginning of another Story, and signify Rex iste aliquando.

[B] ----- as the learned Maufficus has very well observed it. He pretends that Theopompus affirms the same thing in Athenæus, as Harpocratem, to wit, that Cotys cut his own Wife in Pieces; and he censures Dalechamp for having translated Athenæus, as if the third Messenger had been served so, and not the Queen herself. 'Eruditissimus Dalecampius longissime erravit à veritate historiarum cum hæc Græca verba Theopompi ----- ita vertit

(4). ----- Imo è contrario mulierem propriam disceperit: ut optime habet Harpocratem, quod designant evidentiissime illa verba τὴν ἀνδρῶν: falsissimum autem est eum conscidisse tertium militem. Fraudis fuit sine dubio eruditissimo illi interpreti vox ἀνδρῶν, cui non animadvertit conjunctum esse articulum τῆς, & hoc in loco mulierem significare. Hæc velim dicta in favorem rudiorum (5). ----- The learned Dalechamp has quite deviated from the Truth of History, in translating the Greek of Theopompus in this manner. 'For, on the contrary, he cut his own Wife to pieces, as Harpocratem has very justly observed, and which the Words τὴν ἀνδρῶν most plainly demonstrate; that he served the Soldier in this manner is undoubtedly false. The learned Translator was probably led into this Mistake by the Word ἀνδρῶν, to which he did not observe, that the Article τῆς was prefixed, and that in this place it signifies the Woman. I mention this for the sake of younger Readers.'

[C] One Python killed him, and retired to Athens, where his Action was magnificently rewarded. When he did that Action, he was assisted by his Brother Heracles (6). After that Murder, he could not have found a place of Safety every where (7); but he thought Athens would be a very good Sanctuary, because of the long Wars they had had with Cotys. So he went thither, and desired that the Rights of a Citizen might be granted him (8). He not only obtained that Privilege (9), but also a Crown of Gold; and they loaded him with so many Praises in the Speeches that were made before the People, that perceiving they exposed him to Envy, by extolling to the Sky the Murder that he had committed, he found out an Expedient to allay the Jealousy that was raising against him (10). He presented himself before the People, and declared that he pretended nothing to the Glory of that Action, that he had only been the Instrument of a Deity, and that consequently all the Merit of it was to be ascribed to that Deity. Diocles says falsely in Diogenes Laertius (11), that it was the Philosopher Pyrrho, who was honoured with the Freedom of Athens, as a Reward for the Murder of Cotys. The War had made a great Alteration in the Minds of the Athenians; for they had formerly given the Freedom of their City, and a Crown of Gold, to Cotys (12). It is pretended, that, to shew them that he valued himself as much as they, he made them Citizens of Thrace. 'Capax generosi spiritus illud quoque civitatem regis Cotys: ut enim ab Atheniensibus civitatem sibi datam cognovit; Et ego, inquit, illis meæ gentis vii dabo. Aequavit Athenis Thraciam, ne vicissitudine talis beneficii imparem se judicando, humiliter de origine sua sentire existimaretur (13). ----- As soon as Cotys understood that the Athenians had presented him with the Freedom of their City, and I, says he, in return will make them free of my Nation, which expression shews him to have been of a generous Spirit. He put Thrace on a level with Athens, lest by showing himself 'unable to return the Compliment, he might be thought to have too mean an Opinion of his Country.'

[D] Python and his Brother did this to revenge their Father's Death. Aristotle ----- informs us of this. It is in the tenth Chapter of the Fifth Book of his Politics. Something must be corrected in it. Πάρον δὲ καὶ Ἡρακλίδης οἱ Αἰνιοὶ Κότυν διασέβαν, τῷ πατρὶ τιμωρῶντες. Jam Paro & Heracleida Enii Cotyn interemerunt, patris injuriam ulciscetes. This is what is to be found in my Edition of Aristotle (14), which is that of Geneva 1605. It must be Πύρων instead of Πάρον, and the Words ought to be rendered thus, Jam Python & Heracleides, &c. I must not forget that Plutarch observes, that those two Murderers of Cotys had been Plato's Disciples (15). See also Philostratus in the first Chapter of the seventh Book of the Life of Apollonius, wherein he says, that they were of the Sect of the Academics.

[E] His Son ----- had a Sister, who was the Wife of Iphicrates. Menestheus, who proceeded from that Marriage, said one day, that he valued his Mother more than his Father, because his Mother had done all her Endeavours to make him an Athenian, whereas his Father had done his utmost Endeavours to make him a Thracian. 'Menesthea filium reliquit (Iphicrates) ex Thressa natum, Coti regis filia. Is cum interrogaretur, utrum pluris matrem patremve faceret; matrem, inquit. Id cum omnibus mirum videretur: at ille, merito, inquit, facio. Nam pater quantum in se fuit, Thracem me genuit: contra mater, Atheniensem (16). Such was the Pride of the Athenians; they preferred the Freedom of their City to the Quality of a King's Son-in-law and Grandchild, and they bestowed great Rewards on the Murderers of a crowned-head. Demosthenes informs us, that Iphicrates, tho' loaded with Honours in his Country, engaged in a Sea fight against the Athenians, for the Interest of his Father-in-law. He adds, that Cotys, being most ungrateful for that Service, did not endeavour to facilitate a Pardon for Iphicrates, by any Civilities to the People of Athens; but, on the contrary, he would have him to exasperate the Athenians more and more against him, by employing him in the Attack of their other Places: and because he could not obtain that from him, he deprived him of the Command of his Troops, and reduced him to the miserable necessity of seeking a corner of the Earth for his Retreat. For, when Iphicrates found himself disgraced at the Court of Cotys, he durst not retire to Athens, having lately bore Arms against his Country (17). I forgot to observe, that there is a Jest of the Poet Anaxandrides, in Athenæus (18), on the Entertainment that Cotys gave on his Daughter's Wedding-day with Iphicrates.

[F] I believe this is the Cotys that Plutarch made mention of in his Apophthegms. Cotys, mentioned by Plutarch, was a passionate Man, who corrected his Servants cruelly when they committed any Fault. He had a noble Present sent him; which was, some very fine Vessels of Earthen Ware, adorned with fine Painting: He rewarded him who brought them, but caused them all to be broke (19), because he foresaw that his Servants could not avoid breaking so brittle a Matter as that; which if they should do, he could not forbear to punish them too severely (20). This suits well enough with our Cotys. Moreri applies it to another Cotys, who took Pompey's part, says he: But the Places, that he quotes, contain nothing like it; and I do not question but that he is mistaken. We shall see his other Faults in the following Remark. Observe that I do not deny that there was one Cotys King of Thrace, who sent his Son (21) to Pompey at the Head of Five hundred Horse.

[G] Tacitus

(14) Pag. 305. D.

(15) Plut. Adv. Colotem, pag. 1120.

(16) Cornel. Nepos in Iphicrate, sub fin.

(17) Ex Demosth. ubi supra, pag. 447.

(18) Lib. 4, cap. 3, pag. 131.

(19) Plut. in Apoph. pag. 174.

(20) Compare with this what Augustus did in the House of Vedius Pollio, apud Senecam de Ira, lib. 3, cap. 4, pag. m. 581. and the Advice which Plutarch, lib. de Ira Celsenda, pag. 461, E, gives to passionate People, not to have any precious Vessels in their Houses.

(21) Called Sosicles. See Cicero de Bello Civ. lib. 3, cap. 4, pag. m. 311. See also Lucan, lib. 5, ver. 34.

married a handsome Maid by that means (c). Livy makes mention of one COTYS, King of the Odryæ, who fought faithfully against the Romans for Perseus King of Macedonia (d). Tacitus speaks of some Princes called COTYS, of whom Moreri does not give a good Account [G].

(c) In Vita Agrippæ, pag. 601.
(d) Livius, lib. 42.

[G] Tacitus speaks of some Princes called COTYS, of whom Moreri does not give a good Account.]

I. He says that Cotys King of Thrace divided his Kingdom with his Uncle Rhescuporis, in Nero's time. He should have said, that, after the Death of Rhemetalces (22) King of Thrace, Augustus divided that Kingdom between the Son and Brother of the deceased. Rhescuporis, who was the Brother, had, for his share, such Places as were least cultivated, and nearest to the Enemy. Cotys, who was the Son, obtained the nearest Countries to Greece. This is what Tacitus says in the Sixty fourth Chapter of the second Book of his Annals. II. And therefore it was a great Mistake to cite Tacitus l. 11. § 12. Annal. § 1. 2. Hist. It is true, that in the Eleventh Book we find a COTYS, King of the lesser Armenia, whom Moreri speaks of; but no mention is made of that Cotys in the Twelfth Book, nor of any Cotys in the second Book of the History; and consequently Moreri's Citations are very false, since this Question may be asked him, besides what I have just now observed, Why have you not cited any Body concerning Cotys, who, as you say, divided his Kingdom with Rhescuporis? COTYS, mentioned in the Twelfth Book of the Annals, was the Brother of Mithridates King of Bosphorus. It is likely that he, who is mentioned in the Eleventh Book, was the Son of that Cotys King of Thrace, whom his Uncle Rhescuporis treated so cruelly. I shall speak of him hereafter. That which makes me believe that he was his Son, is, that the Emperor Caligula, giving the lesser Armenia, and part of Arabia, to Cotys, gave the States of that same Cotys to Rhemetalces (23). That Rhemetalces was doubtless the same, who, after the Condemnation of Rhescuporis, the Murderer of Cotys, obtained part of Thrace from Tiberius, whilst the other part was given to the Sons of Cotys (24). III. Moreri's greatest Fault is an Omission. He had in his hands an Account full of Morality, the Materials whereof were supplied him by Tacitus; Why did he not make his Advantage of them? I will not imitate his Negligence. The two Princes, between whom Augustus divided Thrace, were of a very different Humour. Cotys was an honest, polite, mild, and agreeable Man; Rhescuporis was fierce, cruel, and ambitious, and could not suffer any Companion. 'Ipsorumque regum ingenia, illi mite & amicum, huic atrox, avidum & societatis impatiens erat' (25). By that Remark Tacitus prepared his Readers to see, without any Astonishment, the Catastrophe that he was to represent. - Any Reader, that is not stupid, will expect after this to see Cotys deprived of his Dominions. It were a kind of a Miracle, if the Share of an honest Man did not become the Prey of an ill Man. Rhescuporis, during the Life of Augustus, whose Power he feared, seemed to be a Friend to his Neighbour, and made but slow Usurpations; but as soon as he heard of that Prince's Death, he kept within no bounds. Tiberius, being informed of it, let them know that he would have them end their Differences peaceably. There needed no more to oblige Cotys to disarm: and as he judged of others by himself, he consented to an Interview which Rhescuporis proposed to him: and the better to shew his Sincerity, he accepted of the Invitation to the Entertainment that Rhescuporis was to give him under pretence of cementing their Alliance. He represented to him, in vain, the Laws of Sincerity and Hospitality; for he found himself loaded with Chains after the Feast. 'Rhescuporis, sicca modestia, postulat eundem in locum coiretur, posse de controversiis colloquio transigi. Nec diu dubitatum de tempore, loco, dein conditionibus: cum alter facilitate, alter fraude cuncta inter se concederent, acciperentque. Rhescuporis faciendo, ut discitabat, foederi, convivium adjicit; tra- & etaque in multam noctem læticia, per epulas ac vinolentiam incautum Cotyn, & postquam dolum intellexerat, sacra regni, ejusdem familiæ deos, & hospitales mensas obstantem, catenis onerat' (26). Rhescuporis, having possessed himself of all Thrace, wrote to the Emperor, that he found himself obliged to do it, to prevent Cotys, who had plotted against him. 'Thracia omni potius scripsit ad Tiberium structas sibi insidias, præventum insidiatorem' (27). This is the usual Perfidiousness wherewith the most unjust Men cover their black Attempts. Tiberius made him answer, that if he was innocent, he ought to have no Mistrust; and that he should set Cotys at liberty, and come to Rome to discuss his Rights there. By a much more cunning piece of Policy than is thought, he chose rather to be guilty of a complete Crime, than of one half committed: he caused Cotys to be killed, and published that Cotys had made away with himself. 'Rhescuporis inter metum & iram cunctatus maluit patrati quam inter cepti facinoris reus esse: occidi Cotyn jubet, mortemque sponte sumptam ementitur' (28). But divine Justice did not suffer him to enjoy long such a wicked Usurpation. He was not cunning enough to avoid the Emperor's Snares (29): He was obliged to come to Rome, where the Senate, upon the Accusation that the Widow of Cotys entered against him, deprived him of his Kingdom, and even of his Liberty. He was carried to Alexandria, and put to Death, either because he endeavoured to make his Escape, or because they pretended he had committed some Crime. His Son Rhemetalces, who had no share in his Wickedness, had likewise none in his Punishment. Thrace was divided between him and the Sons of Cotys; and because the latter were not of Age, they were put under the Guardianship of Trebellienus Rufus, who was Regent of the Kingdom. The fourth Fault of Moreri is his distinguishing Cotys, the Nephew of Rhescuporis, from him whom Ovid speaks of; for it is not to be questioned, but that he to whom that Poet inscribed an Elegy, is the same with him that Tacitus praises, and to whom Augustus gave part of Thrace. Ovid praises him very much, and desires his Protection. He informs him in one place that he is an Exile in the Neighbourhood of his Dominions (30); and in another, that he lives in his Fortresses (31). This is somewhat obscure. We learn from this Epistle of Ovid, that Cotys had studied, and even that he had made good Verses:

Adde, quod ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores, nec finit esse feros.
Nec regum quicquam magis est instructus in illis,
Mitibus aut studiis tempora plura dedit.
Carmina testantur: quæ si tua nomina demas,
Threicium juvenem composuisse negem.

Science, the Soul's best Physic, mends Mankind,
And softens the native Fierceness of the Mind.
To thee, dread Sire, are all her Virtues known,
Virtues that rarely reach the gilded Throne.
The Muses too thy softer Hours inspire,
And warm the Scythian with Poetic Fire.

The Antiquity of his Family was so considerable, that it reached back to Eumolpus (32). Now Eumolpus is he who taught the Athenians the Mysteries of their Religion (33). V. Lastly, what Moreri says, that Cotys was a certain King of the Getæ, among whom Ovid was exiled, may be condemned. It is certain that Cotys's Kingdom was Thrace, and not the Country of the Getæ. It may be that Cotys kept Garrison in Tomi, the place of Ovid's Exile: but that is not to be King of the Getæ; and so Lipsius seems to be in the wrong when he says, In hujus regno vates ille exulavit, quod scire volo juventutem (34). Did ever any one beseech a Prince, when one is in his Kingdom, to order it so that he may live safely in the Neighbourhood of his Dominions? Yet this is the Conclusion of Ovid's Request.

Hæc (35) quoniam careo, tua nunc vicinia præstat
Inviso possim tutus ut esse loco.

Some

(22) I think it is he whom Dion speaks of, lib. 54. pag. m. 624. ad ann. 743. & lib. 55. pag. 651. ad ann. 759. He was, if I am not mistaken, the Brother of one Rhescuporis (Son of COTYS), who was killed in the Year 743, according to Dion, pag. 624.

(23) Dion, lib. 59, ad ann. 791, pag. m. 745.

(24) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2, cap. 67.

(25) Id. ibid. cap. 64, ad ann. 772.

(26) Id. ib. cap. 65.

(27) Ibid.

(28) Ib. cap. 66.

(29) Paterculus, lib. 2, cap. 129, reckons this one of Tiberius's Intrigues that were best managed.

(30) Fama loquax vestras si jam pervenit ad aures Me tibi finitimi parte jacere soli. Ovid. Epist. 9, lib. 2, de Ponto, vers. 2.

(31) Tu quoque fac prois intra tua castra jacentis. Ibid. vers. 37.

(32) Ib. ver. 2 & 19.

(33) Plut. de Exilio, pag. 607, B.

(34) Lips. in Tacit. Ann. lib. 2, cap. 64.

(35) Natali hemo.

(36) See Ovid.
cum Notis Va-
riorum, in 8vo,
Tom. III, pag.
661.

(37) Suet. in Augusto, cap.
63.

(38) Casaubon,
in hac verba Suetonii.

(39) Annal. lib.
2, cap. 64.

(a) Teiffier. Catalogus Catalo-gorum, pag. 52.

(a) Epit. Bibl.
Gefner.

(b) Thomafius
de plagio literario
n. 220, p. 232,
ubi be confessus that he does not know which of those two Authors preceded the other.

Some (36) believe, that he, to whom Ovid writ, was the Son of Cotifon, King of the Getæ; of whom Suetonius says this: 'M. Antonius scribit primum eum (Augustum) Antonio filio suo despondisse Juliam: dein Cotifoni Getarum Regi, quo tempore sibi quoque invicem filiam regis in matrimonium petiisset (37). — Marc Antony writes, that Augustus first promised his Daughter Julia to his Son Antony; then to Cotifon, King of the Getæ, at which time he also demanded the King's Daughter in Marriage.' These words contain two things, which are not to be found in any other Writer. I. That Augustus had a mind to marry his Daughter Julia to Cotifon, King of the Getæ. II. That he himself had a mind to marry the Daughter of the same Cotifon; for notwithstanding what a great Critic says to the contrary (38), this is the Sense of Suetonius's words, which is not to be refuted by the constant Affection of Augustus for his Wife Livia. You must know that it is Marc Antony who speaks, and that he was not very careful of his Expressions when it concerned him to make that Emperor odious. The least Reports, the least Suspicions, served him to make some Articles of his Manifestos. But I came back to refute those, who say, that Ovid writ to the Son of that Cotifon. I oppose to them Tacitus (39), who says positively, that Cotys, King of part of Thrace, in the time of Tiberius, had obtained that part of the Kingdom from Augustus, after the Death of his Father Rhæmetales. And therefore in the time of Ovid's Exile, Cotys, who reigned in Thrace, was the Son of that Rhæmetales. Mr de Tillemont is mistaken (40) when he says, that he was only the Nephew of Rhæmetales; and it is likely, that what I am going to say deceived him. He saw that, in the Year 738 of Rome, Rhæmetales governed Thrace as Guardian of his Nephews, the Sons of Cotys (41); and that, in 759, Rhæmetales, and Rhescuporis his Brother, expelled the Enemies (42). So that he thought that Cotys, to whom Augustus gave part of Thrace after the Death of Rhæmetales, was one of those Pupils, Sons of Cotys, of whom Rhæmetales was Guardian in the Year 738. He would not have thought so, if he had taken notice that the Testimony of Tacitus is considerably enforced by the Praises that Ovid bestowed upon the Valour of Cotys's Father.

Non tibi Cassandrus pater est —

Sed quàm marte ferox, & vinci nescius armis,

Tam nunquam facta pace cruoris amans (43).

Thou Great in Arms, unconquer'd on the Plain,
In Peace thy Sword ne'er knew a bloody Stain.

Those Praises suit with Rhæmetales, who appears from time to time on the Stage from the Year 738 to the Year 759 (44); and many precarious Suppositions must be made, to make them suit with one Cotys that died before the Year 738, leaving his Sons very young; which gives occasion to presume that he did not reign long.

(40) Histoire de
Empereurs,
Tom. I, pag. m.
21.

(41) Dio, lib.
54, pag. 612.

(42) Id. lib. 55,
pag. 651, 652.

(43) Ovid, ubi
supra, ver. 43.

(44) See Dion;
lib. 54, pag.
612, 624, & lib.
55, pag. 651.

(b) Multa vel pa-tius multos col-legit. Scripto
Gentilis in Apol- loneis, pag.
428.

COTTA (CATELLIAN), wrote some Scholia ad Mediolanensium Statuta, and a little Treatise de Jurisperitis, wherein he begins with Mutius Scævola, and ends with Andrew Alcinius (a). He writ also a Book intituled Memorabilia, printed at Venice in the Year 1572, in 8vo, which is taken out of other Authors (b). He acknowledges it in the Title-Page of his Work, and therefore he cannot be said to be a Plagiary.

COTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER), one of the three Prophets, whose Revelations Comenius published. Look for KOTTERUS.

COUSIN (GILBERT), in Latin Cognatus, born at Nozeret in Franché-Comté (a), in the Year 1505, was a learned Man, as it appears by his many Books, of which there is a List in the Epitome of Gefner's Bibliothèque. He had been a Servant to Erasmus [A], who did Justice to his good Qualities. Erasmus esteemed him very much, and taught him many things [B]. He procured him a Canonship at Nozeret, and offered him his House with some Advantages, when he found him disgusted with his Benefice, by reason of the Law-Suits that attended it. See the Forty sixth, Fifty first, and Fifty fifth Letters of the Twenty seventh Book of Erasmus. Cousin was living in the Year 1563 [C]. He was no Plagiary as to the Passage mentioned by Thomafius (b); for his Notes upon Lucian were printed before the Adversaria of Peter Pitbæus came out.

[A] He had been a Servant to Erasmus.] Erasmus writ the following words to Lewis de Vers, Abbot of Mont Sainte Marie, who was a Kinsman to Cousin. 'Gilbertus Cognatus mihi jam plusquam triennium fidelem & commodum præstitit famulum, quem ego tamen ob mores liberales non tam pro famulo habui, quam pro convictore, & in studiorum laboribus socio. Proinde & tuæ reverendæ amplitudini gratulor talem cognatum, & illi multo magis tam amicum & benignum patronum. — Gilbert Cousin has now, for above three Years, discharged the Duty of an able, and a faithful Servant to me, though, out of Respect to his extraordinary Merit, I treated him, rather as a Companion, and Partner of my Studies, than as a Servant. Wherefore I congratulate you, most worthy & Reverend Sir, in so deserving a Kinsman, and him more abundantly in so good and indulgent a Patron.' I take this from the Forty sixth Letter of the Twenty seventh Book of Erasmus. It was written the eleventh of December 1533.

[B] Erasmus — taught him many things.] Erasmus reckons this among the Advantages that Cousin got by waiting upon him; and he pretends also to have kept him from the dangerous Contagion of the new Opinions. 'Spero autem fore ut illum temporis apud me peracti non poeniteat; nam præter eruditionis fructum quem ex mea consuetudine cepit haud poenitendum — poterat alibi nihil attrahere contagii à sectarum amatoribus; apud me vero etiam si quid attraxisset, purgari potuit (1). — I hope he will have no occasion to repent the time he spent with me; for besides some Improvement, which I hope he received from my Conversation, — he might elsewhere have contracted some Errors from the Encouragers of Sects, from which with me he might have been cured. I cannot tell what Cousin's Opinions were whilst Erasmus was living; but I do not doubt but that he was afterwards either a Protestant, or a Favourer of them (2).

[§ (a) Whoever reads his Adagia will be strongly inclined to believe this. See among others the Chapter, intituled, Magis phantasticus quam Papæ Mula. REM. CRIT.]

[C] He was living in the Year 1563.] This appears by Advertisement that Mark Hopperus prefixed to the Edition of Lucian, published at Basil in the Year 1563. He there bestows many Praises upon Gilbert Cousin, whose Notes on Lucian were inserted in that Edition.

(1) Erasm. Epist.
46, lib. 27.

CRANTOR,

CRANTOR, a Greek Philosopher and Poet [A], was born at Solos in Cilicia. He left his native Country, where he was admired, and went to Athens, where he was a Disciple of Xenocrates with Polemo (a) [B]. The latter, having succeeded Xenocrates in the Academy, about the end of the XVth Olympiad (b), had the Pleasure to see the same Crantor, who had formerly been his Fellow-Disciple, among his Scholars. This was great Honour to him; for that Scholar was learned enough to teach Philosophy; and People were so persuaded of it, that, when he retired into the Temple of Æsculapius during a Fit of Sickness (c), several Persons went to him, thinking that he designed to settle a School there, to put themselves under his Discipline. Arcefilaus, his Favourite, did not go thither with that Design, but in hopes of a good Recommendation from him to Polemo. He obtained what he desired: Crantor was so little concerned at that Request, that, as soon as he was recovered, he himself became one of Polemo's Auditors (d). He was accounted one of the Pillars of the Platonic Sect [C], and he was the first who wrote Commentaries on Plato's Works (e). If he did not explain other things more clearly, than that which concerns the Nature of the Soul (f), he had as much need of a new Commentator as Plato. He wrote a Book of Consolation, which is lost, and which was much esteemed [D]. He was not very old (g) when he died of a Dropsy (h). He left his Estate to Arcefilaus. That Estate amounted to twelve Talents

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. 4. n. 24. Instead of Polemon, there is in Mereri Philemon.

(b) See Diogen. Laërt. in Xenocrate, lib. 4. n. 14.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Laërt. ibid. n. 25.

(e) Πρώτος τῶν Πλάτωνος ἑταίρων. Proclus lib. 1. in Timæum apud Menægium Not. in Diogen. Laërt. lib. 4. n. 27.

(f) See his Opinions upon it in Plutarch's Treatise περὶ τῆς ἐν τιμῶν φύσεως, pag. 101, & seq.

(g) Laërt. lib. 4. n. 25.

(h) Id. ib. n. 27.

(1) Diog. Laërt. lib. 4. n. 25.

(2) Cicero, Tuscul. lib. 3, cap. 6.

(3) Item de Orat. lib. 3, cap. 18, fol. 92. d.

(4) See, above, Citat. (42) of the Article ARCESILAUS.

(5) Add that of the 1st Book de Finibus, cap. 1.

(6) Horat. Epist. 2, lib. 1, ver. 3.

(7) Cicero Tuscul. 2, cap. 48.

(8) Psychomanteum.

Ignaris homines in vita mentibus errant.
Euthynous potitur fatum muncere læto,
Sic fuit utilis finiri ipique tibi que.

Man! foolish Man! thro' Life's dark windings strays,
In Errors strangely lost ten thousand Ways.
Thy Son is sent, by Fate's all-wise Decree,
To happier Climes. Say, is it worse for thee?

You lament the Death of a Son, and you ask the Reason of such a great Calamity: know that Men are ignorant: he enjoys an agreeable Favour that Fate has done him. His Interest and your's required that he should leave this World (g). This is a piece of Crantor's Book. I think the Title of that Book was περὶ πένθους, de Luctu; for so Diogenes Laërtius quotes it. I shall set down his words, because they contain an exquisite Encomium: Θανμάστα δὲ αὐτῷ μάστιγα βιβλίον τὸ περὶ πένθους (10). His Treatise of Mourning is chiefly admired (11). For the same Reason I ought to cite this Passage: 'Legimus omnes Crantoris veteris Academici de luctu, est enim non magnus, verum aureolus, & ut Tuberoni Panætius præcipit, ad verbum ediscendus libellus (12). -- -- -- We have all read Crantor, the old Academic, de Luctu: it is indeed a small, but a valuable, Piece, and, as Panætius in his Advice to Tuberone observes, ought to be learnt by Heart.' It will not be useless to observe on what occasion this was said: it was to prove, that the ancient Academy did not teach the Indolence, or Insensibility, which was a Doctrine of the Stoics. Cicero's Interlocutor proves the contrary by this little Book of Crantor. It is certain, that this Philosopher did not approve the Doctrine of the Stoics, and that he said, that the Exemption from Passions would cost too dear, since it could not be acquired but by the Stupidity of the Body, and the Savageness of the Soul: Μὴ γὰρ νοοῦμεν, (φρονῶν δ' Ἀκαδημαῖκος Κράντωρ) νοοῦσθαι δὲ παρῆναι τις αἰσθησις, εἴτ' ἐν τῷ νοῷ τι τῶν ἡμετέρων, εἴτ' ἀποσπῶτο. Τὸ γὰρ ἀνάνδυνον τῶτο καὶ ἀνευ μεγάλων ἐργαίνεσθαι μισθὸν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, τεθνεῶσθαι γὰρ εἰκός, ἐκεῖ μὲν σῶμα τοιαῦτον, ἐν/αὐτῷ δὲ ψυχὴν. Optandum est, inquit Crantor Academicus, ne ægrotemus: sed si in morbo sumus, sensus ejus aliquis adesse debet, siue secetur pars nostri aliquis, siue avellatur. Indolentia enim illa non sine magna jactura homini potest parari: quippe necesse est ut ibi corpus, ita hic animus plane efferatum esse (13). -- -- We ought to wish (says the Academic Crantor) to avoid Sickness; but should it seize us, should some Limb be tore or cut off, we must have a Sense of it. That Insensibility is not to be attained but at the Price of Humanity; for either the Mind, or the Body, must become savage. Cicero mentions the same Thought of Crantor. 'Minime, inquit, (Crantor) assentior his, qui illam nescio quam indolentiam magnopere laudant, quæ nec potest ulla esse, nec debet. Nec ægroto etiam, inquit, nisi is qui fuerat sensus aditus, siue secetur

(g) Apud Cicero-nem, Tuscul. 1, cap. 48, ex Crantore. That Story is to be found more at large in Plutarch de Consolatione, pag. 102; but Crantor is not quoted.

(10) Diog. Laërt. lib. 4. n. 27.

(11) Thus it ought to be rendered, and not Of Grief, as Me Mereri has it.

(12) Cicero Acad. Quest. lib. 2, cap. 44.

(13) Plut. de Consolatione, pag. 102. D.

Qui quid sit pulcrum, quid turpe, quid utile, quid non,
Plenius ac melius Chrysippo & Crantore dicit (6).

Mankind may learn from his immortal Song,
What's virtuous, lovely, useful, right, or wrong,
With greater Ease than from the labour'd Page
Of Crantor or Chrysippus.

This is said of Homer.

[D] He wrote a Book of Consolation -- -- -- which was much esteemed.] It is cited under this Title, in the first Book of the Tusculan Questions, Simile quiddam est in consolatione Crantoris (7). What follows in Cicero, shews, that Crantor did not forget the common Topic of the Miseries of this Life: neither is it a thing that can be omitted in such Writings: Can any body argue against a Father who laments the Death of his Children? I say, can any body urge to him Motives of Consolation, without remembering the Evils to which the Life of Man is exposed, and which a vast number of People would have avoided, if they had died young? Here is the Answer that was given to a Father in an Oracle of the Dead (8).

V O L. II.

7 C

(i) Id. ib. n. 25.
(k) Mr Foucher, pag. 28 of his Histoire de la Philosophie des Académiciens.

Talents (i). What some affirm is not true (k), viz. that, after the Death of the Philosopher Crates, he taught in the Academy; for he died before Crates and Polemo (l).

(l) Diog. Laërt. lib. 4, n. 27.

(12) Cicero, Tuscul. Quest. lib. 3, cap. 6.

(15) Plut. de Consolat. pag. 104. B.

(16) Plin. in Prefat.

(17) Epist. 21. lib. 12, ad Att. It is the 20th in Grævius's Edition.

(18) Dacier upon the 3d Epistle of Horace, pag. m. 142, 143, of the 8th Tome.

(a) Plutarch. in Aristide, sub fin. pag. 334. F.

(1) Schol. Arist. in Ran. act. 1, sc. 7.

(2) Plut. in Aristide, pag. 335. A.

(3) See Plutarch in Cimone, pag. 487. A; and above Citat. (83) of the Article CIMON.

(4) See in Furetier's Dictionary, at the Word Arrestographie, the Names of many Compilers of Arrests.

(5) Mauffie. Not. in Harpoc. vocæ Ἀρrestῶν.

quid, five avellatur à corpore. Nam istud nihil dolere, non sine magna mercede contingit immunitatis in animo, stuporis in corpore (14).

For the rest, we learn from Plutarch, that Crantor composed that Book to comfort Hippocles, who had lost his Children (15). Plutarch took some Thoughts out of it, which he made use of in his Treatise of Consolation to Apollonius. That same Treatise of Crantor was very useful to Cicero, who took many things out of it, when he composed a Book on that Subject. He owned it; and for that Reason, Pliny does not reckon him amongst the Plagiarists. 'Scio enim, says he (16), conferentem auctores me deprehendisse, à juratissimis & proximis veteres transcriptos ad verbum, neque nominatos: non illa Virgiliana virtute, ut certarent: non Ciceroniana simplicitate, qui in libris de Republica, Platonis se comitem profitebatur: in consolatione filiae, Crantorem, inquit, sequor. - - - For I find, says he, in comparing Authors, that some of the greatest Credit have transcribed the Ancients verbatim, without quoting them, not to vie with Virgil's Honesty, or Cicero's Plain-dealing, who in his Treatises de Republica owns Plato, and in his Consolation owns Crantor for his Guide.' Father Hardouin observes, in his Note on those words of Pliny, that Cicero says, that Crantor intitled his Book, de Luætu minuendo. But it is certain, that Cicero, in the Passage (17) quoted by that learned Jesuit, speaks of his own Work, and not of that of Crantor. Mr Dacier says (18), that Cicero, in his Book of Consolation, made use of these words; 'Sed ego Crantorem sequor, cujus legi brevem illum quidam dem fere aureum, & ut Panætio placuit, ad verbum ediscendum de Luætu librum, quo acute universam doloris medicinam complexus est.' He distinguishes this Passage from that of the second Book of the Academic Questions. I have not found it in the Fragments that have been collected out of Cicero's Treatise de Consolatione; but it is in the Book that Sigonius endeavoured to impose upon the World, under the same Title, for one of Cicero's Works. It is likely Mr Dacier is not of the Opinion of those Critics, who believe that Sigonius had a mind to deceive the Public. Note, that one of the things that Cicero borrowed of Crantor, is, that we come into the World to expiate our Crimes. 'Cicero cum in principio consolationis suæ dixisset, luendorum scelerum causa nasci homines; iteravit id ipsum postea quasi objurgans eum qui vitam penam non esse putet (19). - - - Cicero, having said in the beginning of his Consolation, that Men come into the World to atone for their Crimes, repeats the same thing, as a Reproof to him who should imagine Life not to be a Punishment.' Compare this with these words of Plutarch, and you will find that I am in the right. Πολλοὶ γὰρ καὶ σοφοὶ ἀνδράσιν (ὡς φησι Κράτης) εἰ νῦν ἀλλὰ παλαι κἀλλανσαι τανθῶπινα, τιμωρίαν ἡγούμενοι εἶναι τὸν βίον, καὶ ἀρχὴν τὸ γενέσθαι ἀνθρώπων συμφορὰν τὴν μεγίστην. Multi quippe, ut ait Crantor, iique sapientes viri, non nunc primum, sed pridem deploraverunt res humanas, supplicium judicantes vitam hanc esse, & summæ calamitatis loco ducentes, nasci hominem (20). - - Many, and those wise Men, says Crantor, having long before this Day complained of the Condition of Man, who thought Life a Punishment, and to be born the greatest Misfortune. The learned Casaubon did not take notice of the words that I have quoted out of Pliny; for, to confirm his Conjecture, that Cicero had made great use of Crantor's Book, he alleges only the Testimony of St Jerom. 'Eum libellum — dubium non est quin in suo de consolatione magnam partem expressisset (Cicero) quod & Hieronymus his verbis testatur: legimus, inquit, Crantorem, cujus volumen ad consolandum dolorem suum sequutus est Cicero (21). — There is no doubt but Cicero, in his Treatise de Consolatione, copied the greatest part of this Book, which St Jerom testifies in these words. I have read, says he, Crantor, whose Treatise on Consolation Cicero has followed.'

(19) Lactant. lib. 3, cap. 18, pag. m. 197.

(20) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 115. B.

(21) If. Casaubon. Not. ad Diog. Laërt. lib. 4, n. 27.

CRATERUS, the Author of a Work, the Loss whereof ought to be lamented [A], was a Macedonian (a). Nevertheless, we must not believe, with Vossius, that

[A] The Author of a Work, the Loss whereof ought to be lamented [A] It was a Collection of the Decrees of the People of Athens (1). How many Difficulties might we not resolve, if we had that Work? How many Particulars should we not find in it, concerning the illustrious Persons that were banished, or ill used in other Respects, in that famous Commonwealth? Craterus was an exact Author: he related the Purport of the Accusation, and that of the Judgment that had been given, and cited the Authors who supplied him with those things. Τῶτων ἐδὲν ἐν ἑσχατῶν ὁ Κράτης τεκμήριον παρέσχε, ὅτι δίκην ἐπὶ Ἀθῆναις, καὶ περ εἰσθῶς γράφον τὰ τοιαῦτα, καὶ παρὰ τὸν βίον τὸν ἰσορῶντας. Hujus rei Craterus scriptum monumentum profert nullum, neque formulam accusationis, neque plebiscitum, solitus aliqui talia adscribere & citare auctores (2). Nay, there is some reason to believe that he inserted the Treatises of Peace at length in his Work (3). I believe that Mr de Maussac would have bought such a Book at the Rate of it's weight in Gold, notwithstanding the Contempt and Indignation he expresses against the modern Compilers of Decrees or Arrests (4). 'Hodie in Gallia (says he) nos hujusmodi homines & trivium vocamus Collecteurs d'Arrests, ad quorum nugas, & somnia excudenda, & typis mandanda, divina hæc excudendi ars potius inventa videtur, quam ad serias & non ita futiles doctorum virorum lucubrationes, posteris imperitiam sequioris hujus sæculi hominum miraturis, typographorum avaritiam contempturis relinquendas (5). - - - In France, says he, we now a-days call such Men in Derision Collecteurs d'Arrests; for the publishing of whose empty and incoherent Notions, the divine Art of Printing seems rather invented, than for the solid and laborious Lucubrations of learned Men, which will stand as a mark to Posterity of the ill Taste of this degenerate Age, and the Avarice of Printers.' Observe, by the by, that it is not only now a-days that learned Men complain, that the Bookellers choose rather to print bad Books than good ones. They should not complain of the Bookellers, but of the Readers; for, if the Sale of good Books was as profitable as that of others, no doubt the Bookellers would prefer good Copies before bad ones. I call those good Books that are truly so, and not those that are only so in the Bookellers's Style.

You may find a Confirmation of this in Mr du Pin. 'We see daily a world of little French Books appear in Public, and there is scarce any ancient Book printed, either Greek or Latin. It is true that the Bookellers say it is not their Fault, but the Fault of the Public, that the first sell and go off, and that they grow rich by them; whereas the latter remain in their Shops, and are often the Cause of their Ruin. It is therefore the Fantasticness of the Men of this Age that is to be blamed. The Taste for Antiquity is lost; there is nothing but Novelty that pleases. True and solid Learning is no more fashionable; People are contented to know things superficially. There is now no solid Study; People learn Antiquity in the new Books, and few go the Fountain-head. It is a very deplorable thing for the Republic of Letters; and it is much to be feared, that this superficial Study will bring us into a worse condition than the Ignorance and Barbarity of the foregoing Ages (6).'

A N Observation upon the Complaints that are made against Bookellers.

(6) Du Pin, Nouv. Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccl. Tom. II, pag. 200, Dutch Edit.

[B] W2

that he is the same Craterus who had so great a Share in Alexander's Friendship [B]. I wonder that Pinedo knew no more of the matter than Vossius furnished him with [C]. Moreri is very much mistaken about CRATERUS, the Favourite of Alexander (b).

(b) See Rem. [B].

[B] We must not suppose with Vossius, that he is the same Craterus, who had so great a share in Alexander's Friendship. I wonder that Vossius could advance such a Conjecture as this: 'Suspicio esse eum ipsum qui cum Alexandro M. militavit, de quo sequenti libro dicemus (7). — Imagine him to be the same, who served under Alexander the Great, of whom I shall speak in the following Book.' He renews his Conjecture when he speaks of that Craterus who accompanied Alexander: 'Fortasse idem est ille Craterus Macedo de quo inter incertae ætatis scriptores dictum fuit libro tertio (8). — It is perhaps the same Craterus, of whom I spoke in the Third Book, amongst the Writers, whose Ages are not well known.' He had quoted Strabo, who speaks of a certain Letter of Craterus to his Mother Aristopatra, and who says, that this Letter contains several incredible things, and which do not agree with any other Relation. 'Εκ δὲ δόξης δὲ τις καὶ Κελεύει πρὸς τὴν μητέρα Ἀριστοπάτρου ἐπιστολὴ πολλὰ τε ἄλλα παραδόξα φράζουσα, καὶ ἢ ὁμολογούσα κερνέ. Editæ est etiam epistola quædam Crateri ad matrem Aristopatram scripta, quæ cum aliis permulta admirabilia narrat, tum cum nullo concordat (9). This concerns the Indies. I am very much inclined to believe, that it was a supposititious Letter; for though it is possible that the Favourite of a great King, and one of the chief Generals of a Conqueror's Army, may divert himself with composing a Letter full of Stories; yet I do not think it likely that he should write such things to his Mother. I think it much more unlikely, to suppose that such a Lord as Craterus, shining with Glory for having had so great a share in Alexander's Conquests and Friendship, could resolve to collect all the Decrees of the People of Athens with all the requisite Circumstances and Citations. It was the business of a Practitioner in the Law. The writing of Alexander's History, or the Relation of his Campaigns, is another thing: I do not deny but that his Favourite Craterus might have done himself much Honour by it. He went about it, if Moreri may be believed: 'Craterus, says he, gave some marks — of his Wit, by the fine Works that he composed of Alexander's Conquests. Strabo, who makes mention of it, cites a Letter of Craterus in his Fifteenth Book.' This is to pretend that Strabo distinguished that Letter from the History of Alexander's Conquests. Now this is false: He only spoke of that Letter. I own that Freinsheim places Craterus among Alexander's Historians; but his Expression is sufficient to convince one that there is no certainty about it. 'Craterus cum sub Alexandro res gereret ejus etiam historiam dicitur conscripisse (10). — Whilst Craterus served under Alexander, he is said to have wrote his History.' Vossius, the only Author that Moreri consulted, speaks only of the Letter mentioned by Strabo; so that all that can be said is, that Craterus wrote a Letter concerning the Wonders of the Indies. As for me, I cannot but believe that it is supposititious. I believe also, that, if he had made the Compilation of the Decrees of the Athenians, Plutarch, or some other Authors who mention it, would sometimes have taken notice of the Dignity he had been in with Alexander the Great; and that having said nothing of it, we ought to take their Silence as a Proof against Vossius.

[C] — Pinedo knew no more of the matter, than Vossius furnished him with. What Vossius says of Craterus, the Compiler of Decrees, amounts to this; that Plutarch took him to witness, that Stephanus Byzantinus has quoted the third and the ninth Book of his Decrees: Citat tertium & nonum de Crateri libris περὶ Ἀπορίσμων, de scitis, sive decretis (11); and that Harpocration, at the Word ἀνδρῶν, quotes the same Work (12). Pinedo, having noted the Places where Stephanus Byzantinus cites Craterus, and a place where the Citation was corrupted, refers us to Vossius, and ingeniously confesses that he goes no farther (13). I am sure he would not have stopped there, if he had known the Remarks of Maussac. That learned Critic observes, that the Transcribers have often changed the Word Craterus into Carterus (14). He gives these Words of Pollux for an Example of it (15): Καρτέριον πρὸς τὴν τὰ Ἀπορίσμων συνάγωγην; and takes notice of a Mistake of the Translator, who instead of saying, to give credit to Craterus the Compiler of the Decrees, Cratero fidem habere qui Decreta in unum collegit, has translated, to give credit to Carterus, who collected the Suffrages, Cartero fidem habere suffragia poscenti. He corrects a remarkable Fault in Suidas. Craterus (16) is cited there in the ninth Book of Sophisms: Thus Books are multiplied. How many Persons may have believed that Craterus, besides the Compilation of Decrees, had also made a Compilation of Sophisms? The Alteration of a Syllable (17) may have occasioned that Multiplication. Maussac conjectures, that instead of Καρτέριον ἐν τοῖς Ἀπορίσμων, it must be read Κελεύει (18) in a place of Harpocration (19). It is true that he believes also, that Cratinus the Comic Poet perhaps composed a Piece for the Stage, intitled, Ἀπορίσμων. Vossius is positive that Cratinus must be put out, and Craterus put in (20). Here is something more worthy of Attention. Maussac observes, that Alexis had composed an Hymn against Craterus, as, says he, Aristotle composed one against Hermias (21). I do not insist upon these two small Faults which Henry Vossius has not censured; the one that Maussac should have said Alexinus, and not Alexis; the other, that Aristotle made an Hymn in Honour of Hermias, and not against him. But I observe, that this Remark of Maussac enables us to guess at the time wherein our Craterus lived; a time, about which Vossius durst not produce so much as a Conjecture. In whatever sense Athenæus's Words be understood, it seems we may conclude from them, that Craterus and Alexinus lived at the same time; for it is not likely that Alexinus would have composed an Hymn either against Craterus, or in his Praise, if he had never had any Acquaintance with him. Παύδῃ δ' ἐστὶ καὶ εἰς Κελεύειν τὸν Μακρόδωρα γεγραμμένη, ἐν ἧν Ἰνναῖο Ἀλεξίνος ὁ Διαλεκτικός — — ἀδελφεὶ δὲ καὶ ἔτος ἐν Δελφοῖς Ἀνρίστοντος γὰρ τινος παιδὸς. Est & Pæan scriptum carmen in Craterum Macedonem quod Alexinus Dialecticus composuit. — — — Canitur ille Delphis puero lyram pulsante (22). — Alexinus, the Logician, composed also a Hymn against Craterus of Macedon, sung, at Delphos, by a Boy to the Harp. I know very well, that Alexinus, a great Disputer (23), and a subtle Logician, would have attacked both the living and the dead, when the Question was about Philosophy (24); but Craterus was not in that case. Now if he lived in Alexinus's time, he may be placed towards the CXXth Olympiad; for Alexinus was a Disciple of Eubulides, who lived at the same time that Aristotle did. See the second Book of Diogenes Laërtius, at the One hundred and ninth Section. Vossius comes in here to put us out (25): he pretends that Maussac is mistaken in taking Craterus, mentioned in the Passage of Athenæus, for the Compiler of Decrees: he says, the Hymn was composed against Craterus the Successor of Alexander. He gives no Reason, nor cites any Body for it. One might say several things for and against his Opinion; but it were to dispute without hopes of finding any Certainty. Perhaps some Persons that are at leisure will amuse themselves with those Discussions. I conclude with saying, that the Scholiast upon Aristophanes has cited our Craterus at least twice, on occasion of the Decree that was fulminated against the impious Diagoras. See the Article DIAGORAS (26).

(13) Vossius. Vossius de Hist. Græcis, lib. 3, & lib. 4, cap. 9. Ego enim nihil de eo memoratu dignum habeo dicere. Pinedo in Stephan. pag. 759.

(14) Maussac. in Harpocrat. voce ἀνδρῶν.

(15) Lib. 3, cap. 10.

(16) In voce ὑμῶν. Vossius. I do not find this Fault in the Suidas of Æmilius Porus, printed at Geneva, in 1619.

(17) Non σοφισμάτων sed Ἀπορίσμων. Craterus ille coegerat. Maussac. ib.

(18) Maussac should have said Κελεύει.

(19) In voce ἀνδρῶν.

(20) Vossius. Not in notas Maussac, pag. 99.

(21) Maussac ubi supra, voce ὑμῶν.

(22) Athen. lib. 15, pag. 696.

(23) He was first named the Dialectician, as we have seen in the Words of Athenæus, which I have just now quoted. See Diog. Laërt. lib. 2, in Euclid. n. 109.

(24) Jonsson, lib. 2, cap. 2, says that Alexinus wrote against Aristotle: he cites Hierocles and Hermippus. He is mistaken as to the latter. Hermippus, says he, lib. 1, de Aristotele apud Athenæum, lib. 16, cap. 16. Alexinus in Aristotelem petulantiam notat. Athenæus does not mention that.

(25) Vossius ubi supra.

(26) Surnamed The Atheist, at the end of the Remark [D].

(7) Vossius de Hist. Græc. lib. 3, pag. 347.

(8) Ibid. lib. 4, pag. 462.

(9) Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 434.

(10) Freinsheim. Prolegom. ad Curtium, cap. 4.

(11) Vossius de Hist. Græc. pag. 347.

(12) Ibid. lib. 4, pag. 462.

(13) Vossius de Hist. Græc. lib. 3, pag. 347.

(14) Maussac. in Harpocrat. voce ἀνδρῶν.

(15) Lib. 3, cap. 10.

(16) In voce ὑμῶν. Vossius. I do not find this Fault in the Suidas of Æmilius Porus, printed at Geneva, in 1619.

(17) Non σοφισμάτων sed Ἀπορίσμων. Craterus ille coegerat. Maussac. ib.

(18) Maussac should have said Κελεύει.

(19) In voce ἀνδρῶν.

(20) Vossius. Not in notas Maussac, pag. 99.

(21) Maussac ubi supra, voce ὑμῶν.

(22) Athen. lib. 15, pag. 696.

(23) He was first named the Dialectician, as we have seen in the Words of Athenæus, which I have just now quoted. See Diog. Laërt. lib. 2, in Euclid. n. 109.

(24) Jonsson, lib. 2, cap. 2, says that Alexinus wrote against Aristotle: he cites Hierocles and Hermippus. He is mistaken as to the latter. Hermippus, says he, lib. 1, de Aristotele apud Athenæum, lib. 16, cap. 16. Alexinus in Aristotelem petulantiam notat. Athenæus does not mention that.

(25) Vossius ubi supra.

(26) Surnamed The Atheist, at the end of the Remark [D].

- CRATIPPUS was a Peripatetic Philosopher of great Reputation [A]. He taught Philosophy at Mitylene, where he was born. He went afterwards to Athens (a), to teach it there; and had, among his Scholars, the Son of Cicero. He was highly valued by that great Orator (b), who obtained of Cæsar the Freedom of Rome for him, and afterwards moved the Court of the Arcopagites to make a Decree, to desire Cratippus to live at Athens, as an Ornament of the City (c), and to instruct the Youth (d). We may be persuaded, that he made very good Lectures, since Brutus, preparing himself for the War against Marc Antony, went to hear him (e). There are some Proofs, that he was none of those Professors, who do not understand the World; for he did not obstinately dispute with Pompey concerning the Divine Providence [B], at a time when the Misfortunes of that

Roman

- [A] He was a Peripatetic Philosopher of great Reputation. These Words of Cicero witness it. Cratippus Peripateticorum omnium quos quidem ego audierim, meo iudicio, facile princeps (1). Cratippus is, in my Opinion, by far the most excellent of all the Peripatetics whom I have heard. Let us observe on what occasion Cicero bestows this praise upon him: he says, that, when he was going to command in Cilicia (2), Cratippus came from Mitylene to Ephesus to wait upon him. The beginning of the first Book of Cicero's Offices contains another Testimony of Cratippus's Merit. Quamquam te, Marce fili, annum jam audientem Cratippum, idque Athenis, abundare oportet præceptis institutisque Philosophiæ, propter summam & doctorem auctoritatem, & urbis, quorum alter te scientia augere potest, altera exemplis, tamen, &c. (3). — Though, my Son, after a Year's Study under Cratippus, and that at Athens, you cannot but be abundantly stored with the Maxims and Rules of Philosophy, having had the babbings of a Master famed for his Learning, and of a City so full of bright Examples; Yet, &c. There is still a greater Commendation of him in the third Book of the same Work. Quamquam à Cratippo nostro, principe hujus memorie Philosophorum, hæc te assidue audire atque accipere confido, tamen conducere arbitror talibus aures tuas vocibus undique circumsonare — suscepisti onus præterea grave & Athenarum & Cratippi: ad quos cum tanquam ad mercaturam bonarum artium sis profectus, inanem redire turpissimum est dedecorantem & urbis auctoritatem & magistris (4). — Though I hope you hear and receive these things constantly from Cratippus, the most eminent Philosopher of this Age, yet I think it highly necessary, that these Precepts should be inculcated from all quarters. — Athens and Cratippus render the task you have undertaken of greater consequence; to return empty from that great Mart of Learning, would be dishonourable, and derogate from the Honour of the City, and the Master.
- [B] He did not obstinately dispute with Pompey concerning the divine Providence. After the Battle of Pharsalia, Pompey went to Mitylene, to take in his Wife (5). His whole Fleet consisted of a single borrowed Ship. The Inhabitants ran to the Shore, and desired him to come into the Town. He thanked them for it. The Philosopher Cratippus was one of those that went to complement him. Pompey disputed a little with him, and complained of divine Providence, in which Cratippus gently receded, advising him to hope for the best, fearing he might be tiresome and troublesome to him if he had directly opposed his Arguments. And when Pompey might have demanded, How the Providence of the Gods appeared in his Case, Cratippus might have answered, that, for the ill Government of Affairs at Rome, it was necessary the Power should be lodged in the hands of a Sovereign Prince, and then he might have demanded, How, or by what signs, Oh Pompey! shall we believe, that if thou hadst been the Conqueror, thou wouldst have made a better use of thy good Fortune, than Cæsar has done, or will do? But we leave this as it shall please the Gods to appoint (6). Cratippus acted the part of a wise Man: Had he been a meer Scholar, he would have followed Pompey to his Ship, and would have had the last Word, he would have pushed his common places to the tenth Reply; and would have made it a point of Honour, to get a more complete Victory over him in a Dispute, than Cæsar had obtained in the pitched Battle. He would not - have been sensible that the Circumstances of the time did not require it, and that the Passions of the Soul must be cured as the Diseases of the Body. Purging and Bleeding, which may save the Life of a Patient, if seasonably used, take it away if they are used unseasonably. The same may be said of Passions; whoever designs to cure them, must take a proper time for it. Nothing can be more troublesome than certain Comforters, who will have, by all means, afflicted Persons to confess that they are in the wrong to afflict themselves. The best way to dispose them to hearken to Reason is, to give them some Advantage: Suffer your self to be overcome sometimes, do not answer all their Reflexions, or if you go about it, do it indirectly, and with Condescension, and at last be the first that is silent, and keep your Arguments for a better Opportunity. Time will dispose the sick Person to make a better use of your Philosophy.
- Impatiens animus, nec adhuc tractabilis arte, Respuit, atque odio verba monentis habet. Aggrediar melius tunc, cum sua vulnera tangi Jam finet, & veris vocibus aptus erit. Quis matrem, nisi mentis inops, in funere nati Plere vetet? non hoc illa monenda loco. Cum dederit lacrymas, animumque impleverit ægrum; Ille dolor verbis emoderandus erit. Temporis ars medicina fere est: data tempore profunt, Et data non apto tempore vina nocent. Quin etiam accendas vitia, irritesque vetando, Temporis si non aggrediare suis (7).
- Distemper'd Minds, distracted with their Grief, Take all for Foes who offer 'em Relief; But when their first fermenting smart is o'er, They suffer you to probe the ripen'd Sore. 'Tis Madness, a fond Mother to dissuade From Tears, while on his Hearse her Son is laid. But when Grief's Deluge can no bigger swell, Declining sorrows you'll with ease repel. Cures have their times; the best, that can be try'd, In flame the Wound, unseasonably apply'd.
- TATE.
- Cratippus* was not ignorant of this Art, and knew how to practise it with Pompey. That great Man was not then in a condition to hearken to Reason with respect to Providence; his Wound was yet bleeding, and his vexation would have been increased by a strong Refutation of his Murmurs. Contradiction would only have provoked and angered him. His Complaints were a Fire, which would have increased by stirring it, whereas it might be hoped, that it would be extinguished for want of Agitation (8). It was therefore better to forbear disputing. Any Man, that was versed in the Knowledge of the World, would have done so; but a meer Scholar, a Philosopher, who had been nothing but a Philosopher, would have done the quite contrary. Note, that some Writers of the XVIIIth Century say, that Cratippus did actually make the Answers contained in the Passage of Plutarch, which I have set down before. Rare Men! Who fancy they are better informed of such things than the ancient Historians; or rather, for want of reading the Originals, they pervert Roman General, made him unfit to yield to the Reasons that might have been alledged to him. Moreover, he knew how to be sociable with his Scholars, and to charm them by the Agreeableness of his Conversation, which was free from that pedantic Gravity [C], which others cannot leave off, and which discourages young People. He writ some Books concerning Divination, and fell into an Inconveniency, which can hardly be avoided, when a Man rejects only part of certain Doctrines: he was shewed, that the Reasons, he made use of to maintain what he retained, were favourable to the Opinions which he did not retain [D].

Moreri

pervert and spoil History. The Jesuit Bisselius supposes that Cratippus told Pompey, that, considering the Disorders of the Republic, Rome could not avoid being destroyed, unless it was Monarchically governed (9). He adds, that those, who heard that Answer, asked Cratippus, Why then, if the Gods are wise, did they rather grant that Monarchy to Julius Cæsar than to Pompey? and that the Philosopher answered, Can you tell whether Pompey would have reigned better than Cæsar? the Gods only know it (10). Can any Body wonder that News-writers give a wrong Account of what they hear? Do Authors relate right what they have read in Plutarch? Plutarch says, that Cratippus thought it better to be silent, because he must otherwise have answered this and that; and yet they are so bold as to affirm, that he answered all those things, and then retired, that he might not be obliged to reply, and tell him some disagreeable Truths. 'Inter hæc ne Pompejo, se pluribus fortassis impugnaturo, veridicis responsis molestiam aggravaret, obstitit Cratippus, & abivit (11). — Upon this Cratippus, not to aggravate the concern of Pompey, who in all probability would have urged him farther, declined the question, and took his leave.'

By the way, it has been observed, that Pompey did not begin to be unfortunate, till he maintained the best Cause. O rem miseram! malas causas semper obtinuit, in optima concidit (12). You will find this in the following Passage of la Motte le Vayer, which contains a Judgment contrary to mine, concerning Cratippus's Conduct. There is a Prudence full of Vanity, and so presumptuous as to find fault with the Decrees of Heaven. Such was the Prudence of Cato, when he asked how the divine Providence could permit that Pompey should be invincible, when he did nothing that was reasonable, and only acted to satisfy his Ambition; whereas, having afterward embraced the good Cause in favour of the public Liberty, he was always unsuccessful, and worsted by Cæsar the Usurper of it *. Pompey himself, abounding in his own Sense, discoursed in that manner with the Philosopher Cratippus at Mitylene, after his Defeat at Pharsalia. Plutarch praises that Philosopher for having prudently condescended to the Opinions of that great and unfortunate Captain, contenting himself to give him some hopes for the future. But I think it had been better for him not to have had so much worldly Prudence; and that, if he had represented to Pompey the Respect that is due to the Decrees of the Almighty, he might have the better reclaimed him from his Impiety, which made him blaspheme against the Orders of Providence, which we cannot comprehend, though they tend always to the general Good of Mankind. It seems to me, that Cratippus's Philosophy would not have been less prudent, nor less comfortable, if he had taken such a course; and it had been wiser, having nothing of Meanness in it, or that could flatter Pompey's Reluctment, which did but provoke God the more against him (13).

[C] He knew how to charm his Scholars by the Agreeableness of his Conversation, which was free from pedantic Gravity. We find this in a Letter of Cicero's Son: 'Cratippo me scito, says he (14), non ut discipulum, sed ut filium esse conjunctissimum: nam cum & audio illum libenter, tum etiam propriam ejus suavitatem vehementer amplector. Sum totos dies cum eo, necdique sæpe numero partem: exoro enim ut modicum quam læpissime cœnet. Hæc introducta consuetudine, sæpe incontinentibus nobis & canentibus obrepit, sublatæque severitate philosophiæ, humanissime nobiscum jocatur. Quare da operam ut hunc talem, tam jucundum, tam excellentem virum videas quamprimum.

mum. — The familiarity, in which Cratippus indulged me, speaks him more a Father, than a Master. He speaks without reserve, and I am charmed with his peculiar sweetness of Temper. I spend whole Days with him, and often part of the Night, for I engage him to sup with me, as often as may be; by means of this intimacy, he comes when we do not expect him, and are at Supper, and, laying aside the Severity of a Philosopher, he entertains us with the most polite flow of Wit; wherefore take the first Opportunity to see this great, agreeable, and most extraordinary Man.' This is a great Encomium that he bestows upon his Professor: he made vast Improvements under such a Master; and for that Reason Trebonius, desiring to carry him into Asia, resolved to take also Cratippus along with him (15). The latter had brought some learned Men, whom he valued very much, from Mitylene to Athens. I do not question but that he had educated them. His Disciple writes, as a piece of good News, that he was familiarly acquainted with them. Uxor familiaribus & quotidianis convivioribus, quos secum Mityleni Cratippus adduxit, hominibus & doctis & illi probatissimis (16). You may look upon this as a sign that Cratippus made good Scholars. I must take notice of a Mistake of Jonsius. He says, that Cicero's Son had a great share in that Philosopher's Familiarity at Athens in the Year 708 (17). This is a wrong Chronology; for Cicero's Offices, written after the Death of Cæsar, shew, that this young Man had been then but one Year Cratippus's Scholar at Athens.

[D] The Reasons — to maintain what he retained, were favourable to the Opinions which he did not retain. He admitted the Divination of Dreams, and that of Fury; and here is his Hypothesis. He said, that the Soul of Man had it's Original partly from a divine Understanding that is out of us, and that that part of our Soul which feels, moves, and desires, is not separated from the Action of the Body, but that the part, which is endowed with Reason and Understanding, has more vigour, when it is less depending upon Matter (18). He went upon an Opinion of Aristotle, which Averroës has unfolded, to draw out of it the monstrous Doctrine of an universal Intellect, which is the same in all Men. Afterwards Cratippus collected some Instances; he shewed that the Event had confirmed such and such Dreams, such and such Predictions, and then he argued in this manner: We cannot see without Eyes, and it happens sometimes that they do not perform their Duty; but provided they discover the Truth to us once, it is certain, that we have Organs that see it: In like manner, if there was no Divination, no Man could ever divine any thing; but because there is a Divination, it does not follow that a Man can divine always: But Men divine sometimes, and therefore we must believe there exists a Faculty of divining (19). I desire I may be allowed to say, that Cicero shews little Exactness in this part of his Work; I do not think that the Opinion of a Man can be more carelessly explained: I could easily prove it, if this was a proper place to shew the Rules of a Parallel, or of Antitheses. He refutes Cratippus's Comparison, and his Consequences more clearly. He says, that the Eyes which discover the Truth are directed by Nature and Sense; but that if our Soul foretells the Truth, either by Dreams, or by Ecstasies, it is a meer chance. Oculi vera cernentes utuntur natura atque sensu. Animi si quando vel vaticinando vel somnando vera viderunt, uti sunt fortuna atque casu (20). Cratippus's Consequences were grounded on this Hypothesis, viz. That so many Dreams, and so many Predictions, had not proved true by chance. Cicero denies that Hypothesis, and maintains against him, that Chance had always done

(9) Joannes Bisselius, Ruinar. illustr. decide 4, parte iv. p. 2856.

(10) Cuius, me hercules entus prescientia peneç folos (adit) immortales, peneç nos, nihil minus est. Id. ib.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) Cicero. Epist. 25, lib. 7, ad Attic.

* Plut. in Cat. & Pomp.

(13) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue 6, de la Promenade, pag. 144 of the thirteenth Volume of his Works. See also pag. 146, where he confutes those who excuse Cratippus.

(14) Epist. 21, lib. 16, Cicero ad Familiar. pag. m. 455.

(15) Ibid. Epist. 16, lib. 12.

(16) Ibid. Epist. 21, lib. 16, pag. 457.

(17) Jonsius, de Scriptor. Hist. Phil. pag. 203.

(18) Cicero, lib. 1, de Divinat. cap. 32.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Id. ibid. lib. 2, cap. 45; D.

(f) He was still at Mitylene after the Battle of Pharsalia, in 706 (ans) not in 706, as Yossius says, pag. 203, and no body informs us that he went out of it the Year following.

Moréri says, without any Reason for it, that he taught in Athens in the Year of Rome 706 (f).

it; and then he makes use of an Argument ad hominem: You reject, says he, the Divinations of the Augures, and of the Haruspices, and those of Astrologers, &c. nevertheless they have been sometimes confirmed by the Event; and therefore you are in the wrong to reject them, or you must admit two kinds of Divination without any reason. I cannot see what Cratippus could have answered. Cicero's words deserve to be set down: 'Assumit Cratippus hoc modo, sunt autem innumerales praesentiones non fortuitae: at ego dico nullam. Vide quanta sit controversia, jam assumptione non concessa nulla conclusio est. At impudentes sumus, qui quod tam peripetuum sit non concedamus. Quid est peripetuum? Multa vera, inquit, evadere. Quid quod multo plura falsa? Nonne ipsa varietas quae est propria fortunae, fortunam esse causam non naturam esse docet? Deinde si tua ista conclusio, Cratippe, vera est (tecum enim mihi res est) nonne intelligis eadem uti posse & aruspices, & fulguratores, & interpretes ostentorum, & augures, & fortilegos, & Chaldaeos, quorum generum nullum est, ex quo non aliquid sicut praedictum sit evaserit? Ergo aut ea quoque genera divinandi sunt quae tu rectissime improbas: aut si ea non sunt, non intelligo quur haec duo sint quae relinquis. Qua ergo ratione haec inducis, eadem illa possunt esse quae tollis (21). --- Cratippus proceeds in his Argument thus: There are innumerable Preconceptions wherein Chance is not concerned. But I say none. Consider the Nature of the Question. Where the Postulatum is denied, no Conclusion can be drawn. But it would be Impudence not to grant what is so self-evident. What is self-evident? That many things happen to be true. And what if many more happen to be false? Does not this Variety, which is the peculiar Mark of Chance, prove Chance, and not Nature, to be the Cause? But, Cratippus, (for it is with you I am engaged) was your Conclusion true, do not you perceive, that Soothsayers, Diviners, Interpreters of Prodigies, Augurs, Fortune-tellers, Chaldeans (of all which sorts some have foretold something which happened) might use the same? Therefore either those kinds which you rightly reject are true, or else I see no reason to allow these which you except. For the rest may be supported by the same Arguments, which you use in the Defence of these. Tertullian reckons one Cratippus among those that wrote Books about Dreams (22); and I take him to be the same with our Cratippus.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Tertul. lib. de Anima.

(a) This is the Opinion of Imperialis and Cratippo; but Jerom. Bursardus, Difert. de Poëtis Ferrarenfibus. pag. 33, refutes it, and says, that Cento is in the Ferrarese.

CREMONINUS (CAESAR), who was seventeen Years a Professor of Philosophy at Ferrara, and forty Years at Padua [A], was born at Cento in the Modeneze (a), in the Year 1550. He got such a Reputation, that most Kings and Princes desired to have his Picture. His Lectures were very much esteemed; but his printed Books did not sell well [B]. He was accounted a Freethinker, who did not believe the Immortality of the Soul [C], and whose Opinions about other Matters

[A] He was Professor of Philosophy — and forty Years at Padua. He was at first Colleague of the famous Piccolomini, first Professor of Philosophy in the University of Padua, whom he succeeded after his Death. His Method was, to explain first of all Aristotle's Doctrine, and then to clear the Obscurities of it, either according to his own Thoughts, or according to the Explication of Alexander Aphrodisiensis. He seldom mentioned the Disputes of the Schoolmen; he utterly despised the Opinions of the Moderns, and made it his Business to revive the Doctrine of the Ancients. He delivered his Lectures with such a good Grace, and so gravely, that it would be a very difficult thing to find any Professors like him. His Conversations with the Scholars were not considerable. He discoursed of all manner of things, without diving into the bottom of any one of them. His Affability and Politeness appeared in them much more than his Learning (1). I do not think that he deserves to be blamed for it; for, in short, a Man's Mind cannot be always bent; the more pains he takes in his public Lectures, the more he wants some Relaxation in his private Conversations, which would be most troublesome, if he was obliged to undertake the Discussion of some particular Matter. One must have the Liberty of rambling, and touching slightly upon all the things, which the course of Conversation brings upon the Carpet. This is the most agreeable, and the most innocent Diversion that a Doctor, obliged to teach in public, can have.

[B] His Lectures were very much esteemed; but his printed Books did not sell so well. This wants to be paraphrased, that my Author's Thought may be thoroughly understood. The Books, says he, that Cremoninus caused to be printed, grow musty in the Booksellers Shops; but what he dictated to his Scholars, walking, according to the Custom of the Peripatetics, is so excellent, that nothing more agreeable, or more perfect, can be desired for the Discovery of the Mysteries of Philosophy. 'Illud nobis mirandum quod elaborata ipsius opera typis excusa, in officinis haecenus evilescent; scripta vero Peripatetici, ut nihil ad arcana philosophiae detegenda perfectius ac suavius desiderari possit (2)'. That a Sermon or a Lecture should be more admired when we hear them, than when we read them (3), is no rare thing; nay it is very common. That a Man who speaks in public should better succeed, when without any Preparation he gives a free Scope to his Imagination, than when he composes, or meditates what he is to say with all the Care imaginable, is not so common a thing; but yet it is not very extraordinary. That the Books of an Author should be more esteemed, whilst they are read in Manuscript, than after they are printed, is a thing that happens very often (4); but here is something more extraordinary: What Cremoninus dictated to his Scholars had the utmost Perfection, and what he published was read with the utmost Contempt. This is what Imperialis says. To explain this, we may have recourse to two Hypotheses; the one is, to say, that he was one of those Authors, who spoil their own Works by correcting them, and whose Strength consists only in the first Sallies of the Mind, and grows dull or vanishes away in a close and profound Meditation: the other is, to say, that Imperialis has not expressed himself well, and that, to relate the thing truly, he should have told us, that Cremoninus's Writings, which were admired in Manuscript Copies, lost their Reputation as soon as they were printed. This last Hypothesis seems more likely to me than the other: for, if Cremoninus had spoiled his Works by preparing them for the Press, the thing might have been remedied by means of the Copies that were in the Scholars Hands. Some officious Friends would have revived his Glory, by publishing the incomparable Writings that he had dictated.

[C] He was accounted a Freethinker, who did not believe the Immortality of the Soul. Several Authors say, that this was the Reason why he would have those words to be put in his Epitaph, Caesar Cremoninus hic totus jacet. --- Caesar Cremoninus lies wholly here. If we had no other Argument, we could not well convict him of Libertinism; for the famous Professor Gisbert Voëtius, having alleged that Proof, disowned it some time after, because the same Friend, who had supplied him with it, sent him word that it was founded upon a false Fact. 'Ante hac, says he (5), ab eruditiss. viro & amico mihi communicatum erat epitaphium quod dicebatur sibi fecisse; Totus Cremoninus hic jacet. Sed postea ab eodem aliunde aliter informato monitus revocaui illud in prima hujus disputationis editione.' In the Room of that Proof, he substitutes another, which does not signify much. The thing is this: Fortunius Licetus says, that, having taken upon him to confute the Opinion of Alexander Aphrodisiensis concerning

(4) Varillas is an Instance of it.

(5) Voët. selectarum disputationum Theologicarum, Vol. I, pag. 206.

(1) Ex Joanne Imperiali in Museo Histor. pag. 173.

(2) Imper. ibid. pag. 174.

(3) See, above, Remark [O] of the Article CASIUS SEVERUS (TITUS), at the end; and below, the Remark [K] of the Article HOR-TENSIVS (QUINTUS); and the Remark [C] of the Article NARNI.

Matters were not in the least consonant to Christianity [D]. He died of the Plague in the Year 1630, and was buried in the Monastery of St. Justina, to which he left all his Estate. He was very civil to every body, and knew how to appear kind and obliging: nay, he was too exact an Observer of Ceremonies, or Offices of Civility; but at the bottom he did not espouse any one's Interests sincerely or faithfully. He delighted in fomenting Divisions among the Scholars, and pretended to take no part in their Factions, and disguised himself under artificial Caresses with the utmost Facility; and in the mean time he kept up Discord with all his Heart, especially to the Disadvantage of those Students whom he knew not to be in his Interest (b). We have, in the first Volume of the Mercurio Jesuitico (c), the Speech he made in 1591 to the Senate of Venice, for the University of Padua, against the Jesuits. His Qualities were not known to one of the Historians of Count d'Ulfeld [E]. Father Rapin is mistaken, when he says, that he flourished in the XVth Century (d) in the University of Pisa (e).

cerning the Nature of the Soul, he could not be dissuaded from that laudable Design, by the Menaces of Cremoninus, his Colleague, and Lewis Albertus, Professor of Divinity, who threatened to write against him. They were, says he, two Disciples of Frederic Pendasius, very much addicted to the Opinion of Alexander Aphrodisiensis. 'Ambo doctrinæ Aphrodisiæ cultores non semel dixerint se volumini meo contradicentes, qui nulla contradictione relicta diem obeuntes fato cesserunt (6). -- They were both Advocates for the Doctrines of Aphrodisæus, and often declared they would answer my Discourse, but died without leaving any Answer.' It is plain, that, since a Professor of Divinity at Padua threatened to write in favour of that Opinion, he did not believe that Alexander Aphrodisiensis had maintained the Mortality of the Soul. Common Sense teaches, that neither in Italy, nor in other places, a Divine would be so bold as to write in Vindication of an Opinion, if he acknowledged that it is contrary to the Immortality of the Soul. So that, if Cremoninus had no other Opinion than that which that Professor of Divinity pretended to vindicate, he was not heterodox as to the Immortality of the Soul: and therefore we want other Proofs. But as I affirm nothing of my own Head, I am not obliged to produce them.

Here is a Passage somewhat curious. I take it from a Letter of Balzac, wherein he recommends one Mr. Drouet to Mr. de Lorme the King's Physician. 'If you discover to him the Mysteries of the Arabians, (he knows those of the Greeks in Perfection) he will not hear you, neither as a prophane Person, nor as one newly initiated. His Name is in great Letters in the Records of the University of Padua: and when he left the School of the great Cremoninus, he was almost as great and as learned as he. Not that he is a blind Follower of his Master: I can assure you that he has only embraced his sound Opinions; and never was a Christian better persuaded than he, that the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, is the God of the Living, and not of the Dead, &c (7).'

Lorenzo Craffo, whom I had not by me when this Article was first printed, is since come into my Hands. I find in his Book the Confirmation of a Conjecture that came then into my Mind; which is, that Cremoninus did not simply and absolutely maintain the Mortality of the Soul, but only in case Aristotle's Opinions were to be followed. That Question of Fact, of little Moment at bottom, has been a long time debated in the Schools of Italy, and there was no just reason to place those among the Heterodox, who pretended, that Aristotle had not taught the Immortality of the Soul. Such was Cremoninus's Restriction. 'E veleno d'animo contagioso l'insegnare, che l'anima dell' Uomo soggetto alla corruzione non differisca nella morte dell' Uomo da quella de' Bruti, com' egli faceva, ancorche faccamente asserisse sollenerci ciò solamente in sentenza d'Aristotele (8)'. Moreri has suppressed that Clause of Lorenzo Craffo, which is a capital Omission in this Case. Note, that this is almost the only thing that Lorenzo has added to the Narrative of Imperialis. He is so much the more to be praised for having added it, because he was besides persuaded that Cremoninus's Restriction is only a Shift. He declares him void of all Religion, and adds, that some Persons thought he was guilty of having inspired that bad Doctrine into several of his trusty Scholars. 'Fù ben composto di corpo, aultero di volto, breve di sonno, ambizioso di saper molto, finto di costumi, LONTANO D'OGNI RELIGIONE, havendo secondo il parer d'alcuni fatto non pochi alievi confidenti di questa prava sua Dottrina (9).'

[D] His Opinions about other matters were not in the least consonant to Christianity. His Doctrine concerning Fate, the World, and the moving Intelligences of the Heavens, did not appear to be sound; and it was thought that he maintained them with more Zeal than a Christian should have done (10). [E] His Qualities were not known to one of the Historians of Count d'Ulfeld. That Historian's Name is Roussau de la Valette. His historical Novel, intitled, Le Comte d'Ulfeld, was printed at Paris in the Year 1677. We find there, that That Count, having, by the Follies of his Youth, deserved to be turned out of his Father's House, met with Signor Cremonini, a noble Venetian, at Padua, that he contracted a very strict Friendship with him, and improved so much by his Conversation in a Year's time, that he often owned, that he had from him the best part of what he knew.

CRESPET (PETER), Friar of the Order of the Celestins, and Prior of their Convent at Soissons, published, in the XVIth Century, several Books [A], which made it appear, that he had read much, and had made abundance of Collections, both out of Prophane and Ecclesiastical Authors. Moreri says he was a Native of Sens (a), and that he died in 1595. Therefore he should not have added, that he lived in an Age, when Learning was very much neglected.

[A] He published several Books. His Garden of Pleasure, and spiritual Recreation, was printed, at Paris, in two Volumes, in 8vo, in the Year, 1602. He revised, and corrected, this Edition. It is divided into five Parts, containing divers Discourses, as well of the Nature, Origin, Conditions, Effects, and Enormities of Sins, which ought to be excluded or extirpated the Garden of the Soul: as also of the Nature, admirable Effects, Dignity, and Excellence of the Virtues, which should be planted and cherished there. He joined to this Tract, An Encomium upon the Excellency of the Virtue of Chastity, Virginity, and Continence, although he had already sufficiently treated of those noble Virtues in the six Books of Continence, which he had translated from the Latin of Mr d'Espense, in the Epistle Dedicatory of the said Book, and again in his Mystical Pomegranate. Treatise 1, §. 9.

(1). The Epistle Dedicatory of the first Volume of this Garden is dated October 1, 1586, and that of the first Volume May 1, 1587. He quotes sometimes, in this Book, his Discourses on the Origin, Excellence, and Immortality, of the Soul. He also made Discourses of the Hatred of Satan, which are often cited by Martin del Rio, in his Disquisitiones Magicæ. He published also in Latin, Summa Ecclesiasticæ Disciplinæ & totius Juris Canonici.

CRISPINUS

(6) Fortun. Licetus, Histor. prior. Operum, cap. 16, apud Veticum, ibid.

(7) Balzac Lettres choisies, pag. 35, Dutch Edit.

(a) He calls himself, in the Titles of his Books, Celestin of Paris; but this may only mean, that he was made a Celestin Monk at Paris.

(b) Taken from Imperialis in Museo Histor. pag. 173.

(c) Pag. 490.

(d) Rapin, Com. par. de Platon & d'Aristote, pag. m. 399.

(e) Id. Reflex. sur la Philosophie, pag. m. 350.

(8) Lorenzo Craffo, Elogio d'Uomini Letterati, Tom. II, pag. 124.

(9) Id. ib. pag. 125.

(10) Imperialis, ubi supra, pag. 174.

(11) Crespet. Jardin de Plaisir, &c, Tom. II, at the end, pag. 451.

(a) Melch. Adam, in vita Theod. Bezae, pag. 205.

(b) Beza, Responsio ad Balduinum, pag. 216, Tom. II, Operum.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Melch. Adam, ubi supra, Note, That this Martyrology was first printed in Latin, in 8vo, in the Year 1556, and then in 4to, in the Year 1560.

(1) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 433.

(2) Konig. Bibl. pag. 223.

(3) See his second Answer to John Calvin, pag. 73, & seq. Edit. Col. lon. 1562.

(4) Responsio pro Balduino ad Calvinum & Bezae, fol. 98.

(5) Melch. Adam, in vita Bezae, pag. 205.

(6) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 437.

CRISPINUS (JOHN), in French Crespin, a famous Printer at Geneva, whether he fled for his Religion, in the Year 1548 (a), was born in the Artois (b). He applied himself with great Capacity and Diligence to the printing of several Books (c), and particularly of a Greek and Latin Lexicon [A], and of the Martyrology of the Protestants (d). He died of the Plague at Geneva, in the Year 1572 (e). Eustache Vignon, his Son-in-law, continued to make that Printing-house flourish (f). Valerius Andreas Desselius says, that Crispinus, the Son of a Civilian of Arras, studied five Years at Louvain, and that there was a very long Friendship between him and Francis Baudouin, and that he writ some Notes on the Institutes, and a Treatise of Apostates &c. (g) [B]. He says nothing of a Book that has been very often reprinted, and which Baudouin despised very much [C]. You will find some Facts in Moreri, which I will not repeat, and some Faults that I shall observe below [D]. I shall also observe those of the History of Printing [E]. Conrad Badius printed some time for our Crispinus [F].

(e) Beza, Epist. 64, pag. 278, Tom. III, Operum.

(f) Id. Prefat. Tom. II, Operum.

(g) Valer. Andr. Desselius, Bibl. Belg. pag. 437.

[A] He applied himself to the Printing of — a Greek and Latin Lexicon. It was not in the Year 1595, as Valerius Andreas (1) and Konig (2) say; for he died in the Year 1572. Many Bibliographers commit this Fault: they ascribe to a Man the Editions of his Books that were made after his Death.

[B] He wrote — a Treatise of Apostates. It is a Commentary on the third Law of the Code de Apostatis. He wrote it in favour of Calvin against Baudouin, and to oppose it to the Commentary of the latter on the Laws de famosis Libellis. Baudouin complains bitterly of it, and inveighs against that old Friend, who had been his School-fellow (3).

[C] He says nothing of a Book, that has been very often reprinted, and which Baudouin despised very much. In this Book, Crispinus displays his Zeal against Popery, and for the Instruction of the Reformed. It is intitled, The State of the Church, with a Discourse of the Times from the Days of the Apostles to this present time. I have sometimes quoted it. The Edition, that I make use of, is that of Bergen-op-Zoom 1605, in 4to, revised and enlarged by John Tassin, Minister of the French Church at Flushing. Here is the abusive Judgment that Baudouin made of that Work of Crispinus: 'Si qua unquam fuit putida & insulsa farrago vanitatis atque aversusque illam profecto esse altissima voce profiteri cogimur (4).' Note, that Baudouin spoke then as being the Author's Enemy.

[D] You will find some Faults in Moreri, which I shall observe below. I. Crispinus did not go to Geneva with a design to print Books there, but on account of Religion. It is true that he and Beza designed at first to associate themselves, and to set up a Printing-Press (5); and that, Beza having found another Employment, Crispinus executed that design alone. But this does not excuse Moreri; for his words express nothing less than what he should have informed the Reader of. They plainly signify, that Crispinus went to Geneva to get some Bookfellers, that would print the Books that he had either made or collected. II. It is not true, that, before he went to Geneva, he had already published Hesiod, Nomenclatura Aitionum, Institutionum Imperialium lib. iv. &c. III. Neither is it true, that, being at Geneva, Poverty obliged him to be a Servant for a Livelihood. IV. Nor, that Baudouin says so. The following words of Valerius Andreas have occasioned most of those Faults: 'Vixit dein in Galliis professione typographicae ac literariae exercitationis clarus: usus annos multos amico Franc. Balduino, quocumque pueris educatus fuerat. Crispinum tamen postea omnis humanitatis non minus quam juris oblitum fuisse, ex quo factus est servus Allobrox, scribit Bald. in Responsione sua ad Joan. Calvinum pag. 89 (6). — He lived afterwards in France, eminent for his Printing, and Studies, with Fr. Baudouin, with whom he had been educated from his Infancy; But Baudouin afterwards, in his Answer to John Calvin, writes, that Crespin had abandoned both Humanity and Honesty, since he had submitted to the Yoke of Religious Slavery.' This is what made Moreri say, that Crispinus published some Books before he went to Geneva; and that afterwards he was a Servant. He did in no wise apprehend the sense of Baudouin's words. They signify that Crispinus had forgot all the Duties of Humanity and Justice, since he had submitted to Calvin's Yoke. I wonder Moreri did not believe that Baudouin meant, that Crispinus, after his Change of Religion, had forgot whatever he knew of the Civil-Law. This would have been wonderful; and it would not be the first time that it hath been said, that Men, by changing their Religion, lose their Wit, Style, Learning, &c.

[E] I will also observe the Faults of the History of Printing. We find there (7), I. That Crispinus, having studied five Years at Louvain, came afterwards into France to study the Civil-Law with Francis Baudouin his intimate Friend, under Gabriel Mudé and other Doctors of the Civil-Law. II. That he made himself very famous in the Exercise of the Art of Printing. III. That he printed there the New Testament in Greek very correctly in 1564, and Homer and Theocritus in 1570. IV. That he was obliged to retire to Geneva on account of Religion, where he composed and printed Lexicon Crispini in Folio and Quarto. V. That Casaubon was one of his Authors. One Faulty of Valerius Andreas has occasioned many others. He is in the wrong, to say that Crispinus made himself famous in France by the Exercise of Printing; for he did not begin that Trade till he left France. But other Mistakes have been built on that bad Foundation of Valerius Andreas. It is supposed that Crispinus did not retire to Geneva till after the Year 1570; that he printed several Books in France before that time, and that his Lexicon came out after the Year 1570. This falls to the Ground, when this Truth is once established, that Crispinus went to Geneva about the Year 1548, and that his Lexicon Græco-Latinum appeared before the Year 1562. 'Tu oblitus te aliquando Lugduni fuisse Sebastiani Gryphii mancipium, bono & honesto, id est tui penitus dissimili viro (Crispino) vitio vertis quod Lexicon Græco-Latinum quale ante non editum fuit, maximo tum sumptu tum labore in publicum emisit (8). — Forgetting you were once a Servant to Sebastian Gryphius, you object against Crespin, a Man of Honesty and Integrity, (Principles to which you are a Stranger) that, with immense Labour, and at a vast expence, he had published a Lexicon, Greek and Latin, such as had before been published.' So says Beza in the Refutation of a Book, which Baudouin had published in the Year 1562. The other Faults of the History of Printing are such, that Valerius Andreas has no hand in them. He says in very plain terms, that it was at Louvain, and not in France, that Crispinus heard the Lectures of Gabriel Mudéus and other Professors. 'Lovanium missus Gabrielem Mudæum aliosque antecessores quinquennium totum ante aditam Galliam audivit (9).' He does not say that Crispinus went into France with Baudouin. Take notice, that Casaubon was not yet fourteen Years of Age when Crispinus died: How then could he be one of his Authors? The origin of this error is probably this: Theocritus was reprinted after Crispinus's Death, and Casaubon's Notes were added to that Edition (10), and the Preface of Crispinus was kept in it. This made some believe that Crispinus had put out that new Edition.

[F] Conrad Badius printed some time, for our Crispinus. I have seen these Words at the end of a little Book in 8vo. A Geneva, de l'Imprimerie de Jean Crespin par Conrad Badius 1550. That little Book is a Piece of Calvin, intitled, A most excellent Treatise of the Christian Life.

(7) La Caille, Hist. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 142.

(8) Beza Resp. ad Francisc. Balduin, pag. 216, Tom. II, Operum.

(9) Valer. Andr. ubi supra.

(10) Those Notes came out under the Name of Isaacus Hortus bonus. He made them at the Request of Eustache Vignon, who reprinted Theocritus. They are dated in August, 1584.

CRISPUS (JOHN BAPTIST), a good Divine, and a good Poet, flourished in the XVth Century, and was born at Gallipoli, in the Kingdom of Naples. The chief of his Books is that which was printed at Rome, in the Year 1594, in folio, de Ethnicis Philosophis caute legendis [A]. See Toppi's Biblioteca Napoletana (a). (e) Pag. 132.

[A] The chief of his Books is that de Ethnicis Philosophis caute legendis. Poffevin speaks of it. Vir vere Philosophus qui nimirum acri & quali Christianum decet, judicio, Philosophiam expendit, librum sat grandem de Philosophis caute legendis ita scripsit, ut quæcunque hereses à Philosophis minus cautis manarunt, eæ indicatæ, sint ac solidis rationibus confutatæ, ex divinis Scripturis & Patribus, ex Synodorum decretis, ex Scholasticis, quibus cautionibus præmuniti Philosophi sive publici Professores inoffenso pede curriculum hoc decurrent, tantamque ancillam recta adducunt ad arcem (1). — A true Philosopher, who examined Philosophy with that nicety of Judgment, which becomes a Christian, wrote a considerable Treatise on the caution, which ought to be used in reading the Philosophers, wherein all the errors, which flowed from unguarded Philosophers, are pointed out, and confuted, by solid reasoning from the Holy Scriptures, the Fathers, the Decrees of Councils, and the Schoolmen. With which Precautions, Philosophers, or public Professors, being provided, may safely tread that Path, and lead the handmaid to the Temple. Father Merfenne has inserted a long Passage out of it in one of his Books (2): it is that wherein Crispus confutes the mystical Divines. It is not improper to know the reason why Father Merfenne inserted that Passage; Because, says he, that Author, who is pretty scarce, has confuted that sort of Divines most elegantly. Quod attinet ad secretiores illos Theologos quos Venetus tam importune & tam frequenter inculcat, bene mihi philosophatus videtur Joannes Baptista Crispus, cujus hic ideo integram sententiam libet attexere, præsertim cum autor ille rarissimus esse videatur, & elegantissimo stylo secretiores illos Theologos configat (3). — As to those mystical Divines whom Venetus mentions so often, John Baptist Crispus seems to me to have justly reasoned, whose Opinion I shall here give at large: especially as that Author is very scarce, and as he confutes them with a peculiar Elegance of Style.

The other Works of Crispus are two Speeches about the War against the Turks, printed at Rome in the Year 1594, in 4to. De Medicis laudibus, Oratio ad cives suos Gallipolitans, printed at Rome in the Year 1591, in quarto. The Life of Sannazar, printed at Rome in the Year 1583, and reprinted at Naples in the Year 1633, in octavo. The Plan of the City of Gallipoli, dedicated to Flaminio Caraccioli the first of January 1591 (4).

(3) Marinus Merfennus in Problem. Veneti, pag. 423.

(4) Taken from Toppi's Biblioteca Napoletana.

CRITIAS, a Disciple of Socrates, improved so little by that Philosopher's Instructions, that he became a very wicked Man. He shewed it chiefly, when the City of Athens, the Place of his Birth, being subdued by Lyfander, General of the Lacedæmonians, was subjected to thirty Tyrants. He was one of them, and the most unjust of them all (a). He did not only design to render the City of Athens most miserable, but also to make a Desert of all Attica [A]. It is said, that his Injustices prejudiced the People against Socrates [B], because their Resentment against the Scholar reflected upon the Master. Xenophon has confuted those, who maliciously imputed to Socrates the disorderly Lives of some of his Scholars [C]. It is certain, that Critias did not love Socrates, and that he forbade him

(a) Κριτίας μὲν γὰρ τῶν ἐν τῇ ἀτυχεύσει πάντων πλεονεκτήσατος τῶν καὶ βιαστῶτος ἐγένετο. Critias enim quam ad paucos pervenisset civitatis status, unus ex illis factus longe omnium avarissimus ac violentissimus fuit. Xenophon, de factis & dictis Socratis, lib. 1, pag. m. 415. See Remark [A].

[A] He designed to make a Desert of all Attica. His Rancour against his Country appeared from the time that he retired into Thessaly, where he was continually speaking ill of the Athenians. He represented them as a People who had the worst Customs in the World. Διαβάλλον δ' Ἀθηναίους ὡς πλείστα ἀνθρώπων ἀμαρτανότας. Athenienses vero perstringens quod præ cæteris errarent maxime (1). Being returned to Athens, he did the Lacedæmonians many Services; he put Lyfander upon demolishing the Walls, and conspired with them to depopulate all Attica, and to reduce it into Meadows. Ἐπεὶ λαμπρῶς μὲν ἐλακάνισεν, πρὸς δὲ τὰ ἱερὰ, καθήρει δὲ διὰ Λυσάνδρου τὰ τεῖχη, ὥς δ' ἤλαυνεν τῶν Ἀθηναίων τὸ σῆμαί ποί τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἀφαιρεῖτο, πόλεμον Λακωνικὸν εἰπὼν ἐς πάσας, εἰ τις τὸν Ἀθηναίων φεῖγοντα δέξαστο, ἐμὴν τε καὶ μισαίοντα τὴν τελευτὴν ὑπερβάλλειν, βυλεύματός τε ἀπὸ τῶν τοῖς Λακεδαιμονίοις ἐνελαλόμενον ὡς μηλόβοτος ἢ Ἀττικὴ ἀποφανεῖν τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀγέλης ἐκκνωθεῖσα, κακίος ἀνθρώπων ἐμοὶ γὰρ φαίνεται ζυμάντων, ὃν ἐπὶ κακία ὄνομα. Cum ille aperte Lacedæmonia is faveret, proderet sacra, per Lyfanderum mœnia destrueret, quoque Athenienses expulerat quominus in ulla Græciæ parte consisterent, prohiberet, Lacedæmonicum edicens bellum omnibus imminere si quis exultantem Atheniensem exciperet, truculentia & cædibus triginta tyrannos superaret, detestabileque consilium cum Lacedæmonia iniret ut Attica pecorum nutrix efficeretur, virorum armentis spoliata, his de causis mihi omnium hominum pessimus fuisse videtur qui ob scelera fuerunt famosi (2). — As he was evidently devoted to the Lacedæmonians, had not the least regard for the most sacred things, demolished the Walls by Lyfander, and forbade the Athenians, whom he banished, to remain in any part of Greece, threatening all, who should entertain them, with the Arms of Sparta, exceeded the whole Thirty in Cruelty and Tyranny, and entered into a most abominable Scheme, with the Lacedæmonians, of depopulating Attica, and making it a common Pasture; I look upon him as the worst of Men, even amongst those who have signalized themselves by their Villanies. He was the cause of the Death of Alcibiades; for Lyfander did not engage the Persians to make away with him, till he had been informed by Critias, and the other Tyrants of Athens, that the Order which he had established in that City would be soon overturned, if that Man was not destroyed. Critias cæterique tyranni Atheniensium certos homines ad Lyfanderum in Asiam miserunt, qui eum certiores facerent, nisi Alcibiadem sustulisset, nihil earum rerum fore ratum quas ipse Athenis constitulisset. Quare si suas res gestas manere vellet, illum persequeretur (3). — Critias, and the other Tyrants of Athens, sent to inform Lyfander in Asia, that, unless he dispatched Alcibiades out of the way, nothing which they had done at Athens would be of any effect. That therefore if he desired the continuance of what he had done, he must destroy him.

[B] His Injustices prejudiced the People against Socrates. The Orator Æschines did not question it; for in one of his Orations, he spoke thus to the Athenians: Τυχεῖς ὡς Ἀθηναῖοι Σωκράτην μὲν τὸν σοφιστὴν ἀπεκτείναντες ἐπὶ Κελσίαν ἐφάρμακον πεπαιδευκὸς ἕνα τῶν τελευτῶν, τῶν τὸν δῆμον καλῶσαντων. Vos, Athenienses, Socratem sapientem illum occidistis, quod Critiam institulisset unum XXX. virorum qui populum opprimerent (4). — Ye, O Men of Athens, put the wise Socrates to Death, because he had educated Critias, one of the XXX Oppressors of the People.

[C] Xenophon has confuted those, who maliciously imputed to Socrates the disorderly Life of some of his Scholars. The Enemies of that Philosopher imputed to him all the Misery, that Critias and Alcibiades, two of his Disciples, brought upon the Athenians. Xenophon shews that this was very unjust: He says, That those two Scholars applied themselves to Socrates to learn the Art of Discouraging, which they intended to make use of to satisfy their exorbitant Ambition (5). He pretends, that tho' they were

(3) Corn. Nepos, in Alcibiade, cap. x. init.

(4) Æschines Orat. in Timarchum, pag. m. 194. B.

(5) Xenoph. de factis & dictis Socratis, lib. 1, pag. m. 415.

(1) Poffevin Ap. p. r. Sac. Tom. II, pag. 117.

(2) At the end of his Observations & Emendations in Problema Georgii Veneti in Genesim.

(1) Philostratus in vitis Sophistarum, pag. 505.

(2) Idem, pag. 504, 505.

Poetry [F]. He was more praised by Plato than by Proclus [G], who commented upon Plato. He has been reckoned one of those who dogmatized against the Existence of God [H]. I should not be surprized that Authors, indifferently

* Sophistas Critias, qui in gravi genere dicendi exercitissimus fuit. Nec tamen gravitatem verbis poeticis aut dithyrambicis metiebatur, sed vocabulis maxime propriis, ut natura postulat, concinnabat orationem. Insigni præterea brevitate & magna Atticisimi temperie loquutus, nihil habet insolens aut ineptum (16). — Critias bore no considerable rank among the old Sophists, being a perfect Master of the majestic manner of speaking; nor yet did he swell his Discourse with poetical or sounding Expressions, but chose those which were most suitable to the nature of his subject. Besides he spoke with a peculiar conciseness, and a happy mixture of the Attic Elegance, so that nothing is uncouth or improper. He quotes Hermogenes in his Favour

(16) Caussin. de Eloquentia, lib. 2, pag. m. 18, 29.

(17) Ab Hermogene judicator summus et digne

(18) Philostratus in vita Sophistarum, pag. 505.

(19) Id. ibid. This may be justly said of Seneca.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Philostratus in Epist. ad Julianum Augustum, pag. 887.

(22) Plut. in Alcibiades, pag. 209, E.

(23) Idem, in Cimone, pag. 484, E.

(17) I had rather inform my Readers, that Critias was one of the XXX Tyrants of Athens, than merely call him a Sophist. However, I own that Philostratus, giving too great a Latitude to that Word, placed Critias among the ancient Sophists. We have seen that he made a profligate Wretch of him; and we shall see that he praises him extremely for his Eloquence. Την δὲ ἰδίαν τὴν λόβη δολυσίας ὁ Κριτίας καὶ πολυφωνῶν, σεμνολογῆσαι τε ἱκανώτατος, ἢ τὴν διθυραμβικὴν σεμνολογίαν, ἰδὲ καταφύγουσαν ἐς τὰ ἐκ ποιητικῆς ἰνῶματα, ἀλλ' ἐν τῶν κυριωτάτων συκμῶν καὶ κατὰ φύσιν ἔχουσαν, ὅρα τὸν ἀνδρα καὶ βραχυλογῶντα ἱκανῶς καὶ δεινῶς, καθαρῶς ἀπολογίας ἡδὲ ἀπλῆς ἔχοντα τὴν ἐκ ἀρετῆς, ἰδὲ ἐκφάτως. Genus vero orationis Critiæ fuit sententiarum gravitate & judicio ornatum. Idem in gravi dicendi genere exercitissimus fuit, quam quidem gravitatem non dithyrambis intonabat, neque ad poetica verba confugiebat, sed vocabulis maxime propriis concinnabat & ut natura postulat. Video namque hominem dicenti brevitate loquentem, & in defensione alios subtiliter carpentem. Item neque male neque immoderate Attica lingua differentem (18). — Critias, as to his Manner of writing, was solid and sententious, much inclined to the Majestic, but never rising to Bombast, or affecting Poetical Terms, expressing himself with Propriety, and agreeable to Nature. Metbinks I see him speaking with a becoming Gravity, and refusing Objections with strength of Argument, and Attic Elegance. I omit the remaining part of his Character mentioned by Philostratus: He loved Paradoxes, and to represent one and the same Idea by several loose Strokes. Καὶ τὸ δυνάστεως δὲ χωρὶς περσεύων Κριτίου ὄρα. Critias quoque decor est scriptis dissolutis uni loco inbarere (19). The Wind of his Eloquence fell often, but it was always softer and more pleasant than the Zephyrus (20). One of Philostratus's Letters informs us, that Critias and Thucydides took Gorgias for their Model, and that they were beholding to him for the Loftiness of their Eloquence, attended with Facility in the one, and with Force in the other. Κριτίας δὲ καὶ Θουκυδίδης ἐκ ἀγωνίζοντες τὸ μεγαλόφωνον καὶ τὴν ὀφρὺν παρ' αὐτῶν κεντημένοι μεταποιῶντες δὲ αὐτὸ εἰς τὸ οἰκίον, ὁ μὲν ὑπ' εὐλαττίας, ὁ δ' αὖ ὑπὸ ῥώμης. Critiam vero & Thucydidem non clam est magnitudinem animi & supercilium ab eo (Gorgia) accepisse. Transulerunt autem ad propria, alter ad linguæ promptitudinem, alter ad robur (21).

[F] And for his Poetry.] Plutarch mentions a Passage of Critias's Elegies, where the Author puts Alcibiades in mind that it was he who had caused him to be recalled, I mean, who had proposed to the People of Athens the Law that recalled him. It cannot be said, that the Author of those Elegies is another Critias, since Plutarch surnames him the Son of Callæsebrus: Κριτίᾳ τῷ Καλλαισεβρὲ γράσαντο ὡς αὐτὸς ἐν ταῖς ἐλεσίαις πεποινηκε. Ex Critiæ Callæsebræ filii rogatione, ut ipse bisce elegiis cecinit. And also citing the same Work elsewhere, he ascribed it to Critias one of the thirty Tyrants. Κριτίας δὲ τῶν τεσσακοντα γενόμενος ἐν ταῖς εὐχραι. Critias ex triginta tyrannis orat in elegiis (23). There is a Fault in the Life of Alcibiades translated by Amyot; instead of Critias the Son of Callæsebrus, there is Callias the Son of Callæsebrus. The same Fault is in the Translation of Plato, by Serranus, in the Dialogue, intituled, Protagoras. There is Κριτίας in the Greek, and Callias in the Translation. Plutarch is not the only Author who has cited the Elegies of Critias; you will find several Passages out of them in Athenæus: see Book 10, pag. 432, and Book 15, pag. 666. This last Passage informs us, that the Passage of the first Book, pag. 28, is taken from the same Work of Critias. I do not question but he composed some other Poems. It is not certainly known whether he was the Author of a Poem, intituled Pirithoüs; some ascribe it to him, and others to Euripides (24). We shall see hereafter whether he ought to be distinguished from the Author of the Book De Politia Lacedæmoniorum.

[G] He was more praised by Plato than by Proclus.] Every body in this Town knows, that Critias is ignorant of none of the things we speak of. Κριτίαν δὲ πε πάντες οἱ τῆδε ἱσμεν ἰδὲνδς ἰδιώτην ὄντα ἐν λέγουμεν. Critiam vero omnes utique hac in urbe, nullius eorum, quæ dicimus, esse imperitum scimus (25). This is the Encomium that Plato bestows upon him: now he had been speaking of the Advantages that accrue from an excellent Genius, and from the Study of good Philosophy: Proclus in commentario ad hunc locum: 'O Κριτίας ἦν μὲν γενναῖος καὶ ἀδρᾶς φύσεως, ἡπείρο δὲ καὶ φιλοσόφον συνεσιῶν, καὶ ἐκαλεῖτο ἰδιώτης μὲν ἐν φιλοσόφοις, φιλοσόφῳ δὲ ἐν ἰδιώταις, ὡς ἡ ἰσῶρια φησιν. Erat quidem Critias generosa & vehementi indole, nec philosophicarum expers deceptationum; sed ita tamen ut idiota inter philosophos, philosophus inter idiotas vocaretur; ut quidem historia testatur. Quod significat hunc quidem non fuisse perfectum in philosophia, sed tamen ingenio aptum, & multæ eruditionis (26). — Proclus, in his Commentary on this Place, says: Critias had a noble and extensive Genius; he had likewise spent some time in Philosophy; but so as to be accounted a Novice amongst Philosophers, and a Philosopher amongst the Novices; as History relates. Which means, that he was no Adept in Philosophy, but a Man of a ready Genius, and great Learning. I observe upon these two last words of Petitus, that Proclus's Expressions do not seem to signify, that Critias had a great deal of Learning. A Man may pass for a Philosopher without it among ignorant People. Inter cæcos regnat strabus.

[H] He has been reckoned one of those that dogmatized against the Existence of God.] Sextus Empiricus does not express this in obscure Terms. Οὐκ ἔστι γὰρ, says he (27), οἱ μὲν πολλοὶ φασιν εἶναι τινὲς δὲ οὐ εἶναι. Ὅστις οἱ περὶ Διαγόραν τὴν Μήλιον, καὶ Θεόδωρον, καὶ Κριτίαν τὸν Ἀθηναῖον. Most People believe that there are Gods, but some, as Diagoras, Theodorus, and CRITIAS the Athenian, say there are none. He explains that Man's Thoughts in another Book. Critias, says he (28), one of the XXX Tyrants of Athens, seems to be in the Number of Atheists. He pretends, that the ancient Lawgivers, designing to prevent any one from doing his Neighbour wrong in private, feigned that there is a Providence which takes notice whether Men live well or ill, and punishes them that do evil. According to his System, there had been a time when Men, being as disorderly as Beasts, and neither rewarding good Actions, nor punishing bad ones, followed no other Law than that of the strongest. Afterwards some Men enacted Punishments, and then Justice exercised it's Authority over Injustice, like a Master over his Slave. Those were punished that did any Evil. And then, when it was found that the Laws did indeed prevent Men from sinning publicly, but not from doing an ill Action privately, there arose a Man of Parts, who knew that he should do Mankind a very great Service, if he could order it so, that the Wicked should be afraid of being punished even when they should sin privately, or have an ill Design. He therefore invented a God, that is, an immortal Nature, which sees and knows all things: he ascribed to him the Government of the World, the Motion of the Heavens, Lightning and Thunder,

(24) Athen. lib. 11, pag. 495.

(25) Plato in Timeo, pag. m. 104, E.

(26) Petrus Petitus, Miscellanea. Observat. pag. 6.

(27) Sext. Emp. Pyrrhon. Hypotypos. lib. 3, pag. 155.

(28) Id. adversus Mathematicos, pag. 318.

rently versed in the reading of the Ancients, should be ignorant of that matter of Fact; but I think it somewhat strange, that the learned Tanaquillus Faber did not Thunder, and all things in general that Men dread: Thus, concluded he, an ingenious Man made others believe the Existence of a Deity. Sextus Empiricus quotes Critias's own words, without naming the Book from which he takes them. We know only that he borrows them from a Poem; for he cites Iambic Verses. That which perplexes the thing is, that Plutarch ascribes the same Verses to Euripides, and supposes that this Poet, fearing the Areopagites, and not daring to publish his Atheism directly, caused this wicked System to be set forth by a Person represented on the Stage (29). Εὐεπίδης ὁ τραγῳδοποιὸς ἀποκαλύψασθαι μὲν ἐκ ὑβέλης, δεδαικὸς τὸν ἄρειον πάγον ἐνέφηνε δὲ τῶτον τὸν τρόπον. τὸν γὰρ Σίσυφον εἰσάγαγε περὶ τὴν ταύτης τῆς δόξης, καὶ συνηγοροῦσεν αὐτῇ ταύτῃ τῇ γνώμῃ. Ἦν γὰρ χρόνος (φησὶν) ὅτ' ἄτακτος ἦν ἀνθρώπων βίη, καὶ θνητῶν, ἰσχυρὸς δ' ὑπερήτης. ἐπέβη οὖν τὴν ἀνομίαν λυθῆναι νόμον εἰσαγαγῶν. ἐπεὶ γὰρ ὁ νόμος τὰ σανάρα τῶν ἀδικημάτων εἴργεν ἐδύνατο, κέρεια τε ἡδίκων πολλοί, τότε τις σοφὸς ἀνὴρ ἐρέσπεν ὡς δεῖ αἰεὶ ψευδεὶ λόγῳ τυρρῶσαι τὴν ἀλήθειαν καὶ πείσαι τὸς ἀνθρώπους, ὡς ἔστι δαίμων ἀρβίτη δάλλων βίη, ὅς ταύτ' ἀκούει καὶ βλέπει φρονεῖ τ' ἄγαν. Euripides tragicus Poeta aperte quidem profiteri hanc sententiam non est ausus, metuens Areopagiticum iudicium: indicavit tamen hac ratione: Sisyphum introduxit, qui eam proferret, ipseque ei patrocinatus est, Incondita olim vita fuit mortalium.

Et belluina, viribusque serviens.

Legibus deinde positus ait injustitiam fuisse repressam. Sed cum hæc aperta possent flagitia prohibere, multi autem occulte scelera perpetrarent, tum quendam callidum virum prodixisse, qui docuerit veritati tenebras mendacio offundendas, hominibusque persuadendum esse,

Quod sit perenni vita aliquis vigens Deus,
Qui cernat ista, & audiat, atque intelligat.

— Euripides, the Tragedian, dreading the Censure of the Areopagites, dared not publicly declare himself; but effected it after this manner. He introduced Sisyphus to broach this Opinion, and then patronized it himself. His Words are,

Man like a lordly Savage once untam'd
Scur'd the wild Desert, nor would Homage pay
But to superior Power.

He afterwards observes, that these Irregularities were checked by the Introduction of Laws. But whereas those could only restrain Men from open Acts of Injustice, and Men would still be wicked in the Dark; that then,

Some subtil Politician rose, who taught
To warnish Falshood with a specious Dye:

That he likewise instilled a Notion into the credulous Part of Mankind, that there was

Some God immortal, whose all-seeing Eye,
And ever-open Ear, all Secrets know.

It is manifest, that the System mentioned by Sextus Empiricus, and that which Plutarch speaks of, are both alike. They only differ in this, that Plutarch does not quote so many Verses as Sextus Empiricus, and that he attributes to Euripides what the other ascribes to Critias. But the Verses, quoted by Plutarch, are exactly the same with some of those that Sextus Empiricus quotes. An Enquiry may be made upon this, whether, through want of Memory, too frequent among Authors great and small, what belongs to Euripides has not been ascribed to Critias, or vice versa; or whether there is any other way of solving the Difficulty? It seems to me that a Physician of Paris has been pretty lucky in his Conjectures.

He thinks there is a Gap in Sextus Empiricus; I mean, that the Transcribers have skipped some Periods, which contained what was cited out of Critias, and the notice that was given that Euripides, imbued with the same Opinion, had fully explained it in a Tragedy. 'Mihi probabilis videtur mutilum esse Empirici librum quam Plutarchi, nec ea modo quæ ex Critia citabat ævo substracta, sed etiam ipsius verba illa quibus Euripidem eorum versuum auctorem laudabat antequam versus ipsos poneret. Quo sane factum putandum est ut iis qui lacunam non adverterent, iidem versus Critia adscribi ac nomine ejus citari ab Empirico viderentur (30). Those who know that some very ancient and pretty good Manuscripts do not contain all that is to be found in others, and yet that no Blanks have been left in them, will own that it is very possible that the Manuscripts of Empiricus should be curtailed in that place, though the words are continued. But though I approve Petitus's Conjecture, yet I do not admit of all his Reasons: and I am going to shew those that seem to be false.

I. He says, that, according to Plutarch, the Reason that obliged Euripides to put out his System under the Person of Sisyphus, was for fear of the Areopagites; now, adds he, that Fear is not likely in such a Man as Critias, a cruel and violent Tyrant, who laughed both at humane and divine Laws. 'Non videtur is metus in tyrannum cadere qualis fuisse Critias dicitur impotens, sævus, juris humani oblitus, & Deorum contemptor (31). This Reason has no force: for Critias's Tyranny did not begin till after the taking of Athens: before that time he was only considered proportionably to his Intrigues, and was no less answerable for his Behaviour than another. So that if he would have composed a piece for the Stage, he had been obliged to be as cautious as Euripides more or less. The People and the Tribunals of Athens could have brought him as easily to reason as they did Alcibiades under pretence of Impiety (32). It is very probable, that if Critias had made Tragedies, it was not after he became one of the XXX Tyrants, but when he was more at leisure. At the worst it is very possible that he might have made them before he was a Tyrant; which is sufficient to confute the Reason I am here to oppose.

II. Here is another that is not stronger. Critias was not so good a Poet, that one may ascribe to him such fine Verses as those quoted by Empiricus. How shall we reconcile this with Athenæus, who quotes so many good Verses of Critias, and even calls him a very good Man (33); and lastly cites a Piece that was looked upon as a Work of Critias, or of Euripides? When the Public doubts whether a Poem be the Work of one of the first rate Authors that are known, or of another, they must be persuaded that That other is a very good Poet.

III. What Petitus adds, that since Plato (34) reproached Euripides with flattering Tyrants, and praising Tyranny, the Fear of the Areopagites becomes that Poet much better than Critias, seems to me a wrong Argument: For, generally speaking, there is no Connexion between preferring Monarchy before a Commonwealth, and being afraid of speaking one's Mind about Religion. The Praises of Tyranny, for which Euripides was reproached, are only some Passages in his Tragedies, wherein he describes the Advantages of a Monarchical Government: and it is not strange that in a City like Athens, wherein the Republican Government was an endless cause of Revolutions and Confusions, a Man of Parts should be affected with Maxims favourable to Monarchy. 'Magis profecto Euripidi convenit, quod ait Plutarchus, non ausum metu Areopagi aperire mentem suam de Diis, propterea Sisyphi personam ab eo inductam. Nam & Plato Euripidi objicit in octavo de Republica, quod tyrannis impensius faveret, & tyrannidem laudaret (35).—What Plutarch advances is more agreeable to the Character of Euripides, namely, that out of a fear of the Areopagites he durst not declare himself, and therefore introduced the Character of Sisyphus. For Plato, in the eighth Book De Republica, objects against Euripides for too strenuously favouring Tyrants, and (29) Plut. de Placitis Philof. lib. 1, quest. 7, pag. 880, E.

(30) Petrus Petitus, Observat. Miscellan. lib. 1, cap. 1, pag. 7.

PETITUS's Reasons examined.

(31) Petit, ibid. pag. 5.

(32) See Cornelius Nepos in vita Alcibiadis.

(33) 'Ο κριτίας ὁ καλὸς ποιητής. Optimus Critias. Athen. lib. 13, pag. 600.

(34) Libr. 8, de Republ.

(35) Petit. lib. 2, pag. 6, 7.

not know it [I]. The Place where Sextus Empiricus speaks of it has exercised one 'commending Tyranny.' But to leave this, the Question is not to vindicate Euripides's Notion about Government, but to enquire whether, because he spoke sometimes in Commendation of a Monarchical Government, it was necessary for him to use the Artifice that Plutarch ascribes to him: which is, that, being afraid of the Acepagites, he brought in Sisyphus, in one of his Tragedies, venting the impious Doctrine, which he durst not give out as his own. One cannot easily perceive that one of those two things may be the Consequence of the other: it appears plainly, that, though he had inveighed against a Kingly Government, in favour of a Republican one, Prudence would have taught him, that it was necessary for him to use some Art in the publishing of an impious Doctrine, to avoid being prosecuted for it by the Acepagites. I grant that, if one consider well the matter, it will appear, that his praising a Monarchical Government might have made him unacceptable to the Magistrates of Athens, and that consequently he should have thought himself obliged to be more cautious than another, and to give no occasion for a Prosecution. But, at the Bottom, Petitius's Conjecture would be disputable (36); and however it cannot be denied, that this does not clearly appear to be his meaning, as he has expressed himself (37).

(36) I speak thus, because it is certain that Petitius had no such Thought.

(37) Compare the first Edition of this Dictionary with the second.

IV. If Plato's Reproach against Euripides had been alleged only as a Principle of the Conclusion that I am going to examine, I would not have found fault with Petitius's Arguments in the way I have done; I should easily have perceived some Connexion between the two things that he concludes the one from the other. He argues thus: Since Euripides praised Tyranny, and warmly maintained the Cause of Tyrants, it is probable that he vented upon the Stage the Maxims that are imputed to him; for those Maxims are very pleasing to Tyrants. 'Quidni igitur Euripides tyrannis amicus, & Archelao Macedonum regi haud sane admodum laudato, in amoribus, hanc sententiam in ea tragedia tyrannorum moribus consentaneam protulerit: utpote quibus religio nihil aliud sit, nisi machina theatralis, qualem poetæ habent in promptu, ad expediendum fabulæ quæpiam nodum (38). — Why then might not Euripides, a Friend to Tyrants, and much caressed by Archelaus, King of Macedon, who does not bear the best of Characters, advance this Opinion, agreeable to the Manners of Tyrants; whose Religion is nothing but a Theatrical Machine, which Poets have in readiness, to solve some Difficulty in the Play.' Thus far he is in the right; I mean, that whoever admits the Principle, must admit the Consequence: but it falls out unluckily, that there is a false Proposition in that Argument. It is not true, that whoever goes about to take off the Impressions of Religion, does a thing acceptable to a Tyrant. Those who are so ignorant and so unreasonable, as not to ascribe the Origin of Religion to the Impressions that God himself has communicated to Mens minds, find no Supposition more plausible than to say, that those who had a Mind to govern have invented Religion, to keep the People more easily under the Yoke. History affords us a thousand Instances of the Advantages that Princes have drawn from the Superstitions of the People, whether they were to be encouraged, or terrified. An Oracle of Delpi, an Answer of the Augurs, the Explication of a Prodigy, have been of great use in a thousand Cases for the Interest of Sovereigns. So that, tho' by the same Machines People may be made to revolt (39), it is nevertheless probable, that because all the Inconveniences that may arise from an Invention cannot be foreseen, understanding and cunning Sovereigns would have forged a Religion, if they had not found one already established. Petitius is therefore in the wrong to suppose that Euripides, in order to make his Court to Tyrants, and particularly to Archelaus, King of Macedonia, caused a long part to be acted on the Stage with design to destroy Religion. Is any thing more proper to ruin it, than to make People believe that it was only invented to serve for a Scarecrow, and that it is a Chimera to pretend that Thunder, Hail, and Storms, are Punishments that God makes use of against wicked Men? Petitius has so plainly confuted himself, that one cannot but wonder at it: Tyrants, says he (40), laugh at Religion, they do not mind it; nevertheless, they use all imaginable means to make their Subjects obedient to Religion: and consequently, (he may be answered) Euripides would have made his Court very ill to Tyrants, if he had vented upon the Stage such an impious Doctrine as that mentioned by Sextus Empiricus and Plutarch.

(38) Petit. lib. 1, pag. 7.

(39) See above, Remark [B] of the Article A. B. D. A. S.

It seems to me that Petitius forgot one of the best Reasons, which prove, that it is Euripides, and not Critias, who dogmatized in that manner. He should have said, that it is an usual thing with Euripides to bring some Persons on the Stage who utter Impieties. His Bellerophon inveighs very boldly against the Divine Providence, and concludes against it from the Disorders that are to be seen in the World, and the continual Oppression of Innocency (41). To conclude, I shall observe, that Petitius has quoted a long Passage of Seneca, whereby it appears, that This Philosopher looked upon what the Ancients have said of Jupiter's Thunderbolt as a pious Fraud. 'Quid tam imperitum est, quam credere fulmina e nubibus Jovem mittere — ut impunitis sacrilegis, percussis ovibus, incensis aris, pecudes innoxias feriat. — Si quaeris à me quid sentiam, non existimo tam habetes fuisse, ut crederent Jovem, aut non æque voluntatis, aut certe minus paratum esse. Utrum enim cum emi sit ignes, quibus innoxia capita percuteret, scelerata transiret, aut noluit justius mittere, aut non successit? Quid ergo secuti sunt, cum hoc dicerent? ad coercendos animos imperitorum sapientissimi viri judicaverunt, inevitabile metum, ut supra nos aliquid timeremus. Utile erat in tanta audacia scelerum, aliquid esse adversum quod nemo sibi satis potens videretur. Ad conterendos itaque eos, quibus innocentia nisi metu non placet, posuere super caput vindicem & quidem armatum' (42). — What can be more ridiculous than to imagine, that Jupiter burlt Thunder from the Clouds — that he should strike harmless Sheep, burn Altars, and suffer impious Wretches to escape with Impunity. — If you ask my Opinion, I cannot imagine Men to have been so stupid as to believe Jupiter, either partial in his Judgment, or defective in Power: For when he throws his Thunder, which strikes the Innocent, and spares the Guilty, is it want of Justice, or does he miss his Aim? Where then is the Consequence of this Assertion? In order to check the Minds of the Ignorant, the wiser sort thought it necessary to establish a dread of something above, and of an inevitable Punishment: it was of use, in a daring Age of Impiety, to set up some Power, which none could think himself able to oppose. Therefore to keep those in awe, who chase Innocence only out of Fear, they placed over their Heads an armed Avenger. Note, that Seneca does not deny that Jupiter darts his Thunderbolt, if by Jupiter the Soul of the World be understood, which produces, governs, and directs all things, which may be called Fate, Providence, Nature, World, and which, properly speaking, is nothing else but the Universe itself. Ipse enim est totum quod videt, totus suis partibus inditus, & se sustinet vi sua (43). The Spinozists would easily approve this Thought. When Seneca is asked why this Jupiter strikes what ought to be spared, and spares what ought to be struck, he desires some time to prepare an Answer. At quare Jupiter aut ferienda transit, aut innoxia ferit? In majorem me quæstionem vocas, cui suus locus, suus dies dandus est (44).

(40) Cum enim neque religionis respectum habent, id tamen moribus omnibus student, ut quibus imperant populi, religioni maxime parent. Petit. lib. 1, pag. 7.

(41) See Remark [A] of the Article EURIPIDES. See also la Mothe le Vayer, Tom. XII, Letter 135, pag. 220, & Athenagoras in Legat. pro Christian. pag. m. 23, & Clem. Alexandrin. in Admonit. ad Gentis, pag. 50.

(42) Seneca Natur. Quæst. lib. 2, cap. 42.

(43) Seneca, Id. ibid. cap. 45.

(44) Ibid. cap. 46.

[I] Tanaquillus Faber did not know it. He plainly shews it in his Note on these words of Plutarch: Τὸ δὲ Καρχηδονίους ἐκ ἐλευσίῃς Κερταίαν λαβόντων ἢ Διαγόραν νομοθετῆν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, μὴ τε τινὰ δῶκεν μὴ τε δαίμονων νομίζειν: ἢ τοιαῦτα δύνει οἷα τῷ Κρόνῳ ἔθουον. Nonne utilis erat Carthagenensibus jam inde ab initio Critia vel Diagora ad condendas leges adhibito decernere nullum esse Deum, nullum genium: quam talia sacra facere qualibus illi Saturno operabantur (45). — How much better would it have been for the Carthaginians to have had a Critias and a Diagoras for their first Legislators, who believed neither Gods nor Spirits, than to offer such Sacrifices to Saturn as they did? Here is his Note: 'I know very well that Critias

(45) Plut. de Superst. sub fin. pag. 171.

(g) Dr Petit, a Physician at Paris. See Remark [H]. one of our modern Critics (g). Moreri had but little Information concerning this Particular [K], and Vossius could not serve him for a sufficient Guide [L].

' was a passionate, furious, and unjust Man; in short, the fiercest of the XXX Tyrants. But the Question is here about a Philosopher, and not a Tyrant: Wherefore I believe that instead of Critias it must be read Theodorus, who was formerly one of the most famous Atheists of Greece. I shall be told that between these two Words Κριτίας and Θεόδωρος there is almost no resemblance in the Letters that compose them; but it must be remembered, that the Greek Transcribers do commonly to abbreviate the Words that begin with Θεο, that they write Θεωρ with a little stroke on the Θ. However it be, Critias is a fault: Here is a definitive Sentence, that would not have escaped that Critic, if he had known what is to be found in Sextus Empiricus concerning Critias. A Father of the Church (46) has placed this Critias among the Atheists.

[K] Moreri had but little information concerning this Particular.] He should not have spoken in the singular Number of an Elegy of Critias, since Plutarch and Athenæus made use of the plural. II. He would not have said, that the Philosopher Sextus quotes a fine Fragment of his, if he had known that this Fragment contains an abominable Doctrine, down-right Atheism. III. Critias the Son of Calleschubus should not be an Article by itself; he is the same Critias that was one of the XXX Tyrants. IV. There are no good Reasons to give us one Critias, a Greek Historian, different from the Son of Calleschubus; as we shall see in the following Remark. V. The Testimony mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus is not very advantageous to that Author; for that Father cites only (47) some Words of Critias, to shew that he was a Plagiary of Euripides. That which deceived Moreri is, that he did not understand all the force of these Latin Words of Vossius, Illystre hujus Scriptoris testimonium adducit Clemens (48). This signifies only that Clemens Alexandrinus cites Critias, on a remarkable Subject. Now this does not import that he praises and esteems Critias. VI. Moreri should not have questioned that he, whom Plutarch cites in the Life of Lycurgus, is the same who wrote concerning the Republic of Sparta, and whom Athenæus quotes twice. We shall quickly see that it is a certain Truth.

[L] Vossius could not serve him for a sufficient Guide.] He believed, without any reason, that Critias the Son of Calleschubus was not the same that composed Elegies, and who was one of the XXX Tyrants (49). It is easy to see that it is one and the same Critias; and I wonder that Vossius did not perceive it: he says in express Words, that Critias the Tyrant had inscribed an Elegy to Alcibiades (50): now Plutarch cites an Elegy of Critias the Son of Calleschubus, wherein the Author spoke to Alcibiades (51): is it not plain then, that Critias the Tyrant, and the Elegiac Poet, and the Son of Calleschubus, are one and the same Person? Vossius was not always ignorant of it; for he acknowledged in his Greek Historians, that Critias, whose Verles are mentioned by Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiades, is the Son of Calleschubus (52). We read also in Athenæus, that Critias the Son of Calleschubus made some Elegies. As for Critias the Author of a Treatise of the Republic of Lacedæmon, Vossius should not have thought (53), but known, that it is he whom Plutarch quotes in the Life of Lycurgus (54). In order to prove it, it is sufficient to say that Athenæus, relating the same thing that Plutarch mentions, alleges Critias, Author of the Treatise of the Republic of Lacedæmon, for his Authority. Vossius says, that this Critias is not the Son of Calleschubus, but gives no reason for it; and therefore as I would not affirm that he is in the wrong, neither would I be positive that what he says is true. It might be that the same Critias, who was a Scholar of Socrates, and one of the XXX Tyrants, had a mind to shew the Public that he was at once a Poet, an Orator, and an Historian. He left some Orations; Cicero and Dionysius Halicarnassensis had read them: he left some Poems; Plutarch and Athenæus (55) quote them: why should he not be the same that composed a Treatise of the Republic of Lacedæmon? I observe that Athenæus cites a Passage out of Critias's Elegies, wherein mention is made of the different ways of drinking at a Feast. Critias praises very much the Custom that was observed at Lacedæmon in that respect: they drank no body's health; they did not drink round; they did not run into any Excess; they observed a certain Medium that revived the Martial Humour, and the Mirth of the Conversation: in a Word, it was beneficial to the Body and the Mind; it made a Man fit for the Functions of Love, and provoked a good Sleep.

Οἱ Λακεδαιμονίων δὲ κόρη πίνουσι τοῦτον,
"ὦσε φρέν" εἰς ἱλαρὰν ἀσπίδα πάντ' ἀ-παύειν.
Εἰς τε φιλοφροσύνην γλώτταν μέτεύν τε γέλωτα.
Τοιαύτη δὲ πόσις σώματι τ' ἀφέλιμος,
Γνώμη τε, κήσει τε καλῶς εἰς ἔργ' Ἀφροδίτης,
Πρὸς δ' ὕπνον ἥρμοσαι, τὸν καμάτων λιμένα.

Lacedæmonii juvenes eousque bibunt,
Ut ad capiendum scutum alacres totum animum
vertant:
Linguam verò ad hilaritatem, modestumque ri-sum:
Ea nimirum potatio corpori utilis est,
Ac menti: juvatque multum ad Veneris opus,
Nec parum ad somnum confert, qui laborum portus est (56).

The Spartan Youth with caution sinks the Bowl,
Not to inflame, but warm his generous Soul.
For moderate cups a genial pow'r dispense,
Health, Vigour, Mirth, soft Sleep, and pleasing Sense.
By them inspir'd, the Hero meets th' alarms
Of War's dread GOD, or Beauty's softer charms.

I observe also, that the same Author cites Critias's Work about the Republic of Lacedæmon (57), to shew the different ways of drinking: and this Critias makes the same Observation that I have already mentioned, which is, that the Lacedæmonians drank no Health. This will rather prove that there is here but one Critias, than that there are two. Note, that Julius Pollux, who quotes Critias a great many times, without naming any Book, names the Ἀταλάντη (58) once, and the Treatise of Republics once (59).

CRITO. Several ancient Authors have born This Name. I shall not repeat what Moreri says of them; I shall only correct some of his Faults [A].

[A] I shall only correct some of his Faults.] I. Critias the Athenian lived indeed in the XCIVth Olympiad, but not in the 150th Year of Rome: Moreri should have said the Year 350. II. I own he was one of the Disciples of Socrates; but it is false that Diogenes Laërtius tells us so, and yet he is the only Author that Moreri quotes: he should have quoted Xenophon (1). I shall clear this at the end of this Remark. III. Crito had no Son whose Name was Ctesippus; it should be Ctesippus. IV. Crito the Physician did not teach an Art of Politeness, which Galen says ought to be excused, because he exercised Physic with Kings and Ladies. Would not one think that this Physician published some Books concerning Civility, not for the use of Children, but concerning the Civility of grown Men, and even a higher Civility than that of the Galatens of Monfignor della Casa? Would not one think that he was the Chevalier de Meré of his time, and that he published some Treatises of Delicacy, which de-ved

(46) Theophilus ad Autolyicum, lib. 2, pag. m. 121.

(47) Stromat. lib. 6, pag. 620. D.

(48) Voss. de Hist. Græc. pag. 348.

(49) Id. de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 44.

(50) Ibid.

(51) Plut. in Alcib. pag. 209. E.

(52) Voss. de Hist. Græc. pag. 348.

(53) Puto & eundem Critiam esse cujus Plutarchus mentionem facit in Lycurgo. Id. ib.

(54) Pag. 45.

(55) Athen. lib. 11, pag. 463.

(56) Id. lib. 10, cap. 9, pag. 432.

(57) Id. lib. 11, cap. 3, pag. 463.

Vossius thought that Athenæus has only quoted that Book twice. I find it quoted thrice. Harpocration quotes it at the Word Λυκισμῶν.

(58) Κριτίας δὲ ἐν Ἀταλάντῃ. Jul. Pollux, lib. 7, cap. 10.

(59) Παρὰ Κριτίας ἐστὶν ἐν ταῖς πολιτεῖαις. Id. ibid. cap. 13.

(1) Xenophon, de Fact. & Dict. Socratis, lib. 1, pag. m. 418. See also Suidas in Κριτίας.

ved that Title better than Father Boubours's Apology against Cleanthes? And yet he did nothing of all this; he was contented to teach that part of Physic that is called Cosmetic. It is that which undertakes to cure the Ugliness and other Imperfections of the Body, which are apt to give married People a disgust of one another. That part of Physic is not the most minded; but it is pretended that it may be of great use even with respect to the Salvation of the Soul, since it may prevent Adulteries. 'Ad medicinam etiam pertinet Cosmetice: quæ ars non debet reprehendi, si quis rectè utatur. Nam & mariti quandoque levibus uxoribus vitiiis offensi amorem ad concubinas, vel etiam meretrices, imo & alienas uxores applicant. Quandoque & homines bene natos inque honore constitutos pudet cum ejusmodi vitiiis in publicum prodire. Itaque nec Galenus dubitavit in Arte sua tradere complura, quæ ad artem κοσμητικὴν pertinent: ut de iis quæ sculcrum vultui colorem conciliant: quæ maculas, scabritiem, aut rugas tollant: quæ capillis colorem mutant: quæ dentes albos reddant (2).'

(2) Vossius de Philosophia, cap. 9, pag. 74.

— Cosmetics are a part of Physic, which, if rightly applied, ought not to be condemned: for Husbands sometimes taking an Antipathy to their Wives, from some trifling Imperfection, keep company with loose Women, or other Men's Wives. And sometimes Men of distinguished Rank and Quality are ashamed to appear in public with such Blemishes. Wherefore Galen did not stick to insert among his other Works, several things which relate to the Cosmetic Art, as what will give a lively Colour to the Face, take away Pimples, Scurs, or Wrinkles, change the Colour of the Hair, or make the Teeth white. Physicians distinguish it commonly from that dishonest Art, that supplies Painting and all those fine Drugs, which Ovid set forth in his Poem De Medicamine Faciei (3). They have endeavoured to mend that Fault in the Dutch Edition of Moreri's Dictionary; but they could not succeed in it, because they could not believe that it was so gross as it is. He taught his Art with a Politeness, which Galen says ought to be excused, &c. This is the Correction of Moreri's Words, which is certainly wrong, but very excusable; for who could have imagined that, since it is said three lines after that Crito was the Inventor of the Cosmetic Art, they should not have distinguished in him Politeness from Cosmetics. Moreri's Blunder does not appear in it's full extent, unless one examine the Author, he pretends to follow, viz. Vossius. Now these are Vossius's Words: 'Hic Crito docuit artem κοσμητικὴν, five comitoriam vel exornatoriam: qua in re, ut Galenus ait, veniam meretur quia apud reges & reginas medicinam faceret (4). — This Crito taught the Art of Cosmetics, or that of beautifying, wherein, as Galen says, he deserves to be excused, because he was Physician to Kings and Queens.' By these Words it is plain, that the pretended Art of Politeness, that Galen would have to be excused, is nothing else but Cosmetics. Doubtless Moreri had read in some other Book that Crito had taught artem po-

(3) Supposing him to be the Author of that Poem.

(4) Vossius, ubi supra, cap. 11, pag. 86, 87.

liendi cutem, the Art of making the Skin smooth, and taking off the Spots, &c. He took no notice of the Word cutem, and from the rest he made the pretended Art of Politeness. But Vossius, who was his usual Author, and his perpetual Oracle, might easily have set him right here. V. Moreri has not translated Vossius right, when he says that Galen has given the Catalogue of Crito's Works (5). He should have said, that he gave the Summary of them. VI. It is not true, that these Words of Vossius, docuit artem κοσμητικὴν, signify that Crito was the first Inventor of Cosmetics: there is a very great Difference between a Physician who makes a certain part of Physic his chief Study, and a Physician who is the first Inventor of that part. Crito being a Court Physician, and perceiving that Princes and Princesses are as desirous to be rid of a Redness, or of Freckles, and in general of all the Defects of the Skin, as to be cured of a Distemper, applied himself altogether to Cosmetics: But this does not prove that no Body had treated of it before him. VII. Lastly, Moreri defines Cosmetic very ill: It is, says he, the Art that takes care of the Beauty and Ornaments of the Body. According to this Definition, Cosmetic would contain the Art of Dressing the Head, choosing a proper Dress, and setting Jewels, in a Word, all the Industry of the Women who dress a Bride on her Wedding-day. Now this is very false.

Let us see whether I was in the right as to the second part of this Criticism. It has been objected to me (6), that Diogenes Laërtius, speaking of Crito's Affection for Socrates, and placing him in the number of the Socraticians, says clearly enough what Moreri attributes to him. I answer, That the Disciples of a Philosopher are not the only Persons that can shew him a great deal of Affection; and therefore what Diogenes Laërtius relates of Crito's Affection for Socrates, is not a Proof that favours Moreri. I add, that he has placed some Philosophers between Socrates and Crito, that were neither Socrates's Scholars nor Followers, and consequently it cannot be concluded that he put Crito in the number of the Socraticians; I say, it cannot be concluded from the place he gives him in his second Book. Nay he observes in express Words, that the Sons of Crito were Socrates's Scholars, οἱ παῖδες δὲ αὐτοῦ διήκουσαν Σωκράτους, ipsius liberi Socratis audientes fuere (7). Having said nothing like it concerning Crito, it is natural to believe that he did not design to inform us of the thing, for which he has been cited in Moreri's Dictionary. I even observe, that Plato introduces Socrates saying that Crito was as old as he, and Father of Critobulus, who was his Scholar (8). That Philosopher had then all the reason in the World to place the Father as well as the Son in the number of his Scholars; yet he gives that Quality only to the Son. However, I confess that Plato gives clearly to understand in some other places (9), that Crito ought to be reckoned among the Scholars of Socrates.

(5) * Avανταξ λαλασεν librorum ejus exhibit Galenus, lib. 1, τὸν κατὰ τὸν Vossius, ibid.

(6) See Moreri of the Dutch Edition, 1698, Tom. 11, pag. 253.

(7) Diog. Laërt. lib. 2, n. 121.

(8) Plato in *Apolo-*gia Socratis, pag. m. 26.

(9) It is not in the Dialogue intitled, Phædrus; but it is chiefly in the Dialogue intitled Phædon.

CRITON (GEORGE) (a), a Scotchman, was Greek Professor in the Royal College at Paris. He was a zealous Papist [A]. He married the Daughter of a Scotch

[A] He was a zealous Papist. Mr Gillot writes thus to Scaliger (1). 'You must know, that within these few Days, Criton, Professor of humane Languages, desiring to be made Doctor of the Canon-Law, proposed Theses in the Civil and Canon-Law to dispute publicly; which having been seen by the King's Council, they found one of them contrary to the old and sound Doctrine of France, of the Sorbonne, and of Truth: to wit, Nec Hierarcha Romanus (ad quem solum atheniæ τῆς ἀποστολικῆς διαδοχῆς Jurisdictio spiritalis in Christianos omnes, in patrimonio Ecclesiæ temporalis etiam potestas pertinet) nec Princeps solutus est legibus tametsi uterque alios his solvere possit, & hic comitis, ille Concilii sit superior, &c. — Neither the Roman Pontiff (to whom appertains the spiritual Jurisdiction over all Christians, as also a Temporal Power, within the Patrimony of the Church) nor any Prince are exempted from the Laws, though each can exempt others: The one being superior in Courts, the other in Councils,

(1) Lettres Françaises écrites à Scaliger, pag. 256.

&c.' And in another, speaking of Excommunication, he says: Quod nudâ cogitatione nonnunquam incurritur, & ob unius noxam familiam omnem & civitatem plerumque ferit. — That it is sometimes incurred by mere Thoughts, and often involves a whole Family or Town, for one Person's Crime. Upon which complaining to the Parliament, it was ordered that Criton should go immediately and speak to the Attorney-General, and that the Dispute should be deferred. Criton being heard, the next Day, as also the Doctors of the Canon-Law, it was ordered that the Parties should have speedy Audience; and in the mean time, Criton was forbid to propose, maintain, or dispute upon, the said Theses. This was done the seventeenth and eighteenth of this Month of January. We hope to go farther, and to make a good Decree, which shall be read in the Sorbonne, to forbid the Doctors maintaining such Propositions against the Doctrine of the Gallican Church.'

[B] His

a Scotch Gentleman, a Counsellor to the Presidial of Poitiers, who was afterwards married again to Francis de la Mothe le Vayer [B], after she had refused a Brother of the Constable de Luines [C]. Criton died the eighth of April, 1611 (b).

(b) Du Breul, pag. 564.

[B] His Widow married again with Francis de la Mothe le Vayer. I confess I have this only from the Sorberiana: there I find what follows: 'Franciscus Motta Vaberius, of Mans (2), married the Daughter of Adam Blaciodeus, Counsellor of Poitiers, a learned Man; she was the Widow of Jacobus Critonius, Professor of human Learning at Paris. Le Vayer had his Collections, which he knew how to make good use of.'

(2) It should be of Paris; it was his Father who was of Mans.

[C] After she had refused a Brother of the Constable de Luines. We must not believe she was so delicate at the time that Mr Luines was Favourite and High-Constable. If it was true that she would not marry Mr Cadenet, it was before Mr Luines was taken into Favour. I mention this with an if, because I have no other warrant for it than a Collection of Pieces against the Family of Luines. Now Writers of this kind of Satires are to be very much suspected: at all hazards I shall put down what I find in that Collection. 'Cadenet's presumption was not less gallant in pretending as he did in the Year 1618 to the Princess of Orange, Sister of the first Prince of the Blood, and Widow of a Sovereign Prince; Cadenet, I say, to whom the King's Nurse would not give her Daughter, and whom the Widow of Criton, a Greek Professor of Paris, refused to marry; and some time after this, you see he aspires to an Alliance with the Royal Blood (3).'

(3) This is taken from a Satire called, La Comtadin Provençal, inserted pag. 79, and following, of A Collection of the most curious Pieces made during the Reign of the Constable de Luines, printed in 1625, in 8vo: the Page I cite is pag. 103.

CRITON (WILLIAM) (a), born in Scotland in the XVIth Century, turned Jesuit in France, in the Seminary of Rheims (b). He was Rector of the Jesuits College at Lyons (c), and made himself famous, not by his Books, for I think he published none, but by State-Machinations, which would have been infinitely more useful, both to his Order, and to the Roman Catholic Cause, if they had succeeded, than a hundred Volumes. He often passed and repassed the Sea and the Alps, full of Intrigues and Plots, tending to re-establish the Romish Religion in Great Britain. Nevertheless, if we may believe a Letter he wrote to Walsingham, he did not approve of establishing the Kingdom of God by wicked Methods [A]; and he utterly condemned the Design of killing Queen Elizabeth, upon which he was consulted by William Parry. He was taken by the Privateers of

(a) His Scotch Name was Chrichton.

(b) De Larrey, Hist. of England, Tom. II, pag. 385.

(c) Pasquier, Catch. des Jesuites, lib. 3, cap. 2, pag. m. 335.

[A] If we may believe a Letter he wrote to Walsingham, he did not approve of establishing the Kingdom of God by wicked Methods. I shall produce part of the Narrative, which Mr de Larrey gives us of this William Parry's Confession. 'Morgan told him that all the Catholic Church expected from his Courage some bright Actions; this wretch assured him he was ready to stab to the Heart the first Lord in the Kingdom. And why not the Queen, interrupted Morgan? And the Queen also, if they can make it appear to me that it is lawful; but the Jesuit Pattes (1) is not of that Opinion. He added, that Criton, the Scotch Jesuit, also was not of that Opinion; and to deter him from it, he alleged, that great Principle, that the natural, as well as the Divine, Law teaches all Men not to commit a Crime, with an Intention to serve God. That he had strongly maintained this Doctrine of Morality, insisting upon one Saying, of which he made a kind of Demonstration, that God loved Adverbs rather than Nouns; that is to say, that he was more pleased with that which was well and lawfully done, than with that which was good and lawful (2). This William Parry, being convicted of the execrable Design to kill the Queen, was executed for it the second of March 1585 (3). His Trial was first printed at London, in English; but there is a French Translation of it, in the first Volume of the Memoirs of the League, which I have just now consulted; but do not find that Parry ever made mention of our Criton, either by word of Mouth, or by writing; and I observe, that Camden, reporting this Man's Confession, has inserted, by way of Parenthesis (4), what concerns the Opinion of this Jesuit. Tbuanus does likewise speak of it, not as a thing contained in the Confession of the Criminal, but as an accessory Fact, and discovered another way. However it is true, that the Articles of the Trial discover the Maxims of the Jesuit Criton; for they contain a Letter he wrote to Walsingham (5), wherein he has explained them very clearly. He was a Prisoner in the Tower of London, during Parry's Trial, and being examined by Walsingham, whether the Accused had ever said any thing to him in France, or elsewhere, concerning the Question, if it was lawful to kill her Majesty, he answered he did not remember that he had; but afterwards recollecting himself, he writ of his own Free-will to the Secretary (6), concerning that Fact, and all with his own Hand, in the manner following. Then follows his Letter in pag. 42 of the first Volume of the Memoirs of the League.

(1) Tbuanus, lib. 79, at the end, calls him also a Jesuit, but in Parry's Trial he is only called Priest. See also Camden, Ann. pag. m. 393, at the Year 1585.

(2) De Larrey, Hist. d'Angleterre, Tom. II, pag. 392.

(3) Tbuanus, lib. 79, at the end, puts it 1584, not observing that the English begin their Year, in the public Records, the 25th of March.

(4) It is printed in a character different from what goes before and follows.

(5) See Memoirs of the League, Tom. I, pag. 42, and following.

(6) That is to say, Francis Walsingham.

I with the same Trial had informed us, whether they communicated this Letter to William Parry. Equity required it; for a Declaration made in the Tower of London is not much to be depended upon. Criton would have been far from confessing in that place that he had approved Parry's Design. To know then if he told the Truth, his Letter ought to have been shewn to the Criminal, or he should have been asked what Conversations he had had with Criton, concerning this wicked Attempt. If Parry had confessed that the Jesuit had plainly condemned the Proposal of killing the Queen, we should have had a certain Proof of Criton's Orthodoxy on that Head; but the Acts of the Trial furnish us with nothing but the Evidence, which William Criton, a Prisoner, gives of himself. However, I suppose, William Parry was examined upon this Article, though the Account of the Proceedings against him makes no mention of it; and consequently that what de Larrey advances is not without Foundation. For here is what is reported by Richeome: 'The Queen — ordered Parry to be asked if he knew William Criton, the Scotch Jesuit, who answered yes; and that he had formerly dissuaded him from this Enterprize, when he asked his Advice at Lyons. The Queen was astonished at this Justification, and, to be better informed, commanded her Secretary, Francis Walsingham, to know of Criton, if Parry had communicated nothing to him in France, or elsewhere, of his Affair. Walsingham immediately went to Criton and asked him, &c. (7). Richeome adds, what I have said before (8), and gives Criton's Letter entire, taken from the Memoirs of the League, after which he goes on in this manner: 'The Queen having heard the Contents of this Letter. How then? says she, they publish that the Jesuits would kill me in England, and this Jesuit defends me in France. She commanded afterwards that he should be set at Liberty, and his Letter published, not so much to favour him, as to let the People know that the Jesuits did not teach it was lawful to kill the Queen (9). There might be more Policy than Sincerity in these words of the Queen: for she well knew Criton's Innocence did not clear the two Jesuits, that Parry had named, as Approvers of his Treason (10). Let us say then, that Richeome has drawn too extensive a Consequence from the Letter of Criton, when he says: 'So far are ours from being the Authors of this treasonable Attempt of Parry, that, on the contrary, they hindered it to the utmost of their Power, according to the Evidences even of our Enemies. For the Hi-

(7) Richeome, Plainte Apologétique, pag. 166.

(8) Citar. (5).

(9) Richeome, ubi supra, pag. 168, 169.

(10) One was Benedictus Palmaris; he had consulted him at Venice; the other was Hannibal Cadetto; he had confessed to him at Paris.

Story

of Ostend, in the Year 1585, as he was returning into Scotland, upon a great Enterprize [B], and was carried, by Order of the Admiral of the States, to the Queen of England, who was so glad of this Present, that she gave him, among other things, a Chain of Gold for a Reward (d). Criton was committed Prisoner to the Tower of London, where he was kept a long time, but at last the Queen set him at Liberty, upon his Promise never to undertake any thing whatsoever to the Prejudice of England (e). Nevertheless she understood, in 1593, that he had made several Journeys into the Low-Countries, and into Spain, to promote the Design which the Catholics of Scotland had formed to bring in the Spaniards, in order to make a Change in Religion, and to attack England (f). He accompanied into Scotland the Bishop of Dublin, sent, by Pope Sixtus V, thither to make an Offer of the Infanta of Spain to the King (g). The Conditions of this Marriage were, that the King should turn Papist, and should join with the Pope, and with Spain, against the English. The King of Scotland's Mother had been beheaded some time before. The Envoy of Sixtus V did not succeed in this Negotiation, but was obliged to return Home without having done any thing. He left Criton in Scotland to second the Designs of Robert Bruce, whom the Duke of Parma had sent thither by Order of the King of Spain. It is said this Jesuit endeavoured to engage Robert Bruce to kill John Maitland, Chancellor of Scotland, who had broke off the Negotiation with the Bishop of Dublin; and that, not being able to persuade him to do it, he accused him to the Governor of the Low-Countries (h). This is related at full length in a Book of Stephen Pasquier, which I do not know that the Jesuits have answered. Criton was yet alive in the Year 1615, as we are informed by a Book, which assures us, that Criton had great Reason to complain of the Jesuits [C].

(d) Richeome
Plainte Apologetique, cap. 43.
pag. 106.

(e) Camden's
Annals, pag. m.
604, at the Year
1592.

(f) Id. ibid.

(g) Pasquier, ubi supra.

(h) Idem.

(11) Richeome
Plainte Apolog.
pag. 160. See also Eudemon Johannes in the Apology for Garnet, pag. 154.

(12) De Larrey,
Hist. d'Angleterre, Tom. II,
pag. 385, 386.
See also Camden's pag. m.
384, at the Year
1584.

(13) Thuan. lib.
79, about the end.

(14) Printed in the Year 1614,
in 8vo, pag. 64,
65.

(a) Colomies
Gall. Orient.
pag. 184.

(1) Colomies,
Gall. Orient.
pag. 184, calls
him John.

(2) Johannes,
scriptis quibus-
dam clari, filius.
Ibid.

story and the Letter have been inserted in the Collection of memorable things, which happened under the League, published by those of the pretended Religion, in the Year 1583 (11). He would have given more weight to his Remark, if he had said, that That Part of the Collection was only the French Translation of an Account, published in English, at London.

[B] He was taken by the Privateers of Ostend, in 1585, as he was returning into Scotland upon a great Enterprize. He had had the Precaution to throw his Papers into the Sea, after tearing them to pieces; but the Wind kept them up, and even threw them back into the Ship, without any part being lost or spoiled: which Criton could not help looking upon as a Miracle in favour of Elizabeth. They were collected, and carried to Vaad, who rejoined them so artfully, that they found the whole Narrative of the Enterprize, the Plan of which the Scotch Jesuit was carrying to the Accomplish. There they were informed, that the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Guises, were preparing Troops, and a Fleet, to make an Invasion upon England, which was very soon to be put in Execution. This writing being made public, the whole Kingdom was alarmed at it (12). Thuanus was not well informed, when he says, that, whilst Parry was in Prison, there were some who gave notice, that Criton was come into England in disguise, which was the Cause of his being seized (13).

[C] He had great Reason to complain of the Jesuits. In the Collection of the Articles, proposed by Theophilus Eugenius to the most Christian King, for the Reformation of the Jesuits in France (14), we find the following Passage: 'Father John Fourrier, Rector of the Jesuits of Avignon, will not receive into his College Father Criton, a Scotchman, that venerable old Man, whom Queen Elizabeth of England discharged out of Prison, for having deterred the Paricide Paris from the Treason he had resolved against her Royal Person. That sincerely religious Man, who cannot speak of Father Perjonias, the Jesuit, the great Disturber of England, without calling him factious, alienated from his King, the present King of Great Britain, having diffamed him, and neglected his Reduction to the Church, to the great Prejudice of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland: That old Man, who laboured so long in Spain, to procure the pacific Conversion of his Prince, and who would willingly die with his grey Hair in the Middle of his Country: This good Father is driven from the College of Avignon: they are afraid that he should procure Charity for the the poor Scots, who are banished from their Houses, for the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Romish, Faith. Father Fourrier cannot bear to see, at the Gate of his College, these poor Christians reduced to Poverty, for the Cause of God. Father Criton, the Father of these persecuted Confessors of our holy Faith, is sent to Carpentras, as too heavy a burden to the Avarice of Father Fourrier, the Rector. He is in the Hands of Father Luce, an Italian, Rector of Carpentras, who is resolved to make his Life bitter, and to nourish him with Anguish; he is dying under the cruel Reign of Father Luce. Father Luce, seeing himself reproved by Father Criton for the unreasonableness he has caused to Signior Coponio the Bishop, and to the Inhabitants of the City, has no patience till he see this free and courageous old Man out of his College. The proud and contemptuous Behaviour of Father Luce has obliged the good old Man to request a Retreat in another College. The charitable Rectors desire to be excused. He hardly finds one Rector who will receive him.'

(a) See Aldus Manutius the Son of Paul, in the Epistle dedicatory of his Notes upon Tully's Paradossi. Moreri's Quotation runs thus, Aldus Manutius in Pref. Cicer. which is wrong. That Commentary of Aldus Manutius was dedicated to James Criton, in 1581.

CRITON (JAMES), born in Scotland in the XVIIth Century, was one of the most prodigious Wits that ever was seen (a). Moreri gives a pretty large Account of him.

CROIUS (JOHN), in French de Croi, was one of the most learned Ministers in France in the XVIIth Century. He was a Native of Uzes (a), and the Son of a Minister [A]; he exercised his Ministry in the Church of Beziers, and afterwards in

[A] He was the Son of a Minister. His Father's Name was Francis de Croi (1). Colomies says that he made himself known by some Books (2). I only know that which he intitled, Les trois Conformitez, savoir l'harmonie & convenance de l'Eglise Romaine avec le Paganisme, Judaïsme, & les anciennes Heresies, 1605, in octavo. — (The three Conformities, to wit, the Harmony and Agreement of the Romish Church with Paganism, Judaism, and the ancient Heresies.) I have heard say that he was descended from the illustrious and ancient Family of Croi, but by the left side. He that told me this, could not well explain to me whether Francis de Croi had been a Monk: he told me only that the Minister of Beziers descended from a Monk, who had embraced the Reformation, and who was a Bastard, or descended from in that of Ufz. He published several Books of Controversy in French [B]; but his Latin Works have done him more Honour [C], because they made it appear that he was admirably well versed in the Languages, in Critical and Jewish Learning, in Ecclesiastical Antiquity, and in whatever goes by the Name of Philology and Polymathia. He aimed at being thought an universal Scholar, and even undertook to criticize Balzac on his Mother Tongue [D]. When the Disputes about Universal Grace were at the Height, each Party endeavoured to gain him. The Particularists were the most diligent, and prepossessed him in such a manner against Universalism, that he went to the National Synod of Alençon full of Threatnings (b). Mr Amyraut boasted of having brought him over to his Opinion after some Hours Conversation. Others say that Croius, finding afterwards that Amyraut had put upon him, was very much vexed at it (c). He died the Thirty first of August 1659.

(b) See the Preface to the Specimen Animadversionum of Mr Amyraut.

(c) See Andrew Rivetus Epist. Apologet. and du Moulin, Pref. Judicii de Amyraldi libro contra Spanhem.

from a Bastard of the House of Croi. Francis de Croi styles himself in the Title-page of his Book of the Three Conformities, G. Artib. that is to say, Gentilhomme Artibien, a Gentleman of Artois. He was Minister of Ufz.

Note, that a very honest Man of that Country sent me Word, that, having wrote from Amsterdam to the Son of our John de Croi (3) what I had reported on a hear-say concerning his Extraction, he received an answer, that they are lawfully descended from the House of Croi, and that they could justify it. I answered, that I would insert, with all my heart, the Memorial that should be communicated to me as well on this Subject, as on the History and Writings of that able Minister printed, and not printed; but I have not yet received any thing.

[B] He published several Books of Controversy in French.] He wrote one to prove the Confession of Faith of Geneva by the Scripture, and dedicated it to our Lord JESUS CHRIST. That Book was printed at Geneva in the Year 1645, in octavo (4).

(4) Colomieu, ibid, pag. 185.

The second Edition is of the Year 1650, and contains many Additions. The Author promised two other Treatises, the one to confirm that same Confession by the Testimonies of the Fathers; the other to confirm it by the Testimonies of the Adversaries (5): He published a Book at Geneva in the Year 1655, intitled Augustin supposititious, or Reasons that make it appear that the four Books of the Symbol, that are in the ninth Tome of St Augulmin's Works, are none of his, but of several Authors who took his Name, against Father Bernard Meynier a Jesuit. Colomieu observes, that there is also a Book of Mr de Croi, intitled Shemei convaincu, printed at Geneva in several Volumes in octavo (6). I do not believe that this Work contains several Volumes: it serves for an Answer to a very capitious Piece, intitled The holy Liberty of the Children of GOD. The Jesuit Meynier, who is the Author of it (7), speaks in it like a Minister, and for that reason Mr Drelineourt, answering that Book, intitled his Answer, The false Pastor convicted. It was printed in the Year 1656.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 184.

(7) See Nathaniel Southwell in Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 122, where he says, That this Book had been printed twenty times, and that the last Edition was that of Nijmes, 1660.

Here is what he observes at the end of his Preface: I understand that M. de Croi, Pastor of the Church of Ufz, answers, or has already amply and exactly answered, whatever our false Pastor has put in this last Edition of his Libel. Wherefore I heartily yield him my Pen. For I know his Learning and Merit, and that he has no need of my Assistance. I have heard of a Book, wherein Croi pretends to prove that St Peter never was at Rome. See Sarravius's One hundred and Twenty sixth Letter, pag. 130, of the Utrecht Edition.

[C] His Latin Works have done him more Honour.] In the Year 1632, he published a Specimen conjectionum & observationum in quædam Origenis, Irenæi, & Tertulliani loca. Twelve Years after came out the Observationes sacræ & historica in Novum Testamentum, wherein Heinsius is terribly criticized. In several places of those two Books he promises many others, which it is likely will never appear: it is pity, for one might learn a great many things by them. He was not contented to use Daniel Heinsius very ill; but he exercised also his sharp and haughty Criticisms on Petavius, who had examined and censured (8) the Specimen conjectionum. That Jesuit would not reply, because, said he, when one writes against the Ministers, it is the right way to get their Salaries increased. Is responsum se negat ideo quod non annua augeri Ministris contra quos scribitur (9).

(8) In fine Synesi Operum Græc. & Lat. Edit. 1640.

(9) Grotius apud Colomieu, ubi supra, pag. 183.

His Observationes sacræ appeared very learned to Sarravius, and such as might ruin Heinsius's Reputation (10). He wrote to Salmassius, that the Author had twenty five Books like that, ready for the Press (11). He wrote also to him, that Heinsius had endeavoured to hinder the printing of Croius's Book (12), and had desired him in a very civil Letter to deal kindly with him (13).

[D] He undertook to criticize Balzac on his Mother Tongue.] This was not the true Subject of his Criticisms: he only made some Remarks on the Language by the by, and occasionally. His chief Design was to answer the Censure of the Herodes infanticida (14), published by Balzac. That Answer was printed at Geneva in the Year 1642, and contains One hundred and eighty nine pages in octavo. It is anonymous: but the Author declares at the end of it, that he has not concealed his Name out of fear. If Balzac will answer it, says he, I desire him to make use of no other Name than his own, and not to appear under a borrowed Name, that he may speak of himself with more liberty. I have Courage enough to discover my Name to him when he shall desire it, and Strength enough to enter into the Lists with him if he has a mind to it. What is very surprising in it is, that he speaks for the Interest and Glory of Heinsius with all the Zeal of a very good Friend, and praises him excessively; and yet at that very time he was preparing a Volume of sharp and slighting Observations against Heinsius. They were published in the Year 1644, as I have already said. Sarravius could not understand this Conduct. See his Amusement and Conjectures in the following Words: Vidi tua indicta Croii responsum ad Balzaci pro Heinsio. Plurima certe sapient eruditionem altissimam: sed linguam Gallicam & stylum quod attinet, sicut incultus, dissipatus, inelaboratus, habebitque non pauca politissimi ingenii & vibrantis orationis Adversarius, etiam in ipso argumento, quæ regerat. Opus itaque laudo non opifecim, idem aliquando de Garrifolii tui Poemate dicturus. Sed an Croius ipse autor edendi? Vix credam. Scio enim & certo scio, habere eum præ manibus satis amplum volumen Notatorum in Exercitationes Sacras τὸ ποινικιστὶς Leydenis. Ergo quem Gallice, hoc est, quasi intra privatos parietes, opus ob multum laudaverit, Latine, id est per totum orbem terrarum in re non nauci, fuggillabit. Explica quæso mihi istud quiddam est ænigmatis: nisi forsan Gronovius, quem istam Diatribam ad vos detulisse audio, voluit Heinsium ad quem abituriebat, hac five arte five officio demereri (15). — By your Intelligence I have read Croi's Vindication of Heinsius, in Answer to Balzac. There are indeed many things which shew vast Learning; but as to his Style, and the French Language, it flows rough, unequal, and incorrect: so that his Antagonist, a Man of a ready Wit and polite Style, will find many things, even in his Arguments, to retort upon him. I therefore commend the Treatise, not the Author, and may perhaps say the same concerning the Poem of your Garrifolius. But was Croi himself the Author of it's being made public? I can scarcely believe it. For I know, and that for certain, that he has by him a large Volume of Animadversions upon the Exercitationes Sacræ τὸ ποινικιστὶς Leydenis. It is therefore commending a Man in his own Language, and at his own House, and exposing him in the tenderest part, through the World in a Language universally approved. I could wish you would unfold this Mystery; unless Gronovius, who I understand forwarded that Dissertation to you, thinks by this means to oblige Heinsius.

(10) Sarrav. Epist. 102, pag. 103, 104.

(11) Id. Epist. 103, pag. 105.

(12) Id. Epist. 102, pag. 103. Vide etiam Epist. 94, pag. 94.

(13) Id. Epist. 81, pag. 81.

(14) It is the Title of a Tragedy composed by Heinsius.

(15) Sarravius in Epistola ad Alex. Morum Scripta Lutetie Id. Jan. 1642, pag. 39, 40. Edit. Ultraj. 1697.

CURIO (COELIUS SECUNDUS), a learned Piedmontois, retired into Switzerland, after having suffered great Persecution in Italy, because he was suspected of being a Protestant. He was very well received in the Canton of Bern, where he was made Principal of the College of Lausanne (a). He went afterwards to Basil, where he was promoted to the Professorship of Eloquence, which he discharged with great Reputation. He published several Books [A]; and one among the rest, wherein he endeavoured to shew that the number of the Predestinated is greater than that of the Reprobate [B]. He died in the Year 1569, aged Sixty seven Years (b). He had lately buried an illustrious Son, whose Name was AUGUSTINUS SECUNDUS CURIO [C]. Their Library, which was very fine, was bought by a Duke of Lunenburg (c): it makes part of that of Wolfenbuttel. You will find several things concerning our Curio in Hofman's Lexicon, and in Mr Teissier's Additions to the Elogies taken from Tbuanus.

(a) See the Epistle dedicatory of his Pasquillus Eclasticus, printed at Geneva, in 1544.

(b) Hofman in Lexico, Tom. I, pag. 509.

(c) See Contrarius in his Treatise of Libraries.

(1) Tom. I, pag. 358.

(2) Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 228.

(3) Of the Ter-gow Edition 1614. The first Edition is of Basil, 1554.

(4) Ramus Oratione de Basilica, pag. 57, says, that Coelius Horat. Curio published, at Basil, at fifteen Years of age, a Book de Amplitudine Divine Misericordiae, and some Declamations.

[A] He published several Books. You will find a List of them in the Additions of Mr Teissier to the Elogies taken from Tbuanus (1); but take the Historia Sarraeenica out of it; for it is a Work of Augustin Curio, the Son of Coelius. As for the War of Malta, printed with that Saracen History, Konig (2) should not have ascribed it to Augustin; it is a Work of Coelius.

[B] And one among the rest, wherein he endeavours to shew, that the number of the Predestinated is greater than that of the Reprobate. It is surprising that he durst preach such a Gospel among the Swiss; for this Doctrine is very much suspected by the true Reformed, and I do not think that any Professor could maintain it at this time in Holland with Impunity. However it be, his Book is intitled, De Amplitudine beati regni Dei. He dedicated it to Sigismund Augustus, King of Poland. He says, in the One hundred and Thirty first Page (3), that he never so well understood the Extent of the Mercy of God, as when his Son Horace (4) translated out of Italian a Discourse on that matter, written by Marcellus An- dreasi of Mantua. See the Sorberiana (5), wherein this Book of Curio is much slighted, whilst the Author's Intention is praised in it.

[C] He had an illustrious Son, whose Name was AUGUSTINUS SECUNDUS CURIO. He was Professor of Eloquence at Basil; and though he lived but Twenty eight Years, yet he gave public Proofs of his Learning, having published three Books of the Saracen History, one of the Kingdom of Morocco, and one about the Life and Death of his four Sisters (6). One of them was a learned Woman. Cujus sororem Angelam præter cætera virginis ornamenta non solum Germanicè, Italicè, Gallicè, sed & Latine loquantem (quod ipsius manuscripte, declarant Epistolæ) equidem etiam ad patris eximias laudes aggrego. — Whose Sister Angela, besides the Ornaments of her Sex, spoke not only German, Italian, French, but Latin (as her Manuscript Letters testify) and I think justly deserves a place amongst the distinguished Honours of her Father. They are Peter Ramus's Words (7).

(5) Pag. m. 561

(6) Taken from Petrus Ramus in Oratione de Basilica, pag. m. 53.

(7) Ib. pag. 57.

CURSON. See CORCEONE.

CURTIUS (QUINTUS), Historian of Alexander. See QUINTUS-CURTIIUS.

DAILLÉ.

D.

DAILLÉ (JOHN), in Latin Dallæus [A], Minister of the Church of Paris, was one of the most learned Divines of the XVIIth Century [B]; and none of the Protestant Controversists was so esteemed by the Catholics as he was. He was born at Chatelleraut the sixth of January, 1594. He began to study the Latin somewhat late, because his Father designed him for Business, thinking to leave him his Office (a); but he was obliged to give way to the great Inclination that Nature had given to his Son for Learning, ----- So that, at eleven Years of Age, he was sent to St Maixet, in Poitou, to learn the first Rudiments (b). He continued his Studies at Poitiers, Chatelleraut, and Saumur; and having made an end of his Classcal Learning in this last Town, he entered upon Logic at Poitiers, at sixteen Years of Age, and finished his Course of Philosophy at Saumur, under the famous Duncan. He began to study Divinity at Saumur, in 1612; and in the Month of October, of the same Year, he went to the illustrious Mr du Plessis-Mornai, to be Tutor to two of his Grandsons. He had the good fortune to please him, and made a very great Progress in the Conversation of that learned Man, who did him very often the Honour to read with him, and imparted to him all that he knew. Mr Dailé, having lived seven Years with such an excellent Master, travelled into Italy with his two Pupils (c). He found himself very much perplexed when one of them fell sick at Mantua; he was obliged to get him carried with all Diligence to Padua, where the Protestants have a little more Liberty. The young Gentleman died there soon after, and a great deal of Address and Credit was necessary to avoid the Oppositions of the Inquisitors, and to have him carried into France to be buried with his Ancestors. The Governor of the Deceased overcame all those Difficulties, but not without the Assistance of Father Paul, and continued to travel with his other Pupil. They saw Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England, and returned into France about the latter end of the Year 1621. Mr Dailé made so little account of the Usefulness of travelling, that he regretted all his Life-time the two Years he had spent in it [C], and would have regretted them more, had it not been for the Advantage he had of being familiarly acquainted with Father Paul [D], at Venice. He was made a Minister in the Year 1623, and exercised his Office first in the House of Mr DU PLESSIS MORNAY (d); which did not continue long; for that Lord fell sick a little while after, and died in the Month

(a) It was that of Receiver of the Consignations, which he had at Poitiers. Abridgement of Mr Dailé's Life, pag. 2.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3, 4.

(c) They set out from Saumur in the beginning of the Autumn, 1619.

(d) At the Castle of la Forêt upon Saumur in the Lower Poitou.

[A] Dailé — in Latin Dallæus.] Whilst a Man has not printed his Name, none ought to be blamed for not knowing how to write it; but such an Ignorance cannot be excused in those who have seen that Name in Print: and therefore Mr de Chaumont may be taxed with a great Carelessness, for writing always the Sieur D'Aillé in a Work wherein he answers a Letter of that Minister. That Letter was printed in the Year 1634, and contains in the Title the Name of Dailé. The Author had already put that Name to the Apology for the Reformed Churches, which obliged Mr de Chaumont to publish a Piece to which that Letter served for an Answer. Where then were Mr de Chaumont's Eyes when he read the Books that he went about to confute? I have observed in another place, that Father Southwell criticizes Mr Dailé's Name (1). The learned Grotius has not latinized his Name better, for he calls him Dallæus (2). The Abbot de la Roque would not have said Dailé (3), if he had been better acquainted with that Minister's Works. Balzac says generally Dailé, as he ought to do; but I have seen D'Aillé in the Thirty seventh Letter of the ninth Book (4).

[B] — was one of the most learned Divines of the XVIIth Century.] Tho' of the Protestant Religion in France used to say, that they never had a better Pen since Calvin, than that of Mr Dailé. 'An honest Man of that Party told me, that they never had so great a Man since Calvin as Mr Dailé: I know him. 'The Jews said of their Rabbi Moses Maimonides, that à Mose antiquo ad Moysen nostrum non surrexit major

Mose. I therefore agree to it (5). These are Patin's Words, who speaks thus in another place: 'They are now printing at Geneva a new Book of Mr Dailé, Minister of Charenton, whom the Huguenots will have to be the greatest Man they have had since Calvin (6). What he says in the Four hundred and eighteenth Letter deserves to be set down. He speaks to a Huguenot: 'I do not care for Law Books, but I love those concerning your Religion: for something may be learned by them, especially when they are as good as those of Mr Dailé (7). I have cited, above (8), a Passage of Mr Arnauld, to which I refer my Reader. Here is one very considerable of Mr Colomès: 'I went to see Mr de Valois (Valefius) the elder at Paris, who told me, among other things, that a great many People set up for Authors, but that he knew but few that write so well as Mr Dailé (9).'

[C] He regretted all his Life-time the two Years that he spent in his Travels.] We have often heard him, whose History we write, regret those two Years, which he accounted almost as lost, because he might have spent them more usefully in his Closet. His Son says this in the Abridgment that he made of Mr Dailé's Life (10).

[D] He had the Advantage of being familiarly acquainted with Father Paul.] Let us continue to hear his Son (11). 'The only Benefit, which he said he had reaped from this Journey, was the Acquaintance and Conversation of Father Paul — M. du Plessis, with whom he kept Correspondence by Letters, had recommended

(5) Patin, Letter 405, pag. 201, of the 3d Tome, Edit. Genev. See also the 527th Letter.

(6) Letter 501, pag. 46 of the 3d Tome.

(7) Lettres du Patin, Tom. III, pag. 241, 242. See also pag. 464, of the same Tome.

(8) Citat. (10), of the Article AUBERTIN.

(9) Colom. Opusc. pag. 95.

(10) Abregé de la Vie de Mr Dailé, pag. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 9.

(1) He calls him D. Allius. See above, Rem. [I] of the Article ADAM (JOHN).

(2) Grot. Epist. 350, Part II, pag. 854.

(3) In the Journ. des Savans of the 2d of January 1675.

(4) Edition in folio.

of November, of the same Year, in the Arms of that new Pastor. That great Man's Memoirs took up Mr Daille the following Year. In 1625 he was Minister of the Church of Saumur, and in 1626 he was removed to that of Paris (e). He spent all the rest of his Life in the Service of this last Church, and became a great Ornament to the whole Body of the Reformed, as well by his Sermons [E], as by his Books of Controversy (f). As he lived long, and enjoyed a very good Health, and besides had but a small Family [F], it is easy to apprehend, that so laborious a Man [G], (e) He succeeded Mr Durant.

(f) Taken from the Abridgment of his Life, published in 1670.

and

* recommended his Grandchildren and their Government to him in a very particular manner; so that he was immediately received into his Confidence, and no Day passed without visiting him, and having some Hours of Conversation with him. The good Father conceived such an Affection for him, that he used his utmost Endeavours with a French Physician of our Religion, one of his intimate Friends, whose Name was Affelineau, to oblige him to stay at Venice (11). He used his Interest to procure him the necessary safe Conducts and Passports from the Republic for the dead body, that was to be conveyed into France (12). It may be, the Controversies have already made use of this Passage of Mr Daille's Life, to prove that Fra-Paolo concealed, under the Habit of a Monk, a Soul intirely devoted to Protestantism.

[E] By his Sermons. He published nineteen Volumes of them, and a little before his Death he sent to Geneva the last that he had preached on the twelfth Chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. They make the twentieth Volume. There is no profound Learning in those Sermons, as in those of Mestrezat; but they are much clearer both in Expression, and in the Disposition of the Subject. He was accused of having stolen many things out of Dr Davenant, in his Exposition of the Epistle to the Colossians. See what he answered about it to Cottib (13), who also reproached him with many Repetitions.

[F] He had but a small Family. He married in the Lower Poitou, in the Month of May 1625 (14). His Wife died the Thirty first of May 1631 (15), and left him but one Son, of whom she was delivered at the Dutch Ambassador's House (16) the Thirty first of October 1628 (17). She had fled thither, because the Protestants were afraid that the News of the taking of Robbelle would stir the People against them. This only Son, whose name was Hadrian DAILLE, was made a Minister in the Year 1653. He had been studying Divinity at his Father's for several Years, when the Consistory of Robbelle desired to have him (18).

Both his Father and he were beholding to the Affection and obliging Cares of Messieurs Drelincourt, the Father and the Son (19), for such an honourable Invitation. They accepted of it with Joy, and set out together in the Month of April 1654, the Father being not willing to leave his Son before he had installed him in that holy Office, to which he had consecrated him from his Youth. In that Journey he saw his old Friends in Touraine, Anjou, and Poitou, and the Church of Cbatelleraut, where he was born, that of Saumur, and that of La Foret, which had enjoyed the first Fruits of his Ministry, had again the Satisfaction to hear him preach in their Assemblies. He preached also several times at Robbelle and La Rochefoucaut, whether he was obliged to go in order to present his Son to the Synod that was held there in the farthest part of the Province. And the Synod having admitted him after the necessary Trials, they returned to Robbelle, where that numerous Flock having heard the Probation-Sermons of the new Minister, his Father laid his Hands on him, upon a Sunday, the sixth of July. Fifteen Days after he took leave of the Church with a farewell Sermon, and a Collection was made of all the Sermons that he preached in that Journey, whereof two Impressions have been fold off, one at Saumur, and the other at Geneva. He set out afterwards from Robbelle, to return to Paris (20). Five Years after he had the Satisfaction to have his Son for his Colleague. Hadrian Daille was chosen in the Year 1658 to be a Minister of Paris, in the place of Mr Mestrezat. Cottib tells a pleasant Story about Mr Daille's Son being successively invited by the Church of Robbelle and Paris (21).

The Reflexion you cast on my Prayers (he speaks to the Father) puts me in mind of your's, in a Journey that I made with you from Paris to Cbatelleraut. Was it not a shameful thing for you, because you conducted that dear and only Son of your's to be a Minister at Robbelle, to compare yourself to the Patriarch Abraham, and him to Isaac, whom you was going to offer up, because you removed him from Paris (22)? There wanted only (to make the Allegory perfect) an Angel to hold your Arm, and stay the Blow, obliging you to return back again to your House with your Victim. But you have taken care of it since: that Angel was one of the King's Secretaries, whose Name I have forgot (23); he went Post from Paris to surprize the Robbellers, and notwithstanding all the Protestations you had made to those poor People, to consecrate your Son to them without any reserve, and never to re-call him, which you did in opposition to Mr Drelincourt, who seemed (as it was said) to have a mind to re-call him; against all those Vows, by which you had devoted his Ministry to this People, and which, being more solemn than those which you say I made to the Protestants at Poitiers, ought consequently to be more inviolable; notwithstanding, I say, all these Engagements, that Angel applied himself to the Ministers of Xaintronge, already prepossessed by Letters; and without giving the Parties time to speak for themselves, he takes that Isaac from them, and gives them occasion to complain for ever, both of the Fidelity of the Father, and of the Loss of the Son, if he deserves to be so long regretted. Mr Daille calls this a Romance, and a fabulous Story (24).

His Son was yet living when the Edict of Nantes was revoked; but by reason of his bodily Infirmities he was dispensed with exercising the Functions of his Ministry. He retired into Switzerland, and died at Zurich, about the Month of May 1690. All his Manuscripts, among which there were several Works of his Father, were carried into the public Library. He had a vast Knowledge of Books; for he did not only know whether they were good, but also whether they sold well; and I have heard say, that the Bookellers were not well pleased with this last Knowledge. Mr Baillet makes mention of him in the first Volume of his Anti, and justly censures those who said he had a Son who turned Catholic. I set down his words in the Margin: They are taken from a place of his Work, wherein he gives the Titles of several Books which he supposes were designed (25). Note, that Mr Daille, the Father, being a Widower at Thirty seven Years of Age, never married again.

Mr Pillet, Professor of Divinity at Geneva, having read what I have said above, that the Manuscripts of Mr Daille's Son were put into the public Library of Zurich (26), was pleased to acquaint me that the Manuscripts of Mr Daille, the Father, were at Geneva, in the Hands of a private Person, who had bought them. They are the Explication of the nine first Chapters of the Epistle of St Paul to the Romans; the Explication of the first Epistle of St Peter, several Sermons, the Refutation of the Exposition of the Bishop of Condom, and a Treatise of the Eucharist like that of Aubertin.

[G] So laborious a Man. I am sure the Readers will be glad to find here what I am going to transcribe out of Mr Daille's Life. His Books and his Studies were his chief Recreation, and his greatest Delight: there he unbent his Mind from Labour, with Pleasure and Profit. He betook himself to his Books, when he was weary of Business; and after a long Application to sublime and abstruse Matters, he used to take some Authors, the reading of which required less Attention, and afforded him some Diversion. Thus he intermixt serious and pleasant Studies, that he might always preserve his Appetite by this Variety of Food and Diet. I think also, without flattering him, he may deserve the Praise of having been one of the Men of his Time that read most, and most kind of Books, not only those of his Profession, but also of those that seem the farthest from it. It will not be hard to conceive this, if it be considered that he lived long, and that he husbanded all the Moments

(22) I shall observe, without pretending that this Story is true, that the Parisians have the Weakness to think, that living in the Province is a deplorable Exile.

(23) In Mr Daille's Life, pag. 31, the Elder of the Consistory of Charenton, who was deputed to Robbelle, to demand Mr Daille's Son, is called Mr Turpin.

(24) Rpelique à Adam & à Cottib, port. III. c. iii. p. m. 152.

(25) Conjuracion generale des Protestans, & autres Heretiques du Nord & de l'Occident, contra l'Eglise Catholique, concertée sur les visions & les inspirations du Prophete de Rotterdam, avec l'Histoire des Visionnaires de l'un & de l'autre sexe que les Protestans ont eu jusqu'ici. Par le Sieur Jean Daille R. B. T. fils d'Adrien, petit fils de Jean. If I am not mistaken, says Mr de Brilhat, the Name of the Author is supposititious. It is true that Mr Daille, who is now at Zurich, is called Adrien, and that his Father's Name was John; but I have not heard that he left a Son in France, who was converted. Baillet, Tom. I, of the Anti, pag. 294.

(26) I had read this in a Letter written from Zurich, soon after the Death of Mr Daille the Son.

(11) Ibid. pag. 9.

(12) Ibid. pag. 8.

(13) Daille Replique à Adam & à Cottib, Part III, chap. 5. pag. m. 172.

(14) Abridgment of his Life, pag. 12.

(15) Ibid. pag. 17.

(16) It was the Baron of Languerack.

(17) Daille, ubi supra, pag. 15.

(18) Ibid. pag. 29.

(19) He was Minister of Robbelle.

(20) Abregé de la Vie de Mr Daille, pag. 30.

(21) Cottib, Replique à Mr Daille, pag. 20.

(g) The Bookseller put the following Year in the Title as it is usual.

(b) See the Remark [N].

(i) See Remark
[I] of the Article ADAM (JOHN).

and so well qualified for Writing, composed many Books. With submission to some Critics, his first Essay was a Masterpiece [H]; and I do not know but it may be said to be his Masterpiece: I mean his Book de Usu Patrum, that was printed in the Year 1631 (g). It is a very strong Chain of Arguments, that form a moral Demonstration against those, who would have Differences in Religion to be decided by the Authority of the Fathers. The Author did not begin with such a Book because he knew that the Fathers of the first Centuries favoured the Roman Catholics; for he has shewed in several Works, that he desired no better than to reduce Controversies to this Point, Every Doctrine, that is not consonant to that of the three first Centuries, ought to be rejected as an humane Innovation. He would not have contested with the Bishop of Meaux the Principle of the History of the Variations [I]. Never any Minister knew the History and Doctrine of the Fathers better than he. No Man can write in a better Latin Style than he did about the Matters that he treated of. As for his French Style, it cannot be said that he had attained to Perfection in it; but there was no Man of his Age, among the Persons of his Gown, that spoke French so well as he; which ought to be ascribed, to the intimate Acquaintance he had, during his long stay at Paris, with the famous Mr Contart (b). He presided in the last National Synod that was held in France, which is that of Loudon, in the Year 1659. He had that Advantage, that his Mind did not decay; for there is as much Fire and Strength of Argument in his Reply to Father Adam (i), and in the two Volumes de Objecto cultus

ments of his long Life. He was exceedingly laborious, and, rising very early every Morning, he had by that means five or six Hours free from the common Hurry of Life, which he could spend in his Closet: and therefore it is no wonder if he had leisure enough to get such a stock of Learning in so many Years; for he was a Man that made an Advantage of every thing, and he read no Book, how despicable soever it might be, but he made some Extracts of it (27), and he knew very well how to make use of them at a proper Time and Place (28).

[H] With Submission to some Critics, his first Essay was a Masterpiece.] Here is what we find in a Book of Colomies (29). 'People are very much divided in their Opinions about Mr Daillé's Book de usu Patrum. The Presbyterians admire it very much, and the English Episcopians value it but little. Speaking formerly of this Book with a learned Man, (who is at present one of the latter) he told me that in his Opinion it was the least of Mr Daillé's Works, and that he wondered that, having a considerable Knowledge of the Fathers, he had made use of his reading to obscure the Merit of the Ancient Church.'

Mr Scrivener, an English Divine, is of the same Opinion, in his Apology for the Fathers against the same Mr Daillé. Take notice that this Censure is chiefly grounded on this, that it is a Work which may injure Antiquity: this would not be said of an indifferent Book, and therefore those who find fault with this Work do really commend it. I know very well that the English Divine (30) who writ against that Work, pretends that Mr Daillé's Reasons are not strong; but he does not make it out, and nothing would be more easy than to confute him. But laying aside that Dispute, I shall only observe, that, by the Confession of that Divine (31), the Book de usu Patrum was the Admiration of the Presbyterian Party. Of all Mr Daillé's Works, this was most esteemed by a learned Minister of Picardy. These are his words; he speaks to the Author. 'Licet quidquid operum hactenus edidisti, Vir Reverende, mihi plurimum placuerit, tuæque omnia, cum Latine tum Gallicè scripta, æquale plausu ab eruditiss, atque adeo à piis omnibus; excepta sint, disserter tamen non possum, laborum tuorum primitias, Tractatum nempe tuum de Patrum in decidendis de Religione Controversiis Usu, me plurimum semper cepisse. Non solum enim opus istud miræ rerum lectu & scitu jucundissimarum dignissimarumque varietate refertum est, verum etiam eloquentia orationisque nitor cum rebus ipsis certant, tantæque eruditione & facundia argumentum illud pertractasti, ut vix quicquam magis elaboratum erudito hoc seculo prodidisse videatur (32). — Although I have been extremely delighted with whatever you have hitherto published, and all your Writings, both in French and Latin, have been received with equal Applause by the learned and religious part of Mankind; Yet I must own, that the first Fruits of your Labours, namely your Treatise concerning the use of the Fathers in deciding Controversies about Religion, has charmed me above the rest. For that Work is not only stored with Variety of Matter, both useful and entertaining, but the Eloquence and Beauty of Style is kept up to the Dignity of the Subject, which you have handled with so much Learning and Politeness, that nothing, in my Judgment, has appeared more elaborate in this learned Age.' These are the words of Mr Mettayer, who was Minister of St Quintin: his Latin Translation of that Work of Mr Daillé was printed at Geneva in the Year 1656 (§ a). It is said, in the Life of Mr Daillé (33), that a learned Englishman, whose Name is Thomas Smith, translated that same Book into his Mother Tongue; Mr Mettayer says the same: but Mr Scrivener assures us (34), that he has some very good Witnesses of the contrary, and that he heard Mr Smith say, that it was an Oxford Man, and not he, who made that Translation; and that Mr Smith himself would have confuted that Work if he had thought it worthy of his Notice (35). One thing which cannot be denied is, that there is a Preface, with the Name of that Mr Smith, prefixed to the English Translation, printed in the Year 1651. Mr Cottibby (36) made a Remark against the Book de usu Patrum, which the Author did not vouchsafe to examine. See Mr Daillé's Reply, in the eleventh Chapter of the third Part (37).

This is more than sufficient to prove, that the first Book that Mr Daillé published was accounted a very good Book, and one of his best Works: which puts me in mind of a Maxim which a grave Author advanced some Years ago, to prove, that the Advice to the Refugees was the Work of a Writer who had already composed several good Books. His Proof turned into a Maxim amounts to this; Every Book that is well written, and well turned, is at least the third or fourth Production of its Author. This Maxim is false: but when a Man goes about to convert it into a Proof of a Crime of State, he deserves to be more ridiculed than the Author, whom I speak of, was in the Cabale Chimérique. Mr Daillé, and his Book de usu Patrum, have been alledged in this last Piece, among other Examples, to shew, that the first Book that a Man publishes is sometimes a most accomplished Piece.

[§ a] As soon as Mr Daillé's Treatise concerning the right Use of the Fathers came out, it was received with a general Applause in the Protestant Countries; and particularly in England, as it appears by the Advertisement of Mr Thomas Smith, prefixed to the English Translation of it, containing the Testimonies of the Lord Falkland, Lord Digby, and Dr Taylor, concerning this learned Book. The Appobation of these great Men shews what Judgment is to be made of some hot-headed Divines, such as Scrivener, who endeavoured to depreciate it. He affirms, that Mr Smith said, he would have confuted it, if he had thought it worth his while; but we must charitably believe that he did not know, or had forgot, that the same pious and learned Mr Smith set so high a value upon this Work, that he prefixed before it the aforesaid Advertisement. My Lord Clarendon was also a great Admirer of that Performance, and has made an excellent Apology for it, in his Answer to Serenus Cressy, in which Scrivener is used as he deserves. See the Life of Mr Chillingworth, pag. 116, & seq. REM. CRIT.]

[I] He

(27) Pliny d'd
the same. Nihil unquam legi,
quod non exer-
peret, dicere
tiam solebat nul-
lum esse librum tam malum, ut non aliqua ex parte prodesset.
Plin. Epist. 5,
lib. 3.

(28) Pag. 66,
67.

(29) Bibliot.
choise, pag. 2.

(30) Matthew Scrivener in Apologia pro S.
Ecclesiæ p'ribus adversus Jo. Dallaum, London,
1672.

(31) See his Pro-fuge.

(32) Jo. Mettayer, Epist. de-dicat. Tractatus de usu Patrum.

(33) Pag. 14.

(34) Scriven. in Prefat.

(35) Sibi as-quando fuisse in animo contrario scripto Dallaum refellere, sed ne
maius expensæ
nihil in Dalla-
no opere sua dig-num opera re-pertum. Id. ib.

(36) Cottibby ubi
supra, pag. 245.

(37) Pag. ma-
209.

cultus Religiosi (k), as in all his other Works. He openly declared for Universal Grace, and writ against a Professor of Leyden who was an Antagonist of Mr Amyraut (l). He intituled his Book, An Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton (m). That Work raised a new War among the Protestant Divines. Mr Daillé endeavoured to excuse himself, by saying that his Book had been published without his Knowledge; nevertheless he answered, with all the Sharpness imaginable, a Professor of Groningen, who had writ against him. That Professor (n) replied; and though this Dispute did not continue very long [K], yet it produced what is usual in the like Cases; I mean, that the Public came to know by them many little Particulars that injure Mr Daillé's Memory [L], whether they be true or false; for there are but too many Readers, who

(k) He was 70 Years old when he published the first.

(l) Frederic Spanheim.

(m) It is a Latin Book printed at Amsterdam in 1655.

(n) It was Samuel Marefius.

[J] He would not have contested with the Bishop of Meaux the Principle of the History of the Variations. Here is the Principle I speak of: The Catholic Truth which comes from God has immediately its Perfection; but Here, the weak Production of human Wit, cannot be made up but of ill sorted Pieces. The Author of the Pastoral Letters pretended (38), that this is to argue like a Pagan, and as the greatest Enemy of the Christian Religion would do, and that it is to suppose Matters of Fact, which none can advance but the most ignorant of all Mankind: so that one is inclined to believe that the Bishop of Meaux never cast his Eyes on the Writings of the Fathers of the first four Centuries, since it is not possible a learned Man can give an Instance of so profound an Ignorance. A Piece was published (39) towards the end of the Year 1688, wherein it was observed (40), that these Reflexions fell as well on Mr Daillé as on the Bishop of Meaux, who seems to have transcribed his Maxim from the first Lines of one of Mr Daillé's best Works. In effect, that Minister lays down the Bishop of Meaux's Principle at the beginning of his Reply to Father Adam. See the Answer of the Faithful, that are Captives in Babylon, to the Pastoral Letter of the first of November 1694; you will find (41) there Mr Daillé's Words, and the Declaration those Faithful make, that they keep to that Principle, notwithstanding the Invektives of the Author of the Pastoral Letters. That Answer is dated from Orleans, the fifteenth of January 1695.

[K] This Dispute did not continue very long. The Quarrel between Marefius, and the Author of the Apology, was soon ended. And because they had been good Friends till then, it was no difficult thing to reconcile them: the Agreement was confirmed afterwards by their meeting each other at the Hôtel de Turenne, where they embraced one another; and then they visited each other, when Marefius had occasion to go to Paris (42).

[L] The Public came to know many little Particulars that injure Mr Daillé's Memory. Read Marefius's Prolegomena, and there you will find a long Train of Artifices, that Mr Daillé made use of to clear himself from the printing of his Book. The Walloon Synod made a great Noise about that Book, and complained of it in a Letter to the Synod of the Ile of France. They said that the Title of that Book had been fraudulently suppressed till after the Publication; that that Title was injurious and scandalous; that the Walloon Churches had been very much offended at it; that they believed those of France had still more reason to be offended at it; that Mr Daillé's Honour was visibly blemished by it, since they had tacked that Title to his Book against his Intention. This shewed that Mr Daillé had writ, or got some body to write, to Holland, that the Title of his Book was none of his, and that he disapproved it; and yet it appears by the Answer, which the Synod of the Ile of France made to the Walloon Synod, that, except Mr Spanheim's Name, the rest of the Title was that of Mr Daillé's Original, and that Mr Daillé had fully satisfied the Synod by the Explanations he had given them. Vos scitis, Domini honoratissimi fratres, id factum absque ejus consensu iploque inscio, & præter id quod ipsi prescribitis i vestra ad nos epistola, ita se explicavit in hoc cætu, ut plene nobis satisfactum fuerit (43). — You know, most honoured Brethren, that it was done without his Knowledge or Consent, and besides that, which ye have directed, in your Letter to us, he has so explained himself in this Assembly, that we are entirely satisfied. This was plainly to play upon both the Walloon Synod and that of the Ile of France; for the thing that gave offence was not that the Name of Mr Spanheim had been put to the Title, but that the Work had been intituled, An Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton. The Letter of the Walloon Synod shewed it plainly; and therefore, since Mr Daillé presided in the Synod of the Ile of France, and caused the Answer to be drawn up as he pleased (54), it was he that played upon the two Synods. Dallæum hac in parte suæ Synodo imposuisse, idque parum & prudenter & pudenter, luce meridiana clarius possum demonstrare; nam adoptando priorem partem tituli alteram omnino suam facit: qui enim, &c. — That Daillé herein imposed upon his Synod, and that without either Prudence or Modesty, I could demonstrate most evidently; for by not owning the first part of the Title, he makes the other his own. If Evasions were made use of about the Title, they were no less made use of about the Impression of the Book. Marefius does clearly shew that Mr Daillé's Excuses, and those of Blondel, and the rest, being compared together, destroy each other; and, in a Word, that to conceal the first Lye, they were forced to forge many others. I maintain that this wrongs a great Man's memory; for a great many Persons, especially in the remotest parts of the Kingdom, know those Gentlemen of Charenton only by their pious and controversial Books. They take them to be living Images of the Apostles, who would not for any thing in the World use any Art and Dissimulation. So that when a Mr Daillé is shewed to them, as one who deceives two Synods all at the same time, who causes Letters to be written as he pleases in a Synod whereof he is Moderator, who heaps Subterfuge upon Subterfuge in order to elude the Complaints made against his Conduct, he must needs loose a great part of the Respect and Veneration that People had for him; and if they have still the same esteem for him, it is rather because they are stupidly insensible, than that the thing would not naturally produce that effect. It is certainly a scandalous thing to see how some Men, who have a great credit in Synods, get any thing, that they have a mind to, inserted in the Letters and Acts of those Assemblies; and when those Tricks are laid open, as they have been by Marefius, the reading of them must needs give great offence.

But this is not all: You will see in the same Prolegomena, that, when Mr Daillé saw the Animadversions made upon his Book, he conceived a furious spite against Marefius, dispersed every where thundering Menaces, and made a Confederacy with Curcellæus, an Arminian Professor, whereby that Professor engaged to attack Marefius on the one side, whilst Mr Daillé made his Attack on the other. Dallæus instar Tigrorum, qui dicuntur in rabiem agi ad pulsus tympanorum, ita efferebuit ad istius opusculi conspectum, ac si tres illæ Exercitationes in tres Furias abissent, quæ vere ferdo ipsum interdiu nocturne exagitarent; nam illico cepit dira quæque mihi minitari, & hinc inde ad amicos scripitando, in me evomere quicquid ipsi splendida sua bilis suggerebat, responsum eam minatus quæ me pro merito depexeret — primum ex astu politico pactus est cum Curcellæo, publico hoste Ecclesiarum reformatarum, ut arma sua conjungerent, & me communi impetu adorirentur (45). — Daillé like the Tigers, who are said to grow furious by the beating of a Drum, was as much enraged at the sight of that Piece, as if those three Disputations had been changed into three Furies, and lashed him with continual stripes, both Night and Day. He immediately began to thunder out his Menaces, and writing circular Letters to all his Friends, solicited them to load me with all the Calumny their Malice could invent. He threatened me likewise with an Answer, which should expose me as I deserved. — And first by a Piece of political Craft he entered into a Confederacy with Curcellæus, a professed Enemy of the Reformed Churches, (44) In nuperis literis suæ Synodi provincialis, cui præfuit, quæ curavit fabricari pro suo libitu. Ibid.

(45) Marefius, ubi supra.

(38) See the Pastoral Letter of the 1st of Novemb. 1688.

(39) Intituled, Reponse d'un nouveau Converti à la lettre d'un Réfugié pour servir d'addition au livre de Dom Denys de Ste Marthe.

(40) Pag. 9.

(41) Pag. 5.

(42) Vie de Mr Daillé, pag. 26.

(43) Maref. Prolegom. Epist. Theolog. Edit. 1658, in 12mo.

who, not being able to discern a Truth from a Falsity, will believe what they find in the Book of a famous Man. It were to be wished that the Disputes about Universalism and Particularism had been looked upon in those Days as they are now [M]. Mr Daille had a great share in Balzac's Esteem [N]. He died at Paris the 15th of April 1670, leaving a Son of whom I shall speak in the Remarks (o). The Knave very

Churches, to attack me with their United Forces. They ascribe this Anger to the Presumption he had conceived by being Minister of the capital City of France; as if a Pastor of that Church ought to enjoy the Privileges of a little Papacy. * Iniquius fert sibi contradici & pro celebrare Ecclesie cui servit, Id τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, ut de veteri Roma loquuntur Patres Concilii Chalcedonenfis Can. penult. Non solum τὰ προεχέια sibi debere putat, sed etiam τὸ πρεσβεῖν; ac subinde Archiepiscopatū vel Papatūrit (46). The same Author quotes a piece of the Case, which M. de Fauquemberg, Minister of the Church of Sens, had published against Mr Daille, which contains a Fact that shews an insufferable Pride. * Nolim omnibus iis credere, quæ de ipso publice scripti unus ex suis in eadem Provincia symmiltis, Fauquembergius; aut illum eo feritatis processisse, ut cum sibi nartaretur hunc pro concione liberius notasse quendam ex Ecclesie suæ membris, qui dicebat falso modio usus fuisse, statim eum inauditum damnaverit, nec solum censurā dignum pronuntiaverit, sed etiam in hanc tyrannicam vocem proruperit, (Il lui faut bailler les estriviers du haut en bas;) quo atrocius & contumeliosius, ut norunt qui Gallicæ norunt, (sic enim agitur demum cum viliſſimis mancipiis,) nihil à Verbi Divini Ministro, de suo fratre in eadem dignitate constituto, dici potest (47). — I would not believe all those things, which Fauquemberg, one of his Brother Divines in the same Province, has published concerning him, or that he was arrived at that pitch of Haughtiness, that, when it was told him, that Fauquemberg had reprimanded, in a manner too severe for a Sermon, one of the Members of his Congregation, who was said to have used false Measures, he should condemn him unheard, and not only proclaim him worthy of censure, but break out into this tyrannical Expression. He should have the Bastinado from Head to Foot. Than which nothing more barbarous or contumelious could be spoken by a Minister of GOD's Word concerning a Brother in the same Dignity with himself: For such treatment is given to the vilest Slaves. They affirm that several of Mr Daille's Brethren complained of his Haughtiness, and conclude with saying, that commonly those who see themselves in a fine Post, and applauded by Flatterers, forget themselves, and cannot bear to be contradicted. * Ut dudum est quod φιλοπροσέχει, nec pristinae ferulae memoriam penitus deposuit, ita aſſatus typho sæculi paulatim aſſuevit κατὰκρυβεῖν τὸν κληρὸν, ut multi sint ejusdem secum ordinis in Gallia, qui majorem moderationem, & nimis sublimium spirituum aliquam repressionem, in ipso desiderant. Verum id solet iis evenire qui in loco celsiori consistunt, ut facile tententur vertigine, & aliorum blandimentis delinunt, sibi quid fumant de Phariseorum supercilio, quod postea tonforis novaculam non vult admittere (48). — At his Elevation is of no long standing, and the late Ferule is still fresh in his Memory, he is so elate with Pride, and has so accustomed himself to tyrannize over the Clergy, that there are many of the same Order in France, who wish to see a greater Moderation, and a check given to his too haughty Temper: but it is usual for those, who are placed on a summit, to have their Heads suddenly turned, and, by being flattered by others, to contract a Pride which cannot suffer a favourite sore to be touched, tho' ever so gently.

(46) Id ibid.

(47) Id ibid.

(48) Id ibid.

It is certain that those things may very much contribute to lessen the Esteem that People had conceived for Mr Daille. In most of the Provinces of France he was only known by a great number of Sermons full of an excellent Morality, and edifying Piety, and by Books of Controversy, wherein his Zeal for Truth, and his Wisdom and Judgment, shine no less than his Learning. When People know a Person only by such a conspicuous Merit, they have the greatest Veneration for him, because they are prepossessed with this favourable Opinion, that his Life is answerable to his Doctrine: and therefore they must needs have a worse

Opinion of him, when they come to know that he who teaches others Humility, and the forgiving of Injuries, is puffed up with Pride, cannot bear to be refuted, and horribly inveighs against his Censurers. It is doubtless a great Misfortune for such Persons, as Mr Daille was, to engage in personal Disputes. One would think that their evil Genius brings them to those unlucky Circumstances. They grow hot, and in their Anger they discover more Faults in a Month than they had been able to conceal in twenty Years. The worst is, that their Enemies reveal whatever may tend to their Disreputation, and publish a hundred things that would have been unknown. Remember the Clause that I have put in the Text of this Article, whether they be true or false. I decide nothing here upon the matter of Fact; and, on the other side, I say nothing but what is to be found in a public Book.

[M] It were to be wished, that the Disputes about Universalism and Particularism had been looked upon in those Days, as they are now. We have seen how the Walloon Synod stirred themselves against Mr Daille's Book, and that they made great Complaints of it to the Synod of the Isle of France. The very Title of it (Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton;) appeared to them very scandalous. How comes it then that the Walloon Synod, that drew up a Form of Subscription, in the Year 1686, for the Ministers that came from France, did not inform themselves whether they were for Universal or Particular Grace? Had that Doctrine changed its nature since the Printing of Mr Daille's Book? That Question is not very difficult. In order to resolve it one needs but remember that all the Party Leaders, either in France or Holland, were dead a long time before. If Peter du Moulin, Andrew Rivet, Frederic Spanheim, Samuel Des-Marets, (Marſius), Moses Amyraut, had been living in the Year 1686, the Disputes about Universal Grace would have been accounted very important; but, as they had not been able for a considerable time to communicate to any body the Spirit wherewith they were animated, the overflowed Waters were returned into their Channel, and ran softly and smoothly, and at that time they judged better of the nature of things. How many Sins and Scandals would have been avoided, if those Waters had never overflowed those Banks (49)!

[N] He had a great share in Balzac's Esteem. Mr Conrart procured that Acquaintance to Mr Daille. From the Year 1639 there was a mutual Correspondence by Letters between them. Among Balzac's choice Letters, we find an Answer he made to Mr Daille the Twenty fourth of December 1639 (50). Mr Daille is often mentioned in Balzac's Letters to Mr Conrart (51), and commonly with great Praises. See the tenth Letter of the second Book, wherein a Sermon of Mr Daille is extolled to the Sky. In the sixteenth Letter of the fourth Book Balzac mentions a Visit that he received from him, and complains obligingly, that it had lasted but two Hours. This is an Encomium upon that Minister, which is very glorious to him. Mr Daille went to see Balzac in the Year 1653, in the Journey that I spoke of before (52). This appears by the date of the sixteenth Letter of the fourth Book. Here is something that shews the Friendship between Mr Daille and Mr Conrart. 'The Friday after his last Sermon (53), he only went abroad in the Neighbourhood to see his intimate Friend the illustrious Mr Conrart, who was a Man truly according to his Heart, and whose charming Conversation was one of the chief Delights of his Life, and in whose Affection he had just reason to glory; for there never was a more strict or more indissoluble Friendship than theirs ever since their first Acquaintance. One would have thought that he had a mind to take his Leave of that dear Friend; and as if he had known that it was to be their last Farewel, his Visit was longer than usual, and he did not come away till after a most pleasant Conversation, which lasted two Hours (54).'

(49) See the Remark [E] of the Article AMYRAUT.

(50) It is the 13th of the 1st Book of the 2d Part.

(51) See the 1st Letter of the 1st Book, pag. 26, of the Dutch Edit. 1650, and more over the 8th Letter of the 2d Book, pag. 107. See also pag. 249.

(52) In Remark [F].

(53) That is, the Sermon which he preached on Thursday, the 10th of April, 1670. It has been printed with the Abridgement of his Life.

(54) Abridgm. of his Life, pag. 47.

[O] The

(15) In his Apology for the Reformed Churches.

swered, that Mr Daille did not speak of the retrenching of the Cup, but of the Reasons that moved the Church of Rome to retrench it. See the Letter (56) that he wrote to Mr de Langle, Minister of Rouen, who had very well cleared that Equivocation in a printed Sermon.

(56) It is dated the first of Mar. 1655, and printed with two Sermons of Mr de Langle upon the first Epist. to the Corinth. cap. x, ver. 32s

(1) Philip.
Hailbrun. Erist.
Dedic. Comm.
in Jerem.

(c) It must then be distinguished from that which, according to the Oxford Catalogue, at the Word Biblia, was printed Ostrobia, in 1581.

(d) Hailbrunn.
Epist. dedicat.
Com. in Jerem.

(a) This Article was communicated by Mr Bresler

(b) Valvasor,
The Glory of the Duchy of Carniola, lib. 6,
cap. 11, num.
11, pag. 348.

stris ordinis ingenuam juventutem. Wittemb. Cal. Jan.
1584 (2).

(3) Ibid.

[D] The Impression was begun.] They agreed with Samuel Seefisch, Bookseller at Wittenberg, to print 1500 Copies, and each Copy to contain 280 Sheets, of the largest Paper, in a fine Character, with Figures carved in Wood. The States of Carniola were to pay 20 Florins for every Bale of 500 Sheets. The Charge of the Impression of this Bible came to about 8000 Florins, of which the States of Stiria paid 1000 Florins, those of Carinthia 900, and the Evangelic States of Carniola 6100 (A).

(4) Ibid.

[E] The Year 1584. Under the Title of Biblia tu je ufe suetu pisma, stariga inu noviga Testamenta Slovenski, tolmazjena Skufi Jurja Dalmatina, &c. That is to say, The Bible, or the Holy Scriptures, of the Old and New Testament, translated into the Slavonian Tongue, by George Dalmatin, printed at Wittenberg, in the Electorate of Saxony, by the Heirs of John Kraft 1584 (5).

(5) Ibid.

[F] Slavonian Version. Stephen Gerlach (6) indeed mentions, that, in the Month of June, 1578, there was found at Vedreno, a Village of Bulgaria, upon the Frontiers of Thrace, the Bible in the Slavonian, or Illyric, Tongue, at the House of a Clergyman of that Place; but in all Appearance it is neither printed in Latin Characters, nor agrees with the Dialect of the Bible I have been speaking of. (1) In the Account of his Travels to Turkey.

(c) In t

[G] Primus Truber.] Primus Truber deserves to be treated of more fully. At first, he was Canon of Laybach, and began, in the Year 1331, to preach publicly, in the Cathedral of that City, the Doctrine of Luther of the two Kinds in the Eucharist, and to approve of Priests marrying. So that he embraced Luther's Party, and gether published for the public Good. Dalmatin was afterwards presented to the Benefice of St Kbaziam [H] by Christopher, Baron of Aursperg, in the Year 1585, and tho' the Catholics had given him an ignominious Name [I], and had also banished him in the Year 1598, yet the Baron of Aursperg kept him concealed in his House [K].

56

and retired from Carniola into the Empire, where he was chosen by the City of Kempton to be their Pastor. He preached in this place for fourteen Years, and deserved well of his Country by his Translations. For he translated into the Carniolian Tongue, with Latin Characters, not only, 1. The Gospels, according to Luther's Translation, 2. With his Catechism, but also 3. All the New Testament, and 4. The Psalms of David 1553. At last the States of Carniola recalled him into his own Country. He translated also into his Mother-Tongue the Ausburg Confession, and Luther's German Sermons, whose last Book was printed at Tubingen. Hermannus Fabricius Molesmannus (7) speaks of Truber's Translation, with some other Circumstances as follows. 'John Ungnad, Baron of Sonneck (8) in Croatia, at the time of the Ausburg Confession, got the Bible translated into the Slavonian Tongue, at Auerbach, in the Duchy of Wurtemberg. He employed three learned Slavonians in this Translation; the first was Primus Truber, the second Anthony Dalmata, and the third Stephen Consul: But these Books were stopt upon the Road, and are still shut up in Casks at Neustadt in Austria. The Character is altogether new, almost like an Asiatic, or Syriac, Character, with pretty large and square Letters. A Copy of this Bible is to be seen in the Library of the Landgrave of Hesse; and there are some Copies of it in Slavonia. Thus far Fabricius. These Bibles no doubt were printed in Cyrillic Characters: but as to Truber, he was banished a second time from Carniola, and died in the Year 1586, according to Martin Zeiler (9). The same Year he subscribed himself in this manner, in a Letter he wrote to the Deputies of Carniola, which Subscription contains his whole Life. 'Primus Truber, formerly Canon in Ordinary, called and confirmed at Leybach, Pastor at Lack, at Taffer near Ratsbach, and in St Bartholomew's Field, Chaplain to St Maximilian de Cilly, Slavonian Preacher at Trieste, after the first Persecution Preacher at Rosemburg upon the Tauber, Pastor at Kempton and at Aurais, afterwards Preacher of the States of Carniola, and at Rubia, in the County of Goergh, after the second Persecution Pastor at Causen, and now at Deredingen near Tubingen (10).'

[H] Of St Kbaziam. Or St Catiani near Aursperg, in the Diocese of the Patriarch of Aquileia. Gregory, the Patriarch, in the Year 1260, gave the Right of Presentation, with all the Dependances of this Benefice, to Gebhard of Aursperg (11).

[I] Gave him an ignominious Name. They called him Jure Kobila, which is to say, George Mare. This was done by mistake, because they had nicked-named George Terefibith, another Lutheran Minister, Jure Kobila, on account of a Mare that was given him: For Jure signifies, in the Carniolian Tongue, George, and Kobila a Mare; for this Reason several of the Reformed have ignorantly called our Dalmatin, Jure Kobila (12).

[K] Concealed in his House. To wit, in a Vault, under the Stable, before the Cattle; and this private Vault is called to this Day, Jure Kobila, the Preacher's Hole (13).

DAMASCEN (JOHN), one of the most illustrious Fathers of the Lower Empire, flourished in the VIIIth Century [A]. He was born at Damascus, where his Father, though a good Christian [B], had an Office of Counsellor of State to the Calif of the Saracens. He was a very rich and charitable Man; and his chief Delight was to redeem Captives. One day he redeemed a very learned Man; whose Name was Cosmus, who had been taken at Sea, and made him Tutor to his only Son. The Child did very much improve under that excellent Tutor, both in Learning and Zeal for Religion. He became very zealous for Images, and dispersed some Letters in the Empire, which did wonderfully support the Cause against the Emperor; I mean the Emperor Leo Isauricus, a great Enemy to Images. It is said, that this Prince, burning with Desire to be revenged of John Damascen, who exercised at that time the Office of Counsellor of State to the Calif, which his Father had exercised, made use of a forged Letter [C] with [A] He flourished in the VIIIth Century. Alphonse de Castro deserves to be censured for two Reasons, since he said (1) that, according to Tritheimius, our John Damascen must be placed in the Empire of Theodosius the younger, about the Year 450. It is not true that Tritheimius said so: he transcribed Sigebert, who spoke of the Disputes of John Damascen against the Emperor Leo; this belongs to the Year 730 (2). But if it were true, that Tritheimius had been of that Opinion, Alphonse de Castro would not be excused; for he should have rectified him, instead of adopting his pretended Ignorance. We are going to see such another Anachronism.

[B] His Father was a good Christian. John, Patriarch of Jerusalem, having caused some Informations to be made concerning John Damascen's Family, found that his Father and Mother were Christians, and that they had bred him up in the Christian Faith. From whence one may conclude, that it is not true that That Father of the Church was ever converted from the Jewish to the Christian Religion; for he could not have done it without having first renounced his Baptism and the Gospel. Now those that have writ his Life say nothing like it, and it appears that he always had a very great Affection for the Gospel, such as it was then taught by the Bigots or Zealots: I mean chiefly the Monks infatuated with Images. A certain Author, called Peter Galissard (3), is therefore guilty of two Oversight, when he says that, in the Year 470, John Damascen abjured Judaism, and embraced the Gospel. The first Mistake concerns the pretended Conversion, the second conficts in the Time; for if this Man was converted, or perverted, it would not be in the Year 470, since he lived in the VIIIth Century.

[C] Leo Isauricus made use of a forged Letter. Some of the Letters, that John Damascen had writ against the Iconoclasts, fell into Leo's Hands, who 'caused a Man very well skilled in the Art of counterfeiting and falsifying Writings, to imitate his Hand so well, that it was impossible to distinguish the true one from the false one (4)'. Whereupon he caused a Letter to be written (5), wherein he supposed, that John Damascen exhorted him to draw his Forces towards Damascus, promising him, in the Quality of Governor of the Place, to dispose all things in such a manner, that the taking of it would be infallible. He sent that Letter to the Prince of the Saracens, and gloried in taking no Advantage of the Perfidiousness of a Traitor, and in being so generous as to discover to the Calif the Treason of one of his Subjects. The Calif, without hearing the Protestations of Innocence that John Damascen made, and without giving him leave to discover Leo's Trick, 'caused his Right-Hand to be cut off immediately, wherewith he pretended, that he had writ so treasonable a Letter, and commanded it to be exposed on a Gibbet in the public Place, in sight of the whole City (6)'. Damascen retired home, and petitioned the Calif to give him his Hand again, which was granted: he prostrated himself before an Image of the Virgin, and 'having applied his Hand to the Place where it was before, he supplicated the Holy Virgin to make use of her powerful Intercession with her Son, that he might have it restored, in order to maintain the Cause which he had hitherto so happily defended against the Iconoclasts (7)'. He fell asleep in his Prayer, and thought he saw in a Dream the Holy Virgin, who assured him, that his Prayer was heard. Whereupon 'awaking on a sudden, he found his Hand so perfectly restored,

(7) In his Abbridgement of the History of the World.

(8) He was the Emperor's Governor in Stiria, and General of the three Provinces of Stiria, Carnitania, and Carniola, and died the 27th of December, 1564, aged 71 Years. Valvasor, ubi supra, pag. 343.

(9) In his Epistles.

(10) Valvasor, ubi supra, pag. 343.

(11) Id. lib. 3. pag. 729.

(12) Ibid. pag. 349.

(13) Ibid. pag. 349, and 729.

(1) In libris ad. vers. Heracles, apud Philippum Labbe, de Script. Eccl. T. m. I, pag. 557.

(2) There is 830 in Father Labbe, ibid.

(3) In Chronographia apud Theophilum Raynaudium Flophi. Sect. 2, Serie 1, cap. 3, pag. m. 53.

(4) Maimbourg, Histoire des Iconoclastes, lib. 2, pag. m. 116.

(5) It is to be found at length with that of Leo in Maimbourg's History of the Iconoclasts, ibid. He quotes the Life of John Damascen, written by John, Patriarch of Jerusalem.

(6) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 122.

(7) Ibid. pag. 123.

with such great Success, that the Calif caused his Counsellor's Hand to be cut off. It is also said, that John Damascen, having recommended himself to the Prayers of the Holy Virgin, recovered his Hand, and fully vindicated his Innocence. The Minister, who answered Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, rejected, with Contempt, that Story as an impertinent Fable, and, not contented with that, made use of an Argument, which, properly speaking, is Blasphemy [D]. It is a ridiculous Conceit of Bzovius to place Damascen among the Physicians that have been famous for their Sanctity [E]. There is more reason to say, that it was he, who began, among the Greeks, to handle a Subject according to the Scholastic Method [F]. This appears chiefly from his four Books of the Orthodox Faith. He left the Court of the Prince of the Saracens after the Miracle that I have mentioned, and shut himself up in the Monastery of St Sabas at Jerusalem.

restored, that he had the free use of it as before, with a little Circle about his Wrist, which shewed the place where it had been cut from his Arm, left it should be said that another Man had voluntarily submitted himself in his place, and suffered that Punishment for him. The whole Town — ran in the Morning to see that Spectacle. The Calif, being informed of such a surprizing Wonder — would see it with his own Eyes, — confessed his Injustice and Precipitation, detested the Emperor's infamous Treason (8), and would have restored Damascen to all his Dignities, but he found him resolved to lead a solitary Life.

[D] A Minister — made use of an Argument, which, properly speaking, is Blasphemy. No body can think it strange that the Protestants should not believe the Miracle that I have just now mentioned; for it is certain, that a great many Catholics do not believe it: and the Writers for the Cause of Images have so composed their Histories, that they are only fit to make those very things suspected which they truly report. So that Mr Jurieu would have done nothing but what is reasonable, if he had been contented to reject what is said of John Damascen's Hand as a Monkish Story. His Reflexion upon the slight Punishment that was inflicted on him, is very good; for a Prince is not contented to have a Governour's Hand cut off when he promises to deliver a Place to the Enemies. But when that Minister adds, that, since the Saracens were not converted at the sight of such a Miracle, and the City of Damascus did not renounce Mahometism, it must be concluded, that what is said of John Damascen is false; he will permit me to tell him, that he advances an Impiety. The Saracens of those times were very hard hearted, says he (9); for I am persuaded that, if such a Miracle was wrought at Mecca, they would turn Christians immediately. Is not this to supply the Infidels with Weapons to refute all the Miracles of Moses and JESUS CHRIST? The Egyptians and the Jews of those times were very hard hearted; (might one say) if such Miracles had been wrought in Athens, and Rome, they would have immediately turned Jews, and afterwards Christians. It is somewhat strange that a Divine should suffer himself to be dazzled by a Reason, that is as strong against the Gospel Truths, as against the Monkish Fables; but if we consider how much the first Thoughts that come into the Mind work upon Men of a quick Imagination, we shall not wonder that the Minister of whom I speak should have argued as he has done. That which is very wonderful is, that there is but one Man, who has made it appear that he has observed that dangerous Doctrine: and it is a remarkable thing that no body seems to know that the Public was told of it. It is also a very remarkable thing, that Mr Jurieu, who might easily have saved his Orthodoxy, by declaring that he had advanced this unwarily, and without perceiving the Consequences of it, but that being sensible of the ill tendency of it, since he was censured upon that account, he disowns that pernicious Maxim: I say, it is very remarkable that That Author has neglected this short and easy way of shewing his Innocence, and has rather chosen, by being silent, to give a lawful Pretence to accuse him of persisting in the same Persuasion, viz. that if at this present time a Hand that is cut off should be restored at Mecca, that Town would immediately turn Christian. Nothing can be more impious (they are the words of him who has informed against some of Mr Jurieu's Errors (10); for it is to declare openly in the sight of Heaven and Earth, that he is persuaded that all the Miracles of Moses, and of JESUS CHRIST and his Apostles, are meer Fables, and consequently that the Scripture of the Old and New Testament is but a Romance and a Legend. Who can hear this without horror? Might not Judaism and Christianity be overthrown by a like Argument? If the Miracle mentioned by Father Maimbourg is false, because the whole City of Damascus was not converted by it, it follows from thence, will the Unbelievers say, that Moses did no Miracles in Egypt, that JESUS CHRIST did none in Judea, that St Peter did not make the Cripple walk, who asked Alms of him in the midst of Jerusalem; for neither the Egyptians nor the Jews were converted. Note, that this lame Man was daily carried to the Gate of the Temple, and that afterwards all the People saw him walk, and knew him to be the same Man who had been lame (11), and that he was known to be the same by the Magistrates (12), and yet Jerusalem was not converted. The Miracle of John Damascen, such as it is related, had nothing more glaring than that of the lame Man, and was not attended with a pathetic Exhortation, as that was.

[E] Bzovius has placed him among the Physicians that have been famous for their Sanctity. Bzovius affirms, in his little Book about Physicians who have been holy Men, that John Damascen is one of them. The Conformity that is between Manfur and Mesue seems to some to be the Cause of that Mistake (13). John Damascen was called Manfur, that is to say, Redeemed; Constantin Copronymus, who hated him, called him Manfer, that is to say, Bastard (14). Bzovius might have confounded Manfur or Manfer with Mesue, and imagined that John Manfur of Damascus is the same with John Mesue, also of Damascus; and that, since the latter is a Physician, the other must needs be so. But he might easily have avoided that Fault, if he had remembered that John Damascen lived in the VIIIth Century, and that Mesue lived after the Year 1140. William du Val (15) follows Bzovius's Error, as Bzovius has followed that of some other Authors. Take notice of what Gesner says; for, having spoken of one John Damascen a Monk and a Priest, Author of the four Books of the Orthodox Faith, he quotes a Passage of Symphorian Champier, importing that he was a learned Physician, Vir fuit in Medicinis doctus, and who for his Learning, and the Purity of his Life, was elected Superior of a Monastery in Constantinople. Afterwards Gesner speaks of one John Damascen surnamed Manfur, who, among other Works, wrote several Parallels on the Scripture. He confutes those who take this John Damascen for Mesue, or who believe that those two Persons were cotemporary; I say, he confutes them by a Chronological Reason, which is, says he, that Mesue lived several hundred Years after the other, for he lived under Frederic Barbarossa in the Year 1163. He gives the Titles of John Mesue's Books, and says that they had been published not long before at Basil, under the Name of Janus Damascenus. Lastly, he speaks of one John Damascen, Author of the Books of the Orthodox Faith, and of the Parallels. Every body sees that this is to confound and multiply Authors prodigiously. Tiraquellus has a little intangled himself; for he reckons (16) one John Damascen Manfur among the Physicians. The word Manfur is the Proof of his Error, since it doth not permit us to say, that he only meant John Mesue, whose Works were printed at Basil under the Name of Janus Damascenus.

[F] It was he, among the Greeks, who began to handle a Subject according to the Scholastic Method. Mr Arnould observes, that 'St John Damascen was as it were the St Thomas of the Greeks, and that they followed his Opinions more, than those of any other Father (17). This is so certain, adds he, that St John Damascen has always been the Rule of their Belief concerning their Eucharist, that Enthimius, to represent

(11) Acts of the Apostles, cap. iii. ver. 9, 10, 11.

(12) Ibid. cap. iv, ver. 14.

(13) See Theophilus Raynaud de malis ac bonis libris, Partit. I, Erotamate 10, n. 214, pag. m. 137.

(14) Idem. Hypotheca, pag. 53.

(15) In Historia Monogramma SS. Medicorum, apud Th. Raynaud. de malis ac bonis libris, pag. 138.

(16) In Opere de Nobilitate, apud Theophil. Raynaud. Hypotheca, pag. 53.

(17) Arnould, perpetuité de l'Église, Tom. I, Book 2, chap. 6, pag. 229, of the Brussels Edition in 12mo.

(8) Ibid. pag. 124, 125.

(9) Apologie pour les Reformats. Tom. I, pag. 20.

(10) See the Book intitled, Declaration de Mr Touchant un petit écrit qui vient de paroître sous le titre de Courte revue des maximes de moralité, &c. pag. 15. It was printed in 1691.

(a) Taken from Mr Du Pin's Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, Tom. VI, pag. 101, & seq. of the Dutch Edit.

Jerusalem, where the Monk, that was chosen to conduct him, ordered him to keep a perpetual Silence. That Monk was so severe, that, because his Disciple did not observe that Order, he turned him out of his Cell, and for a Penance ordered him to empty the Filth of the Monastery: but seeing him ready to obey, he dispensed with it, and embraced him. John Damascen was ordained a Priest about the latter end of his Life by the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and immediately returned to his Monastery. He died about the Year 750. James de Billi caused that Father's Works to be printed in the Year 1577: that Edition was reprinted in the Year 1619. Several Treatises are wanting in it, which Leo Allatius communicated to Mr Aubert, who designed a new Edition of John Damascen (a). Father Labbe had also promised one (b).

(b) See the Book he published in 1652, intitled, Conspectus novæ editionis omnium S. Joannis Damasceni Opera in quatuor partes tributorum, ubi etiam de fore- going Editions.

(18) Claude Reponse à la per- tuité defendue; Book ii. cap. 13, pag. m. 497.
(19) Id. pag. 515, & seq.

the Doctrine of the Greek Church concerning that Mystery against the Heresy of the Paulicians, mentions only the famous Passage of S. Gregory Nyssen in his Catechesis, and a Passage of S. John Damascen, wherein that Error of the Stercoranists is formally rejected. Mr Claude, in his Answer to Mr Arnauld, acknowledges the same: 'It is certain, says he (18), that, to judge well of the Opinion of the Modern Greeks, we must go back as far as John Damascen.' He explains, some few Pages (19) after, the Opinion of that Author, which is no ways consonant to that of the Reformed; but he does not admit of Transubstantiation. It is an incomprehensible Nonsense, and such will ever be the Fate of those who go about to explain too particularly the mode of Mysteries. The best way would be to keep to the most general Expressions. There are some things, the Explication whereof does but increase their Obscurity: the greatest Divines should be put in mind of the common Saying, Ne sator ultra crepidam, considering the Sublimity of some Doctrines.

DAMIAN (PETER), Cardinal, Bishop of Ostia, flourished in the XIth Century. He had been a Benedictin; and it is thought he would always have preferred a solitary Life before the Dignities of the Church, had he not been, as it were, forced to accept of them. He openly condemned the Liberty which the Popes took to oppose the Emperors with temporal Arms [A], and made a lively Description of the enormous Vices of his Age in many of his Works. That which he intituled Gomorrhæus is commonly alledged: The Controversists speak much of it [B]. Pope Alexander II suppressed

(1) Coiffeteau, Reponse au My- stère d'Iniquité, pag. 667.

[A] He openly condemned the Liberty that the Popes took to oppose the Emperors with temporal Arms. His Doctrine is very orthodox upon this Head, and he confirms it by the Practice of the Primitive Church (1). 'He maintains, that the Offices of Emperor and Pope are distinct, and that the Emperors ought not to concern themselves with what belongs to the Popes, nor the Popes with what belongs to the Emperors, as, to handle Arms, make War, &c. As, says he, the Son of GOD overcame all the Obstacles of the World, not by the Severity of Revenge, but by the lively Majesty of an invincible Patience; so he has taught us rather steadfastly to endure the Rage of the World, than to take up Arms against those who offend us: especially considering that there is such a distinction of Offices between the Royalty and the Priesthood, that it belongs to the King to make use of temporal Arms, and to the Priest to gird himself with the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of GOD, &c. — Do we read that St Gregory ever did, or writ, such a thing; he who suffered so many Outrages from the Lombards? Did St Ambrose take up Arms against the Arians, who thwarted him, and cruelly tormented his Church? Can we find that any of the holy Pontiffs did ever appear in Arms? Let therefore the Ecclesiastical Causes be decided by the Laws of Justice, or by the Decrees of a Council of Bishops, lest what ought to be done in a Court of Judges, or in an Assembly of Prelates, should tend to our Confusion by a Conflict of Arms.' Can any thing be more reasonable? And yet Baronius does not scruple to say, that this Doctrine of Peter Damian is erroneous, and even a Scion of the Doctrine of Julian the Apostate. These are the Words of that Cardinal, 'Errone lapsus convinctur Petrus quem communi totius Ecclesiæ Catholicæ consensu constat esse damnatum. Post Tertullianum Julianus Apostata fuisse convinctur originarius sator erroris, ex quo & iste nascitur propagatus (2). — We cannot therefore, says he, nor ought to, excuse him for having fallen into an Error which the Church has condemned. After Tertullian, Julian the Apostate is known to be the original Author of the Error from which That of Damian springs.' This is pitiful, since that Apostate Prince did only put the Christians in mind of the evident Maxims which their Master had left them.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 669. He quotes Baronius, ad ann. 1053.

[B] He intituled one of his Works Gomorrhæus; The Controversists speak much of it. By this Law of Celibacy Sodomy does so much prevail among the Romish Clergy, that Peter Damian, who was then in his Hermitage, was obliged to write a Book about it, intituled Gomorrhæus, wherein he laid open the several kinds of it, and dedicated it to Leo IX, in-treating him to apply a Remedy. And Baronius himself confesses it in these Words; Briars and Nettles had over-run the Field of the Father of the Family; all Flesh had corrupted its way, and Men deserved, not only a washing Deluge, but also a consuming Fire from Heaven, like that of Gomorrah. Whereupon Pope Leo made some Regulations, and ordered some Penalties: But soon after Damian lost his Favour; and Alexander II, coming to be Pope, stole his Book from him under pretence of giving it to the Abbot of St Saviour to be transcribed, saying, that he had spoke too filthily of the matter, as if those Orders could be stirred without Stink. The good Man complained bitterly of it in one of his Epistles to Cardinal Hildebrand and Cardinal Stephen, and told them, not without a plain Irony, It is in truth a sign of the sacerdotal Cleanness, or rather an Argument of the Papal Purity (3). That my Reader may be sure that this Passage contains no Fallacies (4), I shall set down Coiffeteau's Answer to it (5). 'That in those times the Ecclesiastical Laws were not the cause of the Scandal which Damian bewails, is plain enough from the Letter which Pope Leo IX writ to him after he had received his Book, which he highly praised. The Clergy, says he, of whose most filthy Life you have discoursed in doleful Terms, but full of Reason, do not certainly belong to the Lot of the Lord's Inheritance, from which they separate themselves by such a dissolute Life. If their Conversation was chaste, they would not only be called the Temple of GOD, but also the Sanctuary wherein the Lamb, whose Whiteness exceeds that of Snow, and who takes away the Sins of the World, is offered up, &c. — 4. As for Alexander II, who used some Art to suppress Peter Damian's Book, wherein that horrid Lewdness was expressed a little too freely, any Man, who does but love civil Honesty, will never take it ill: for certainly, it is a sign of great Purity to be offended at the very Words that represent any Obscenity, though they be used to make it detested. The Pope was not the only one that was offended at it, but all good Men were generally displeased with such a Liberty; for that Filth could not be stirred without leaving an ill Smell behind it: and therefore the Pope's Artifice deserved to be praised for punishing those that were guilty, and suppressing such an obscene Book. But because sometimes we love our Works inconsiderately, Peter Damian could not bear that this Fruit of his Mind should be stifled, which he said he had produced with extraordinary Labour; for which reason he spoke of it with Passion. Nevertheless, after having taken the liberty to speak against the Pope, he cor-

* Baron. Vol. XI, ann. 1049, art. 10. & seq. Petri Damiani, lib. qui in scribitur Gomorrhæus cui præfixa Epist. Leonis. IX.

(3) Du Plessis, mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 223.

(4) That is, as to Matters of Fact.

(5) Coiffeteau, ubi supra, pag. 648.

† Epist. Leon. ad Damian. præfixa Gomorrhæo, extat apud Baron. ad ann. 1049.

‡ Du Plessis, pag. 223, lib 34.

† Pet. Damiani Epist. ad Stephan. & Hildebrand. Card.

suppressed it; nevertheless it is extant to this Day (a). The Author of the Prejugez (a) See the Remark [C].
legitimes contre le Papisme would be hard put to it, if he was to answer the Author who criticized him [C]. It appears from a Letter of Peter Damian (b), that some of the Clergy taught that Priests might be married. He ought to be praised on account of (b) It is the 13th of the 5th Book.
 the great Zeal he expressed for the re-establishment of good Discipline, which might be a Bar to the Vices of the Monks and the Clergy: but the Credulity wherewith he compiled many Examples of Apparitions of Bishops, or other Persons, condemned to the Torments of Hell, or to those of Purgatory (c), is inexcusable. He had a great Devotion (c) See the 10th and 20th of his small Pieces.
 for the holy Virgin. You will find his Country, the time of his Death, and some other Circumstances of his Life, in Moreri's Dictionary.

rects himself at the end of his Epistles: he confesses that there is some Presumption in him, that he went too far, and that the Pride of his Lips deserves to be punished.

[C] This Book is extant to this Day. The Author of the Prejugez contre le Papisme would be hard put to it, if he was to answer the Author who criticized him. These are the Words of the Author of the Prejudices (6). It is from Cardinal

(6) Jurieu, Prejugez legitimes contre le Papisme, Tom. I, pag. 319.

Baronius that we know that Peter Damian, Cardinal of the Church of Rome at that time, writ a Book intitled Gomorrheus, which he addressed to Leo IX, wherein he described the Manners of his Age, and particularly of the Clergy; and it may be guessed by the Title what it was: Sodom and Gomorrab came into the Description of those horrid things. Baronius says, that, besides the Crime of Simony, the Field of the Lord had been over-run with Thorns and Nettles, which shamefully came out of the Stink of the Flesh through the Dung of Corruption: for all Flesh had corrupted its way, so that it did not seem that a Deluge could be sufficient to wash off that Filth. Those horrid Sins called for the Fire of Gomorrab, which consumed the Country where the five Cities stood. For which reason Peter Damian, then a Hermit of Mount Avelan in Umbria, thought himself obliged to inform the new Pope of all those things, writing a Book to him which he intitled Gomorrheus, wherein he represented, as clearly as he could, the four sorts of carnal Sins that prevailed in the Church, desiring him that he would pierce through those infamous Men with the Sword of Phineas, and restore the Church to its former Purity. That Disorder had already continued an hundred and fifty Years, (viz.) from the beginning of the Xth Century to the middle of the XIth: If there was nothing but this, would it not be a sufficient Reason to be prepossessed against the Latin Church and Popery? Would God have suffered that the true Church, without ceasing to be the Spouse of Jesus Christ, should become a Sodom and a Gomorrab, and be sunk in the four Sins of the Flesh that are most enormous, and remain under that Deluge near two hundred Years? That Minister had already said in another Book (7), 'We produce for example Peter Damian, who wrote a Book in the XIth Century, intitled Gomorrhai; wherein he pretends to convict the Clergy of that time of the horrid Sin for which Sodom was burnt. The Book is lost, but we have the Monuments of it in the Annals of their great Baronius, who says that this Peter Damian, in that Book, Quadrupertita vitia carnis quibus Ecclesia obrueretur, ut decuit quam potuit bonefide insinuasit, pointed out as modestly as he could the four Vices of the Flesh wherewith the Church was overwhelmed.'

(7) Jurieu, Apologie pour les Reformateurs, Tom. I, cap. 9, pag. 152.

* Anno 1049, n. 20.

(8) The Abbot Richard, Examen des Prejugez de Mr Jurieu, esp. 28. pag. 238.

The following Censure hits Baronius no less than Mr Jurieu: for the Abbot Richard affirms that Peter Damian did not represent those Disorders as an Evil which had over-run the Church, but as the Corruption of some particular Persons. It is very remarkable, that the Abbot, instead of insulting Mr Jurieu, excuses him as much as he can. 'Mr Jurieu, says he (8), ingeniously confesses, that he never read that Book. — It is therefore no wonder if he is mistaken in the Idea which he formed of a Work that he never saw, and which he thinks to be lost. It is no wonder if judging of it only by the Title, and by what Baronius says of it in general, he imagined, &c.' Afterwards the Abbot shews him, 1. That that Book is not lost; 2. That it does not treat of the Manners of the Age, nor of the Clergy in general; and that it does not represent the Latin Church like a Sodom or a Gomorrab; 3. That, according to the Testimony of the same Peter Damian, there were many eminent Men in that Age. I shall not mention the Proofs of the third Point, being contented to transcribe in part those that concern the other two. These are the Words of the Abbot Richard: (9) 'As to the first, It is so far from being true that this Work is lost, that I have it among my Books; and it was printed with the other Works of that Saint, in the beginning of this Age: nay, he that took care to publish them, dedicated them to Pope Paul V, who granted a Licence for that Edition in the Year 1606. If Mr Jurieu had been more careful to examine the Truth of the Proof that he brings, and to see it in the Original; and if he had enquired for the Book whence it is taken; the Booksellers of Paris would have supplied him with as many Copies of it as he had pleased, and would have informed him, that the Gomorrheus of Peter Damian is so far from being lost, that it is not much above twenty Years since it has been reprinted, with all the other Works of that Cardinal. For the second, If Mr Jurieu had been more careful to seek into the Original of the Truth of what he advances, and if he had read the Book which Peter Damian intitled Gomorrheus, he would have found there, that this Cardinal does not endeavour to convict the Clergy of that time of the horrid Sin that drew Fire from Heaven on the City of Gomorrab; and that he does not describe the Manners of the Age, nor of the Clergy in general; and lastly, that it is not true that he represents the Latin Church as a Sodom and a Gomorrab. For he would have found, that Peter Damian did only acquaint Pope Leo IX with the Lewdness of certain Clergymen of his Neighbourhood, that is, about Mount Apennine, whither he had retired, and where he lived with Anchorites. A certain horrid and infamous Vice is spread IN THESE PARTS, says he to that Pope, mentioning the Reasons which obliged him to write that Piece, in the Sequel of which we do not find he extends that Disorder and Corruption farther. Can it be said, with any Shew of Reason, that a Vice, which crept among the Clergy about Mount Apennine, is the Vice of the Age and of all the Clergy? And can all the Latin Church be, with any Justice, accused of a Sin, which some Clergymen of a particular Province were guilty of? How truly then, and how equitably, could Mr Jurieu have said, that Peter Damian endeavoured, in his Gomorrheus (10), to convict the Clergy of that time of the most horrid of all Sins, to describe the Inclinations of the Age and of the Clergy, and to represent the Latin Church as a new Sodom and a new Gomorrab, if he had known that in all that Book Peter Damian does only mention to the Pope the Impurities of some of the Clergy of a particular Province? So that Mr Jurieu, as well as Baronius, has alledged the Testimony of that Book, which says nothing of what he makes it say, only because he never read it, and believed it was lost.'

(10) This is not the Title mentioned by Mr Jurieu. We have in this Remark [C] an Instance of the Carelessness that I shall speak of in the Remark [B] of the Article DE METRIUS.

From hence we may learn, how much an Author is to be pitied when his Library is not furnished with all sorts of Books, and how much he is to be blamed, when, notwithstanding this, he boldly affirms, that such and such Books are not extant. Let us learn also, with what Caution we ought to speak of a Work that we know only by the report of others. Who would have thought that Baronius would have deceived the Protestants in the Idea of the Gomorrheus of Peter Damian, I say, have deceived them to the Disadvantage of his own Communion? But, will some say, is it a convincing Proof of Baronius's Error, to say, that the Abbot Richard maintains the contrary? No, it is only a strong Suspicion, that comes near a good Proof, since the Author of the Prejugez has not endeavoured to maintain what he had advanced. It is thought he would not have digested such an Affront, if he had been able to make his Apology. After all, do not we see that the Abbot Richard points at the Fountain head? He mentions an Edition of Peter Damian's

Works printed at Paris in the Year 1663. If any body is incredulous, let him read the Work in question. Mr Du Pin speaks briefly of it, and observes, that it is in the 7th of Peter Damian's Opuscula, in the third Tome of his Works (11).

(11) Du Pin Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. du XI. Siècle, pag. m. 94.

DANAË, the Daughter of Leontium. See the Remark of the Article LEONTIUM.

DANDINI (JEROM), an Italian Jesuit, born at Cesena in the Ecclesiastical State, is the first of his Order, who taught Philosophy at Paris. He had many honorable Offices in the Society; for, besides his teaching Divinity at Padua [A], he was Rector of several Colleges, as Ferrara, Forlì, Bologna, Parma, and Milan; Visitor in the Provinces of Venice, Toulouse, and Guienne; and Provincial in Poland, and in the Milanese. Clement VIII sent him to the Maronites of Mount Libanus. He died very old [B], at Forlì, the 29th of November, 1634. His Commentary on the three Books of Aristotle, de Anima, were printed at Paris, in the Year 1611, in folio; and after his Death, his Morals were published. It is a Book in folio, that was printed at Cesena in the Year 1651, with this Title, Ethica sacra, hoc est de virtutibus & vitiis (a). This is all that the Historians of the Jesuits say of him (b). If we consider the great Character that Father Simon gives him, we shall find that those Historians have not flattered him too much, nor let him off to the greatest Advantage. Dandini, says Father Simon, was of a noble Italian Family, whereof there are still Counts of the same Name living at Cesena; he was a Man who had a penetrating Wit, a solid Judgment, and a great Experience - - - who, besides School Divinity, which he understood perfectly well, was also Master of the Theology of the Fathers, especially Moral Theology, of which he composed an excellent Work - - - so that the Pope could not choose a Man better qualified to treat with the Maronites. It is true he wanted the Knowledge of the Oriental Languages; but he easily supplied that Want by means of the Interpreters that he made use of (c). I omit the other Praises that he gives him [C]. There is no reason to suspect them, because it is usual with those that translate, or comment upon, a Book, to be extremely prepossessed in favour of the Author, and to make themselves the perpetual Protectors, or even the Panegyrist of his Opinions; for no Man can take more Liberty with an Author, than Father Simon has done with Father Dandini [D]: he criticizes him and confutes him on a thousand Occasions in the Remarks that he has added to the Translation of the Journey to Mount Libanus. This Book was unknown to Father Southwell. It was printed at Cesena, in 1656, with this Title, Missione Apostolica al Patriarca e Maroniti del Monte Libano. It contains the Relation of that Jesuit's Travels to the Maronites, and to Jerusalem. Father Dandini taught Philosophy at Perugia (d), in 1596 (e), when he was chosen by Clement VIII for the Nunciature of Mount Libanus. He took shipping at Venice, the fourteenth of July 1596, and returned to Rome, in the Month of August the following Year. Soon after he went from thence again, to exercise the Office of Provincial in Poland. The French Translation, that was made of his Travels by Father Simon, was printed at Paris, in the Year 1675, and reprinted at the Hague, in 1685. It does not contain his Journey to Jerusalem [E].

(a) There is a Mistake in the Acta Eruditorum, 1685, pag. 284, where it is said, that the Author published that Book at Paris.

(b) Alegambe & Southwell.

(c) Simon, Preface to the Voyage du Mont Liban, which he has translated into French, from the Italian of this Jesuit.

(d) See his Relation.

(e) In the Dutch Edition there is 1599, which is a Fault.

[A] He taught Divinity at Padua. I durst not say that he was the first Jesuit who taught that Science in Padua; and yet it would have been the best thing that a Translator could have done, if those who write in Latin prescribed as rigorous a Law to themselves as that of our French Grammarians; but the Latin Writers take so little Care to avoid Equivocations, that a Translator who applies himself to the most obvious and exact Sense of their Words, is sometimes led into an Error. However it be, these are Alegambe's Words: 'Hanc (Philosophiam) etiam professus est primus à nostris Lutetiae Parisiorum: Theologiam verò Patavii' (1).—He was the first of our Society who taught Philosophy at Paris, and Divinity at Padua. Father Southwell made no Alteration in them. The Reader may do as he pleases; he may understand them, as if no body had taught Divinity at Padua before that Jesuit.

[B] He died very old. Father Alegambe made him Eighty Years old. 'Obiit demum Forlivii octogennarius die 29 Novembris anno salutis 1634 (2).—He died at Forlì aged eighty Years, the Twenty ninth of November 1634.' Father Southwell made no Alteration in those Words, and yet he should not have left them as he found them; for here is what he adds to the Text of his Predecessor: 'Co-optatus in societatem anno salutis 1569, ætatis 18, vota quatuor solemniter nuncupavit (3).—In the Year 1569 he was admitted into the Society, being then eighteen Years of Age, and made the four solemn Vows.' To say after this, that he died at eighty Years of Age, the Twenty ninth of November 1634, is not consistent with an exact Historian.

[C] I omit the other Praises Father Simon gives him. Father Dandini, says he (4), endeavoured to cast off all the Prejudices that he ascribes to those, who had been at Mount Libanus before him. He did not altogether trust to the Pope's Bulls, though they made the best part of his Instructions, because he did not think they were infallible with respect to the Facts in question: but he heard with great Patience the Patriarch and the chief Maronites, who complained of some Jesuits who had been before him in that Employment: and all those Precautions are convincing Proofs of his wise Conduct. Neither did he seem to have had any thing else in view, than to discover the true Belief of the Maronites. And yet his Penetration and prudent Conduct could not hinder him from being imposed upon, as will appear in the Remarks that I have added to my Translation.

[D] No man can take more Liberty with an Author, than Father Simon has done with Father Dandini. The last Words of the foregoing Citation are an Instance of it. Let us see the Judgment he makes of that Jesuit's Style. 'His Style, says he (5), is sometimes so careless, and so full of superfluous Words, useless Epithets, and Exaggerations, that I thought it more proper to give his Sense than his Words, tho' on the other side I almost every where preserve something of his Character. And to write with greater Clearness, I have been often obliged to make two or three Periods of one of his.'

[E] It does not contain his Travels to Jerusalem. The Reason that the Translator gives for it is, that as we have many such Relations, he thought he might be excused from publishing this, because it contains almost nothing that has not been already observed by other Travellers.

(5) Id. ibid.

(1) Sotuel, de Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 338.

(2) Simon, Preface to the French Translation of the Journey to Mount Libanus.

DANTE,

DANTE, one of the first Poets of Italy, was born at Florence, the Twenty seventh of May (a), in the Year 1265 (b). He was of a good Family [A], and carefully educated in polite Literature (c). Among other Masters, he had the famous Brunetti (d), who was one of the most learned Men of those times. He soon shewed the Inclination that Nature had given him for Poetry (e); and, as he fell in love as soon as his Age did permit it [B], he made many Verses in his Youth. He consecrated the First-fruits of his Muse to amorous Verses (f); but afterwards he undertook a more serious Work. He began it in Latin Verse, and ended it in Italian Verse. The Reason of that Change was, that he felt too much Slowness in the Motion of his Poetical Vein, when he made use of the ancient Roman Language. He did well to make use of his Mother-Tongue, since he excelled in the Tuscan Poetry (g). He would have been more happy if he had not meddled with any thing else; for being an ambitious Man, and having been promoted to the highest Posts of the Republic, he sunk under the Ruins of the Faction which he embraced. The City of Florence being divided into two Factions, the one called the White, and the other the Black, found itself reduced to such a tumultuous Condition, that Pope Boniface VIII sent Charles de Valois (h) thither in the Year 1301, to restore the public Tranquillity. No better way was found to pacify the City, than to drive the White Faction out of it. This is the Reason why our Dante, who had favoured

(a) Reußer in Diario, pag. 81.

(b) Volaterran. Comment. Urbanor. lib. 21, pag. m. 770.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Michael Poccianus, de Scriptor. Florentinis, pag. 33, 34. See Remark [K].

(e) Volaterr. ubi supra, pag. 771.

(f) Papyr. Maslo, Elogior. Tom. II, pag. 28.

(g) Id. ibid.

(h) Brother to Philip the Fair, King of France.

[A] He was of a good Family. It is pretended that Cacciaguida, his great great Grandfather (1), was the Son, or Grandson (2), of Eliska Frangipani, and that he married a Ferrarese Lady of the Family of the Alighieri. They add, that the Son of Cacciaguida, and of that Lady, took his Mother's Name and Arms, and that this is the Reason why the Family of Dante had the Surname of Alighieri (3). Note, that Cacciaguida was born at Florence in the Year 1160 (4). The Ancestors of Dante, being very much addicted to the Party of the Guelphs, were twice driven out of Florence by the Ghiblins (5). Some pretend that he ought to be called Dante d'Alighieri del Bello, and that Alighieri was his Father's Name, and Bello the Name of his Family. See the Proofs that Vincent Buonanni gives of it (6). For the rest, our Poet's Name was Durantes, which by Abbreviation was made Dantes, whilst he was yet a Child (7). Grangier is plainly mistaken in the Passage that I am going to quote; it serves for a Commentary to some Verses wherein Cacciaguida declares (8), that he had better say nothing of his Ancestors, nor of the Place they left to come to Florence, than to speak of it. This he says out of Modesty, (they are Grangier's Words (9), not that he did not know any other more ancient Original of his Family, or that beyond Cacciaguida it was but of a mean, obscure, and ignoble Descent. For Dante seems to intimate in his Inferno, that his Ancestors descended from the ancient Romans who built Florence, after having left the Colony of Fieszola. Complaining of his exile in the 15th Canto, and of the Wrong the Florentines had done him, he makes Ser Brunetto Latini speak thus:

Faccian le bestie Fieszolane frame
Di lor medesime, & non tocchin la pianta
S'alcuna furge ancor nel lor lettame,
In cui riviva la sementa fanta.
Di cui i Roman, che vi rimafer quando
Fu fatto il nido di malitia tanta.

Perish thy brutal Sons, a Dunghil-Breed,
O Fieszola, nor mingle with the Seed
Of Romans, who in Florence dwelt, when she Became the Nest of so much Villany.

It is certain that Dante does not design to say there any thing particular in praise of his Ancestors; and that he only means that there were some Families in Florence that descended from the ancient Romans. How many Towns are there among those that have been Roman Colonies, wherein meer Tradesmen, descended from the Dregs of the People for twenty Generations, would not lye if they should say at a venture, that they are descended from the ancient Romans? What would this signify to prove that their Family is illustrious, and of an eminent Nobility?

[B] He fell in love as soon as his Age did permit it. Thus I thought I might translate these words of Volaterran: amavit in adolescentia Beatrix (10). This Beatrix was the Daughter of Folco Portinari (11). Some pretend that our Poet loved her very modestly, but that when she died he gave himself over to a lascivious Love (12). Others say, that the chaste Love he had for her, was the Reason why, after her Death, he turned a real thing into a Poetic Fancy, making Beatrix to be Theology (13). Those, who have read his Poem, know that Beatrix moralizes very much in it, and that she acts the Part of a grave Doctor. Read what follows, wherein you will find moreover, that she was only his second Mistress; but do not trust to that. It is observed, that he had two Mistresses in his younger Years: the one was called Gentucca, with whom he fell in Love when he was in the City of Lucca; the other, Beatrix Portinari, the Daughter of Folco Portinari, whom he loved with an ardent, but chaste Affection. That Love often mixed itself with the sublime Conceptions of his Mind; which was the Reason why he went about to immortalize her by his Verses, wherein Theology is veiled under the fine Name of Beatrix. Desiring to follow Virgil's Steps in the Descent of his Aeneas into Hell, he introduces this Daughter of the Empyrean Heaven, coming to him and giving him that Prince of the Latin Poets as a Guide in such dark and uneasy ways (14). It is certain that this Gentucca was not Dante's first Mistress; he did not love her till after his having been exiled, and during his Abode at Lucca after his Banishment (15). Note, that the Names of his Mistresses have been better preserved than those of his three Wives. Papyrius Maslo confesses that he does not know the Names of those three Wives. Uxoribus tres habuisse dicitur quarum incertum est nomen & mihi prorsus obscurum (16). He adds, that Dante left a Son who was a Lawyer and settled at Verona, and whose Posterity was illustrious. He mentions one PETER DANTE among his Descendants, to whom it is said that Philoebus dedicated the Life of our Poet; and another Dante, the third of that Name, who was exhorting by the Florentines to return to Florence in the Year 1495, but refused to do it. He says also that they all left the Name of Alighieri, and took only that of Dante, whereby they shewed, that the Glory of their Family came only from that great Poet (17). It is likely he did not know what Pierius Valerianus tells us of this third DANTE, which is, that he died exceeding poor. He was learned, and made good Latin Verses. When he began to digest his Compoſures, in order to publish them as a Viaticum of his Immortality, Scripta sua ceperat in classes instruere, & immortalitati suae viaticum comparare (18), the Enemies, whom Julius II had raised against the Venetians, took Verona (19). Dante, who fled with his Wife and Children to Mantua, found himself reduced to Poverty; and because Old-age made him more unfit to bear the Hardships of so sad a Condition, he fell sick, and died miserably in this Exile, after he had endured tedious Pains (20). Gyraldus mentions one Dante, who was reckoned the fifth: 'Fuerit ex eadem familia, says he, (21), & alii, in quibus Veronæ natus Danthi & ipse nomine qui, ut audivi, quintus ab illo est, & latine & vernacula lingua non sine laude versum scribit. — There were others of the same Family, amongst whom one Dante, born at Verona, is the fifth as I am informed, and is much admired for his Verses, both in Latin and Italian.'

[C] Our

(1) He says he is the Father of Dante's Great Grandfather, in the 1st Canto of That Poet's Paradiso, pag. 333.

(2) Vel nepos vel filius. Papyr. Maslo, in Eleg. Tom. II, pag. 336, should not have said the Nephew.

(3) See Dante's Paradiso, Canto 16, pag. m. 339.

(4) Ibid. pag. m. 350.

(5) Id. Canto 10, of the Inferno.

(6) In his Discorso sopra l'Inferno of Dante, pag. 2, 3, & 184.

(7) Volaterr. lib. 21, pag. 770.

(8) In the 10th Canto of the Paradiso.

(9) Grangier Commentaire sur le Paradis de Dante, pag. 351, 352.

(10) Volaterr. Com. Urban. lib. 21, pag. 771.

(11) Grangier upon the 30th Canto of Dante's Purgatorio, pag. 52.

(12) Vincenzo Buonanni, Discorso sopra l'Inferno de Dante, pag. 17.

(13) Grangier, ubi supra.

(14) Ballart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 308.

(15) See his Purgatorio, Canto 24, pag. m. 416.

(16) Papyr. Maslo, ubi supra, pag. 27.

(17) Id. ib. pag. 23.

(18) Pierius Valer. de Literat. Infelicit. pag. 37.

(19) The third Dante was born there.

(20) Ex Pierio Valeriano, ibid.

(21) Lilius Gyrardus de Poet. Histor. Dial. 5, pag. 503.

(i) In the Article
CAPET.

voured it, was sent into Exile [C]. I have observed elsewhere (i), that this made him publish a ridiculous Falshood relating to Hugh Capet's Extraction. He did not bear that Disgrace with Resolution: his Repentment was very great: he endeavoured to revenge himself to the Prejudice of his Country; and would willingly have seen it involved in a bloody War [D]. All his Endeavours to be recalled proved ineffectual; for he could never return thither: he died in his Exile, in the Month of July 1321. He had Strength enough to compose his Epitaph, in Latin Verse, a little before he expired [E]. It must be remembered, that he applied himself diligently to study, during the time of his Banishment, and that he wrote some Books with more Life and Spirit, than he could have done if he had enjoyed a more quiet Life [F]. It is thought that the Indignation

[C] Our Dante — was sent into Exile. The Presence of Charles de Valois was so far from pacifying the Troubles of that City, that it served only to encrease them. The Faction of the Blacks, finding themselves favoured by that Prince, committed a thousand Violences; they drove away those of the contrary Faction, and burned or pulled down their Houses, not without murdering several People. Our Dante, who was then of the Council of Eight (22), and one of the chief Persons of the City that were called Priors, had been deputed to the Pope to negotiate a Peace. In his Absence he was condemned to Banishment; his House was pulled down, and all his Lands plundered (23).

[D] He would willingly have seen his Country involved in a bloody War. He animated Can de la Scala, Prince of Verona, to make War with the Florentines (24), and brought the Emperor to the Siege of Florence (25). Mention is made of a Letter that he wrote to that Prince during the Siege of Brescia (26). I fancy he made a pathetic Description of the Injustices that he had suffered in his Country, and exhorted the Emperor to punish it.

[E] He died in his Exile. — He had Strength enough to compose his Epitaph — a little before he died. He died at Ravenna, and it is thought that he died of Grief. He enjoyed an honourable Retreat with Guy Polentian Prince of Ravenna, when the Republic of Venice made Preparations for War against that Prince (27). The latter sent him to treat of a Peace at Venice. The Venetians behaved haughtily, and would neither receive nor hear Dante, so that he returned to Ravenna, his Journey having proved fruitless, and a little while after he fell into the Sickness of which he died, and Grief was thought to be the cause of it. Revertens itaque Ravennam rebus infestis paulo post morbo contrasto uti existimatur ex animi dolore extinctus est (28). Papyrius Masso speaks of that Embassy without saying any thing of the ill Success of it: he insinuates, on the contrary, that Dante was well received; for, he pretends that they shewed him the Arsenal, which Dante himself relates. 'Lustravitque nalem apparatus urbis & armamentarium sumptu atque opere visendum, ut primis statim verbis Cantici vigesimi primi inferorum indicat (29). — He viewed the Naval Stores and Arsenal, famed for their Sumptuousity and Workmanship, as he owns in the beginning of his Twenty first Canto of Hell. There is nothing more false than this last Assertion: and it may be the other is not truer. As for the Epitaph, this is my Authority for it (30). 'Obiit, adeo mentis compos quod sex versus in extremo vitæ suæ edidit postmodum in proprio tumultu incisos: & sunt hi,

Jura monarchiæ, superos, phlegetonta, lacusque
Lustrando cecini, voluerunt fata quousque:
Sed quia pars cessit melioribus hospita castris,
Auctoremque suum petiit, felicior astris
Hic claudor Danthes patriis extorris ab oris, Quem genuit parvi Florentia mater amoris.
— His Senses continued so strong to the last, that at the point of Death he composed six Verses, which were afterwards inscribed on his Tomb, and are these.

Whilſt Fate allow'd, I Jung of Kings and Gods,
Of Lethe's Lake, and Pluto's dire abodes.
But now the better Part has wing'd it's Flight
To it's great Author, and the Realms of Light.
My Name was Dante; my Birth fair Florence gave,
But exil'd thence a Foreign Clime's my Grave.

Moreri should not have forgot the Circumstance of the Time, when he said that Dante himself composed that Epitaph. He adds, that Bernard Bembo caused the Tomb to be repaired in the beginning of the XVth Century. This does not agree with Poccianti, who observes, that That Reparation was made in the Year 1433 (31). But there are so many Errors of the Press in the Book of that Italian Author, that I would not warrant the Truth of that Date.

[F] He wrote some Books with more Life and Spirit, than he could have done, if he had enjoyed a quiet Life. This is Paul Jovius's Observation. 'Sed exilium, says he (32), vel toto Etruriæ principatu ei majus, & gloriosius fuit, quum illam sub amara cogitatione excitatam, occulti, divinique ingenii vim exaceruit, & inflammavit. Enata siquidem est in exilio comœdia triplex Platonice eruditionis lumine perillustri, ut abdicata patria totius Italiæ civitate donaretur. — But his Banishment, says he, procured him greater Honour, than the Dominion of all Etruria could have done: for under the bitterness of Reflexion, he pointed and improved the force of a great and surprising Genius. In his Exile was produced his tripple Comedy, beautifully enriched with Platonic Learning, which, though he was banished his own Country, intitled him to the Freedom of all Italy. Latomus explains the same Thought in the six Verses he made upon Dante, which you may see in Paul Jovius (33). The Question is, whether the Remembrance of his Exile did not too much excite his Anger; for it often falls out, that those, who write in such a Condition, carry their satirical Bitterness too far. Let us hear Mr Bullart's Paraphrase (34): 'He resolved to take that signal revenge on the Authors of his Exile, which he executed in his tripple Poem of Paradise, Purgatory, and Hell. He dipped his Pen as much in the Gall of his Anger, as in the Springs of Helicon: he added the Bitterness of his Soul, to the Sweetness of his Poetry: he was animated at the same time by his learned Muse, and his Repentment. The Partialities of great Men, and the Corruption of Manners, affording him all the Matter he could desire for such a Subject; he displayed that wonderful Satire in the sight of all Italy, which being levelled at Popes, Emperors, and Kings, discovers their private Actions with a Liberty that shews he was not afraid of their Power nor of their Indignation. He blackens particularly the Reputation of Pope Boniface VIII, because he had sided with his Persecutors. By his Verses he blemishes the Memory and the Race of Charles de Valois, the chief Instrument of his Exile, saying that Hugh Capet was a Butcher's Son. — Dante expresses also, in that Poem, his Indignation against the City of Florence, comparing it to a Nest of Thieves, and to a prostituted Woman, because they sold all Public Offices, and changed continually their Magistrates, their Coin, and their Customs, to bear the Inconveniences of their Government with less trouble.' Mr Bullart should have added, that he cries down Florence as a City, wherein Women give themselves over to Lewdness. He introduces Foresse (35) wondering, in Purgatory, that his Widow should live chafly in the midst of so many lewd Women. I shall set down his Words according to Grangier's Translation:

A Dieu tant plus est chere, & tant plus agréable
Ma vefve, que beaucoup au monde j'ay aimé,
Que plus seule à bien faire elle est par trop louable.
Pour ce que le pays de Sardaigne estimé Barbare, est bien plus chaste en ce qui est des femmes,
Que là où je la laisse au milieu des infâmes.

O frere

(22) Ostorvalli supreme potestate magistratus
infignem. *Paulus
Jovius* *Elog. cap.
4. pag. m. 19.*

(23) See Spondanus,
*Annal. Eccl.
ad ann.
1301, n. 3, & 4.*
He quotes Villani,
lib. 8, cap. 48.

(24) Volaterr.
ubi supra, pag.
771.

(25) It is Volaterranus's Expression: Etiam Henricum sextum ad Florentinæ
obsequium DUC-ENDO. Id.
ib. It should be septimum and not sexum.

(26) See Pocciantius de Script.
Florent. pag. 4.
See Papyr. Masso.
Tom. II, pag. 29.

(27) Volaterr. ubi
supra.

(28) Id. ib.

(29) Papyr. Masso, ubi supra,
pag. 21.

(30) Pocciantius,
ubi supra, pag.
45, 46. See also
Paul Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 9. I have corrected
the Errors of the Press, that are in the Verses of the Epitaph in Pocciantius.

(31) Pocciantius,
ibid. pag. 46.

(32) Jovius, ubi
supra, pag. 29.

(33) Ibid. pag.
20.

(34) Bullart, ubi
supra, pag. 307.

(35) He was Uncle by the Father's Side to the Civilian Francis Accor-cusatus. Grangier, ubi infra,
pag. 401.

Indignation he conceived against his Country gave a new Vigour to his Imagination and Pen. Some question what is said, that he went to study at Paris when he found himself exiled (k). The most considerable of his Works is the Poem intituled, The Comedy of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. It has been commented upon by some Authors [G], and has furnished Matter of Dispute to several Critics [H]. It contains some things

O frere bon & doux que veux tu que je dye ?
Desjà le temps futur m'est au devant des yeux,
Qui suivra non de loing l'heure qui nous manie.
Lors l'on interdira pour adviser au mieux
En la chaire publique aux Dames Florentines
De monstrier leurs tetins, & leurs molles poitrines (36).

(35) Dante,
Canto 23, of his Purgatory, pag.
m. 196.

The widow'd Chamer, who my Bed did share,
Merits by Virtue Heaven's peculiar Care;
Who chafely lives amidst a wanton Race,
Lewder than Those Sardinia's Coasts embrace.
What shall I say? Hope rises in my Breast,
And to my Sight the future stands confest'd.
I see reform'd the Ladies of the Town,
And Pulpits preach each wanton Fashion down.

(37) Grangier,
Commentaire sur
le Purgatoire de
Dante, pag. 404.

Here follows the Translator's Paraphrase (37). 'The time will speedily come, says he, that the Wrath of God will overflow in such a degree, to the great unhappiness of the Republic of Florence, for the Lewdness and Filthiness of the Florentine Ladies, that, in order to appease his Anger, the Preachers will be obliged to forbid them publicly to appear abroad with their Necks and Breasts uncovered. This is what he means by Nel qual sarà in Pergamo (so he calls the Pulpit of Truth) interdetto A le sfacciate donne Florentine, properly shameless, L'andar mon-strando con le poppe il petto, that is to say, to walk abroad open-breasted to shew their full Breasts, and high Chests.' A French Writer of the XVth Century expressed in a more lively manner this sort of Nakedness, for which he blames the French Women. 'As for our Women, says he (38), they have learned the Fashion of the Soldiers of these times, who make a shew of their gilded and shining Breast-plates when they are mustered; for, going to Mass, or walking abroad to Orchards or Gardens, or other private Places, not fit to be named, they shew their naked Breasts, their Diaphragms, Heart, Lungs, and other pectoral Parts that have a perpetual Motion, which those good Ladies move by Rule and Compass, like a Watch, or rather like a Smith's Bellows that kindles the Fire of a Forge. It is just so with our Ladies, who, with the blowing or respiration of their Lungs, kindle a Fire in the Hearts of the Heliogabalists of our Court, who are already but too much effeminated, and heated in their Lusts. But to inflame them the better or to burn them altogether, our Court Medea's invent all the Arts that Nature could produce for the good of Mankind, and convert them into lascivious, infamous, and base things.' The Abuse was not so great some Years after (39).

(38) Nicolas de Montand, Miroir
des François,
Book I, pag. 17,
28, Edit. 1581.

(39) See, in the Remark [B] of the Article
DEMPSTER, the Scandal of the Parisians.

(40) See among others Flacius Illyricus in Catalogo Testium Veritatis, & Wolfius in the first Volume Lætionum memorabilium & reconditarum, pag. m. 612.

(41) I have seen an Edition of Venice, printed (I think) from that of 1578, in folio, dedicated, the 10th of June, 1578, by Gio. Ant. Rampazzetto, to William of Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua.

(42) And not to the Great Duke Cosmo, as Michael Poccianti de Scriptor. Flor. pag. 169, affirms.

(43) Leand. Albert. in Descript. Ital. pag. 493.

bot of St Bartholomew at Noyon, put them into French Rhime, and commented upon them. His Work was printed at Paris in the Year 1597, in three Volumes in twelves. Mr Baillet (44) will inform you of the Judgment that the Critics have made of those three Poems. He says, that in Castelvetro's Opinion they ought to pass for an Epic Poem, though the Italians call them a Comedy. You must observe, that the Author himself called them so (45). For the rest, those who, in order to prove that he had begun that Work before his Banishment, should tell us that the twenty first Canto of his Hell was composed in the Year 1300, would alledge but a weak Proof; for he played with Dates according to his Fancy. Does he not introduce some Persons, who foretel him what had already happened to him (46): and therefore he carries his Fancy to a Time anterior to that wherein he made his Poem.

[H] And furnished matter of Dispute to several Critics.] Some have censured Dante, and others have writ his Apology. James Mazzoni is accounted one of the most learned of his Apologists. He published two Volumes against one Castrovilla, who had criticized Dante (47). A learned Man of Siena, whose Name was Bellisarius Bulgarini, made some Notes against that Work of Mazzoni, at the Request of Horace Capponi Bishop of Carpentras. Some body stole them from him, and published them under his own Name, with the Title of Brevis atque ingeniosa contra Dantis opus disputatio. He was so plainly convicted of this Theft, that he was obliged to make a Recantation, which he published with a Book wherein he answered Bulgarini's Objections against Dante. A learned Man of Bologna, whose Name was Jerom Zobbius, concerned himself in this Quarrel, and published a Book in the Year 1583, which he intituled, Dantes & Petrarcha ab Hieronymo Zobbio defensi. Bulgarini, taking hold of this opportunity to shew more plainly the Fraud of his Plagiary, put out another Book, wherein he refuted what Capponi had opposed to the four first Parts of his Remarks against Mazzoni. He published two other Books, one against that of Zobbius, and another against the Recantation and Apology of the Plagiary. Here are already four Works of Bulgarini. He published another in Italian, wherein he refuted what Zobbius had writ in Defence of Dante concerning the Poetical Particles. The Title of his sixth Book is, Bellisarii Bulgarini, Aperti, Academici intronati, notæ ad primam Dantis defensi partem Jacobi Mazzoni. Lastly, he printed a Book against a Manuscript that was falsely ascribed to Speron Sperone, wherein Dante's Cause was maintained (48). It is pretended that he came off victorious from this long Combat, and that by the strength of his Reasons he made it appear that Dante's Comedy did not belong to any species of Poem, since it was not conformable to Aristotle's Precepts. 'Ne multis morer, finis fuit ejusmodi, ut Bulgarinus certaminis victor discederet, cum, certissimis validissimisque rationibus, adversariorum copias, pro Dante propugnantes, profligasset, obtinissetque, illius comœdiam veram poematis ejuspiam rationem non habere, quod ab Aristotelis præceptis longissime aberraret (49). — To conclude, the event was this; Bulgarini gained the Victory, having by most certain and convincing Reasons defeated his Antagonist's Forces, and proved that this Comedy was inconsistent with the true nature of any sort of Poetry, being intirely repugnant to the Rules of Aristotle.' Ugurgieri informs us, that Dante's Comedy raised one of the most memorable Wars among the learned and Virtuosi of Italy that ever was seen of that kind (50). He adds, that the Work of Mazzoni added Fuel to that Fire, and that the Piece that was stolen from Bulgarini, and which the Plagiary printed with his own Name to it, was the stumbling-block. Bulgarini reclaimed his own by publishing that Piece, and setting his Name to it. He was refuted by the Plagiary; but he returned to the Charge, and took Advantage of the Confession of the Theft. His Reply was printed at Siena in the Year 1588. I set down the Title of it, that the Name of this Plagiary may be known, who has not yet appeared

(k) See the Remark [K].

(44) At the beginning of the third Part of his Judgements sur les Poëtes.

(45) See the 16th and 21st Canto's of Hell.

(46) See Citation (76), below.

(47) Nicus Erythraeus, Pinac. 2, pag. 68.

(48) Taken from Erythraeus, Pinacoth. 2, pag. 72, 73.

(49) Id. ibid. pag. 73.

(50) Ugurgieri nelle pompe Sane, apud Lorenzo Crassi Istoria de Porti Græci, pag. 85, 86.

(1) See the Remark [1].

things, which those that favour the Popes are not pleased with, and which seem to signify, that Rome is the Seat of Antichrist (1). The Court of Rome was very much displeased with another Book of Dante, and cried him down as an Heretic [1]. I must not in the List of that sort of Thieves. 'Il Bolgarino avvantaggiatosi nella causa per la confessione del furto rispose all' Avverfario con un libro stampato per Luca Bonetti in Siena l'anno 1588 che fu intitolato; Difese in risposta dell' apologia e palinodia di Monsignor Alessandro Cariero Padovano in proposito della Commedia di Dante (51). Lilius Gyraldus speaks of an Augustin Monk, who had been prepossessed in Dante's Favour from his Youth, and who, upon all occasions, confuted those who criticized that Poet. 'Certe in eo (Dante) poetica dispositionem majoremque diligentiam plerisque desiderare video, ejusque lingue nitorem: quos Joannes Stephanus eremita, & amicus charissimus, & municeps noster, qua est eruditione, & quo a teneris erga Danthem fuit studio, mirabiliter solitus est refellere (52). — It is true that many complain of Dante's want of a Poetical Disposition, Care, and Purity of Language; whom John Stephanus, the Hermit, my Fellow Citizen, and most intimate Friend has, out of an early respect for Dante, with great Learning often answered.' I do not find this John Stephanus in the Apparato de gli huomini illustri della Città di Ferrara, published in the Year 1620 by Agostino Surperbi da Ferrara Theologo e Predicatore de Minor Conventuali. Gyraldus adds, that the Olivetan Monks very carefully preserved the Latin Translation, that one of them had made of Dante's Poems into Hexameter Verses: 'Vidi qui Latinam Danthem fecerat carmine hexametro, ex Olivetanis videlicet sodalibus Pistoriensem quandam eorum temporum: quem librum (proh summe optime Deus, quanta custodia aservatum in Olivetano cenobio) ipsi non sine ambigitione mihi, tanquam rem sacram aliquam ostenderant (53). — Amongst the Olivetan Monks, I saw one born at Pistoia who had translated Dante into Hexameter Verse; which Book is kept with as much veneration, as the most sacred Reliques in their Monastery, and which they took no little Pride in shewing me.'

[1] Another Book — made him pass for an Heretic. It is his Book de Monarchia, wherein he maintains, that the Authority of the Emperors ought not to depend on that of the Popes. This is his Heresy: (54) Scriptit præter hæc opusculum de Monarchia, ubi ejus fuit opinio quod imperium ab ecclesia minime dependeret. Cujus rei gratia tanquam hæreticus post ejus exitum damnatus est, cum aliorum, tum Bartoli jurisperiti sententia super lege 1. c. præfules. lib. Digestorum de Inquirendis reis (55). — He wrote, besides these, a small Treatise upon Monarchy, wherein he is of Opinion, that the Temporal Power is independent of the Church; for which he was condemned as an Heretic after his Death by several, and expressly by Bartholus, &c. Spondanus, a French Bishop, appears upon this Occasion altogether Ultramontane; for he mentions this Remark of Volaterranus without adding any Corrective to it: He quotes the first Book of Volaterranus's Antipropologia (56). This Quotation transcribed by Moreri is wrong; for this Antipropologia is not divided into particular Books; it reaches from the thirteenth Book of the Author's Commentaries inclusive, to the twenty fourth exclusive; what is alleged by Spondanus is to be found in the twenty first Book. Spondanus also does the like by citing St Antoninus, who, he says, refuted at large the chiefest Error that is to be found in that Poet's Writings, which is his lessening the Pope's Power over the Temporalities of Kings. 'Quem (Dantem) egregias animi dotes ac scientiæ laudem & præclara scripta, tum aliis erroribus maculasse observavit sanctus Antoninus'; tum eo maxime, quo tertia parte tractatus sui de Monarchia conatus est depræmere auctoritatem Romani Pontificis supra Imperatores seu Reges Romanorum in temporalibus, quem idem Antoninus pluribus confutat (57). — Dante, as St Antoninus observes, disgraced the noble Qualities of his Mind, his great Knowledge and excellent Writings, with many Errors, but more especially in endeavouring, in the third part of his Treatise on Monarchy, to deprave the Authority of the Popes over the Roman Emperors in Temporals. Whom the same Antoninus largely confutes.' A true Disciple of the Sorbonne, and a true Son of the Gallican Church, would not have spoke in that manner. Observe, that this Annalist dares not specify the other Errors that St Antoninus observed in our Poet. Poccianti was not so discreet; for he informs us, that St Antoninus censured Dante, for having forgot the Limbo of little Children, and for having looked upon the voluntary Abdication of Pope Celestinus, as a Meanness of Soul (58). He adds, that in this, and in the Doctrine concerning the Independence of Emperors, that great Poet deserves to be blamed. In his culpandum venit vates iste pergloriosissimus (59). He is so silly as to affirm, that both Divine and Humane Writings shew every where, how much the Opinion of Independency is erroneous; for, says he, as the Moon is enlightened by the Sun, so the Temporal Power is illuminated by the Spiritual Power. I shall set down his Words, lest my Readers should suspect the Truth of what I say. 'Cæterum in tertia parte monarchiæ affirmat Romanos Imperatores nullam dependentiam habere à Papa, sed à solo Deo, nisi in spectantibus ad forum animarum, non autem in rebus temporalibus, quod quam erroneum fit ubique locorum in humanis & divinis literis explicatur, sicut namque luna illuminatur à sole, ita potestas temporalis à spirituali (60). — In the third part of his Monarchy he maintains, that the Roman Emperors have no dependence upon the Pope, but only on God, in temporal things, which how erroneous it is, is every where clearly proved, both in sacred and human Writings; for as the Moon is enlightened by the Sun, so is the Temporal Power by the Spiritual.'

Du Plessis Mornai mentions several Opinions of Dante, that are but little conformable to Popery. (61) He wrote a Treatise intituled de Monarchia, wherein he proves, that the Pope is not above the Emperor, and has no manner of Right over the Empire: which is plainly against the Clementine Pastorali, which asserts both: nay, he goes so far as to say, in his Purgatory,

Di hoggi mai che la Chiesa di Roma
Per confonder in se due reggimenti
Cade nel fango & se bruta & la foma.

Rome, which two Governments crests in one,
Is by her own ambitious Pride undone.

He confutes also the Donation of Constantine, which he maintains to be fictitious and insignificant, if it were true: and therefore he was looked upon by some as an Heretic. He says, That the Decretists, Men that are ignorant of sound Divinity and Philosophy, affirm that the Traditions of the Church are the Foundation of Faith; which is an execrable thing, since it cannot be questioned, that those who before the Traditions of the Church believed in Christ the Son of God, either to come, or already come to suffer for us, and have been fervent in Charity, are his Coheirs in eternal Life. He complains in his Paradise, that the Pope is become a Wolf instead of a Shepherd, and makes the Sheep run afay; that for that Reason the Gospel and the Doctors are laid aside, and the Decretals are only minded; that the Pope and Cardinals are only intent upon that, and go no more with their Thoughts to Nazareth, where the Angel Gabriel opened his Wings, but to the Vatican, and other choice places of Rome, which have been the Burying Ground to St Peter's Followers, whose Doctrine they have buried at Rome; that formerly War was made against the Church with the Sword, but that at present they do it by taking from her the Bread that God gives her, and which he denies nobody, to wit, the preaching of his Word. But thou, says he, speaking to the Pope, who writest only to blot out, or by a Chancellor, think that Peter and Paul, who died for the Lord's Vineyard which thou spoilest, are yet living; but thou knowest neither the one, nor the other. He says in another place, That it is a shameful thing, that the divine Scripture should be altogether laid aside, or wrested; that they do not consider how much Blood was shed to plant it in the World; how pleasant it is to him that reads it with Humility; that, on the contrary, every one

(51) Id. ibid. apud eundem Crafio, pag. 86.

(52) Lilius Gyraldus, Histor. Poetar. dial. 5, sub. fin. pag. m. 308.

(53) Id. ibid.

(54) Raphael Volaterranus, lib. 21, pag. 771.

(55) Moreri's Quotation is wrong; for he quotes Bartoli, lib. 1. de Inquisitionibus, which implies these three Faults; 1. The Reader thinks he is refuted, not to the Civilian Bartolus, but to the Jesuit Bartoli. 2. Moreri should have quoted lege 1. and not libro 1. The third Fault lies in saying inquit, reis instead of inquirere, reis.

(56) Spondanus, ad ann. 1521, n. 7.

* Anton. Tit. 21, cap. 5, §. 2.

(57) Spondanus, ad ann. 1521, n. 7.

(58) Poccianti de Scriptor. Florent. pag. m. 45.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Id. ibid.

(61) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 429, 430.

not forget that this great Poet found some illustrious Patrons in his Misfortune; but he could not always preserve their Affection [K]; for, tho' he was a Man of few Words, yet endeavours to set up his own Inventions, and the Gospel is silent. Vain Questions, and fabulous Stories, echo all the Year round from the Pulpit, and the poor Sheep go away fed with Wind. I might quote several Passages out of this Poet against the Pope's Pardons and Indulgences, and other Abuses of the Romish Church, which he describes in such a manner, as plainly shews that he knew very well the Whore mentioned in the Revelations. † Coiffeteau, answering this Passage (62), observes, 1. That Dante was a Gibelin (63), and full of Relentment for the Mischief the contrary Faction had done him. 2. That Dante acknowledges the Donation and the Cause that is alleged for it, to wit, the healing of Constantine's Leprosy. It is true that he endeavoured to prove in his Book de Monarchia (4), that Constantine could not make it, because it was to dismember the Empire; but a Poet is not a Judge of such a Matter of State. 3. That there is no Harm in what he said about Traditions, provided it be rightly understood. 4. That he only blames the Popes of his Time, whom he treats like his Enemies, and the Persecutors of his Faction. 5. That when he speaks of those Pontiffs, he protests that he reverences their Dignity, tho' he blames their Persons. 6. That he only condemned the Impostors, who preached false Indulgences, or made a sordid Traffic of the true ones. Here are some of Dante's Verses alleged by Coiffeteau as a Proof of his Orthodoxy concerning the Submission that is due to the Pope.

† Dante, del Paradiso, Cant. 9. & 29, & del Purgatorio, Cant. 23.

(62) Coiffeteau, Réponse au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1032, 1033.

(63) The Gibelin were the Faction contrary to the Popes.

‡ Dantes Alig. lib. 3. de Monarch. cap. ult.

(64) Granger translates this ſeſt Verſe thus: Pour les vœux, ô Chrétiens, ſoyez d'un cœur plus grave. The Poet had been ſpeaking of raſſo Vœux.

† Cant. 5. del Paradiſo.

Siate Chriſtiani à movervi più tardi (64),
Non ſiate come penne ad ogni vento,
Et non crediate ch'ogni acqua vi lavi,
Havete il vecchio, el novo teſtamento,
El paſtor de la chieſa, che vi guida:
Queſto vi baſti à voſtro ſalvamento ‡.

*Ye Chriſtians, learn more Conſtancy to know,
Nor turn, like Feathers, with all Winds that blow.
Think not, in every common Stream you may Waſh the infeſtious Stains of Guilt away.
The ſacred Oracles will be your Guide:
The Church her Paſtor offers you beſide.
Theſe to direct a Chriſtian's Steps are given Along the thorny Way, that leads to Heav'n.*

(65) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponse au Myſtere d'Iniquité, a. part. pag. 494 & ſeq.

Rivet answers to this (65), 'That the Author of the little Italian Book intitled, Aviſo piacevole dato à la Bella Italia, had collected the chief Pieces, out of which Bellarmin furniſhed Coiffeteau with Arguments; ſo that the Reader, who enters upon the Examination of thoſe things, muſt compare the Animadverſions of the learned Junius with Bellarmin, wherein he will find ſome ſolid Confirmations againſt all thoſe Illuſions and Shifts, and will clearly ſee, that That Man ſaw Antichriſt in a Seat reſpected by him, whoſe Profanation he deplored; in ſhort, the Man of Sin whom he deteſted, in the Temple of God which he revered.' Rivet exhorts his Adverſaries to take notice of theſe Verſes of Dante:

Di voi Paſtor ſ'accorſe l'Uvangelifta
Quando colei che ſiede ſopra l'acque
Puttaneggiar co' i Regi à lui vi viſta
Quella che con le ſette teſte nacque
Et da le dieci corna hebbe argomento
Fin che virtute al ſuo marito piacque *.

*To you, O Pope, St John apply'd his Words,
When he beheld the Harlot on the Floods,
Who, with ſeven heads; and ten horns from her birth, Whores with the Kings and Monarchs of the Earth.*

* Cant. 19. del Inferno.

(66) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 495.

'There certainly, continues that Miniſter (66), he acknowledges, that St John ſpoke of the Pope in the ſeventeenth of the Revelations, under the name of the Whore ſeated on the Waters, and of the Beaſt with ſeven Heads and ten Horns, notwithstanding what he ſays of the Seat and Power of the Keys. No body denies that thoſe things conſidered in themſelves are very recommendable in all Churches: but if they are ulurped by a Tyrant, there is no reaſon why he ſhould not be deſcribed ſuch as he is. . . . As for Constantine's Donation, any one that minds it will find, that he mentions the common Opinion that was received in his Time (67), by way of Confeſſion, and not as believing it; for he never gave Credit to ſuch an Abſurdity. As for the ſix Verſes quoted by Coiffeteau, they are thus tranſlated by his Antagoniſt: 'Chriſtians, be more ſlow to move; be not driven like a Feather with every Wind, and do not believe that any Water will cleanſe you: you have the Old and New Teſtament, the Paſtor of the Church that guides you; this is ſufficient for your Salvation.' After which Rivet ſpeaks thus: 'Would Coiffeteau willingly adviſe all Chriſtians to take the Old and the New Teſtament to ſettle their Faith? He will take care not to do it. But he is not aſhamed to ſay, that the Pope is the Paſtor that is ſufficient for Salvation: He could willingly wiſh that Dante had uttered the ſame Blaſphemy; but doubtleſs he meant the true Saviour, who guides us with the Old and the New Teſtament.' We have here a remarkable Inſtance of the Illuſions into which we may fall, when we ſtick to the ſtrict Senſe that the Expreſſions of a Man offer to our Mind. They who read theſe ſix Verſes of Dante, and take them in ſenſu obvio quem ipſamet propoſitionum verba præ ſe ferunt (68), and underſtand them, I ſay, in ſuch a manner as Innocent XII will have the five Propoſitions of Janeſenius to be underſtood, believe that this Poet meant, that, in order to be ſaved, we need only conform ourſelves to the Old and New Teſtament, and follow the way that the Pope, as Paſtor of the Church, ſhews us. But perhaps this is not Dante's true Meaning, and his Words are to be underſtood as Rivet explains them. Let us learn from hence, that an Author, who has a mind to expreſs himſelf in ſuch a manner, that what he ſays may not be differently conſtrued in future Ages, deſires a thing that is almoſt impoſſible. If a Man could foreſee the Controverſies that will ariſe three or four hundred Years hence, he would expreſs himſelf more exactly: but I cannot tell whether Languages would ſupply as many Words as would be neceſſary to prevent Equivocations and Cavils.

Take notice of one thing, which is, that Dante affords ſome Proofs to thoſe who ſay that he was a good Catholic, and to thoſe who ſay he was not. The Author of the Aviſo à la bella Italia has collected the latter; Bellarmin has collected the former, and beſides, he has eluded all the Paſſages of that Aviſo as well as he could. Gretſer refers us to that Cardinal; and it is almoſt all the Answer that he makes to the Paſſage of Du Pleſſis: 'In Dante, ſays he (69), luculentiffima teſtimonia pro Pontificis Romani auctoritate, proque omnibus illis capitibus, quæ Pleſſæus & Illyricus attingunt, inveniantur. Quæ de re operæ pretium erit legere Bellarminum in libello proprio contra Italum quendam calumniatorem, qui ex Dante potiſſimum, Romani Pontificis majeltatem labefactare nitebatur: Ad omnia enim profani hominis objecta reſpondit illuſtriſſimus Bellarminus: & cap. 19. plurima loca ex Dante producit, quæ cum Pleſſæi & Illyrici delirationibus non magis conſonant, quàm dies cum nocte, æther cum Tartaro.—In Dante, ſays he, we meet with very clear Proofs for the Pope's Authority, and all thoſe Points which Du Pleſſis and Illyricus handle. Wherefore it would be worth while to read Bellarmin's Answer to a certain Italian Libeller, who endeavoured, chiefly from Dante, to weaken the Pope's Power. The Great Bellarmin answers all his Objections, and in the 19th chapter quotes many Paſſages from Dante, which have no more reſemblance to the wild Imaginations of Du Pleſſis or Illyricus, than Day has to Night, or Heaven to Hell.'

[K] He found illuſtrious Patrons in his Miſfortunes, but he could not always preſerve their Affection.] I find ſome Confuſion in the Accounts that concern his Travels after his Banishment. Some Authors ſay, that, being baniſhed, he earneſtly deſired to improve his Learning, and that he went firſt of all to Bologna to apply himſelf to the moſt ſublime Sciences, and

(67) See Cant. 19. of Hell, pag. 236.

(68) Theſe Words are taken from a Brief of Innocent XII to the Biſhops of the Low Countries, dated the 6th of Feb. 1624.

(69) Gretſerus, Exam. Myſterii Pleſſæiani, pag. 493.

yet on some Occasions he gave his Tongue a little too much Liberty (m). He left some Children and afterwards to Paris. 'Exulem ubi se vidit, tum verò magis incensus est studio liberalium Artium, ac Bononiæ primùm dedit operam gravioribus scientiis, indeque Lutetiam Parisiorum profectus est.' This is what Papirius Masso tells us (70). Mr Bullart will have it, that he went from Bologna to Paris, to learn Philosophy and the Principles of Divinity (71). Naudé says (72), that Boccace has left us in writing, that Dante, being expelled from Florence by the Violence of the black and white Faction (73), went to Paris, and frequented the University very much: 'ubi sæpissimè adversus quoscunque circa quamcumque facultatem volentes responsionibus aut positionibus objicere disputans intravit Gymnasium: and in the tenth Canto of his Paradise, he himself expresses a great Esteem for one Seguier, an excellent Philosopher and Dialectician, who read in his time in the great Schools of the Rue aux Fournes, whose Doctrine was not, as he says, without envy.

(70) Papir. Mass. ubi supra, pag. 28.

(71) Bullart, ubi supra, pag. 307.

(72) Naudé, Addit. à l'Histoire de Louis XI, pag. 275, 276.

(73) He was only expelled by the Faction of the Blacks.

* Lib 15, Coenolog. cap. 6.

Questi, ond' à me ritorna il tuo riguardo
E' il lume d'uno spirto che'n pensieri
Gravi à morir, gli parv' esser tardo.
Essa è la luce eterna di Siggieri
Che leggendo nel vico de li strami
Sillogizzo invidiosi veri.

He on the left, where now you turn your Eyes,
Is the Great Siggieri, learn'd and wise,
Who, sick of Life and the World's empty Show,
Cbid tardy Death, and thought he mov'd too slow.
In Lectures, he deliver'd from the Chair
Such wond'rous Truths, as Envy pin'd to hear.

To know whether the Words of Boccace prove invincibly that our Poet studied at Paris after his Exile, it is necessary to consider what goes before. Boccace had been saying, 'Fuit inter cives suos egregia nobilitate verendus: & quantumcumque tenues essent illi substantie, & à cura familiari, & postremo à longo exilio angertur, semper tamen Physicis atque Theologicis imbutus vacavit studiis, & adhuc Julia fatetur Parisiis, in eadem sæpissime adversus quoscunque, &c.' (74). — He was of the first rank in his City, and though his Circumstances were very narrow, and he was oppressed with the care of a Family, and at last with a long Banishment, yet he always set apart time for his Physical and Theological Studies, and disputed very often at Paris, as appears, &c. It is plain, that, according to this Passage, Dante in his Exile used to dispute stoutly in the Colleges of Paris. Nevertheless, I know some Persons, who fancy that Boccace is mistaken in the time: they cannot believe that Dante, who had been one of the chief Governors of the Florentines, and who was extremely desirous to re-establish his Faction, should have trifled away his time in wrangling in several Colleges, being above thirty five Years of age (75), and therefore they are of Opinion that he did not dispute in the Schools of Paris, but when he was a young Scholar, and before his being promoted to the Council of Eight. They say that he was a Scholar of Brunettus at Paris, who died before Dante was banished. They prove it by the Tenth Canto of Hell (76). It is certain that we find there, that our Dante had been a Scholar of the late Brunetto Latinus.

(74) Boccacius de Geneal. Decorum, lib. 15, cap. 6, apud Papir. Masson. ubi supra, pag. 213.

(75) According to Buonanni, who places his Birth in the Year 1260, he must have been above 41 Years of Age. See his Discourse upon Canto 21, of the Inferno, pag. 237.

(76) Dante supposes that he found him in Hell; now he supposes that he travelled into Hell in the Year 1300, and he was not banished before the Year 1301.

(77) Dante, Canto 15, del Inferno, pag. m. 216.

Se fosse tutto pieno il mio dimando
Rispos' io lui, voi non fareste anchora
Dell' humana natura posto in bando,
Che'n la mente m'è fitta, & hor m'accorra
La cara buona imagine paterna
Di voi, quando nel mondo ad ora ad ora
Mi mostravate, come l'huom s'eterna,
Et quant'io l'abbia a grato mentr'io vivo
Convien, che nella mia lingua si scerna (77).

O! had the Gods in pity (I reply'd)
Heard Dante's ardent Wife, you had not dy'd:
The World had still enjoy'd it's Wonder, and it's Pride.
Paternal Likeness I beheld in you,
And all your Father rises to my view.

Fixt in my Mem'ry lives your pious Care,
Which taught me first immortal Fame to share:
His Gratitude let Dante's Pen declare.

But we do not find there, in what City he had him for his Master. However it be, I shall set down Grangier's Note on these Words of Dante, Siete voi qui ser Brunetto. 'Brunetto Latinus was a Notary or Secretary of Florence, very much esteemed and versed in his Art, but a Man of a bad Conscience. Being accused of several Impostures, he went to live at Paris; where, reading public Lectures of Physics, he became Dante's Master, and, as a Mathematician, or Astrologer, he foretold him that he should be one of the most learned Men of his time. Our Poet feigns that he found him damned in that Place with the Sodomy, for the Crime of Sodomy (78). Add to this, that Dante supposes (79) that the Professor Seguier was dead. It is therefore likely that he heard and knew him before the time, wherein he feigns to have been led into Paradise. Now this was before his Banishment. Lastly, it may be observed, that many Authors, who speak of what he did after his Misfortune, do only say that he went to seek retreat among some Princes of Italy.

According to Volaterranus (80), he went first with those of his Faction to Martel de Malespina; he went afterwards to Can della Scala at Verona; and at last to Guy Polentan at Ravenna, four Years after his Banishment. Order and Time have not been well observed in this Account. We have it from Dante himself, that he went first of all to a Lord della Scala at Verona (81):

Il primo tuo rifuggio, e'l primo hostello
Sara la cortesia del gran Lombardo,
Che'n su la scala porta il santo uccello:
Ch'aura in te sì benigno riguardo;
Che del far & del chieder tra voi due
Fia prima quel, che tra gli altri è più tardo (82).

For Refuge to the Lombard King repair, Whose Arms an Eagle on a Ladder are.
This Prince shall first your wand'ring Steps receive,
And Favour, faster, than you ask them, give.

and that he had been banished near six Years (83) when he fled to the Marquis de Malespina. Freberus says, that he retired first to Paris, and that he went from thence to the King of Aragon, who had invited him, and loaded him with Favours; and that he was afterwards invited by Can della Scala who took Delight in the Conversation of learned Men, and gave him several Marks of his Liberality (84). This Account is not better than that of Volaterranus. I confess that Boccace observes, that Dante was very well beloved by Frederic of Aragon King of Sicily (85).

To make an end of my Commentary, I must farther say, that Dante had not the good Fortune to please his Patron at Verona. The Great Can della Scala gave him to understand, that he was weary of him, and told him one Day, It is a wonderful thing that such a one, who is a Fool, should please us all, and make himself beloved by every body, which you, that are accounted a wife Man, cannot do. This is not to be wondered at, answered Dante; you would not admire such a thing, if you knew how much the Conformity of Characters is the source of Friendship. Every body sees that this Answer was too shocking not to put the Prince of Verona quite out of Conceit with our Poet. You may see this more at large in the following Passage. 'Dantes Aligherius, (they are) Petrarch's Words (86), & ipse concivis nuper meus, vir vulgari eloquio clarissimus fuit, sed moribus parum per contumaciam, & oratione liberior quàm delicatis ac studiosis ætatis nostræ principum auribus atque oculis acceptum foret. Is igitur exul patria, cum apud Canem magnum, commune tunc afflictorum solamen ac profugium, versaretur, primo quidem in honore habitus, deinde pedetentim retrocedere cœperat, minisque in dies domino placere. Erant in eodem convictu histriones ac nebulones omnis generis, ut mos est, quorum unus procacissimus obscenis verbis ac gestibus, multum

(m) Erat morosissimus & Philosophorum infans, ut qui tristitiam præ se ferre videretur, nec facile loqui & brevissime conceptiones animi exprimere solebat. Papir. Masso, Elég. Tom. II, pag. 28.

(78) Grangier upon Canto 15 of the Inferno, pag. 166, 167.

(79) In Canto 10, of the Paradiso, pag. m. 230.

(80) Volaterranus ubi supra, pag. 771.

(81) Grangier, upon this Place of Dante, calls him Albuis, and says he was the elder Brother to Can the Great.

(82) Dante on Canto 17 of his Paradiso, pag. m. 445.

(83) See Dante, Canto 8 of his Purgatory, pag. 138.

(84) Paulus Freher. in Theatro, pag. 142. He quotes the 50 Lives of Boissard.

(85) Boccac. Geneal. Decorum, lib. 15, cap. 11, apud Papir. Masson, ubi supra, pag. 214.

(86) Petrarcha Rerum memorandarum, lib. 42, apud Papir. Masson, ubi supra, pag. 22, 23.

(n) See the Remark [B].

Children (n). A remarkable thing is related concerning his Application in reading [L].

‘apud omnes loci ac gratie tenebat. Quod molestè ferre Dantem suspicatus Canis, producto illo in medium, & magnis laudibus concelebrato, versus in Dantem: Miror, inquit, quid causæ subit, cur hic cum sit demens, nobis tamen omnibus placere novit, & ab omnibus diligitur, quod tu qui sapiens diceris non potes? Ille autem: Minime, inquit, mirareris, si nosset quod morum paritas & similitudo animorum amicitiae causa est. — Dante Alighieri, lately my Fellow Citizen, was a Man famed for his Eloquence, but in Morals and Conversation too free for the delicate Eyes and Ears of the Princes of our Age. Being banished his Country, and having retired to the Grand Can, the common Sanctuary and Support of the unfortunate, he was at first in great Esteem, but he declined by Degrees in his Favour, and began to be daily less acceptable to his Patron. There were in the same Society, Strollers, and Cheats of all Degrees, as is customary, one of whom, distinguished for his Ribaldry and Obscenity, was much caressed by the rest; which Can suspecting Dante not to be pleased with, ordered that Man to come near him, and having bigly extolled him, turned to Dante, and said, I wonder that this Man, who is mad, should have found out the secret

‘to please us all, and make himself beloved, which you who pass for a Man of Sense have not hit upon; whereupon Dante replied, You would cease to wonder at the cause, if you considered how much Friendship depends upon a Conformity of Manners, and Parity of Inclinations.’

[L] A remarkable thing is related concerning his Application in reading. He went one Day to a Book-seller, whose Shop looked into the great Place of the City: His Design was to see some public Games that were to be celebrated there; but having met with a Book that he had a mind to consult, he applied himself so earnestly to the reading of it, that, as he was going home, he protested and swore that he had neither heard nor seen any thing of what had been done and said in the Celebration of the Games. ‘Dantem Florentinum ferunt ad spectacula ductum apud bibliopolum, quod ex ejus taberna in forum prospectus esset, confestim, librumque, cujus fuisset cupidus, invenisse; quem tam avidè attenteque legerit, ut domum rediens juramento tellatus sit, nihil se vidisse aut audisse ex iis, quæ in foro dicta factaque essent, quemadmodum de eo scribit Æneas Sylvius (87).’

(87) Philoppos Carolus, Animad. in Aul. Gellium pag. 592.

DANTE (PETER VINCENT), a Native of Perugia, and of the Family of the Rainaldi, was a Man of a great deal of Wit. He understood polite Learning, Mathematics, and Architecture; and composed such fine Verses in Imitation of Dante, that it was thought he revived, in some manner, the Sublimity of that great Genius. They gave him the Surname of Dante; which so pleased his Family, that his Descendants left the Name of Rainaldi, and took that of Dante. Our Peter Vincent invented some Machines that were admired by the best Judges, and composed a Commentary, in Italian, on the Sphere of John de Sacrobosco (a). He died very old in the Year 1512, and left a Son and a Daughter (b) [A], of whom I shall speak in the Remark.

(a) It was printed at Perugia in 1554, and reprinted there in 1574, enlarged with Notes, and with a Letter of the Author to Alpiamus, his Tutor. Oldoini, ubi infra.

(b) Taken from the Athenæum Augustum of Augustin Oldoini, pag. 198, 233.

[A] He left a Son and a Daughter, of whom I shall speak. JULIUS DANTE, his Son, was well versed in Architecture and Mathematics: He wrote a Book de Alluvione Tiberis, and some Notes in ornaments Architecture. He died in the Year 1575. I shall make a separate Article for his Son Ignatius Dante; wherein I shall speak of Vincent Dante, who was also his Son. Theodora DANTE, his Sister, being retired into the Country in the Year 1497, to avoid the Plague where-with the City of Perugia was afflicted, was so well instructed by her Father in the Mathematics, that she deserved an honourable Rank among the most famous Mathematicians of the time. She composed some Books on that Science, and taught it to her Nephew Ignatius with great Success (1). The Abbot de la Rogue was in the wrong to say that she flourished towards the End of the XVIth Century. See his Journal des Sçavans of the twelfth of December 1678, pag. 460, Dutch Edition.

(1) Taken from the Athenæum Augustum of Augustin Oldoini, pag. 198, 313, 314.

DANTE (IGNATIUS), Grandson of the preceding, born at Perugia, was a Jacobin Monk. He was well versed in Philosophy and Divinity, and much more in the Mathematics. Being invited to Florence, by the Great Duke Cosmo I, he explained to him the Sphere, and Ptolomy's Books. He read public Lectures on the same Subject, and had many Hearers, when he explained Geography and Cosmography in the University of Bologna. Being returned to Perugia, he made a fine Map of that City, and of all its Territory. The Reputation of his Learning moved Gregory XIII to invite him to Rome: he gave him a Commission to make Geographical Maps and Plans. Which he performed so well, that this Pontif thought himself obliged to make him a Bishop. He gave him the Bishopric of Alatri near Rome. That new Prelate did not fail to reside in it; but Sixtus V, who succeeded Gregory XIII, would have him with him, and ordered him to return to Rome. Dante was preparing himself for that Journey, when Death made him take a longer one, on the nineteenth of October, 1586 (a). He wrote some Books [A]. I shall speak of his Brother in a Remark [B].

(a) Taken from Oldoini, ubi supra, pag. 161, 162.

[A] He wrote some Books. In the Year 1569 he published at Florence a Treatise of the Construction and Use of the Astrolabe. He also wrote some Notes on the Sphere of Sacrobosco, on the Astrolabe, and the universal Planisphere. He made a Sphere of the World in five Tables. Add to this his Optics of Euclid, and of Heliandorus Larissæus, and his Commentary on the two Rules of James Barrozzii. These two last Works are in Italian (1). Vossius did not know that Author. We only find, in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, the Commentario alle regole della prospettiva di Jac. Barrozzii, printed at Rome in the Year 1583.

[B] I shall speak of his Brother in a Remark. I mean Vincent DANTE the Son of Julius, and Grandson of Peter Vincent, and Nephew of the learned Theodora. He applied himself to the Studies of their Family, in which he did very well succeed; for he was a good Architect, and a good Mathematician. He was, besides, an excellent Sculptor and Painter. He made a Statue of Julius III at Perugia. Philip II, King of Spain, would have made use of him to finish the Escorial, and offered him great Pensions; but Dante wanted Health to undertake that Journey. He continued in the Place of his Birth (2), where he applied himself to Poetry and the Mathematics. He composed several Works, and, among others, the Lives of those who excelled in the Design of Statues. Monumenta plura reliquit, inter quæ connumerantur Vitæ Italico idiomate cælatorum statuarum illustrium (3). He died at Perugia in the Year 1576, at the Age of Forty six Years (4).

(2) That is, at Perugia.

(3) Oldoini, ubi supra, pag. 329.

(4) Taken from Oldoini, ibid.

DANTE (JOHN BAPTIST), born at Perugia, was an excellent Mathematician. One of his most subtil Inventions was, to make Wings so exactly proportioned to the Weight of his Body, that he made use of them to fly. He made several times an Experiment of it [A] on the Lake Thrasimenus, with so good a Success, that he resolved to give that Diversion to the whole Town of Perugia. The Time he made choice of, was the Solemnity of the Marriage of Barbolomeu d' Alviana with the Sister of John Paul Ballioni. When the Crowd of the Spectators was assembled in the Great Place, on a sudden our Dante, soaring up from the highest Place of the City, appeared covered all over with Feathers, and fluttering with two large Wings, in the middle of the Air. He directed his Flight over the Place, and struck the People with Admiration. But it fell out unluckily, that the Iron, wherewith he directed one of his Wings, broke; and being no longer able to ballance the Weight of his Body, he fell on our Lady's Church, and broke one of his Thighs. It was set again by the Chirurgeons. He was afterwards invited to teach Mathematics at Venice. He died of Sickness before the Age of forty Years (a). It is needless to say why he was surnamed Dædalus. I do not question that he was related to the other Dantes of Perugia, whom I have mentioned; and I am surprized that Oldoini, who supplies me with this Article, says nothing either of the Family, or of the Age (b) that this Dædalus lived in.

(a) Taken from Oldoini, Athenæum August. pag. 168, 169.

(b) It appears from the Circumstance of the Marriage of Barbolomeu d' Alviana, that he flourished towards the end of the XVth Century.

[A] He made Wings so exactly proportioned to the Weight of his Body, that he could fly with them. He made several times an Experiment of it. I fancy that several of my Readers will not believe it; and yet it is said that such a thing has been practised in other places. See the last Journal des Savans of the Year 1678.

(a) He was Governor of Perfia, Herod. lib. 3, cap. 70.

(b) Herod. ibid. cap. 78.

DARIUS, the first of the Name, King of Perfia, was the Son of Hystaspes (a). He was one of the seven Lords, who put an end to the Tyranny of the Magi; and it was he who killed the pretended Smerdis (b) [A]. Not to repeat what may be found in Moreri's Dictionary, I shall only say, that the Epitaph of that King of Perfia contained a very remarkable Singularity [B]. Darius had more Wives than Moreri gives him [C]. That Author has reckoned very ill this Prince's Expeditions [D].

[A] It was he who killed the pretended Smerdis. I do not apprehend what Moreri tells us, that the Design, which the seven great Lords formed to dethrone Smerdis, was happily performed by Cambyfes, who died a little while after. For, I. It was not Smerdis who usurped the Crown. Smerdis the Son of Cyrus had been put to Death by the Order of his Brother Cambyfes. The Usurper was a Magus, who gave himself out for Smerdis the Son of Cyrus. II. The same Lords, who formed the Design of dethroning that Usurper, were those who put it in execution: and therefore all the Honour of that execution should not have been given to one Cambyfes. This is the less pardonable in Moreri, because he has not told us whether his pretended Cambyfes was one of those Lords. III. There was no Cambyfes concerned either in the Design of driving away the Magi, or in the Execution of that Enterprize. IV. Lastly, None of those who executed it died very soon after, and before they proceeded to the Election of a new Monarch.

[B] The Epitaph of that King of Perfia contained a remarkable Singularity. Darius boasts in his Epitaph of having been a great Drinker, Titulo res digna sepulchri.

A Title for a Tomb-Stone fit.

Ἡδυνάμην καὶ οἶνον πίνειν πολλὸν, καὶ τῶτον φέρειν καλῶς (1). I could drink a great deal of Wine, and bear it well. It cannot be denied but that, physically speaking, it is a good Quality that Darius boasted of; for in short it is Strength, it is Power, it is the effect of a strong Constitution: but, besides, that it is a Quality most commonly attended with a moral Irregularity, I do not see why we should more value the Faculty of Drinking much, than that of Eating much. Now it is certain, that we have I know not what natural Aversion for great Eaters. Demothenes was in the right, to tell those who praised Philip King of Macedonia as a great Drinker (2), that it was not a Royal Quality, but the Property of a Sponge (3). But as every Nation has it's particular Taste, that of the Perfians was to esteem those who could bear a great deal of Wine. Cyrus the younger boasted of it, as of a thing that made him more worthy of the Scepter than his elder Brother (4).

(a) Νῆδ' ὅλα σωματικὰ ἰκανότατον, strennum profecto compositorem. Plat. in Demoib. pag. 853.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Citat. (29) of the Article CYRUS.

[C] Darius had more Wives than Moreri gives him. Moreri says, 'that, according to Herodotus, he had two Wives, Atossa and Artystona:' but if he had looked into Herodotus, he would have found there, that Darius had three or four other Wives besides those two. That Prince's first Wife was the Daughter of Gobryas: he married her before he ascended the Throne, and had three Sons by her, whereof Artabazanes, the eldest, was excluded from the Succession in favour of Xerxes, who was the eldest by the second Wife. The Mother of Xerxes being the Daughter of Cyrus, and he being born after his Father reigned, he was preferred before Artabazanes, whose Mother was no Princess, and who was born before Darius reigned. This is what is found in the First Chapters of the seventh Book of Herodotus: and here are already two of Darius's Wives, the Daughter of Gobryas, whose Name I know not, and Atossa the Daughter of Cyrus, and the Mother of Xerxes. This Daughter of Cyrus had already been the Wife of his Brother Cambyfes (5), and afterwards of the Magus, who usurped the Crown under the false Name of Smerdis. She had a Sister still unmarried, whose Name was Artystona, whom Darius likewise married (6). Moreover, he married the Princess Parmys, Daughter of Smerdis Son of Cyrus, and Phædima the Daughter of Otanes, one of the seven Lords who destroyed the pretended Smerdis (7). This Phædima had belonged to Cambyfes, and was part of the Succession which the pretended Smerdis usurped; for he did not forget to take all the Wives of Cambyfes. This Woman, by her Father's Advice, lying with that Usurper, discovered that he had no Ears; which plainly shewed the Imposture (8). Darius took also Pbrataguna to Wife: she was the only Daughter and sole Heiress of Atarner, who was Darius's Brother (9). Here then are fairly six of that Monarch's Wives mentioned by Herodotus. It is said that he had a seventh Wife, whose Name was Pantapla, and who had belonged to the pretended Smerdis (10).

(1) Herodot. lib. 3, cap. 33.

(5) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Id. ibid. cap. 68, 69.

(9) Id. lib. 7, cap. 224.

(10) Hieronymus in cap. 11 Danielis, apud Christianum Mathematicum in Theatro quatuor Monarchiar. pag. m. 207.

[D] Moreri has reckoned this Prince's Expeditions very ill. What I am to say now against Moreri, is not grounded on what he says, that Darius made considerable Expeditions, but on his mentioning only three, viz. those of Samos, Babylon, and Scythia, though he had spoken of five. Those who will find out the other two, will be obliged to reckon that for the fourth, which is but a Branch or Consequence of the third, and to add to it the Campaign of Marathon. After which, they must take the Punishment of the revolted Egyptians for the fifth. Thus by guessing at Moreri's Meaning, notwithstanding the Confusion of his Narrative, one may find the promised Number, I mean, the five Expeditions; but at the same time Moreri will appear guilty of several Blunders. These are his words:

* Darius

(11) This Word cannot relate to any thing that goes before.

(12) So a Body of Eighty thousand Men may be called, with respect to the whole Army of Darius.

* Darius, returning from Scythia, left his General Megabazus, with Eighty thousand Men, to conquer Europe. It (11) is memorable for the Defeat of the Persians in the Battle of Marathon — his Army, composed of above Five hundred thousand Men, was defeated by Twelve thousand Athenians. If Megabazus was left in Europe with a Detachment (12) of Darius's Army, it is but a Consequence of the Expedition of Scythia. To reduce the Exploits of Megabazus and the Battle of Marathon to a single Expedition, is to confound things prodigiously. There is an Interval of twenty Years between the Expedition of Scythia and the Battle of Marathon: in which Interval Authors commonly place the fourth Expedition of Darius (13), which is the War of Ionia (14), during which the Athenians assisted the Rebel Aristagoras, and helped him to burn the City of Sardis. And it was to be revenged of that Affront, that Darius sent a formidable Army into Greece, that was defeated in the Plain of Marathon. This is reckoned Darius's fifth Expedition. As for what concerns the Revolt of the Egyptians, he died as he was making Preparations to punish it (15). He did not therefore employ any Troops against them, as Moreri affirms.

(13) See Christia and Matthie Theatrum, pag. m. 205.

(14) Moreri says nothing of it.

(15) Herodot. lib. 7, cap. 4.

DASSOUCI, or D'ASSOUCI (CHARLES COYPEAU, Sieur) a Musician, and a French Poet, in the XVIIth Century. He himself published his Adventures, which are very odd, in a kind of buffoon Stile. He says that he was born at Paris (a); that his Father Gregory Coypeau Sieur d'Assouci, Advocate in the Parliament (b), the Son of a Cremonese Cavalier, called d'Agnanis, an excellent Maker of Violins (c), was of Burgundy (d); that his Mother was of Lorrain (e), a very little Woman, and very cholerick, and that she and her Husband could not agree [A], so that, having divided their Children and their Effects, they parted by mutual Consent (f); that he lived with his Father in Paris, and that he was so ill used by the Maid-Servant, that it made him play many wild Pranks (g); and that at nine Years of Age (h) he took his Flight as far as Calais (i), where he made the People believe that he understood Astrology, and that he was the Son of that Great and Famous Navitv-Calculator (k) called Cæsar (l); that having by a little cunning Trick cured an imaginary sick Person, he passed for a famous Magician (m), though he was yet but nine Years of Age; that those, who received him into their Houses, having had a Hint that the foolish Mobb would throw him into the Sea — sent him privately out of Calais (n). I have not found the Sequel of his Adventures 'till the time

(a) D'Assouci, in the 2d Tome of his Adventures, pag. 55.

(b) Ib. pag. 57.

(c) Ib. pag. 56.

(d) Ib. pag. 54.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ib. pag. 62.

(g) Ib. pag. 64.

(h) Ib. pag. 69.

(i) Ib. pag. 68.

(k) Ib. pag. 73.

(l) See the Article RUGGERI, Remark [E], at the beginning.

(m) D'Assouci, ib. pag. 89.

(n) Ib. pag. 90.

[A] His Mother was — a very little Woman, and very cholerick, and that she and her Husband could not well agree. Here is an Instance of the Irregularity of those Authors, who set up for Jestlers and Burlesque Writers. They find themselves obliged to divert the Public at their own Cost, and to play the Buffoons against themselves, and to the Prejudice of those whom they ought most to spare. See here how our D'Assouci speaks of his Mother: 'She was a little bit of an Amazon, hasty and passionate, who, to make up her want of Stature, wore such high Pattins, that if they had been split, and the Cork taken out, it would have made good School Billets; so that whenever she put them off, she lost just one half of her illustrious Person: upon which account my Father, who was none of the most witty Men, used to say, that my Mother was so little that she lost herself in Bed; and not finding her between the Sheets, he complained that she had no Body, and that she was all Spirit. But, on the other side, she sung like an Angel, and played admirably well on the Lute; she was endowed with such a wonderful Spirit of Contradiction, and with such an imperious Humour, that not having agreed with my Father, the Advocate, about any thing, for the Space of Forty Years, he durst scarce open his Mouth any more for fear of exposing himself. And though I was yet very young, I remember, that my Father speaking one day of the Laws, and my Mother having also a Mind to speak of them, they had such a furious Dispute about a Passage of Justinian, that both took Sword in hand, and fought a Duel for the Explication of the Law, Frater à fratre (1). A little lower, he makes no difficulty to say, that his Father had made a Concubine of his Maid. 'Being exposed to the Caprices of a Servant-Maid, I began to taste the Sourness of Life before I had tasted the Sweets of it: for that Servant, or rather that Mistress, who took such Freedoms with my Father, which are rather to be imagined than expressed, hated me as much as I hated her, and so we were at Daggers drawing every Hour of the day (2).'

(1) D'Assouci, Tom. II, of his Adventures, pag. 58, & seq.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 62, 63.

Doubtless a Man of his Humour had read Father Garasse's Works; and I imagine that he took from thence what he relates concerning his Mother's Pattins. For here is a Passage of the Doctrina Curieuse of that Jesuit. 'St Vincent Ferrier relates in one of his Sermons, that a Man of Honour in his time having married a Woman by Proxy, whom perhaps he had never seen, but only her Picture, and who seemed to be of a good size, found himself much deceived when he saw her in his Chamber without Pattins; for she was shorter by half; which frightened him so much, that he spoke these Words to her somewhat angrily, Ubi posuisti reliquum personæ tuæ? — Where have you left the remaining part of your Person? She had left off her Pattins, that made her appear twice as tall as she really was (3). If D'Assouci had read Brantome's Memoirs, it is likely he would have added to what he says of his Mother's Pattins, some Allusion to Hercules's Club, had it only been to conceal his Theft. Read this Passage: 'I remember, that once a Lady of the Court, very handsome and very tall, looking upon a fine and magnificent Hunting-Piece of Tapestry, wherein Diana, and all her Retinue of Hunting-Virgins, were very naturally represented, and being all dressed shewed their handsome Feet and Legs, had one of her Friends with her, a Woman of a very low and small Stature, who was also looking upon those Hangings, to whom she said, Ha, little one! if we were all dressed in that manner, you would be a great Loser by it; for your large Pattins would discover you, and you would not have so good a Grace in walking, and shewing your Legs, as we that are tall; and therefore you would be forced to hide yourself, and appear but seldom abroad: So that you are obliged to the Times, and to the long Cloaths we wear, which cover your Legs so dexterously, that, together with your Pattins, a Foot high, they look rather like Clubs than Legs; for if one had nothing to fight with, it is but cutting off one of your Legs, and taking it by the upper end, and with your Foot, armed with your large Pattin, one might do Wonders (4). Julius Caesar Scaliger observes, that the Women of Italy wore very high Pattins; and that his Father used to say, that the Men who had such Wives found but half of them in Bed, the other half remaining in their Pattins. Soccus humilis est. Italas mulieres altissimis usas vidimus, quavis diminutiva voce dicant Socculos. Patris mei perfactum dictum memini, ejusmodi uxorum dimidio tantum in lectis frui maritos, altero dimidio in focis deposito (5). One of those Husbands made a pleasant Complaint, that he had married a Wife divided into two parts, half Wood and half Flesh (6). Scioppius thinks to have found in Juvenal, that the two parts of that Division were not equal in some Women, and that the humane Body ought to be considered only as an Appendix. The Words of Juvenal run thus, in the printed Editions:

(3) Garasse, Doctrina Curieuse, pag. 323.

(4) Brantome, Dames galantes Tom. I, pag. 340, 341.

(5) Jul. Cæsar Scaliger, Poëtic. lib. 1, cap. 13, pag. m. 48.

(6) Unde etiam ejusmodi querela, qui se uxorem semiligneam dixisse dicebat. Comment. in Alciati, Emblem. pag. m. 589.

(7) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 502.

— si breve parvi
Sortita est lateris spatium, breviorque videtur
Virgine Pygmæa, nullis adjuncta cothurnis,
Et levis creta confurgit ad oscula plantâ (7).

— but

- (o) Ib. pag. 47. time that the Duke of St Simon made him sing before Lewis XIII at St Germain's (o) [B]. He hit the Humour of that Prince (p) by a drunken Song that he made, and which every
- (p) Ib. pag. 48. Body sung at Court. The King listened to his Songs ever after, and permitted him to come freely into his Closet, and D'Assouci was called Phœbus Warderobin, because he had always his Lutes in the King's Wardrobe (q). He continued that Trade under the Minority of of Lewis XIV. That young Prince read the Verses of this Poet at his going to bed, and always laughed to the Purpose at the Jest, which many Courtiers, who laughed unseasonably, could not apprehend (r). He vouchsafed to lend an Ear to his Songs, and to sing them himself (s). D'Assouci, having a mind to return to their Royal Highnesses at Turin (t), set out from Paris, about the Year 1655, with so much haste that he had scarce time to pay part of his Debts (u). He had two Music-Pages along with him (x). He arrived at Lyons, after having undergone several unlucky Accidents, and got acquainted with a Man mentioned in a bye place of Mr Boileau's Satires, and who for that Reason deserves a Place in my Commentary [C]. He found many Charms at Lyons: he entertained with his Music all the Convents of the singing Nuns, and there was none of those devout Maids but had already a Copy of his Ovid in a merry Humour (y): so he intitled the Work wherein he translated part of Ovid's Metamorphoses into Burlesque Verses. He staid three Months at Lyons, in the midst of Sports, Comedies, and Feasts (z), very much caressed by Moliere and the Bejars (aa); and then he went with Moliere to Avignon (bb), and from thence to Pezenas, where the States of Languedoc were assembled (cc). He was maintained a whole Winter by those Comedians (dd), and he received considerable Presents from the Prince of Conti, Mr de Guilleragues, and several Persons of that Court (ee). He had lost one of his Music-Pages, and finding himself in the Province of France, which produces the best Voices as well as the best Fruits, he would not return into Piedmont before he endeavoured to fill up the Vacancy. He followed Moliere as far as Narbonne (ff); from whence he went to Montpellier, where he ran the hazard of his Life. That Accident
- (aa) They were Comedians and Moliere's Partners.
- (bb) D'Assouci, Tom. I, pag. 302.
- (cc) Ibid. pag. 315.
- (dd) Ibid. pag. 316.
- (ee) Ib. pag. 318.
- (ff) Ibid. pag. 319.

— but look behind

And then she dwindles to the Pygmy Kind.
Duck-legg'd, short-waisted, such a Dwarf she is,
That she must rise on tip-toes for a Kiss.

DRYDEN.

- But Scioptius, instead of adjuta, will have it to be adjuncta, and confirms his Conjecture by an Example: 'Parvam puellæ staturam exprimit dum eam cothurnis adjunctam ait, sicut Cicero de genero suo, qui meum generum alligavit gladio? (8). — He expresses the diminutive Size of the Woman, by saying she was fastened to her Buskins; as Cicero, speaking of his Son-in-law, said, who tied my Son-in-law to a Sword.'
- (8) Scioptius, Verisimil. lib. 4, cap. 10, pag. m. 243, 149.

[B] The Duke of St Simon made him sing before Lewis XIII. If we keep to the Author's Narrative, that Advantage was procured him in the Year 1640, more or less; for he supposes that in the Year 1655 one of the King's Footmen told him, I have known you above these fifteen Years; for it was I who went for you, when the Duke of St Simon made you sing before the King at St Germain's (9). This shews that D'Assouci had not been admitted to that Prince before that time. How comes it then, that he says in another place (10), that he diverted King Lewis XIII for twenty Years. It is not the first time I have observed that Authors are no good Chronologers in their own History. Note, that he informs us (11), that he had been in the Service of Mr d'Angoulême, Natural Son of Charles IX, and that he conquered all the Endeavours that were made to turn him out.

- (9) D'Assouci, Tom. I, pag. 47.
- (10) Ib. Tom. II, pag. 14.
- (11) Ib. pag. 10.

[C] He got acquainted with a Man mentioned in a place of Mr Boileau's Satires, and who for that reason deserves a place in my Commentary. D'Assouci tells us, in the Relation of his Journey from Chalons on the River Saône to Lyons, that, having made his Music Pages sing several passionate and moving Songs (12), a blind man came to him, who had very large Ears, so fine and so red, that tho' his Nose was no less high-coloured, yet it was hard to judge which carried the Prize, the Purple of his Nose, or the Cinnabar of his Ears (13). Being asked who he was? he answered, (14) 'I am —'

- (12) Ib. pag. 249.
- (13) Ib. pag. 251.
- (14) Ib. pag. 251.

'one of the Descendants of Homer, and I dare say that I have some Advantage over that Divine Man; for though he was blind as I am, and sung his Verses publicly from door to door as I do mine, he had only his Legs hairy; but I am as hairy as a Bear all over my Body — I am a famous Poet and Songster, but a Songster endowed with such a powerful Organ, and such a mighty and strong Voice, that provided I drink but a Dram of Brandy, if I should sing on the Augustine's Key, the King might hear me from the Windows of his Louvre. Having said this, without being desired, he took a little Book covered with blue Paper out of his Pocket, giving it to a young Boy that served him for a Guide; they united their Voices, and with their Hats hanging over their Ears, they sung these agreeable Songs.

Helas mon amy doux, &c.

Alas dear friend, &c.

And this which Guatier-Garguille sung formerly:

Baïsez-moy Julienne.

Jeân Julien je ne puis.

Kiss me, Juliana.

That cannot I, John Julian.

After that, he sung one of his own making, newly coined; the Title whereof was this: A lamentable and recreative Song on the Death of a Shoemaker, who cut his Throat with his Paring Knife, to be revenged on the Unfaithfulness of his Wife. He was desired to tell his Name and the Place where he held his Parnassus. My Name, said he, is Philippot, at your Service, alias the Savoyard; and if ever you go over the Pontneuf, you will see my Parnassus on the steps of that Bridge; the Brazen Horse is my Pegasus, and the Samaritaine the Fountain of my Helicon (15). He presented a Book of his Songs to D'Assouci (16). My late Father, added he (17), to whom God give Peace, has sung Guedron's, and the late Boësset's Songs, a thousand times.

If Boileau's Satires remain an hundred Years without a Commentary upon them, there will be some Passages in them less intelligible, than the most obscure that are to be found in the Catholic Confession of Sancti, and in the Catholicicon. And I am persuaded, that a Commentator on those Satires in the XIXth Century would be very glad to meet with this small piece of the History of a famous Singer of the Pontneuf, and that he would willingly adorn with it his Notes on this place:

Le bel honneur pour vous, en voyant vos Ouvrages
Occuper le loisir des Laquais & des Pages,
Et souvent dans un coin renvoyez à l'écart
Servir de second tome aux airs du Savoyard (18).

What envy'd Honour, that your Works engage Th' Attention of each Footman and each Page.

Or

(18) Boileau, Satire IX, v. 54.

is become very famous by the Account of Bachauumont's and Chapelle's Travels [D]. I shall speak of it in the Remarks. He remained three Months longer at Montpellier after he was released out of Prison (gg), and composed there a Relation of that Tragi-Comical Adventure; but he did not publish it, tho' the Chief Judge, who had seen it, had given him (gg) Idem.

Tom. II. pag.
164.

Or in some Place remote, at Wakes and Fairs, Furnish a second Tome to the Savoyard's Airs!

[D] He ran the Hazard of his Life at Montpellier. That Accident is become very famous by the Account of Bachauumont's and Chapelle's Travels. This Account being in every body's hands, I shall only take the Substance of it, which concerns our Musician. Mr de Bachauumont and Mr Chapelle relate, that they came to Montpellier on the Day that D'Assouci was to be burnt for a Crime that is abhorred by the Women. They describe the Indignation of the fair Sex very pleasantly; they say, that a Man of Quality had procured that wretched Man's Escape, and upon that Account the Women raised a Sedition in the City, and had already torn two or three Persons in pieces, for being only suspected to know D'Assouci; that they were afraid of being also taken for his Friends, and went suddenly out of that City; that they met him with a pretty handsome Page following him; that he told them all his Misfortunes in a few Words; that, after they had seen several Towns of Provence, they went to Avignon, and that one Evening, as they were taking the fresh Air on the Banks of the Rhone, in a clear Moonshine, they met the Sieur D'Assouci, and asked him, maliciously enough,

Ce petit garçon qui vous suit,
Et qui derrière vous se glisse,
Que sçait-il? en quel exercice,
En quel art l'avez vous instruit?
Il sçait tout, dit-il; s'il vous duit,
Il est bien à votre service.

The Youth, who after you comes trudging,
(He's an apt Scholar, we imagine)
What has he learn'd, since here you brought him?
What Exercises have you taught him?
O Gentlemen, the Spark replied,
The Boy's a knowing Boy, and tried;
Yet I can part with him with ease:
He's at your Service, if you please.

We thanked him then very civilly, as you would have done, and made him only this Answer:

Adieu, bon soir, & bonne nuit:
De votre Page qui vous suit,
Et qui derrière vous se glisse,
Et de tout ce qu'il sçait aussi,
Grand merci Monsieur d'Assouci;
D'un si bel offre de service,
Monsieur d'Assouci grandmercy (19):

Adieu, good Monsieur D'Assouci;
Thank you for your Civility;
But keep your Page, and all be knows:
Once more, Monsieur, A good Repose!

Few ingenious Books have been so much read and admired as the Account of those two Gentlemen's Travels, whereby they have more contributed to make the Name of the Sieur D'Assouci odious, contemptible, and abominable than any body else. It has been said, that his Enemies shewed that Account to Pope Clement IX, to undo him (20). This was a nice Business; for it contains a Passage somewhat malicious, and very capable to displease the Court of Rome. It is that, wherein it is supposed that D'Assouci, having escaped the Flames of Montpellier, is out of all Fear since he is come to Avignon:

Mais enfin me voila fauvé;
CAR je suis en terre Papale (21).

At length a safe Retreat I've found;
For now I stand on Popish Ground.
VOL. II.

The unfortunate D'Assouci experimented the Prejudice that the Relation of Mr Bachauumont and Mr Chapelle did him (22): he wrote against the latter, and gave him many hard Words; and, as he pretended to be the Person who had taught him to make Verses, and that some Poems had been seen in his Praise composed by Mr Chapelle, he charged him both with Ingratitude and Inconstancy (23). He maintained that it was false that he had been met by those Travellers either near Montpellier or at Avignon (24); he protested that he left Montpellier but three Months after his Release; so that they had published a great Lye, when they said that they had found him out of that Town the same Day that he was set at Liberty (25). He pretends that they did not go to Montpellier till two Years after his Adventure; from whence he concludes that they made use of a most malicious Fiction against him (26). The Mischief is, that, though he makes it appear that they represented the Matter as unfaithfully as the Writers of Romances, yet he cannot deny the main thing; for he owns that he was put into a Dungeon at Montpellier, and accused of an infamous Commerce. Instead of ascribing to my Art, says he (27), the care I took to find a Singing-boy for the Service of the Duchess Dowager of Savoy, the People said it was to make a Trade of him with the Princes of Italy, or that, under pretence of Music (28), I travelled thus in the World, looking for Children, not to teach them to sing, but to sell them to the Chirurgeons of Montpellier, to make Anatomies of them — (29). Nay, the Catholics called me Parpaillot (30), and the Parpaillots called me an Atheist; but the gallant Women, more fond of their Interest, and more speculative, called me an Heretic, not in point of Religion, but in point of Love, and without remembering the many Serenades I had given them, and the great Affection I expressed, for them when in my younger Years, coming to Montpellier, I taught them to play on the Lute. They accused me unjustly of the Cruelties that Orpheus had formerly for the Bacchantes, and all this without any other ground than their chimerical Imagination, already propounded by what they heard of my having been long acquainted with C. and the late D. B. and the late C, and fomented by the Malice of those angry Persons. Note, that he assigns for the cause of all this Persecution, the Anger of a Lady, who was adored. This Lady, who was adored by every Body at Montpellier (31), employed all her wit and utmost endeavours to undo him (32). Several precise Women took that Angry Woman's Part, and swore by their Patches, and their Painting, never to paint again before they had caufed his Ashes to be thrown into the Air (33). He was so imprudent as to use them roughly in a Poem that he handed about with this Title, Articles de paix aux précieuses de Montpellier (Articles of Peace to the precise Ladies of Montpellier). They were very offensive and fatirical Verses. Those Women were the more offended at it, because he freely discovered the true Reason why, as he pretended, they persecuted him, and required that his Punishment might be a warning to others. He promised them to be more gallant for the future, and made an offer of his Services, though weakened a little by Age.

Mais rassurez vos cœurs jaloux,
Esclave des charmes plus doux,
J'adore par tout la nature
Sans m'appliquer à la torture,
Que la plus belle d'entre vous
Viennne un peu tenter l'aventure;
Je veux mourir sous l'impolture,
Si je n'appaise son courroux.
Sec & passé comme je suis,
Et non du tout si beau qu'un Ange,
Je fais pourtant ce que je puis,
Je ne suis pas un masle étrange;
Garçon loyal & bon Chrétien,
J'aime plus que vostre entretien.

7 N

Pourquoy

(19) Volage de
Bachauumont & la
Chapelle, pag.
m. 75.

(20) D'Assouci, ubi supra, Tom.
II, pag. 271.

(21) Volage de Bachauumont, ubi
supra.

- (bb) Ib. pag. 163. him leave to do it (bb). He travelled afterwards through several Towns in Provence; he waited, at Monaco, upon the Prince of Morgues, who gave him thirty Pistoles; he went over the Col de Tende, &c (ii). Being come to Turin, he had much ado to refuse, by his Presence, the false News of his Punishment, which they had read in the Burlesque Gazette. He used his utmost Endeavours to settle himself in that Court (kk); and he thinks he might have succeeded in it, if he had not spent his time in making Verses, if he had not been contented to make his Court to the chief Deities, and if he had not made the Musicians of the Country jealous of him (ll). He pretends that the Beauty of his Poems exposed him to the Indignation of a Poet of Auvergne, who set up for a considerable Man at Turin, and affected to criticize, and to persecute him (mm). He adds, that having neglected the Favourites, because he was so imprudent as to fancy that it was sufficient to make his Court to their Royal Highnesses [E], he exposed himself to the ill Offices of several Persons, which did him great Prejudice. He perceived that they grew cold towards him, and the worst was, that having desired his Dismission, or a Settlement (nn), he obtained the former to his great Grief (oo). I cannot give the Continuation of his Adventures; for I have only had the three first Parts of the History that he wrote of them. I remember, that, about the Year 1674, he published two small Volumes, which he had composed in the Prison of the Chatelet of Paris, where he was still, and I do not know the Particulars of his Enlargement. There is no need to consult the Satirical Writings of his Enemies to have a very ill Opinion of him. What he himself owns and relates, is sufficient for it. I cannot tell whether a Licence could be now (pp) obtained at Paris for printing a Book like the Relations of our
- (ii) D'Assouci, Aventures d'Italie, pag. 74.
- (kk) See the Remark [E].
- (ll) Aventures d'Italie, pag. 330, & seq.
- (mm) Ibid. pag. 153.
- (nn) Ibid. pag. 333.
- (oo) Ibid. pag. 342.
- (pp) I write this in October, 1699.

(64) Ib. ibid. pag. 122.

Pourquoy donc sexe au teint de roze,
Quand la charité vous impose
La loy d'aimer vostre prochain,
Me pouvez-vous hair sans cause,
Moy qui ne vous fis jamais rien.
Ha! pour mon honneur je voy bien
Qu'il vous faut faire quelque chose (34).

*This jealous Rage, ye Fair, give o'er;
Your Charms, I swear, I still adore:
Let but the fairest try my Love,
If to her Will I fail to prove,
May future Ages, to my Shame,
Brand me with an Impostor's Name.
Tis true, the Verge of Age I touch,
Nor can I brag of Beauty much:
Yet I do, Ladies, what I can;
And who does more, is more than Man.
The Fair, I vow, I never balk,
And can do something more than talk.
Why then this causeless Hate to me,
Who ne'er did ought? — Ha! now I see,
'Tis That: my Crime (and I repent me):
I must DO something, to content ye.*

(35) Ibid. pag. 268.

(36) Here is a Passage of Chapelle's Account: Seeing these Bachelors with dishevelled Hair, one would have thought that, at least, Mr D'Assouci had ravished them all, and yet he had never done any thing to them.

(37) Ludovicus nihil fecit. — Lewis did nothing. He was the last King of France of the second Race.

(38) In the Remark [C] of the Article HENRY III.

For the rest, he accuses Chapelle of having robbed him of that Thought (35). See the Margin (36). Do not mind the Reflexions of some invidious Men.

They say that, Incontinency being the strongest Pillar of the Empire of Gallantry, it is in vain to ask in a State of Disgrace, But what have I done? What Crime can I be accused of? I do not find myself guilty of any wicked Attempt, I have been quiet, I have done nothing. A wrong way to justify one's self; for it is chiefly by Quietism, or Inaction, that a Man appears guilty to those who govern that Empire. Lazy Men are looked upon there as very bad Subjects: Idleness is the greatest Felony that can be committed; it is the highest degree of Treason: The Sins of Commission are much more inconsiderable in that Country than the Sins of Omission: these are never venial; they are unpardonable Faults. Tyrants will be sooner deposed in a Political State, than those who are sluggish; but in the Empire whereof I speak, the most just Reason for deposing, banishing, &c. is that which the French alleged against the Kings of the first Race; and it were better for a Man to commit several Violences, than to deserve the Epithet that was given to a certain Prince (37). There are the Slanders which I advise you not to regard: but rather consider of the Reflexions that may be made on a Remark that I shall touch upon hereafter (38).

[E] He was so imprudent as to fancy that it was sufficient to make his Court to their Royal Highnesses. What he says upon this is very judicious, and is as good, not for the Phrases, but for the Thoughts, as one of the most solid Passages of our new Theophrastus (39). Having no other aim, says he (40), than to please their Royal Highnesses, because, in order to satisfy my small Ambition, I thought it was sufficient to deserve their Esteem, instead of making my Court to those who could help me, and more still to those who could prejudice me; I did not so much as wait upon the Marchioness de Lans, nor Madam Servien, my chief Protectress; I neglected also all those that were in favour, and the Favourite himself. A great Folly indeed, and well deserving the Punishment I received for it, and which those must expect, who, like me, will be so high-spirited as to attempt to scale Heaven, and enter Paradise in spite of the Saints. A great Folly for a Man to trust to his Merit, to make his Fortune with Princes; and so much the greater, because most Princes, who think themselves free (because they command others), see but little, and even this with other Men's Eyes, and hardly command any thing but what they are ordered to command, so that they are most commonly the Slave of their Slaves, and consequently the greatest Slaves of all Mankind. I found it by experience in that Court, when, instead of caring for those that were in Favour, and kissing my Poet's Hands and Feet, admiring his Wit and Verses, and getting them printed in Golden Letters, I, a poor Mirmidon, fighting with a Giant in Favour, fought against my self, since as many Victories as I obtained over his Pen, were so many Trophies erected to his Glory, and as many Precipices that I digged for my Fortune. I was a greater Fool than Jehn des Vignes; for instead of abstaining from making Verses, or instead of making some like my Curate, who vexed no Body, I went about to contend with a Poet, who wore a Sword, and who was as noble as the King, and as Valiant as Cæsar. — Princes, as I have already said, see most things with other Men's Eyes, and consider People only as much as they are beloved by those whom they love. If I did not find myself quite forsaken, I found my self at least as much neglected as I had neglected others. The Present, that used to come every Week, came but once a Month; and, observing a certain Coldness mixed with the ordinary Bounties of those gracious Stars (which did not agree with my hopes of a Settlement). — I did, &c (41). A good Courtier does not imitate the Huguenots, who invoke none but God, but imitates the Votaries of the Roman Communion, who apply themselves much more to the Worship of Saints, than to the Worship of God. D'Assouci conformed his Devotion to the Notions of the Protestants, and did not find that it turned to good account. Here follows something of the Description he made of his Zeal for the Duchess Royal. 'It is scarce credible how much pains I took, for the space of fourteen Months that I was in that Court, in order to deserve a Settlement. I omitted no occasion to make my self necessary: though I had already but

(39) Mr de la Bruyere.

(40) D'Assouci, Aventures d'Italie, pag. 332, & seq.

(41) Ibid. pag. 337.

our Burlesque Poet; for they are intermixed with prophane Things. And it is to be observed, that, among other Crimes, he was accused of Impiety; yet he glories to have written in Defence of the Church of Rome [F]. He complains of Mr Boileau, who nevertheless said nothing against Burlesque but what was very reasonable [G]. The Place too much Business in that Princess's Chamber, and though I had heard say many times that no Body goes into Heaven in spite of the Saints, yet I entertained her with Music in her Chapel. Whether she heard Mals in her Chamber, in the Church of the Holy Winding Sheet, or in any other Church, I followed her every where like a shagged Dog; my Lute, and my Boy Pierratin, were always seen in her Attendance. By this means I became, in a little time, the most devout Person in the World; for you must know that this pious Princess, who used to weep at the Altars, was not contented with one Mals; she heard every Day two at least, and most time three, during which time I made a very long and very devout Music, always kneeling on both Knees. Let the Reader judge whether I was not a very devout Man; and yet I assure you that the Thing, that was least in my Thoughts, was to put up Prayers to God: Apollo, who held me fast every where, was still more hard upon me in that Holy Place: My Imagination was at all times taken up with some fine Mets; and though the Words that I muttered were altogether Holy and Sacred, it was not so much for the Glory of God that I sung them, as for the satisfaction of that Mortal Deity, whom at that time I would have preferred to God himself, such a wretched Man I was (42). See the Margin (43).

[F] He glories to have written in Defence of the Church of Rome. One of the extravagant things, for which he blames his Enemies, is their accusing him of Irreligion. 'You have been so wicked and so foolish, says he (44), as to represent, — as an impious Man, a Person, whom God only exposed to your Persecutions, in order to refine him in the Exercise of Piety; and as a Writer, that is an Enemy to Holy Things, a Man, who in his Writings has defended Rome against the Attempts of the Enemies of it's Glory, and of it's Altars, and who has spent his Ink and Incense in favour of it's Holy Ministers and sacred Prelates.' He should not have made it a matter of Merit to have undertaken such a Work: Had Devotion any share in it? Was it not rather to obtain some Reward? It is the Pole Star of such Writers; they pass from a Prophane Subject to a Divine one, as soon as the Hopes of Gain appear on that side (45):

Græculus esuriens in cœlum jusseris, ibit (46).

[G] He complains of Mr Boileau, who nevertheless said nothing against Burlesque, but what was very reasonable. These words of Mr Boileau, D'Assouci refutes as well as he can (47).

— qu'enfin la Cour defabufée

Méprisa de ces vers l'extravagance aîcée.

— At length the Court, being undeceived, despised the easy Extravagance of those Verses.

It is very easy, says he (48), to affect a Scoundrel, who laughs at every thing; but it is very hard to move a confipated Stoic, who laughs at nothing: wherefore whatever may be said of the Heroic Stile, it is far from being so difficult as the fine Burlesque, which is the utmost Effort of the Imagination, and the Touch-Stone of Wit. Nor is it sufficient to have Wit in order to succeed in it: one must also be endowed with a particular Genius, which is so rare, chiefly in our Climate, that, except two Persons, of whom France will have me to be one, every Body knows that all those who meddled with this sort of Burlesque have only wasted Paper. — If I be asked why this Burlesque, which has so many excellent Parts and so many pleasant Turns, has ceased to divert our Court, after having diverted France so long; it is because Scarron has ceased to live, and I have ceased to write. If I would continue my Ovid in a merry Humour, that same Court, which is pleased to this Day with the Verses that I present it with, would be pleased with it as before, and my Bookellers, who have re-printed that Work so often, would again make as many Editions of it (49). A Person, who declares so openly the high Opinion he has conceived of his Poems, may be looked upon as a Witness little to be credited, with respect to the Praises he bestows upon himself; but when he declares that he has been very sensible of the Injury contained in those words of Mr Boileau,

Et jusqu'à d'Assouci tout trouva des Lecteurs,

And even D'Assouci could Readers find,

he ought to be accounted a very sincere Witness. 'Ah! dear Reader, if thou didst but know how this even D'Assouci sticks to my Heart, thou wouldst pity my Fate; I am inconsolable, and cannot recover from my Fainting, especially when I consider that by that Verse, which looks like a Decree of the Court of Parliament, I find my self deprived of all my Honours, and that this Charles d'Assouci Emperor of the Burlesque, the first of that Name, is nothing at present, if you will believe him, but the meanest Reptile of Parnassus, and the Scullion of the Muses. Reader, what is to be done in this Extremity: after the Communication that he has fulminated against this poor disgraced Burlesque, who will vouchsafe to read it, or so much as to look upon it (50)?' He comforts himself with the Thought, that Jealousy was the Cause of that thundering Censure (51): 'Thus you see, dear Reader, what one gets by making good Burlesque Verses: for if I had made as bad ones as my Poet (52), he (53) would have spared me as well as the Author of the Buffoon Ovid: But it is no new thing to see jealous People rail against excellent Things, and blame what goes beyond their Capacity.' I shall set down the Judgment that he made of the most impertinent Poetry. 'It makes People laugh, says he (54), — but it is not enough to hit upon that Impertinence in it's highest Degree, which is so necessary to that kind of Verses; it must also be attended with a certain Simplicity, which the best Wits cannot attain to; and the more excellent a Man is, the less he can imitate it; as plainly appears from the great Bible of the Christmas Carols; for though several Wits have tried to imitate, in their new Carols, those precious Carols of Antiquity, no Body has found, or will ever find, the Secret of it; and the old Carols, which are upon all Occasions preferred before the new, will be always so much the more esteemed in all Ages, as they are more foolish and more excellently full of that admirable kind of Impertinency and Simplicity. For in short, is there any Man of Sense that knows for what, and when to laugh, that will not heartily do it, when he reads these Verses, which I have taken out of a Book, that was sold for twenty Pistols at an Auction, intitled, Les Pois Pilez. CHRIST takes his leave of St Matthew in these Words.

DIALOGUE.

C. Adieu Matthieu.

M. Adieu, Dieu.

C. Prens ta lance & ton épée,

Et t'en vas en Galilée.

M. Prendray je aussi mon épée?

C. Et quoy donc?

M. Adieu donc.

C. Adieu, Matthew.

M. Adieu, God.

C. Take thy Lance and Javelin, and go into Galilee.

M. Shall I also take my Sword?

C. And what then?

M. Adieu, then.

Is there any thing more foolish and more impertinent, than to make those Heavenly Persons speak in this

(42) Ibid. pag. 168, & seq.

(43) My Zeal was so great towards these benign Powers, says he, pag. 176, that if I had had as much towards God, I doubt not but that he would have rewarded me with Heaven before this time.

(44) D'Assouci, Tom. II, pag. 20.

(45) Si dolosi spes affullerit nummi. Perfuit in Prologo. See the Conduct of Aretin, in Rem. [I] of the Article ARETIN. (PETER).

(46) Juven. Sat. III. v. 78.

(47) D'Assouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 241.

(48) Ibid. pag. 252.

(49) Ibid. pag. 261.

(50) Ibid. pag. 263.

(51) Ibid. pag. 265.

(52) That is, a Poet of Auvergne, who was at Turin.

(53) That is, Mr Boileau.

(54) D'Assouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 320.

(qq) Avantures d'Italie, pag. 273, & seq.
(rr) The Pieces against Soudais, that are in his Works, concern D'Assouci.

Place, wherein he speaks of four foolish Poets (qq), is diverting; I shall only set down what concerns him whom he names, and who is an Author in Print [H]. Cyrano de Bergerac (rr), and Loret, were two of his Enemies. The latter abused him on all Occasions, in his Burlesque Gazette, and was so ready to spread any News to the Prejudice of D'Assouci [I], that he several times published an Account of his Death, tho' he was still living.

'this manner? Yet is there any thing more pleasant or more natural? You must needs grant me that those Verses, which would make St. Matthew laugh, and even God himself, if he was still on Earth, are better than all the Verses in the World, which taste neither of Salt nor Sage.'

[H] I shall set down what concerns a foolish Poet — who is an Author in Print. 'But who can better make this authentic Folly authentic, than the poor deceased Ragueneau? Ragueneau known to all Parnassus, Ragueneau beloved by all the Poets, and cherished by all the Comedians. Lastly, that famous Pastry-cook Ragueneau, who being always at Work with six Men in his Shop near a continual Fire, in a well accustomed Oven, laughed at all the Pastry-cooks in Paris; that famous Pastry-cook Ragueneau, who caused nothing but dainty Pies to rain on Parnassus. That Nursing Father of the Muses, after having well fed those ungrateful Maids, alas! What is become of him? I ask it of you, Beis, who inspired him with the Folly of making Verses; you, Beis, who took the most excellent Pastry-cook of Paris from us, to make him the worst Poet in the World. 'It is you, barbarous Wretch, who shall one Day answer in the Valley of Jehosaphat, not only for all the Ink and Paper that he has wasted, but also for all the Pies that (without reckoning those that Parnassus bilked him of) you have eat as they came out of his Oven. Yes, Beis, you only shall one Day be accountable for this harmless Creature; for, in short, he was the best natured Man in the World; he trusted the whole Parnassus, and when they had no Money, he was over paid, satisfied, and contented, when they vouchsafed to applaud his Works with the wink of an Eye. I remember that, for having only had the patience to hear one of his Pindaric Odes, he trusted me above three Months without ever asking a penny of me — (55). Being not paid by any Body, and his Creditors coming upon him for Money, poor Ragueneau was intirely buried under the Ruins of his Oven. It was a sad and lamentable Day for the Poets, who very early in the Morning were met wiping their Mouths, after they had got their last Breakfast at his House; it was, I say, a sad Day, when a Company of hungry Bailiffs, in the face of Apollo, whose Beard was still greasy with the Fat of so many delicate Patties, were so bold as to arrest and seize his well beloved Ragueneau, and to clap him up, without any respect for his Verses, or Muses, into Prison, from whence (after a Year of Captivity) he came out to impart to the World the excellent Works, which, in imitation of Theophrastus, he had composed there: but he found no Poet in Paris that would feed him in his turn, nor so much as hear one of his Verses; nor any Pastry-cook that would trust him with so much as a Pie on one of his Sonnets. Cursing the Age, and storming against the Ignorance of the Times, he left Paris with his Wife and Children, being in all five Persons, and a little Ass loaded with Epigrams, to go and seek his Fortune in Languedoc, where, having met with a Company of Players who wanted a Man to act a Swiss, he entred himself with them as an Underling; and though his Part was never above four Verses at most, he performed it so ill, that within less than a Year he had the Reputation of the worst Actor in the World; insomuch that the Players, not knowing what to employ him in, would make him snuff the Candles; but he would not except that Employment, as being repugnant to the Honour and Quality of a Poet. After which, not being able to resist the Power of his Destiny, I have seen him snuff the Candles very neatly with another Gang: this is the Fate of Fools when they turn Poets, and the Fate of Poets when they grow mad (56).

(56) Ibid. ibid.

[I] Loret — was — ready to spread News to the Prejudice of D'Assouci. 'As soon as I was arrested, my Enemies — sent immediately the News of my Death to Paris, which being not at all displeasing to the late Loret, without staying for the Confirmation of it, inspired him to make those fine Verses in my Praise, which to his Confusion we have seen rambling in his Gazette. Now this bad Poet is gone to tell Lies in the other World, and I am still in this (57):' Here is another Passage: 'They are the same Fools, who, repeating meer Hear-says, have kill'd me so many times in their Gazettes, and who, having drowned me at Ferrara and Venice, before I had set a Foot there, have taken me out of the Sea, and of all it's Rivers, to roast me at Montpellier, and who at last, after having thrown me from the Frying-Pan into the Fire, bowelled, stewed and minced me, have restored me to my first State, to fry me again at Avignon; from whence of their Favour they have removed me without any Harm or Solution of Continuity, to confine me for the rest of my Days in the Inquisition, from whence I am nevertheless return'd as bright and as found as if I was newly born, without losing one Hair in all those Travels which those Fools have described (58). He reveng'd himself of Loret as much as he could, and accus'd him of an egregious Fraud. These are his words: 'What had I done to that Billing-gate Rhimer, that he should so haughtily insult the Honour of my Muses, who are more knowing and honest than his? Tho' his Trade of cheating at Play might very well excuse him for making such bad Verses: Did I call him a Sharper? Did I call him a Poetaster? Did not I always call him Loret? Did not he rob me of my Money with his false Cards, when I play'd with him at the late Marchal de Schomberg's? Why must he rob me also of my Honour and Fortune with his false Rhimes? Did my Ovid in a merry Humour so vex him, that he must revenge himself on my Verses, to the prejudice of my Reputation? Yet this barbarous Rhimer has reveng'd himself of them in that manner, since it is on that very thing that the foolish Mob, more barbarous than he, have since grounded their many Slanders, in order to persecute me in every place, as well as so many honest People, who will believe till the Day of the last Doom, that I have been most strangely abused at Montpellier, if my Writings, at least as lasting as his, did not verify the contrary. Yea, this Scoundrel has revenged himself in that manner; for it is he who supplied all my Enemies with Weapons, and all those that envied me with a pretence of Calumny, who has destroyed my Fortune and my Hopes, who made my best Friend my Persecutor, and who, in short, has exposed me to so many Dangers and mortal Disgraces. Good God! can any Body see such Assassinations without Horror? and can France suffer such Assassins without Shame (59)?' I think it was also published that he had been hanged in Effigy; for he complains that they represented him as a Man whose Picture had served for a Scare-crow in a Hemp-cloze, and for a public Terror to the wicked: but he maintains that this Print was never seen but at the Bookellers Shops of the Palace, that it appears still gloriously before all his Works, and that the most curious Painters look for it at this present Time, as an Original that deserves to be copied (60). I do not believe they will do it to draw a fine Face by; for that of D'Assouci is far from being such. I have not found in the Relation of Bachaumont and Chapelle, that he was represented as the Tiberites of our Age (61). Yet he complains of it (62), and alledges, against that injurious Reflexion, the Verses that were made upon his Picture.

On vous avertit que voicy
Le Portrait du grand d'Assoucy,
Cette merveille de nostre âge.
Contemplez le donc bien; & si
A peu près aux traits du visage
Vouz croyez qu'un tel personnage
Ne peut qu'avoir bien réussi,
Achetez vifste son ouvrage,
Et vous verrez qu'il est ainsi. CHAPELLE.

You are inform'd, that here you see
The Portrait of Great D'Assoucy.
View him, and, if his Looks proclaim
He must have gain'd immortal Fame,
Purchase his Work, and you will see
That it is just as I tell ye.

2

DATE

(a) See Leti's Italia Regnante, Parte 3, pag. 369, & seq. König refers us to pag. 170 of that Book. He has committed two Faults; for he does not specify the Volume, and quotes the Page wrong.

DATI (CARLO), Professor of Philology at Florence, where he was born, became very famous, as well for his Works, as for the Elogies which many Writers bestowed upon him [A]. He was very civil and officious to all learned Travellers who went to Florence; many of them expressed their Acknowledgment for it in their Writings (a). He was a Member of the Academy della Crusca, and in that quality he took the Name of Smarrito. He made a Panegyric upon Lewis XIV, in Italian, and published it at Florence, in the Year 1669 (b). The French Translation of it, was printed at Rome the Year following. He had already published some Italian Poems in praise of that Prince (c). You may thereby learn in what Time he flourished.

(b) Ibid. pag. 367.

(c) Ibid. pag. 363, 367.

(1) Leti, Italia Regnante, Tom. II, pag. 363, 364.

[A] He became very famous, as well for his Works, as for the Elogies that many Writers bestowed upon him. You may find the Commentary, that this Text requires, in the third Volume of Leti's Italia Regnante; I shall only transcribe a few Lines out of it. Leti (1) observes, that the Book intitled, Lettera di Timauro Antiata à Filaleti, della vera storia della cicloide, e della famosissima esperienza dell' argento vivo, was written by Carlo Dati: he refers us to the One hundred and forty ninth page of Placcius's Treatise, De Scriptis & Scriptoribus anonymis atque pseudonymis. This Reference is right; for we find in that Page, that the pretended Timauro Antiata is Carlo Dati, and that this appears plainly from the Twenty sixth Page of the Letter. We find there also, that this Piece was printed at Florence in the Year 1663, and that the Author proves two things: the one, that Father Merfenne is not the Inventor of the Cycloid, as is said in the History of the Cycloid, but that the Glory of that Invention belongs to Galileo; the other, that Torricelli is innocent of the Plagiarism imputed to him concerning the Hypothesis, whereby the Suspension of the Quick-silver is explained by the Pressure of the Air. He was the first Author of that Hypothesis, if we believe Carlo Dati. It is very likely, that Monconys confounds things, when he says, The Sieur Carlo Dati gave me his printed Letter to prove that Torricelli was the first that found out the Cycloid (2). The chief Work, to which our Dati applied himself, was That della Pit- tura antica. He published an Essay, or a Piece of it, in the Year 1667. I will cite it hereafter (3). The Encomium that Chimentelli bestowed upon this Writer, is the only one that I shall transcribe among many others alleged by Leti. 'Nec secus inter rarissimos numerandus, qui Librum utendum permittit Clarissimus & amicissimus D. Carolus Datus nostræ flos illibatus Urbis, suadæque Etruscæ medulla, quam omni literarum paratu quotidie auget, atque illustrat. Parum enim mereri putat, qui per se tam egregie meretur, nisi ad bene merendum de Republica Literaria alios quoque omni ope & consilio adjuvet. Nihil ut minus suum habeat, quam quod in usum & gloriam eruditionis impendi possit; penè ipsum se sibi subtrahens, nedum temporis, aut operæ parvus (4). — Nor is Carlo Dati, an eminent Scholar, and a most obliging Friend, who favoured me with the Use of the Book, to be mentioned without the highest Esteem, as being the unsullied Flower of our City, the Soul of Tuscan Eloquence, which he daily improves and embellishes with acquisitions from all parts of Learning. Yet he esteems his Merit small, unless he assists others with all his Abilities to deserve well of the Common-Wealth of Learning; so that he may be said to have nothing less his own, than that which may be employed for the Advancement or Honour of Learning, and to overact his Strength, neither sparing Time nor Labour.'

(3) In the Roman [L.] of the Article ZEUXIS.

(4) Chimentellus de honore Biscilii, pag. 86, apud Leti Italia Regnante, Tom. III, pag. 373.

(2) Monconys, Voyage, Part. II, pag. 483, at the Year 1664.

DAVID, King of the Jews, was one of the greatest Men in the World, even though we should not consider him as a Royal Prophet, who was after God's own Heart. The first time that the Scripture makes him appear on the Stage of the World (a), is to inform us that Samuel appointed him King, and performed the Ceremony of anointing him. David was then but a meer Shepherd. He was the youngest of the eight Sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite [A]. Afterwards the Scripture tells us, that he was sent to King Saul (b), to cure him of his Fits of Frenzy, by the Sound of his Musical Instruments. A Service of that Importance made him so much beloved by Saul, that he kept him in his House, and made him his Armour-Bearer (c). The Scripture says afterwards (d), that David used to go home from time to time to take care of his Father's Flocks, and that his Father sent him one Day to Saul's Camp, with some Provisions for three of his Sons that were in the Army. David, performing that Order, heard the Challenge that a Philistine, called Goliath, proud of his Strength and gigantic Stature, made daily to the Israelites, which none among them durst to accept. He expressed his great Desire to fight that Giant; whereupon he was brought to the King, and assured him that he should triumph over that Philistine. Saul gave him his Armour; but David, finding it troublesome, put it off, and resolved to make use only of his Sling; which he did so happily, that he brought down that Swaggerer with a Stone (e), and killed him

(a) 1 Sam. xvi, 13.

(b) Ibid. ver. 10.

(c) Ibid. ver. 21.

(d) Ibid. chap. xvii, ver. 15.

(e) Ibid. ver. 49, 50.

(1) See the Journal des Scavans, July 14, 1692, pag. 465, Dutch Edit.

(2) In Bibliotheca magna Rabbinica, Part. II, pag. 4, apud Journal des Scavans, ibid.

[A] He was the youngest of the Sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite. Jesse descended in a direct Line from Judah, one of the twelve Sons of Jacob, and dwelt at Bethlehem, a small City of the Tribe of Judah. Some Modern Rabbins say, that, when David was conceived, his Father Jesse did not think that he lay with his Wife, but with his Servant Maid, and thereby explain the seventh verse of the Fifty first Psalm, wherein David affirms, that he was shopen in Iniquity, and that his Mother conceived him in Sin. This, say they, signifies that his Father Jesse committed an Adultery in begetting him, because, though he begot him by his Wife, he believed that he begot him by his Servant Maid, upon whose Chastity he had made an Attempt (1). This Explication does not well agree with the Doctrine of Original Sin, and for that reason Father Barolocci (2), having mentioned that Opinion of the Modern Rabbins, thought himself obliged to examine whether the ancient Jews acknowledged the Truth of that Doctrine. If the Supposition of those Rabbins was true, they would be in the right to say, that Jesse had committed Adultery; but on the other side it must be said, that he would not have been guilty of it, if, sincerely believing that he was enjoying his Wife, he had got his Servant Maid with Child. This Rabbinical Supposition is very different from the Tradition mentioned by St Jerom. He says, that it was believed that Jesse, the Father of David, did never commit any actual Sin, and that there was no kind of Uncleaness in him but what he brought from his Mother's Womb. 'Mirum est quod de Isai patre Davidis refert Hieronymus, illum nunquam aliud peccatum commississe quam quod ex origine contraxit. Quo enim loco legimus: Amasa ingressus est ad Abigail filiam Naas sororem Sarvise; sic Hieronymus 4, Naas interpretatur coluber, quia eum nullum admisit moris tiferum peribent peccatum, nisi quod originaliter de serpente antiquo contraxit. Est autem Naas qui 5, Isai pater David. Eandem traditionem refert Abulensis 3, & monet Naas eundem esse qui & Jesse sive Isai patrem Davidis, quod quidem & antea Liranus 6 docuerat (3). — St Jerom relates something very † Lib. ii, Reg. 17, 25.

† Hieron. Trad. Heb. in lib. 2. Reg. cap. 17.

† To lat. 2. Reg. 17, Quest. 27.

• Liran. ibid.

(3) They are Father Camar's Words, and Quotations, pag. 126, 127, de rebus gestis Elise.

VOL. II.

7 O

him afterwards with his own Sword, and cut off his Head, which he presented to Saul [B]. That Prince asked his General, when he saw David go against Goliath, Whose Son is this Youth (f) [C]? The General answered, that he did not know, and received Orders from Saul to enquire about it: but Saul heard it himself from that young Man; for, being brought to him after the Victory, he asked him, Whose Son art thou? and David answered him, that he was the Son of Jesse (g). Then Saul kept him in his Service, without suffering him to return to his Father (h). But because the Songs, that were sung in all the Cities, on the Defeat of the Philistines, ascribed ten times more Glory to David than to Saul (i), the King conceived a violent Jealousy, which increased daily, because the Employments, that he gave to David to keep him from Court, served only to make him more illustrious, and to procure him the Affection and Admiration of the Jews. By a false Policy he would make him his Son-in-law: he was in hopes that the Condition, on which he was to give him his second Daughter, would deliver him from that Object of his Aversion; but he was deceived in his Cunning. He asked an hundred Foreskins of the Philistines for his Daughter's Dowry; David brought him two hundred in full tale (k): So that, instead of perishing in the Enterprize, as Saul hoped, he returned with a new Addition of Glory. He married Saul's Daughter, whereby he became still more formidable to the King (l): all his Expeditions against the Philistines were very prosperous; his Name grew famous; he was in very great Esteem (m); inso-much that Saul, who knew his Son-in-law's Virtue much less, than the Humour of the People, imagined that the Death of David was the only thing that could secure him from being dethroned. He resolved then to be rid of him, and trusted his eldest Son with that Design, who, far from siding with his Father's Jealousy, gave David notice of that black Conspiracy (n). David fled, and was pursued from Place to Place, till he had given undeniable Proofs of his Probity and Fidelity to his Father-in-law, to whom he did no manner of harm on two favourable Opportunities (o), wherein he might easily have killed him; upon which Saul resolved to let him alone. But as David feared this Prince might resume his wicked Designs, he still kept upon his Guard. Nay, he provided himself a safer Place of Refuge, than before, in the Land of the Philistines (p). He asked of the King of Gath a Town to dwell in, from whence he made frequent Incursions into the Countries round about [D]: and had he obtained his Desire, he would have fought

(f) Ib. ver. 55.

(g) Ib. ver. 58.

(h) Ibid. chap. xviii, ver. 2.

(i) And the Women answered one another, as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his Thou-sands, and David his Ten Thou-sands. Ib. ver. 7.

(k) Ibid. ver. 27.

(l) Ibid. ver. 29.

(m) Ibid. ver. 30.

(n) Ibid. chap. xix, ver. 1, 2.

(o) Ibid. chap. xxiv, ver. xxvi.

(p) Ibid. chap. xxvii.

* very singular of Jesse, Father of David, that he never was guilty of any Sin, except that which is called Original. For when we read, that Amasa went into Abigail, the Daughter of Nabal, Sister to Zeruiah; Tous St Jerom interprets it: Nabal signifies a Serpent; for it is said, that he never committed any deadly Sin, but what he originally contracted from the old Serpent, and Nabal is the same with Jesse David's Father. Abulenfis relates the same Tradition, and observes, that Nabal was the same with Isai or Jesse David's Father; which Liranus had already observed. For the rest, those, who would adopt the Impertinence of the Rabbins concerning David's Conception, might easily admit another impertinent thing, which would be to place David in the number of illustrious Bastards. The Physical Reason, that is alledged, why Bastards are born so often with such great Natural Talents, might take place here on the Father's Part.

[B] He killed Goliath with his own Sword, and cut off his Head, which he presented to Saul. Goliath's Weapons were preserved as a Monument of the Glory of the Israelites. David carried them first into his Tent (4); but it is likely they were afterwards in a consecrated Place; for we read (5) that David, having asked the Priest Abimelech whether he had not a Spear or Sword for him, that Priest answered him: the Sword of Goliath is here wrapped up in a Cloth behind the Ephod; if thou wilt take that, take it. David caused it to be given him. As for the Head of Goliath, it was carried to Jerusalem (6), when David had chosen that City for the Capital of his Kingdom. Josephus says positively, that David himself consecrated Goliath's Sword to God (7).

[C] Saul asked his General — whose Son is this Youth? It is somewhat strange that Saul did not know David that Day, since that young Man had plaid several times on his Musical Instruments before him, to disperse those black Vapours that molested him. If such a Narrative as this should be found in Thucydides, or in Livy, all the Critics would unanimously conclude, that the Transcribers had transposed the Pages, forgot something in one Place, repeated something in another, or inserted some preposterous Additions in the Author's Work. But no such Suspicions ought to be entertained of the Bible. Nevertheless some have been so bold as to pretend, that all the Chapters, or all the Verses of the first Book of Samuel, are not placed as they were at first. It seems to me that the Abbot de Choisi removes the Difficulty much better. David was brought before Saul, says he (8), who did not know him at first, though he had seen him several times, when he sent for him to play on the Harp: but as this was many Years before, and David was very young, and came to Court in the Quality of a Musician, and was then dressed like a Shepherd, it can be no wonder that a King, full of Business, and whose Mind was disordered, should forget the Features of a young Man's Face, who had nothing considerable in him. I only wish he had not said, I. That Saul had not seen David for many Years. II. That David was very young when he came to Saul's Court in the Quality of a Musician. There is no likelihood that he was much younger when he killed Goliath, than when he came the first time to Saul's Court; for when he made his first Journey, he was a mighty valiant Man, and a Man of War, and prudent in Matters (9); he was but Thirty Years of Age, when he was elected King after the Death of Saul; and there must be necessarily an Interval of many Years between the Death of Goliath, and that of Saul. See the Remark, wherein I criticize Mareri, and the Remark [L].

[D] He asked of the King of Gath a Town, — from whence he made frequent Incursions into the Countries round about. David, having dwelt some time in the chief City of King Achish, with his little Band of Six hundred bold Adventurers, was afraid of putting this Prince to Charges, and begged he would assign him some other place of Abode. Achish gave him the Town of Ziklag. David removed thither with his Adventurers, and suffered not their Swords to rust in their Scabbards. He often led them out in Parties, and killed, without Mercy, both Men and Women. He left nothing alive but Cattle, which was the only Booty he returned with. He was afraid, lest the Prisoners should discover the whole Mystery to Achish, and therefore he carried none of them away, but put all to the Sword, both Male and Female. The Secret, he would not have revealed, was, that the Ravages were committed not upon the Country of the Israelites, as he made the King of Gath believe, but upon the Lands of the ancient Inhabitants of Palestine (10). To speak plainly, this Conduct was very unjustifiable: in order to conceal one Fault, he committed a greater. He imposed upon a King, to whom he had Obligations, and exercised great Cruelty, to cover that Imposition. If any one had asked David, by what Authority

(8) Choisi, Histoire de la Vie de David, pag. 8, 9, Dutch Edit. 1692.

(9) 1 Sam. xvi, 18.

(10) 1 Sam. chap. xxvii.

(4) 1 Sam. xvi, 54.

(5) Ibid. chap. xxi, ver. 8, 9.

(6) Ibid. cap. xvii, ver. 54.

(7) Joseph. Antiq. lib. 6, cap. 13, & 14.

fought under the Banner of this Philistine Prince against the Israelites [E], in that unhappy War wherein Saul perished. After the Death of Saul, he returned into Judea, and was there proclaimed King by the Tribe of Judab (g). Nevertheless, the other Tribes submitted to Ishbosheth, the Son of Saul, which was effected by Abner's Fidelity (r). Abner, who had been General of the Army under King Saul, placed Ishbosheth upon the Throne, and supported him on it against the Attempts of David: but being full of Repentment, because Ishbosheth reproved him for having taken one of Saul's Concubines (s), he entered into a Treaty with David to procure him the Kingdom of Ishbosheth. The Negotiation would have been soon concluded, to the Satisfaction of David, if Joab (t), to revenge a private Quarrel, had not killed Abner. The Death of Abner only hastened the Ruin of the unfortunate Ishbosheth. Two of his chief Captains slew him, and brought his Head to David, who, far from rewarding them for it, as they expected, ordered them both to be put to death (u). The Subjects of Ishbosheth quickly submitted themselves to David. This Prince had reigned seven Years and a half over the Tribe of Judab: afterwards he reigned about thirty Years over all Israel (x). This long Reign was remarkable for great Success, and glorious Conquests. It was not much disturbed but by the wicked Attempts of this Prince's own Children [F]. These are commonly the Enemies which Sovereigns have most reason to fear. David was very near being reduced

(g) 2 Sam. chap. ii, ver. 4.

(r) Ibid. ver. 8.

(s) Ib. chap. iii.

(t) He was General of David's Army.

(u) 2 Sam. chap. iv.

(x) Ibid. chap. v, ver. 5.

thy dost thou these things? what could he have answered? Can a private person, as he was, a Fugitive, who finds shelter in the Dominions of a neighbouring Prince, have a Right to commit Hostilities for his own Advantage, and without a Commission from the Sovereign of the Country? Had David any such Commission? on the contrary, did he not act in Opposition to the Intentions and Interest of the King of Gath? If a private Man, how great soever by Birth, should behave himself now a-days, as David did on this Occasion, he would, undoubtedly, be called by Names of little Honour. I know the most renowned Heroes, the most famous Prophets of the Old Testament, have sometimes approved the putting to the Sword every thing that had Life; and therefore I should be very far from calling that Cruelty, which David did, had he been warranted by the Order of any Prophet, or if God, by Inspiration, had commanded him to do so: But it evidently appears, from the silence of the Scripture, that he did all this of his own accord.

REFLECTION upon the Conduct of David towards Nabal.

I shall add one Word in relation to what he had determined to do to Nabal. Whilst Nabal, who had vast Riches, was shearing his Sheep, David sent to beg of him some Gratuity, in a very obliging manner. The Messengers did not fail to tell him, that his Shepherds had never been injured by David's People. Nabal, being very churlish, asked, rudely, who David was, and upbraided him with having shaken off his Master's Yoke. In a Word, he declared he was not so imprudent as to give to Strangers and Vagabonds, what he had provided for his own Servants. David, enraged at this Answer, ordered Four hundred of his Men to arm, and put himself at their Head, being firmly resolved not to save a Soul alive, but to slay them all with the Sword. He even bound himself to it by an Oath, and if he did not execute this bloody Resolution, it was owing to Abigail, who came to pacify him with Presents and fair Words (11). Abigail was Nabal's Wife, a Woman of great Merit, handsome, witty, and so agreeable to David, that he married her after her Husband's Death (12). Now let us deal plainly: Is it not manifest, beyond Contradiction, that David was about to do a very criminal Action? He had no right to the Goods of Nabal, nor any Authority to punish him for his Incivility. He was roving up and down the World with a Gang of trusty Friends: He might, indeed, have asked some Gratuity of those who could afford it; but if they refused, he ought to have taken it patiently, and he could not compel them to it by Military Execution, without plunging the World again into the dreadful Confusion, which they call the State of Nature, where no Law obtained but that of the stronger. What would one say now of a Prince of the Blood of France, who, being out of Favour at Court, should make his Escape, with such Friends as would be willing to share his Fortune? What Opinion, I say, could we entertain of him, if he went about raising Contributions in the Countries where he cantoned, and put to the Sword, in those Districts, all that refused to pay his Taxes? What would we say, if this Prince should fit out some Vessels to infest the Seas, in order to seize all the Merchant-Ships he could lay hold of? In truth, had Da- vid any more right to exact Contributions of Nabal, to massacre all the Men and Women in the Country of the Amalekites, &c. and to carry away all the Cattle he found there? If one should answer, that the Law of Nations, the Jus Belli & Pacis, about which so many fine Systems have been made, are now better known than formerly: and, therefore, such a Conduct was more excusable, in those Days, than now. I grant it; but, at the same time, the profound Respect we ought to have for this great Prince, this great Prophet, should not hinder us from disapproving the Blemishes that occur in his Life: otherwise we shall give occasion to Libertines to reproach us, and say, that, to determine an Action just, it is sufficient that it should be done by certain Persons we reverence. Nothing can be more prejudicial to Christian Morality. It is of great Importance to the true Religion, that the Lives of the Orthodox be judged by the general Notions of Justice and Order.

[E] Had he obtained his Desire, he would have fought against the Israelites.] Whilst David, with his little flying Camp, was employed in ravaging the Countries of the Infidels, wherever he could penetrate, the Philistines were preparing for War against the Israelites. They gathered all their Forces together. David, and his bold Adventurers, joined the Army of Achish, and would have fought like Lions against their Brethren, if the jealous Philistines had not obliged Achish to dismiss them. They were afraid that David, and his Men, in the Heat of Battle, would fall upon them, in order to make their Peace with Saul. When David understood that he must quit the Army because of these Suspensions, he was extremely concerned (13). He had a Mind, then, to contribute, with all his Might, to the Victory of the uncircumcised Philistines over his own Brethren, the People of God, the Professors of the true Religion. I leave it to nice Casuists to determine, whether or no these Sentiments became a true Israelite.

[F] His Reign was not disturbed, but by the wicked Attempts of his own Children.] The most remarkable of their wicked Attempts, was the Revolt of Abshalom, who forced this great Prince to fly from Jerusalem in a mournful Condition. He went with his Head covered, bare-footed, melting in Tears, and his Bars filled with the Lamentations of his faithful Subjects (14). Abshalom entered Jerusalem as in Triumph; and, that his Party might not abate of their Zeal, from a Notion that this Difference between Father and Son would be made up, he did one thing sufficient to make them believe he should never be reconciled to David. He lay with the ten Concubines of This Prince, in the sight of every body (15). It is very likely, this Crime would have been forgiven: the extreme Affliction, into which his Death threw David, is a Proof of it. David was the best Father that ever lived: his Indulgence to his Children was excessive, and he himself was the first that suffered for it. For, had he punished the infamous Action of his Son Amnon, as it deserved (16), he would not have had the Shame and Sorrow to see another revenge the Injury done to Tamar: and had he chastized, as he ought, the Person who revenged this Injury, he would not have run the hazard of being entirely dethroned. David had the Fate of

(13) And David did unto Achish, But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant, so long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my Lord the King? 1 Sam. chap. xxix, ver. 8.

(14) 2 Sam. chap. xv.

(15) Ibid. chap. xvi.

(16) He revivified Tamar, and was killed for this Crime by the Order of Abshalom, who was Tamar's own Brother, both by Father and Mother. Ibid. chap. xiii.

(17) Ibid. chap.
xv, ver. 34, &c.

duced to the low Condition, in which Samuel found him. Humanly speaking, this Reverse of Fortune would have been unavoidable [G], if he had not found some Persons about his Son Abshalom, who acted the Part of Traitors (y). David's Piety is so conspicuous in his Psalms, and in many of his Actions, that we cannot sufficiently admire it. But there is another thing no less wonderful in his Conduct, viz. that he knew so happily how to reconcile so much Piety with the loose Maxims of the Art of Governing. It is generally believed, that his Adultery with Bathsheba, the Murder of Uriah, and the Numbering of the People, are the only Faults he can be charged with. But it is a great Mistake. There are many other things in his Life that deserve Censure [H]. He is a Sun of Holiness in the Church: he there diffuses, by his Writings, a fruitful Light of Consolation

of the most part of great Princes: he was unfortunate in his own Family. His eldest Son ravished his own Sister, and was killed by one of his Brothers for that Incest: the Author of this Fratricide lay with the Concubines of David. What Scandal is here given to pious Souls, to see so much Infamy in the Family of this King!

[G] He was very near being reduced to the Condition — in which Samuel found him — this reverse of Fortune was unavoidable. We may see by this Example, that there is no depending upon the Fidelity of the People; for, in short, David was both a great and good King. He was beloved, he was esteemed, and had all imaginable Zeal for the Religion of his Country. His Subjects, therefore, had reason to be satisfied, and if they had been to chuse a Prince, could they have wished him better qualified? Nevertheless, they were so unsteady in their Duty to David, that his Son Abshalom, in order to get himself declared King, needed only to make himself popular for some time, and keep some emissaries in each Tribe. This Maxim, Casta est quam nemo rogavit, — She is a chaste Woman that has never been solicited, may very well be applied to the People. The reason we do not see Princes oftener dethroned, is, because the People have not been solicited to revolt by Intrigues well enough managed. Nothing else is necessary: if the Prince be not wicked, it is they know how to make him pass for such, or for a Slave to wicked Counsel. Pretences are never wanting, and provided they be artfully supported, they pass for a just Reason, how weak soever they are in themselves.

[H] It is generally believed, that his Adultery, &c. are the only Faults he can be charged with. — There are many other things in his Life that deserve censure. I have already taken notice of some of them, which happened while he was a private Person: here are others which relate to the time of his Reign.

I. His Polygamy cannot well be excused: for, tho' God permitted it in those Days, we must not think one might stretch it very far, without indulging too much to Sensuality. Michal, the second Daughter of Saul, was David's first Wife: She was taken from him during his Disgrace (17): he married successively several others (18), and still continued to demand back the first. Before she could be restored to him, she must be forced from a Husband that loved her exceedingly, and who followed her as far as he could, crying like a Child (19). David did not scruple to match with a Daughter of an uncircumcised Prince (20): and tho' he had Children by several Wives, yet he took Concubines at Jerusalem. Undoubtedly, he chose the handsomest he could find: so we cannot say, with regard to the Pleasures of Love, that he took much pains to mortify Nature.

II. When he heard of Saul's Death, he bethought himself, without loss of Time, how to secure the Succession. He went to Hebron, and as soon as he arrived there, the whole Tribe of Judah, abersuf be had gained the chief Men by presents, owned him for King (21). If Abner had not preserved the rest of the Succession for the Son of Saul, doubtless, by the same Method, I mean the gaining the chief Men by presents, David would have been King of all Israel. But what happened after Abner by his Fidelity had kept eleven entire Tribes for Ishbosheth: the very same thing that would happen between two infidel and most ambitious Kings. David and Ishbosheth, made continual War upon each other (22), to see which of the two should get the other's Portion, in order to enjoy the whole Kingdom without Division. What I am going to say is much worse. Abner, displeased with the King his Master, contrives to strip him of his Dominions, and to deliver them up to David: He communicates his Design to David: He goes to him himself to concert with him the means of bringing it about. David lends an Ear to this treacherous Villain, and is well pleased to get a Kingdom by Intrigues of this nature (23). Can it be said these are the Actions of a Saint? I own there is nothing in them but what is agreeable to the Maxims of Policy, and the Ways of human Prudence: but it can never be proved, that the strict Laws of Equity, and rigid Morals of a faithful Servant of God, can allow of this Conduct. It is to be observed, David did not pretend that the Son of Saul reigned by Usurpation; he granted he was a righteous Man (24), and consequently a lawful King.

III. I am of the same Mind, as to the Cunning David made use of, during Abshalom's Revolt. He would not suffer Hushai, one of his best Friends, to accompany him; he ordered him to go over to the Party of Abshalom, that he might give bad Counsels to this rebellious Son, and be able to inform David of all the Designs of the new King (25). This Cunning, without doubt, is very commendable, if we judge of things according to human Prudence, and the Policy of Princes. It saved David, and from that Age, even to our own inclusively, has produced a Multitude of Adventures, beneficial to some and destructive to others; but a rigid Casuist will never take this Cunning for an Action worthy of a Prophet, a Saint, a righteous Man. A good Man, as such, will rather lose a Crown, than be the Cause of his Friend's Damnation: now, it is to damn our Friend, as much as in us lies, to push him on to commit a Crime; and it is a crime to pretend, with Zeal, to espouse the Party of a man: to pretend it, I say, with a view to ruin that man, by giving him bad Counsels, and discovering all the Secrets of his Cabinet. Is it possible for one to act a more treacherous part than Hushai did? As soon as he perceives Abshalom, he cries out God save the King, God save the King; and when he was asked, how he came to be so ungrateful, as not to accompany his intimate Friend, he gives himself devout Airs, and alleges reasons of conscience, His will I be, says he, whom the Lord hath chosen (26).

IV. When David, by reason of old age, could not be warmed by all the cloaths they covered him with, it was thought proper to seek for a young virgin, who might take care of and lie with him. He suffered them to bring to him for this purpose, the most beautiful girl they could find (27). Now, can this be said to be the action of a very chaste man? Will a man who is filled with the Ideas of Purity, and intirely resolved to do what Order and good Morals require of him, ever consent to these remedies? Is it possible to consent to them without preferring the instincts of Nature, and the interests of the flesh to those of the Spirit of God?

V. David has been blamed long since, for having committed a flagrant piece of Injustice against Mephibosheth, the Son of his dear Friend Jonathan. The fact is, David no longer fearing the Faction of King Saul, was pleased to shew himself liberal to all those who might still remain of that Family. He heard, that a poor lame man called Mephibosheth, the Son of Jonathan, was yet alive; he sent for him, and gave him all the Land that had belonged to King Saul, and commanded Ziba, an old Servant of that Family, to improve it for him, and for the Maintenance of Mephibosheth's Son: as to Mephibosheth himself, he was to eat as long as he lived at King David's Table (28). When this Prince made his escape from Jerusalem, that he might not fall into the hands of Abshalom, he met Ziba, who brought him some Provisions, and told him in one word, that Mephibosheth staid at Jerusalem, in hopes of recovering the Kingdom amidst these Revolutions. Upon which, David gave him all that belonged to Mephibosheth (29). After the death of Ab-

(13) Ibid. chap.
iii.

(24) Ibid. chap.
iv, ver. 11.

(25) Ib. ch. xv.

(26) Ibid. chap.
xvi, ver. 18.

(27) 1 Kings,
chap. i.

(28) 2 Sam.,
chap. ix.

(29) Ib. ch. xvii
salom,

(17) 1 Sam.
chap. xxv, ver.
44.

(18) 2 Sam.
chap. iii, and v.

(19) Ibid. chap.
iii, ver. 16.

(20) Talmai,
King of Geshur.
Ibid. ver. 3.

(21) Histoire de la Vie de David par l'Abbé de
Cibisi, pag. 47.

(22) 2 Sam.
chap. iii, ver. 1.

folation and Piety, which cannot be enough admired; but that Sun had it's Spots, and even in his dying Words we find the Obliquities of Politics [1]. The Holy Scripture relates salom, he found Ziba had been a false Accuser, and yet took from him but the half of what he had given him, and restored to Mephibosheth only the half of his Estate. Some Authors pretend that this Injustice, which was so much the greater as David had been infinitely obliged to Jonathan, was the reason God permitted Jeroboam to rend in two the Kingdom of Israel (30). But it is certain, the Sins of Solomon were the Cause that God permitted this Division (31). All the Interpreters have not left David without Apology. Some pretend, that Ziba's Accusation was not unjust, or at least it was grounded upon so much probability, that one might give credit to it without being guilty of a rash Judgment (32). But there are not many of this Opinion. Most of the Fathers and Moderns believe, that Ziba was a Slanderer, and that David suffered himself to be imposed on. The Opinion of Pope Gregory is to be taken particular notice of: he owns Mephibosheth was falsely accused, and yet pretends that the Sentence which deprived him of all his Estate was just. This he maintains for two Reasons: First, because David pronounced it; secondly, because a secret Judgment of God interposed in it. 'Non me latet, præter Interpretes in contrarium supra adductos, S. Gregorium contra Davidem stare lib. 1, Dialo. c. 4. Quamvis enim ait, latam a Davide contra innocentem Jonathan filium sententiam, quia per Davidem lata est, & occulto Dei judicio pronunciata, iustam credi, tamen disertè agnoscit Mephibosethum fuisse innocentem. Ex quo aperte sequitur sententiam Davidis non fuisse iustam. In quo cogimur S. Gregorio non adherere; cum competissimè sit Davidis sanctitas; nec eum postea facillè huiusmodi dispendium aliunde confect (33).—Besides the Interpreters above quoted for the contrary Opinion, I know St Gregory is against David l. 1. dialo. cap. 4. For tho' he says, the Sentence of David against the innocent Son of Jonathan is believed to be just, because it was passed by David, and pronounced by the secret Judgment of God, yet he expressly acknowledges that Mephibosheth was innocent. From whence it evidently follows, that the Sentence of David was not just. In which I am forced to differ from S. Gregory; since the Holiness of David is very well known, and it does not appear that he afterwards repaired this Injury. The Author I quote goes another way to work; since the Holiness of David, says he, is very well known, and since he never ordered that Satisfaction should be made for the wrong done to Mephibosheth, we must conclude the Sentence was just. This is to establish a very dangerous Principle: one would be no longer at liberty to examine by the Notions of Morality the Actions of the ancient Prophets, in order to condemn those which are not conformable thereto; and so, Libertines might accuse our Casuists of approving certain Actions, which are manifestly unjust: of approving them, I say, in favour of some Men, and thro' respect of Persons. Let us say rather, and apply to the Saints what has been said of great Wits, Nullum sine venia placuit ingenium. The greatest Saints have sometimes need of a Pardon.

VI. I shall say nothing of what Michal, one of David's Wives, reproached him with, in regard to the Figure he made when he danced in public. If he had uncovered his Nakedness, the Action might pass for an ill one, morally speaking; but if he only made himself contemptible by his Postures, and by not supporting the Dignity of his Character, it was at most but an imprudence, and not a crime. We must consider well upon what occasion he danced: it was when the Ark was brought up to Jerusalem (34); and consequently the excess of his Joy, and of his Capers, testified his Attachment and Sensibility for holy things. A modern Author has endeavoured to justify the Nakedness of Francis of Assise by that of David: Michal, David's wife, says he (35), having seen from a window her husband, who, being transported with an holy fervour, leaped and danced before the Ark of the Lord, despised him in her heart, and, rallying him, said, How glorious was the King of Israel to day, who uncovered himself in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself! These last words of the Holy Text seem to intimate that David stripped himself stark naked; however, as the same text (ver. 14.), speaking of David's dance before the Ark, says he was girded with a linnen ephod, I do not think he was quite naked. But he uncovered himself so much, that he seemed to be naked, and that it was thought unbecoming the Gravity and Majesty of a King; especially as it was done publicly and before a great multitude. The action of David, attended with all these Circumstances, is not more justifiable than that of St Francis, who had very few Spectators (36): so that if the action of the one deserves censure, that of the other cannot be exempted from it; and indeed we read that Michal derided him for it. But let us see whether the Holy Spirit did so; and we shall judge by that whether we ought to ridicule the action of St Francis. Afterwards he relates the Answer David made to Michal, and what the Scripture observes concerning her Barrenness. A great many Ladies would deserve to be barren, if the having Michal's Tattle were a sufficient reason for it. It would be thought very strange all over Europe, if, upon a Day of Procession of the Holy Sacrament, Kings should dance in the Streets without any thing but a little Sash round the waist.

VII. The Conquests of David shall be the subject of my last Observation. There are some rigid Casuists, who do not think a Christian Prince can lawfully engage in a War, thro' a Desire only of aggrandizing himself. These Casuists approve of no Wars but those that are defensive, or in general such as tend only to restore to every one his own. At this rate, David had frequently undertaken unjust Wars: for, besides that the holy Scripture represents him pretty often as the Aggressor, we find he extended the bounds of his empire from Egypt to the Euphrates (37). That we may not then condemn David, it is better to say that Conquests may sometimes be permitted; and therefore we ought to take care, lest, in exclaiming against modern Princes, we should inadvertently asperse this great Prophet.

But if, generally speaking, the Conquests of this holy Monarch were glorious to him, without prejudice to his Justice, we can hardly agree they were so when we come to Particulars. Let us not by Conjectures rake into Secrets, which History has not revealed: Let us not conclude, that because David was pleased to make an Advantage of Abner's and Hushai's Treachery, therefore he practised all manner of Cunning against the infidel Princes, whom he subdued. Let us confine ourselves intirely to what the sacred History tells us of the way in which he treated the Conquered. And he brought forth the people that were in Rabbah (38), and put them under saws, and under barrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln: and thus he did unto all the cities of the children of Ammon (39). The Geneva Bible observes in the Margin of this Verse, that these were kinds of capital Punishments used in former times. Let us see how he treated the Moabites: He measured them with a line casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he, to put to death: and with one full line to keep alive (40). That is, he had a mind to put to death exactly two thirds, neither more nor less (41). Idumea met with rougher Usage; for there he ordered all the Males to be slain: six months did Joab remain there with all Israel, until he had cut off every male in Edom (42). Can one say, this way of making War is not to be condemned? Have not even the Turks and Tartars a little more Humanity? And if an infinite number of Pamphlets exclaim every day against the military Executions of our own time, which are indeed harsh, and much to be blamed, but gentle when compared with those of David, what would the Authors of these Pamphlets say, if they had the Saws, the Harrows, the Brick-kilns of David to complain of, and the general Massacre of all Males, old and young?

[1] And even in his dying Words we find the obliquities of Politics. Understand me right: I do not mean that David in this condition did not speak according to his Mind: but that the plain and free manner, in which he opened his Heart, shews he had formerly, upon two remarkable Occasions, sacrificed Justice to Interest. He knew very well Joab deserved Death, and to let the Murders, whereof he had been guilty, go unpunished, (30) Id gravis peccati iniquitatis erga innoxium Mephibosethum, damnant Abulenſis 2 Reg. 16, q. 6, &c. 10, q. 20, & Richelins, ac Cajetanus ibi: nec non Salianus anno mundi 3010, à n. 21. & alii plerique antea, ut Lyranus Hugo, Rabanus, alique quibus ob hanc iniquitatem in Mephibosethum, nexa cum infidelitate magna & ingratitude in Jonathan ejus patrem, vium est scissum esse sub Roboano Dividis regnum. Et ita v. detur alteri apud Hieronymum in Tradit. Hebr. ad lib. 2, Reg. cap. 19. Theoph. Raynaudus, Hist. lib. 2, Sect. 2, Serie, 2, cap. x, pag. m. 231.

(31) 1 Kings, chap. xi, ver. 11.

(32) Vide Petrum Joannem Olivii apud Th. Raynaud. Hist. lib. 2, chap. 3, pag. 523, & apud Raynaud. pag. 232.

(33) Theoph. Raynaud. pag. 232.

(34) 2 Sam. chap. vi.

(35) Ferrand, Reponſe à l'Apologie pour la Reformation, pag. 364, 365.

(36) Francis of Assise being brought by his Father to the Bishop to renounce his Patrimony, and give up every thing he had, he delivered to his Father his very Cloaths, and stripped himself stark naked before the Company. The Bishop rose from his Seat, and covered him with his Cloak. Bonaventure, Life of St Francis, quoted by Ferrand, Reponſe à l'Apologie pour la Reformation, pag. 363, 364.

(37) L'Abbé de Choſi, Histoire de la Vie de David, pag. 64.

(38) This was the chief City of the Ammonites.

(39) 2 Sam. ch. xii, ver. 31.

(40) Ibid. chap. viii, ver. 2.

(41) See the Note of the Geneva Bible.

(42) 1 Kings, chap. xi, ver. 15.

(20) See Remark
[1] towards the end.

lates them only historically, and therefore every one is at liberty to pass a Judgment upon them (2). Let us conclude with saying, that the History of David may comfort many crowned Heads against the Alarms, which rigid Casuists may give them, in maintaining, that it is hardly possible for a King to be saved. The Life of that great Prince, published by the Abbot de Choisi, is a good Book, and would be much more useful, if he had taken the Pains to set down in the Margin the Year of each Fact, and the Places of the Bible, or Josephus, upon which he grounds his Assertions. A Reader would be glad to know, whether what he reads flows from a sacred or prophane Source. I shall not observe many Faults in Moreri [K]. The

Article

(43) 1 Kings,
chap. ii, ver. 6.

(44) 2 Sam.
chap. xvi, ver.
5, &c.

(45) Ibid. chap.
xii, ver. 19, &c.

(46) 1 Kings,
chap. ii, ver. 9.

(47) 1 Sam.
ch. xxii, ver. 2.

(48) The Words of Shimei, according to the Scripture, are these: Come out,
thou bloody man,
and thou man of Rebel: the Lord hath returned upon thee all the Blood of the House of Saul,
in whose stead
thou hast reigned,
and the Lord hath delivered the kingdom into the hands of Abi-sai thy son, and behold thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody
man. 2 Sam.
chap. xvi, ver.
7, 8.

(49) Antiq. lib.
7, chap. 8, pag.
220.

was a manifest injustice against Law and Reason. Nevertheless, Joab had kept his Posts, his Credit, and Authority. He was a brave Man; he served the King his Master faithfully, and to good purpose: and there was reason to fear some mutiny, if they had attempted to punish him. These were political Reasons, which made the Laws give place to Advantage. But, when David had no further Occasion for this General, he ordered him to be put to Death: This was one of the Articles of his last Will (43). Solomon his Successor was charged with the like order against Shimei. This Man, knowing David had made his escape from Jerusalem in great disorder, upon the account of Abisai's Revolt, came to insult him by the way, and used reproaches yet harder than the Stones he threw at him (44). David bore this injury very patiently; he acknowledged and adored the Hand of God in it, with marks of singular Piety; and when his Affairs were re-established, he pardoned Shimei, who was one of the first that came to submit themselves, and implore his Mercy (45). David swore to him he would not put him to Death, and kept his Word to his Death-bed; but finding himself in this condition, he gave a charge to his Son to kill him (46); a plain Proof that he suffered him to live only to get himself at first the Name of a merciful Prince, and afterwards to avoid being reproached to his Face for having broken his promise. I should be glad to know, whether, in strictness of Speech, a Man, who promises Life to his Enemy, performs his promise, when by his last Will he orders him to be put to Death.

From what I have said, in this and the foregoing Remarks, it may be easily inferred, that if the Syrians had been such Libel-Makers, as the Europeans are now a-days, they would have strangely disfigured the glory of David. With what Epithets, with what infamous Names would they have branded that Troop of Banditti, that came to join him, after he retired from the Court of Saul? The Scripture informs us, that all those who were persecuted by their Creditors, all Malecontents, and all those who were in Distress, gathered themselves unto him, and he became their Captain (47). Nothing can be liable to a worse Construction than this. The Historians of Catiline and Cæsar would furnish Colours enough for a satirical Picture. History has preserved a small Specimen of the reproaches, to which David was exposed among Saul's Friends. This Specimen shews they accused him of being a Man of Blood, and that they considered the revolt of Abisai, as a just Punishment for the Mischief, which they said he had done to Saul, and to all his House. I put the Words of Scripture in the Margin (48): and here follow those of Josephus (49): *Δαβὶδ δὲ γενομένην κατὰ χάρεμον ἔτα καλέμενον τόπον ἐπέρχεται τῷ Σαύλ συγγενὸς ὄνομα Σεμεὶ - - - καὶ λίθοις τε ἔβαλεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐκακῶν ἔβρι. φίλων καὶ σκεπτόντων ἔτι μᾶλλον βλασφημιῶν διεβίβλει, μισαφόνων καὶ πολλῶν ἀρχηγῶν κακῶν ἀποκαλῶν ἐκέλευε δὲ καὶ τῆς γῆς, ὡς ἐναρξῆ καὶ ἐπάρξων ἐξείναι, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ χάριν ἔχειν ὁμολογεῖ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτὸν ἀρελομένην, καὶ διὰ παιδὸς ἰδὲ τὴν ὑπὲρ ὧν ἡμαρτὴν εἰς διασπέρην δίκην αὐτῷ εἰσπεσέμεν. Davidi verò juxta locum Bachoram supervenit cognatus Sauli nomine Semeis . . . faxis eum simul & convitiis impetens, cumque amici eum protegerent, magis etiam exasperatus ad convitia sanguinarium & multorum malorum causam appellabat, jubens ut impurus ac execrabilis regione excederet; gratiaque agebat Deo quod per proprium filium poenam peccatorum ab illo exigeret, & eorum quæ olim in dominum suum commiserat. — But a Kinsman of Saul, whose Name was Shimei, came out upon David near Bahurim, . . . falling upon him at once with Stones and Curses; and as his Friends protested him, the more he reviled him, calling him a bloody Man, and the Author of much* mischief, and thanked GOD for taking the Kingdom from him, and for making his own Son the Instrument of his Punishment, because of those things he had done against his Master. But they exaggerated Matters: It is true, David according to the Testimony of God himself was a Man of Blood; and therefore God would not permit him to build the Temple (50). It is true likewise, that, to pacify the Gibeonites, he delivered to them two Sons, and five Grandsons of Saul, who were all seven hanged (51). But it is false, that he ever made an attempt, either upon the Life or the Crown of Saul.

Those, who shall think it strange that I speak my Mind about some Actions of David, compared with natural Morality, are desired to consider three Things: I. They themselves are obliged to own, that the conduct of this Prince towards Uriah, is one of the greatest Crimes which can be committed. There is then only a difference of more to less between them and me: For, I agree with them, that the other Faults of this Prophet did not hinder his being filled with Piety, and a great Zeal for the glory of God. He was subject alternately to Passions and Grace. This is a Misfortune attending our Nature since the Fall of Adam. The Grace of God very often directed him: but on several Occasions Passion got the better: Policy silenced Religion. II. It is very allowable for private Persons, like me, to judge of Facts contained in Scripture, when they are not expressly characterized by the holy Spirit. If the Scripture in relating an Action condemns or praises it, none can appeal from this judgment: every one ought to regulate his Approbation or Censure upon the Model of Scripture. I have not acted contrary to this Rule: the Facts, upon which I have advanced my humble Opinion, are related in the holy Scripture, without any mark of Approbation affixed by the Spirit of God (52). III. It would be doing an injury to the Eternal Laws, and consequently to the true Religion, to give Libertines Occasion to object, that when a Man has been once inspired by God, we look upon his Conduct as the Rule of Manners; so that we should not dare to condemn the Actions of People, though most opposite to the notions of Equity, when such an one has done them. There is no Medium in this Case; either these Actions are not good, or Actions like them are not evil; now, since we must chuse either the one or the other, is it not better to take care of the Interests of Morality, than the glory of a private Person? Otherwise, will it not be evident, that one chuses rather to expose the Honour of God than that of a mortal Man?

[K] I shall not observe many Faults in Moreri. Only five.

I. David was Twenty two Years of Age, when Samuel anointed him with the Oil designed for the Consecration of Kings. This is inconsistent with what follows, and with what goes before. That Author had been saying that David was born in the Year of the World 2950; and a little while after he tells us, that David conquered Goliath in the Year of the World 2971. It is plain, that the Victory over Goliath was obtained after the Anointing of David; whereas, according to Moreri, the Ceremony of the Uncction was not performed till a Year after that Victory. To mend this Fault, it must be said, that David received the Uncction at twenty Years of Age (53). The rest needs no correction; for it is true that David conquered Goliath the Year after his Uncction.

II. It is not true that Saul renewed his Persecution against David, when the latter had twice obtained from doing him the least Harm, having the most favourable Opportunity in the World for it. It is somewhat surprising, that the Scripture, in order to aggravate Saul's Crime, does not observe that he soon repented of his Reconciliation with David, and that he made himself guilty of a black Ingratitude. In the (50) 1 Chron.

chap. xxii, ver.
8, and ch. xxviii,
ver. 3.

(51) 2 Sam.
chap. xxi, ver. 6.

A N important Advice upon what has been said above.

(52) I have observed, the Scripture informs us,
that David confessed and followed the Orders of God, whom he was to repel
the Aggressors,
1 Sam. chap.
xxiii and xxx;
but that he did not consult God,
when he intended to destroy Nabal, nor when he was going to destroy the Neighbours of King Achish, and made him
believe he ravaged the Dominions of Saul:
This is a Sign
God did not approve such kind of Actions.

(53) According to Calvisius, he was born in the
Year of the World 2860, and anointed
by Samuel in the
Year of the World 2880, and he killed Goliath
the Year after.

Twenty

Article of David, which I have just read in the Dictionary of the Bible, will supply me with Matter enough for a Remark [L]. I forgot to observe, that David ought not to be Twenty fourth Chapter of the First Book of Samuel, he is informed, that David, having it in his Power to kill him in a Cave, would do him no kind of Harm: he admires that Generosity; he desires God to reward it; he acknowledges that the Crown is designed for David; he recommends his Family to him, and returns to his House. In the Twenty sixth Chapter of the same Book, he hears, that David, having it in his Power to kill him in the Night in his Tent, goes away without doing him any harm; he admires that Generosity; he gives David his Blessing; he foretells him all manner of Prosperity, and goes Home. Moreri pretends that these two things, so like one another, happened in one Year. I repeat it again. It is somewhat surprising, that the Scripture does not make use of the first of those two Facts, to make Saul's Obstinacy in persecuting his Son-in-law more odious. Two or three lines would have had a great effect: The Reader would have been shocked to see that Saul, indebted to his Son-in-law for his Life, praises him, admires him, gives him a thousand Blessings, and yet a little while after pursues him to destroy him. Doubtless the Laws of a Narration require, that, in speaking of this new Pursuit, it should be observed, that it was a Violation of that solemn Agreement that followed the Adventure of the Cave; and yet there is not one title in the Scripture concerning that Circumstance. Here are other Subjects of surprise. David, representing to Saul that he did not deserve the Persecution he suffered, and that he could have killed him in his Tent, did not represent that it was the second time he had the King's Life in his Hands, and that the King had soon forgot what had happened in the Cave. Saul on his part, who owns himself in the wrong, and who speaks to David in most obliging Terms, does not observe that it is the second time that he owes his Life to him. It must be confessed that such Circumstances do not use to be forgotten. Moreover we see that, in the first of those two Adventures, David and Saul use almost the same Words as in the second. If I saw two Narratives of this Nature either in Ælian, or in Valerius Maximus, I should make no difficulty to believe that it is one and the same Fact, which having been reported two different ways, served for the Subject of two Articles, or of two Chapters. The Fact would be this: David, having Saul's Life in his Hands, who was his cruel Persecutor, did carefully preserve it. The two ways of relating it, would be, I. That Saul, being obliged by a natural necessity to go aside from his Men, went into a Cave where David was. II. That David slipped in the Night into Saul's Tent, the Guards being in a deep Sleep. I leave it to Father Simon, and the Critics of his Rank, to examine whether it be possible, that the Historical Books of the Old Testament should relate the same thing twice. It seems to me that the Action of the Ziphites, related in the Twenty third Chapter of the First Book of Samuel, is not different from that which is related in the Twenty sixth Chapter of the same Book. Whoever goes about to compare those two Accounts, will doubtless be of my Opinion. What is very certain, is, that Saul did not persecute David after the second Reconciliation. This is Moreri's second Fault.

The III^d consists in his saying, that David was so well received by Achish, King of Gath, that his new Favour was like to make the Grandeess rebel. There is not one Word of Truth in all this, and I see nothing that might occasion that Falsity, but the Suspicions that were entertained of David, when they saw him with his Men in the Rear of the Army of the Philistines. The Commanders would absolutely have had him return into the City that was given him (54). There was a great Difference between those Commanders, and the Grandeess of the King of Gath's Court.

IV. The pretended Discontent of the Grandeess did not oblige David to retire from that Court. But he retired out of Respect: he feared that he and his Men should incommode the Prince by their Abode in the chief City: therefore he desired Achish to assign him another Place to live in, which was granted him. This happened before the Commanders of the Philistines required that David should march out of their Camp.

V. Moreri should not have said, that David returned to Ziklag, since he had not said that he had already sojourned there.

[L] The Article of DAVID in the Dictionary of the Bible will supply me with Matter for a Remark.] The Printers were come thus far, when a Dictionary was shewed me (55), which I consulted immediately at the Article of the Prophet David, and I find some Passages in it that give me occasion to make the following Observations. I. It is not true that David was born One hundred and ten Years before the Birth of JESUS CHRIST: there is above One thousand Years (56) between the Birth of the one and the Birth of the other. II. He ought not to have suppressed the Incursions made by David on the Allies of his Patron, nor the Lye he made use of, in persuading King Achish, that he made them on the Lands of the Israelites. Neither ought he to have suppressed the unjust War he made on That People: he put to the Sword both Men and Women. It is not allowable, in a Dictionary, to imitate the Panegyricists, who take only the fair side of a Character: The Author should act the Historian; he should relate both the Good and the Bad; it is what the Scripture has done. III. One cannot then approve the Affectation, which appears here, of saying nothing of David's Artifices, both against Ishbosheth, and against Absalom, and of mentioning only the Wars, in which David was first attacked. Should not some notice have been taken of Those, in which the Scripture represents him as the Aggressor, and of the astonishing Severity with which he treated the Vanquished? IV. The Author does worse than suppress; he supposes, without the Authority of the Scripture, that the Syrians, the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the other neighbouring People, attacked David. The sacred History plainly intimates, that they only endeavoured to defend themselves, in which they failed of Success (57). V. He supposes likewise, with as little Foundation in the Scripture, that this Prince married the young Girl, who was brought to him, to endeavour to keep him warm. I could excuse him this, without injuring what I have said concerning this fine Method of reviving the natural Heat. The least rigid of our modern Casuists, I believe, would not judge it fit that an old Man, utterly incapable of consummating the Marriage, should wed a young Girl, with the sole view of warming his Feet and Hands by her Side. Without doubt, they would think him guilty of a Sin, and that he would cause his Comfort to sin likewise. VI. The Author strives to remove the Difficulty that is obvious to all Readers, when they consider that Saul did not know David on the Day that Goliath was killed; I say he strives to remove it, and intangles himself more than he should; for he says in one place (58), that David, being seventeen Years of Age, went to play on the Harp before Saul; and, in another (59), he gives him but fourteen or fifteen Years, and the Stature of a very little Boy. A little after, going about to refute those who say, that the Fight with Goliath preceded the playing on the Harp, he raises a specious Objection against himself, grounded on this, viz. That those who proposed David as a fit Person to drive away, with his Music, the evil spirit that afflicted Saul, gave him the Character of a valiant Man and a good Warrior (60). I answer, says he, that it ought not to be concluded from these two words, Fortissimum & Bellicosum, that the Fight was before the playing on the Harp, since the Name of strong may be given to any one that is truly so according to his Age. Is it not a sign of great Strength to pursue Bears and Lions, and to fight with and choke them? This Answer supposes that David being, as yet very little, and a Youth of fourteen or fifteen Years of Age, fought with Lions, took them running, and strangled them, and might be called a strong Man, a Warrior, and a Man that spoke well. This Difficulty is great enough to deserve to be solved; how comes it then that our Author does not seem to have the least glimpse of it? Notwithstanding his Silence, the discerning Readers will easily perceive, that since David fought with Goliath at the Age of twenty one Years (61), he must have been near twenty Years of Age the first time he went to Saul's Court. And thus the Reason

(55) It is the Dictionary of the Bible compiled by Mr Simon, Priest, and Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693, in folio.

(56) 1090, according to Calvin.

(57) 1 Kings, chap. i.

(58) Pag. 249.

(59) Pag. 259.

(60) Et respondens unus de pueris ait, ecce vidi filium Isai Bethleemitem scientem pugnare, & fortissimum robore, virum bellicosum, &c. Ibid. pag. 249.

(61) It is the Supposition of the Author of the Dictionary of the Bible, pag. 249.

OBSERVATIONS upon a Narration in the Books of Samuel.

(54) 1 Sam. chap. 29.

be blamed for excluding his eldest Son from the Succession [M].

(61) He quotes the Author of the History of the Bible, who reckons eight Years between the first and the second time that Saul saw David, and who supposes that David was but fifteen Years of Age the first time.

Reason that our Author gives for the best, why Saul did not know David the Day he fought with Goliath, is insignificant (61). That Reason is, that a little Boy alters so much in his Face in seven Years time, that those who do not see him till after an Absence of seven Years do not know him again. This is not David's Case, and therefore some other Reasons must be alleged. The Author mentions those which several Commentators have imagined. If they do not fully satisfy those, whom it is no easy thing to satisfy, it must be ascribed to the nature of the Question. VII. The Author forgets the strongest Proof, that can be alleged, against those who will have it that David was not sent for to drive away the evil Spirit from Saul, till after his Fight with Goliath. He does not say that they confound the Order in which things are related in the Scripture; he does not say that Saul's Servant, who praised David for being strong, valiant, eloquent, and handsome, did not speak of the Victory obtained over Goliath. Now it is impossible to apprehend that those, who had a mind to recommend him to the King after that Combat, should have been so stupid as not to tell the Prince, in a Word, That same young Man, who killed Goliath, plays well upon Instruments, and he will cure you.

For fear of being too long, I shall not examine whether the Author has wanted Exactness in the rest of the Article. He has avoided the Inconveniency which I have observed in the Abbot de Cboisi; for he sets down the Years wherein David did such and such things.

[M] He ought not to be blamed for excluding his eldest Son. David left his Kingdom to Solomon, in prejudice of the Right of Primogeniture; a right, which in hereditary Crowns ought to be inviolably preserved, unless we would open a Door to a thousand Civil-Wars. Nevertheless, David had very good Reasons to set aside this Right, since Adonijah his eldest Son had been so impatient to reign, that he mounted the Throne before David's Breath was out of his Body (62). This good Father durst not shew his resentment against an Impatience, which in reality differed nothing from Ufurpation: he had always been very indulgent to his Children; and his almost decrepit age was not very proper to correct the easiness which accompanies tender Hearts; but Solomon's Mother, incited and directed by a Prophet (63), whom Adonijah had not invited to a Royal Festival (64), frustrated the Design: she and the Prophet obliged David to declare himself in favour of Solomon, and to give all necessary Orders for the Inauguration of this young Prince. Adonijah thought he was undone, and fled for Refuge to the horns of the Altar; but Solomon assured him he would do him no hurt, provided he behaved himself well (65). However, he caused him to be put to Death, for a Reason that seems frivolous enough: I mean because Adonijah had asked in Marriage the Shunamite, who had served to cherish David (66). This confirms what I said before, that this Royal Prophet was unfortunate in his Children. They had no natural affection, neither to him, nor one another. Here the wisest of them all sheds the Blood of his eldest Brother for a trifle: for, we must not imagine he would have put him to Death because of the Irregularity of his Love. All the Sons of David should have looked on the Shunamite as forbidden Fruit. Her Virginity had belonged to their Father; and he would actually have taken Possession of it, had he been able. Adonijah was therefore to blame to cast his Eyes upon this Girl; but it was not for this Reason his Brother killed him: it was because his demand roused the Jealousy of Solomon, and made him fear, that by the frequent practice of asking favours, he would soon bethink himself to make the best of his Birthright (67). A policy, in some respects, like that of the Ottomans, made him lose his Life.

(62) 1 Kings, chap. i.

(63) By the Prophet Nathan.

(64) 1 Kings, chap. i, ver. 10, and 26.

(65) Ibid, ver. 51, 52.

(66) Ib. chap. 14.

(67) 1 Kings, chap. ii, ver. 22.

Some EXCEPTIONS having been made by the Consistory of the Walloon Church of Rotterdam to the preceeding Article of DAVID, as it was drawn up in the first Edition of this Dictionary; Mr BAYLE, in compliance to the Desire of the Consistory, left out, in the second Edition, what he conceived had been disagreeable, and printed it in the following manner. (We have inserted both, as the same has been done in the subsequent Editions: viz. at Geneva 1715, Rotterdam 1720, Amsterdam 1730, and in France 1734.)

DAVID, King of the Jews, was one of the greatest Men in the World, even tho' we should not consider him as a Royal Prophet, who was after God's own Heart. The first time that the Scripture makes him appear on the Stage of the World (a), is to inform us that Samuel appointed him King, and performed the Ceremony of anointing him. David was then but a meer Shepherd. He was the youngest of the eight Sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite [A]. Afterwards the Scripture tells us, that he was sent to King

(a) 1 Sam. xvi, 13.

[A] He was the youngest of the Sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite. Jesse descended in a direct Line from Judah, one of the twelve Sons of Jacob, and dwelt at Bethlehem, a small City of the Tribe of Judah. Some Modern Rabbins say, that, when David was conceived, his Father Jesse did not think that he lay with his Wife, but with his Servant Maid, and thereby explain the seventh verse of the Fifty first Psalm, wherein David affirms, that he was shapen in Iniquity, and that his Mother conceived him in Sin. This, say they, signifies that his Father Jesse committed an Adultery in begetting him, because, though he begot him on his Wife, he believed that he begot him on his Servant Maid, upon whose Chastity he had made an Attempt (1). This Explication does not well agree with the Doctrine of Original Sin, and for that reason Father Barleacci (2), having mentioned that Opinion of the Modern Rabbins, thought himself obliged to examine whether the ancient Jews acknowledged the Truth of that Doctrine. If the Supposition of those Rabbins was true, they would be in the right to say, that Jesse had committed Adultery; but on the other side it must be said, that he would not have been guilty of it, if, sincerely believing that he was enjoying his Wife, he had got his Servant Maid with Child. This Rabbi-nical Supposition is very different from the Tradition mentioned by St Jerom. He says, that it was believed that Jesse, the Father of David, did never commit any actual Sin, and that there was no kind of Uncleaness in him but what he brought from his Mother's Womb. 'Mirum est quod de Isai patre Davidis refert Hieronymus, illum nunquam aliud peccatum commisisse quam quod ex origine contraxit. Quo enim loco legimus: Amasa filius Jesse ingressus est ad Abigail filiam Naas sororem Sarviae; sic Hieronymus 4, Naas interpretatur coluber, quia eum nullum admisisse mortiferum peribent peccatum, nisi quod originaliter de serpente antiquo contraxit. Est autem Naas qui & Isai pater David. Eandem traditionem refert Abulenensis 1, & monet Naas eundem esse qui & Jesse filius Isai patrem Davidis, quod quidem & antea Liranus 2 docuerat (3). — St Jerom relates something very singular of Jesse, Father of David, that he never was guilty of any Sin, except that which is called Original. For when we read, that Amasa went in to Abigail, the Daughter of Nabash, Sister to Zeruiab; 'Tunc St Jerom interpretis it: Nabash signifies a Serpent; for it is said, that he never committed any deadly Sin, but what he originally contracted from the old Serpent, and Nabash is the same with Jesse David'

† Lib. II, Reg. 17, 25.

† Hieron. Trad. Heb. in lib. 2. Reg. cap. 17.

† Tostat. 2. Reg. 17, Quest. 27.

* Liran. ibid.

(3) They are Father Camar's Words, pag. 126, 127, de rebena gestis Eliae.

(1) See the Journal des Savans, July 14, 1692, pag. 465, Dutch Edit.

(2) In Bibliotheca magna Rabbinica, Part. II, pag. 4, and Journal des Savans, ibid.

- (b) Ibid. ver. 20. King Saul (b), to cure him of his Fits of Frenzy, by the Sound of his Musical Instruments [B]. A Service of that Importance made him so much beloved by Saul, that he kept him in his House, and made him his Armour-Bearer (c). The Scripture says afterwards (d), that David used to go home from time to time to take care of his Father's Flocks, and that his Father sent him one Day to Saul's Camp, with some Provisions for three of his Sons that were in the Army. David, performing that Order, heard the Challenge that a Philistine, called Goliath, proud of his Strength and gigantic Stature, made daily to the Israelites, which none among them durst to accept. He expressed his great Desire to fight that Giant; whereupon he was brought to the King, and assured him that he should triumph over That Philistine. Saul gave him his Armour; but David, finding it troublesome, put it off, and resolved to make use only of his Sling; which he did so happily, that he brought down that Swaggerer with a Stone (e), and killed him afterwards with his own Sword, and cut off his Head, which he presented to Saul [C]. That Prince asked his General, when he saw David go against Goliath, Whose Son is this Youth (f) [D]? The General answered, that he did not know, and received Orders from Saul to enquire about it: but Saul heard it himself from that young Man; for, being brought to him after the Victory, he asked him, Whose Son art thou? and David answered him, that he was the Son of Jesse (g). Then Saul kept him in his Service, without suffering him to return to his Father (h). But because the Songs, that were sung in all the Cities, on the Defeat of the Philistines, ascribed ten times more Glory to David than to Saul (i), the King conceived a violent Jealousy, which increased daily, because the Employments, that he gave to David to keep him from Court, served only to make him more illustrious, and to procure him the Affection and Admiration of the Jews. By a false Policy he would make him his Son-in-law: he was in hopes that the Condition, on which he was to give him his second Daughter, would deliver him from that Object of his Aversion; but he was deceived in his Cunning. He asked an hundred Forekins of the Philistines for his Daughter's Dowry; David brought him two hundred in full tale (k): So that, instead of perishing in the Enterprize, as Saul hoped, he returned with a new Addition of Glory. He married Saul's Daughter, whereby he became

* David's Father. Abulenfis relates the same Tradition, and observes, that Nabab was the same with Isai or Jesse * David's Father; which Liranus had already observed. For the rest, those, who would adopt the Impertinence of the Rabbins concerning David's Conception, might easily admit another impertinent thing, which would be to place David in the number of illustrious Bastards. The Physical Reason, that is alleged, why Bastards are born so often with such great Natural Talents, might take place here on the Father's Part.

(a) That Book is entitled, Precetti da esser imparati dalle donne. See above, Rem. [A] of the Article ARODON.

(c) Precetti da esser imparati, cap. 100, pag. 67.

(f) Ancora che Hai non lo facesti con buona volontà dubitando che si pubblicasse sua vergogna. Ibid. pag. 68.

buono perché essendo la patrona vecchia, e la massera giovane, havea desiderio di haver altri figliuoli (7). A fine Apology this! If such Excuses would do, what a multitude of leud Women would be secured from Censure! Was there ever any Doctrine about the direction of the Intention more convenient than this?

[B] He was sent to King Saul to cure him of his Fits of Frenzy, by the sound of his Musical Instruments. Many things might be said on this Subject; but I refer you to the Collection of Caspar Læschnerus, Professor of Divinity at Wittenberg. Consult his Dissertatio Historico-Theologica de Saule per Musicam Curato. It was printed at Wittenberg in the Year 1688.

[C] He killed Goliath with his own Sword, and cut off his Head, which he presented to Saul. Goliath's Weapons were preserved as a Monument of the Glory of the Israelites. David carried them first into his Tent (8); but it is likely they were afterwards in a consecrated Place; for we read (9) that David, having asked the Priest Abimelech whether he had not a Spear or Sword for him, that Priest answered him: the Sword of Goliath is here wrapped up in a Cloth behind the Ephod; if thou wilt take that, take it. David caused it to be given him. As for the Head of Goliath, it was carried to Jerusalem (10), when David had chosen that City for the Capital of his Kingdom. Josephus says positively, that David himself consecrated Goliath's Sword to God (11).

[D] Saul asked his General — whose Son is this Youth? It is somewhat strange that Saul did not know David that Day, since that young Man had plaid several times on his Musical Instruments before him, to disperse those black Vapours that molested him. If such a Narrative as this should be found in Thucydides, or in Livy, all the Critics would unanimously conclude, that the Transcribers had transposed the Pages, forgot something in one Place, repeated something in another, or inserted some preposterous Additions in the Author's Work. But no such Suspicions ought to be entertained of the Bible. Nevertheless some have been so bold as to pretend, that all the Chapters, or all the Verses of the first Book of Samuel, are not placed as they were at first. It seems to me that the Abbot de Choisy removes the Difficulty much better. 'David was brought before Saul, says he (12), who did not know him at first, though he had seen him several times, when he sent for him to play on the Harp: but as this was many Years before, and David was very young, and came to Court in the Quality of a Musician, and was then dressed like a Shepherd, it can be no wonder

(7) Ib. pag. 69.

(8) 1 Sam. xii, 54.

(9) Ibid. chap. xxi, ver. 8, 9.

(10) Ibid. cap. xvii, ver. 54.

(11) Joseph. Antiq. lib. 6, cap. 11, & 14.

(12) Choisy, Histoire de la Vie de David, pag. 8, 9, Dutch Edit. 1692.

- (l) Ibid. ver. 29. became still more formidable to the King (l): all his Expeditions against the Philistines were very prosperous; his Name grew famous; he was in very great Esteem (m); in-
 (m) Ibid. ver. 30. much that Saul, who knew his Son-in-law's Virtue much less, than the Humour of the People, imagined that the Death of David was the only thing that could secure him from being dethroned. He resolved then to be rid of him, and trusted his eldest Son with that Design, who, far from siding with his Father's Jealousy, gave David notice of that black Conspiracy (n). David fled, and was pursued from Place to Place, till he had given undeniable Proofs of his Probity and Fidelity to his Father-in-law, to whom he did no manner of harm on two favourable Opportunities (o), wherein he might easily have killed him; upon which Saul resolved to let him alone. But as David feared this Prince might resume his wicked Designs, he still kept upon his Guard. Nay, he provided himself a safer Place of Refuge, than before, in the Land of the Philistines (p). He asked of the King of Gath a Town to dwell in, from whence he made frequent Incur- sions into the Countries round about. After the Death of Saul, he returned into Judea, and was there proclaimed King by the Tribe of Judab (q). Nevertheless, the other Tribes submitted to Ishboseth, the Son of Saul, which was effected by Abner's Fidelity (r).
 (n) Ibid. chap. xix, ver. 1, 2.
 (o) Ibid. chap. xxiv, and xxvi.
 (p) Ibid. chap. xxvii.
 (q) 2 Sam. chap. ii, ver. 4.
 (r) Ibid. ver. 8. Abner, who had been General of the Army under King Saul, placed Ishboseth upon the Throne, and supported him on it against the Attempts of David: but being full of Resentment, because Ishboseth reproved him for having taken one of Saul's Concu- bines (s), he entered into a Treaty with David to procure him the Kingdom of Ishboseth. The Negotiation would have been soon concluded, to the Satisfaction of David, if Joab (t), to revenge a private Quarrel, had not killed Abner. The Death of Abner only hastened the Ruin of the unfortunate Ishboseth. Two of his chief Captains slew him, and brought his Head to David, who, far from rewarding them for it, as they expected, ordered them both to be put to death (u). The Subjects of Ishboseth quickly submitted them- selves to David. This Prince had reigned seven Years and a half over the Tribe of Judab: afterwards he reigned about thirty Years over all Israel (x). This long Reign was remarkable for great Success, and glorious Conquests. It was not much disturbed but by the wicked Attempts of this Prince's own Children [E]. These are commonly the Enemies which Sovereigns have most reason to fear. David was very near being re- duced to the low Condition, in which Samuel found him. Humanly speaking, this Re- verse of Fortune would have been unavoidable [F], if he had not found some Persons about his Son Abshalom, who acted the Part of Traitors (y). David's Piety is so conspicuous in his Psalms, and in many of his Actions, that we cannot sufficiently admire it. He is a Sun of Holiness in the Church: he there diffuses, by his Writings, a fruitful Light of Con- solation and Piety, which cannot be enough admired; but that Sun had it's Spots [G]. The Life of that great Prince, published by the Abbot de Cboiss, is a good Book, and would be much more useful, if he had taken the Pains to set down in the Margin the Year of 'wonder that a King, full of Business, and whose Mind was disordered, should forget the Features of a young Man's Face, who had nothing considerable in him.' I only wish he had not said, I. That Saul had not seen David for many Years. II. That David was very young when he came to Saul's Court in the Quality of a Musician. There is no likelihood that he was much younger when he killed Goliath, than when he came the first time to Saul's Court; for when he made his first Journey, he was a mighty valiant Man, and a Man of War, and prudent in Matters (13); he was but Thirty Years of Age, when he was elected King after the Death of Saul; and there must be neces- sarily an Interval of many Years between the Death of Goliath, and that of Saul. See the Remark, wherein I criticize Moreri, and the Remark [I].

[F] His Reign was not disturbed, but by the wicked Attempts of his own Children.] The most remarkable of their wicked Attempts, was the Revolt of Abshalom, who forced this great Prince to fly from Jerusalem in a mournful Condition. He went with his Head covered, bare-footed, melting in Tears, and his Ears filled with the Lamentations of his faithful Subjects (14). Abshalom entered Jerusalem as in Triumph; and, that his Party might not abate of their Zeal, from a No- tion that this Difference between Father and Son would be made up, he did one thing sufficient to make them believe he should never be reconciled to David. He lay with the ten Concubines of This Prince, in the sight of every body (15). It is very likely, this Crime would have been forgiven: the extreme Affliction, in- to which his Death threw David, is a Proof of it. David was the best Father that ever lived: his Indul- gence to his Children was excessive, and he himself was the first that suffered for it. For, had he punished the infamous Action of his Son Amnon, as it deserved (16), he would not have had the Shame and Sorrow to see another revenge the Injury done to Tamar: and had he chastized, as he ought, the Person who re-

venged this Injury, he would not have run the haz- ard of being entirely dethroned. David had the Fate of the most part of great Princes: he was unfortunate in his own Family. His eldest Son ravished his own Sister, and was killed by one of his Brothers for that Incest: the Author of this Fratricide lay with the Con- cubines of David.

[F] He was very near being reduced to the Condition in which Samuel found him — this reverse of Fortune was unavoidable.] We may see by this Example, that there is no depending upon the Fidelity of the People; for, in short, David was both a great and good King. He was beloved, he was esteemed, and had all imaginable Zeal for the Religion of his Country. His Subjects, therefore, had reason to be satisfied, and if they had been to chuse a Prince, could they have wished him better qualified? Nevertheless, they were so unsteady in their Duty to David, that his Son Ab- salom, in order to get himself declared King, needed only to make himself popular for some time, and keep some emissaries in each Tribe. This Maxim, Castra est quam nemo rogavit, — She is a chaste Woman that has never been solicited, may very well be applied to the People. The reason we do not see Princes oftener de- throned, is, because the People have not been solli- cited to revolt by Intrigues well enough managed. No- thing else is necessary: if the Prince be not wicked, they know how to make him pass for such, or for a Slave to wicked Counsel. Pretences are never wanting, and provided they be artfully supported, they pass for a just Reason, how weak soever they are in themselves.

[G] David was a Sun of Holiness in the Church of GOD — but that Sun had it's Spots.] The num- bering of the People was a thing which GOD looked upon as a great Sin (17). His Amour with the Wife of Uriah, and the Orders he gave to cause the same Uriah to be killed (18), are two very enormous Crimes. But he was so troubled for them, and attoned by so

(17) 2 Sam. chap. xxiv.

(18) Ibid. chap. xi.

admirable

of each Fact, and the Places of the Bible, or Josephus, upon which he grounds his Assertions. A Reader would be glad to know, whether what he reads flows from a sacred or prophane Source. I shall not observe many Faults in Moreri [H]. The Article of David, which I have just read in the Dictionary of the Bible, will supply me with Matter enough for a Remark [I].

admirable a Repentance, that this Passage of his Life does not a little contribute to the Instruction and Edification of faithful Souls. We learn by it the Frailty of the Saints, and it is a Precept for Vigilance: We may learn thereby in what manner to lament our Sins, and it is an excellent Example. As to the Remarks, which some Critics would make, to shew that in some other Actions of his Life he deserved to be much blamed, I suppress them in this Edition, and with the more Pleasure, because some Persons, who are much more knowing in these kind of Matters than I, have assured me that all those Clouds of Objections are easily dispersed when it is remembered: I. That he was King by Divine Right during the Life of Saul. II. That he had with him the High Priest, who consulted God to know what was to be done. III. That the Order given to Jehoiada, to exterminate the Idolaters of Palestine, was still subsisting. IV. That many other Circumstances drawn from Scripture may convince us of David's Innocence in a Conduct, which considered in general seems to be an ill one, and which would be so at this time.

[H] I shall not observe many Faults in Moreri. Only five.

I. David was Twenty two Years of Age, when Samuel anointed him with the Oil designed for the Consecration of Kings. This is inconsistent with what follows, and with what goes before. That Author had been saying that David was born in the Year of the World 2950; and a little while after he tells us, that David conquered Goliath in the Year of the World 2971. It is plain, that the Victory over Goliath was obtained after the Anointing of David; whereas, according to Moreri, the Ceremony of the Uncction was not performed till a Year after that Victory. To mend this Fault, it must be said, that David received the Uncction at twenty Years of Age (19). The rest needs no correction; for it is true that David conquered Goliath the Year after his Uncction.

II. It is not true that Saul renewed his Persecution against David, when the latter had twice abstained from doing him the least Harm, having the most favourable Opportunity in the World for it. It is somewhat surprising, that the Scripture, in order to aggravate Saul's Crime, does not observe that he soon repented of his Reconciliation with David, and that he made himself guilty of a black Ingratitude. In the Twenty fourth Chapter of the First Book of Samuel, he is informed, that David, having it in his Power to kill him in a Cave, would do him no kind of Harm: he admires that Generosity; he desires God to reward it; he acknowledges that the Crown is designed for David; he recommends his Family to him, and returns to his House. In the Twenty sixth Chapter of the same Book, he hears, that David, having it in his Power to kill him in the Night in his Tent, goes away without doing him any harm; he admires that Generosity; he gives David his Blessing; he foretells him all manner of Prosperity, and goes Home. Moreri pretends that these two things, so like one another, happened in one Year. I repeat it again. It is somewhat surprising, that the Scripture does not make use of the first of those two Facts, to make Saul's Obstancy in persecuting his Son-in-law more odious. Two or three lines would have had a great effect: The Reader would have been shocked to see that Saul, indebted to his Son-in-law for his Life, praises him, admires him, gives him a thousand Blessings, and yet a little while after pursues him to destroy him. Doubtless the Laws of a Narration require, that, in speaking of this new Pursuit, it should be observed, that it was a Violation of that solemn Agreement that followed the Adventure of the Cave; and yet there is not one tittle in the Scripture concerning that Circumstance. Here are other Subjects of surprise. David, representing to Saul that he did not deserve the Persecution he suffered, and that he could have killed him in his Tent, did not represent that it was the second time he had the King's Life in his Hands, and that the King had soon forgot what had happened in the Cave. Saul on his part, who owns himself in the wrong, and who speaks to David in most obliging Terms, does not observe that it is the second time that he owes his Life to him. It must be confessed that such Circumstances do not use to be forgotten. Moreover we see that, in the first of those two Adventures, David and Saul use almost the same Words as in the second. If I saw two Narratives of this Nature either in Ælian, or in Valerius Maximus, I should make no difficulty to believe that it is one and the same Fact, which having been reported two different ways, served for the Subject of two Articles, or of two Chapters. The Fact would be this: David, having Saul's Life in his Hands, who was his cruel Persecutor, did carefully preserve it. The two ways of relating it, would be, I. That Saul, being obliged by a natural necessity to go aside from his Men, went into a Cave where David was. II. That David slept in the Night into Saul's Tent, the Guards being in a deep Sleep. I leave it to Father Simon, and the Critics of his Rank, to examine whether it be possible, that the Historical Books of the Old Testament should relate the same thing twice. It seems to me that the Action of the Ziphites, related in the Twenty third Chapter of the First Book of Samuel, is not different from that which is related in the Twenty sixth Chapter of the same Book. Whoever goes about to compare those two Accounts, will doubtless be of my Opinion. What is very certain, is, that Saul did not persecute David after the second Reconciliation. This is Moreri's second Fault.

The III^d consists in his saying, that David was so well received by Achish, King of Gath, that his new Favour was like to make the Grandeess rebel. There is not one Word of Truth in all this, and I see nothing that might occasion that Falsity, but the Suspicions that were entertained of David, when they saw him with his Men in the Rear of the Army of the Philistines. The Commanders would absolutely have had him return into the City that was given him (20). There was a great Difference between those Commanders, and the Grandeess of the King of Gath's Court.

IV. The pretended Discontent of the Grandeess did not oblige David to retire from that Court. But he retired out of Respect: he feared that he and his Men should incommode the Prince by their Abode in the chief City: therefore he desired Achish to assign him another Place to live in, which was granted him. This happened before the Commanders of the Philistines required that David should march out of their Camp.

V. Moreri should not have said, that David returned to Ziklag, since he had not said that he had already sojourned there.

[I] The Article of DAVID in the Dictionary of the Bible will supply me with Matter for a Remark.] The Printers were come thus far, when a Dictionary was shewed me (21), which I consulted immediately at the Article of the Prophet David, and I find some Passages in it that give me occasion to make the following Observations. I. It is not true that David was born One hundred and ten Years before the Birth of JESUS CHRIST: there is above One thousand Years (22) between the Birth of the one and the Birth of the other. II. The Author strives to remove the Difficulty that is obvious to all Readers, when they consider that Saul did not know David on the Day that Goliath was killed; I say he strives to remove it, and intangles himself more than he should; for he says in one place (23), that David, being seventeen Years of Age, went to play on the Harp before Saul; and, in another (24), he gives him but fourteen or fifteen Years, and the Stature of a very little Boy. A little after, going about to refute those who say, that the Fight with Goliath preceded the playing on the Harp, he raises a specious Objection against himself, grounded on this, viz. That those who proposed David as a fit Person to drive away, with his Music, the evil spirit that afflicted Saul, gave him the Character of a valiant Man and a good Warrior (25). I answer, says he, that it ought not to be concluded from these two words, Fortissimum & Bellicosum, that the Fight was before the playing on the Harp, since the Name of strong may be given to any one that is truly so according to his Age. Is it not a sign of great Strength

(19) According to Celsus, he was born in the Year of the World 2860, and anointed by Samuel in the Year of the World 2880, and he killed Goliath the Year after.

OBSERVATIONS upon a Narration in the Books of Samuel.

(20) Samuel chap. 29.

(21) It is the Dictionary of the Bible compiled by Mr Simon, Priest, and Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693, in folio.

(22) 1090, according to Calvisius.

(23) Pag. 249.

(24) Pag. 259.

(25) Et respondens unus de pueris ait, ecce vidi filium Isai Bethleemitem scientem pugnare, & fortissimum robore, virum bellicosum, &c. Ibid. pag. 249.

(60) It is the Supposition of the Author of the Dictionary of the Bible, pag. 249.

(61) He quotes the Author of the History of the Bible, who reckons eight Years between the first and the second time that Saul saw David, and who supposes that David was but fifteen Years of Age the first time.

(a) He is also called Aurat, d' Aurat, Dorat.

(b) Papyr. Masso in Elog. Jo. Aurati.

(c) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. m. 565.

(1) Papyr. Masso in Elogio Jo. Aurati.

(2) La Croix du Maine Biblioth. pag. 201.

(3) Menage, Remarq. sur la vie d'Ayrault, pag. 186. Baillet, Auteurs deguisez, pag. 155.

(4) Viz. The Custom of dining too soon.

(5) Coulon, Rivieres de France, Part. 1, pag. 323.

(6) Menage, ubi supra, pag. 186. 499.

(7) Naud. Prof. in Opusc. Niphi.

(8) Bibl. pag. 685, 686.

(9) Matagonis de Matagonibus ad Italopoliam Matharelli, pag. m. 248.

to pursue Bears and Lions, and to fight with and choke them? This Answer supposes that David being, as yet very little, and a Youth of fourteen or fifteen Years of Age, fought with Lions, took them running, and strangled them, and might be called a strong Man, a Warrior and a Man that spoke well. This Difficulty is great enough to deserve to be solved; how comes it then that our Author does not seem to have the least glimpse of it? Notwithstanding his Silence, the discerning Readers will easily perceive, that since David fought with Goliath at the Age of twenty one Years (60), he must have been near twenty Years of Age the first time he went to Saul's Court. And thus the Reason that our Author gives for the best, why Saul did not know David the Day he fought with Goliath, is insignificant (61). That Reason is, that a little Boy alters so much in his Face in seven Years time, that those who do not see him till after an Absence of seven Years do not know him again. This is not David's Case, and therefore some other Reasons must be alleged. The Author mentions those which several Commentators have imagined. If they do not fully satisfy those, whom it is no easy thing to satisfy, it must be ascribed to the nature of the Question. III. The Author forgets the strongest Proof, that can be alleged, against those who will have it that David was not sent for to drive away the evil Spirit from Saul, till after his Fight with Goliath. He does not say that they confound the Order in which things are related in the Scripture; he does not say that Saul's Servant, who praised David for being strong, valiant, eloquent, and handsome, did not speak of the Victory obtained over Goliath. Now it is impossible to apprehend that those, who had a mind to recommend him to the King after that Combat, should have been so stupid as not to tell the Prince, in a Word, That same young Man, who killed Goliath, plays well upon Instruments, and he will cure you.

For fear of being too long, I shall not examine whether the Author has wanted Exactness in the rest of the Article. He has avoided the Inconveniency which I have observed in the Abbot de Chabisi; for he sets down the Years wherein David did such and such things.

DAURAT (a) (JOHN), in Latin Auratus, a learned Humanist, and a very good Poet, was a Limosin [A], and of an ancient Family. It is said, that he left his Family-Name [B], to take another, which occasioned a great many Puns [C]. Being gone to the chief City of the Kingdom (b), to finish his Studies, he made an extraordinary Progress in Learning, and distinguished himself in such a manner by his Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, and his Genius for Poetry, that he became one of the Professors of the University of Paris. He is said to have succeeded John Stracellus, in the Year 1560, in the Office of the King's Reader, and Professor of the Greek Tongue (c); but before that [A] He was a Limosin.] Thuanus, la Croix du Maine, du Verdier, Mr Menage, and several others make him a Native of Limoges. It may be question'd whether they are well grounded, since Papyrius Masso says, he was born near the Head of the Vienne (1). If he was born in the chief City of Limosin, I do not think that his Friends, in their Encomiums upon him, would have assign'd, for the Place of his Birth, a Village, which they do not so much as name.

[B] Of an ancient Family; whose Name, they say, he quitted.] He was of the Family of Dinemandi and Bremondais (2). It is said (3) that the Name Dinemandi signifying, in the Language of the Country, Dine-matin, (a Morning-Dinner) and having something mean in it, (4) did not please him, and that he chang'd it into that of Daurat, which signifies in Gascon the same thing as the French word doré (gilded), and was formerly given to one of his Ancestors, because of his light Hair. Others pretend, that our Poet took that new Name, because the Place of his Birth was situated on the little River Aufante (5). Mr Menage informs me, that Daurat's Mother was of the Family of Bremondet (6); and therefore la Croix du Maine is wrong, who calls it Bremondais. Naudé does not forget our Daurat, when he speaks (7) of those who changed their family Names: Illud — pro Jeanne Manepiano, Auratum — exhibit. Mr Menage denotes Daurat under the Name of Orthobrogus, in his Metamorphosis of Gargilius Macro. See hereafter the Remark [D] of the Article GOULU (NICHOLAS).

[C] To take another Name, which occasioned a great many Puns.] They could not fail of it in an Age, wherein Equivocations, Quibbles, and Puns, were in Fashion; but now they are quite out of Doors. We find in Du Verdier Vau-Privas (8) a Sonnet full of Gilding, or Allusions to Gold, in Honour of John Dorat. The Learned Francis Hotman thought, without doubt, that he had met with a happy Turn, when he made this Diffich against him:

Ex solido esse prius vulgus quem credidit auro,
Extrorsum auratus, plumbeus intus erat. (9).

He, whom Mankind pure Gold esteem'd before,
Proves but a lump of Lead just gilded o'er.

Neither Daurat, nor his Disciple Ronsard, found their Account in turning their Mules against the Protestants; the Match was not even. Daurat, using a very mean Metaphor, writ against the Frogs of the great Lake of Geneva, and compared them to the Frogs mentioned in the Revelation. Wisely done, indeed, to mention to them the Revelation! The Protestants feigned, among other Things, in their Answer, that their Frogs, instead of croaking, cried out, AU RAT, AU RAT, de Limouzin, (the word Rat is an allusion to Daurat), and complained of the RONSES (Briars) of Pandomois (10), (Ronses is an Allusion to Ronsard.) They returned also his abuse in Specie, for they call'd him the Limousin Frog. (11) Hotman calls him Turnip-eater (§ a). 'Vidi multos, says he (12), qui dicebant quod illa carmina melius valebant aureum quam omnia poetarum epigrammata in fine tui libri posita duos denarios, etiam fine excipi endo suum vicinum Lemovicem raphanophagum Joh. Auratum. — I have seen many, says he, who maintained, those Verses were better worth a piece of Gold, than all the Poetasters Epigrams, placed at the end of your Book, were worth two Pence, not excepting those of their Neighbour John Daurat, the Turnip-Eater of Limosin.' I cannot tell whether Daurat ever put into Verse the Answer that he made use of against a Minister of Geneva, who had told him, that the sign of the Cross, which the Catholics make, seems to be intended to drive away the Flies. Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who relates (13) that Answer (14) with great Approbation, pretends that Daurat, coming through Geneva, in his Return from Italy, was solicited to embrace Calvinism, and that they promised him a good Salary, but that he could not use himself to that Doctrine. Doubtless it was after that Journey, that he wrote that Poem, that drew a shower of Allusions upon him.

[§ a] The Word Raphanophagus, used by Francis Hotman, ought to be rendered by maître-rabe (Turnip-Eater) which is the nick-name of the People of the Country of Limoges, particularly the Peasants, such as Daurat, to judge of this Man by his rustic outsize. The Devil take this Turnip-Eater (maître-rabe) says Pantagruel, in Rabelais, book 2. chap. 6. speaking of a School-Boy of Limoges, who beset his breeches, whilst That Giant was preparing to devour him. We know besides the Magnificat of the Peasants of Limoges: 'Monfieur S. Marfau nostre bon fondateur, Préga pour nous nostre Seigneur, qu'il nous veuille bien garder nostra raba, nostra castagna, nostra fama. Alleluia. i. e. Monf. St Marfau, our good Founder, pray for us to our Lord, that he will be pleased to preserve our Turnips, our Chestnuts, and our Wives. Alleluia.' As the Peasants of Limoges are very poor, and, for want of Corn, feed upon a sort of Turnips, or large Navens, which they give themselves not even time to boil, hence came this Nick-name, which reproaches these poor People with their Poverty, and the ill Blasts one is exposed to, when near them. John de la Bruerie-Champier, lib. 9. cap. 2. of his Book De re cibaria, where

(10) See Geraille, Doctrine Cur. pag. 127.

(11) Le Labreur. Addit. to Casteln. Tom. 2. pag. 674.

(12) Ubi supra, pag. 247.

(13) Protopopographie, Tom. III, pag. 2575.

(14) It turns upon this, that Bezezeb signifies Prince of the Flies.

(d) Dinet, Vie de Ronfard.

(e) Ronfard began to study in that College about the Year 1545, since he was then above twenty Years of Age.

(f) Docuit diu summa cum gloria & discipulos habuit omnes fore præstantiores Gallie viros, vicinarumque gentium lectionissimos. Papyr. Mass., ubi supra. See also Thuan. lib. 89. Sammarth. Elog. lib. 3. pag. m. 55.

(15) Histoire de l'Acad. Franç. pag. m. 501.

(16) Dames Galant. Tom. II, pag. 140.

(17) Profograph. Tom. III, pag. 2575.

(18) In the 2d Scaligerana, at the Word Auratus.

that time he had been Principal of the College of Coqueret (d), after he had been Tutor to John Antony de Baif, at his Father Lazarus de Baif's House, who was Master of the Requests. He continued to instruct his Pupil in the College of Coqueret, and there also the famous Ronfard was seven Years his Scholar (e). It is a just and glorious Encomium upon Daurat, that a great Number of learned Men came out of his School (f). He had a good Method of teaching, and his rustic and disagreeable Aspect [D] did not stop the Success of his Lectures. He was accessible to every body, he loved witty Sayings, and even gave sometimes great Entertainments, appearing on all Occasions a great Enemy to Avarice [E], which, together with the Fatality attending his Profession, might be the Cause of the Poverty to which he found himself reduced [F], and which gave him a Place in the List of the learned who have almost died of Hunger (g). Nevertheless Charles IX honoured him with the Quality of his Poet, and took great Pleasure in his Conversation [G]. It was not in his Reign, but in the Reign of Henry II (b), that where he speaks of several Species of this sort of Turnips. 'Sabaudis ac Lemovicis palma tribuitur, ut olim apud Romanos Nursinis. Vulgus Gallicum Sabaudis atque Lemovicis rediisse ad rellim clamat, ubi rapa gelu exulta fuerint, aut aliqua injuria soli cœlive perierint. . . . Inflationes crudiora minusque cocta facere creduntur. Unde crepitus Ventris ingentes velentibus hunt. i. e. The best are Those of Savoy and Limoges, as were Those of Nursia among the Romans. The common People of France have a Saying, That the People of Savoy and Limoges may go hang themselves, when their Turnips are blighted with Frost, or perish toward any injury of the Soil or Climate. . . . When raw and unboiled, they are thought to cause Wind; whence those who eat them are subject to loud Explosions from behind.' Rabelais, who, Book 2. ch. 27. speaking of those thick short Persons, that we call Nabottes (Sbrimps), compares them to this kind of Navews, might furnish Mr Menage with an Authority for the Etymology he gives of this Word. REM. CRIT.]

[D] He had a rustic and disagreeable Aspect. Moreri has stretched too far these words of Papyrius Masso: 'Tametsi vultu subullico & insuavi erat; which he renders, 'Those, who made his Elogy, confess that he was very ill shaped, and looked like a Country Clown'. This is a great Falsification, to the Prejudice of that famous Poet Laureat. The Latin Words, that you have just now read, differ but by one half from what has been said of Voiture. It has been said of the latter, that he had a simple Look, but nevertheless agreeable (15). I am willing to believe, that Daurat was infinitely short of the exquisite Politeness of Voiture; but I don't think that he was destitute of that Knowledge of the World, and of those Graces of Conversation, which the Learned ought to have, to be esteemed in a Court; for we shall see hereafter, that Charles IX took an extraordinary delight in hearing him, and that he admired his good Stories and Repartees; and we are informed by Brantome, that Daurat visited People of Quality. The first time, says he (16), that I heard the Story of the Ephesian Matron, it was from Mr d' Aurat, who told it to the brave Monsieur du Gua, and to some others who din'd with him. He adds, that Mr d' Aurat said, he had it from Lamprius; but he had it from Petronius, and I had rather impute that slip of Memory to Brantome than to our Poet. Du Verdier observes, that Daurat was a little Man in Stature and Mien, but great by his Wit (17).

[E] He was a great Enemy to Avarice. This Encomium, and the preceding ones, are altogether inconsistent with what Scaliger says of him. He was, says he (18), very Fantastical & sordidus like Moncaud, sed non tam. He cut off all the Margins of his Bartholus, and writ upon them. He has few Books. How shall we reconcile this with Papyrius Masso, who maintains, that this Poet valued Money no more than Dirt, and that he thought no Man deserv'd to be a Poet, who was too good a Husband? To which I add Thuanus's Testimony, which may be seen in the following Remark. If it be considered, that Scaliger praised Daurat very much for his Poetry and Critical Learning, one cannot believe that he was prepossessed against him; but, on the other side, how can one rely upon his Words? He affirms that Daurat had a Salary of 1200 Crowns at Padua or at Pisa; and yet who will believe that Daurat had ever a Professorship in either of those two Towns? Scaliger speaks as if Daurat had been still living; but how can this be consistent with a thousand other things that are in the Scaligerana, and which cannot have been said but ten or twelve Years after Scaliger had settled himself at Leyden, whither he came in 1593, five Years after Daurat's Death? To remove these Difficulties, must we not suppose a thing that is false, (viz.) that the two Nephews of Peter Pitbou, who collected the Scaligerana, liv'd fifteen or twenty Years with Scaliger? One of these two things must be true, either that Scaliger's Memory failed him often, in the Conversations he had with those young Men, or that they confounded what they heard him say. For the rest, it cannot be denied that he had seen Daurat: He tells us (19), that they went together to make a Visit to la Croix du Maine, and that Daurat, who could not pronounce a B, said to him, as they went out, secura diligentia. Such was his Opinion of the Works of the Man, whom they had visited. I had forgot a very strong Objection, which alone is sufficient to convince us, that there is a Mistake in the Words of Scaliger. Can it be said of Daurat, who minded nothing but Poetry and the Greek Tongue, that Bartholus was his Book? It belongs to a Professor of Law to signalize his sordid Avarice by writing on the Clippings of his Bartholus.

VOL. II.

[F] Which might be the cause of the Poverty to which he found himself reduced. Thuanus, who says, on one side, that Daurat enjoyed, to his Death, the Pension that was allowed him, when he laid down his Office, confesses on the other, that he always neglected his Interests, and that for a long time he found himself reduced to a deplorable Necessity: 'Vir ad aliorum studia ac commodam promovenda natus, qui rem familiarem tota vita neglexerat, deploranda jam pridem egestate premeretur (20). — Born to promote the Interest of others, he had constantly neglected his own, and had been long reduced to the most miserable Circumstances.' Papyrius Masso acknowledges that he left no Estate, tho' King Charles IX had been a good Benefactor to him in his old Age. 'Excessit e vita dives opibus, iis præsertim quas virtus parit, non quibus mortalium genus avidum expleri nequit (21). — He left behind him great Riches, such indeed as Virtue gives, but not those of which Mankind is so insatiably fond.' This invincibly refutes the pretended Stinginess that he is charged with in the Scaligerana, nor can the Policy of Charles IX, with respect to Poets, be objected against it. Brantome (22) tells us, that this Prince 'was a great Lover of Verses, and did not reward those, who presented him with their Poems, all at once, but by little and little, that they might always be obliged to behave well, saying, that Poets were like Horses, that are to be fed, and not over stuffed and fattened, for then they are good for nothing.' This would be an insignificant Objection; for tho' the King had been never so sparing of his Gratifications to his Poet, he would at least have prevented the Poverty of a Man of a sordid Avarice.

[G] Charles IX took great pleasure in his Conversation. I shall set down the whole Passage of Papyrius Masso: it will afford me matter for a Criticism. 'Carolo nono, says he (23), Regi Christianissimo charissimus atque acceptissimus fuit (Dauratus). Is enim in decrepita ætate facetias hominis & argutias mirabatur, honestatque præmiis poetæ sui venerabilem senectam. — D'Aurat was highly carressed by the most Christian King Charles the IXth, who admired his Wit and Humour in his old Age, and honourably rewarded his venerable Bard.' It seems to me that this Writer is very much in the wrong to represent

(g) See Maturin Simonius, de literis percutibus, apud Barthium in Stat. pag. 447.

(b) About the Year 1544. See Thuanus, lib. 13, sub fin. pag. m. 276. See also the Remark [N] of the Article LORRAIN.

(19) Scaligerana, pag. m. 143.

(20) Thuan. lib. 89, pag. 175.

(21) Papyr. Masso, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 290.

(22) Vie de Charles IX.

(23) Papyr. Masso, ubi supra.

that Daurat was Preceptor to the King's Pages for a Year [H]. I cannot tell whether the Vexations, that made him leave that Post, came altogether, or in part, from the Petulancy of those Youths. Considering the Age he lived in, we ought to forgive him the Taste he had for Anagrams, of which he was the first Restorer (i); some will have it that he found the Pattern in Lycophron. He brought them so much into Fashion, that every body went upon them. He was accounted a great Conjuror in that kind, and several Illustrious Persons gave him their Names to be anagrammatized. He also undertook to explain the Centuries of Nostradamus, which he did so successfully [J], as some say, that he seemed to be invested with the Character of his Interpreter, or Sub-Prophet. These are not the most shining Parts of his Life (§ a). It is better still to see him married again, in an extreme old Age, to a Maid of nineteen Years [K], and to hear him say, for his Reason, that it was a Poetical Licence (k), and that, being to die by the Stroke of a Sword, he thought it more proper to perform the Execution with a bright, than a rusty one (l). That new Marriage proved fruitful; he got a Son by it, and used to play a thousand wanton Tricks with him (m). If Thuanus and his Translator had considered this, they had doubtless been more careful of their Expressions, for the Honour of the young Spouse [L]. Daurat had, among other Children, a Son by his first Wife, whose French Verses were printed (n), and a Daughter, whom he gave in Marriage to a learned Man, whose Name was Nicolas Goulu (o), to whom he resigned the Place of Regius Professor in the Greek Tongue [M]. He made many Latin, Greek, and even

French

(i) Papyr. Masso, ibid. Claudius Venderius, Cent. in Auctor. pag. 44. Dinet, Vie de Ronfard.

(k) Sammarth. in ejus Elog.

(l) Papyr. Masso, ubi supra. I shall set down his Words in the Remark [G].

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) They are in the Collection of the Verses of his Father; and if we believe the Title Page, they were made by the Author at ten Years of Age. Menage, Remarq. sur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 137.

(o) Sammarth. in ejus Elogio. La Croix du Maine, pag. 201. This Daughter was very learned, as you may see in the Article GOULU (NICOLAS).

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 289.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 290.

(26) Tisor. de Poeti, pag. 265.

(27) See Teissier, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 108.

(28) Remarks upon Ayrault's Life, pag. 187.

(29) Teissier, ibid. pag. 110.

(30) Biblioth. pag. 330.

(31) Profograph. Tom. III, pag. 275.

(32) Teissier, ubi supra.

(33) Bull. Acad. des Sciences. Vol. II, pag. 360.

(34) Remarks upon Ayrault's Life, pag. 187.

(35) So these Latin Words, Ob senium inutilis ejus opera esse cupisset, have been rendered.

our Poet as a decrepit old Man in the Reign of Charles IX. This cannot be said of a Man, who is but sixty or sixty five Years of Age, who lives above eighty Years almost without any Sickness, and who gets Children a few Years before his Death. Now this is Daurat's Case, according to Papyrius Masso, whose Words are these (24): 'Prope octogenarius aliquot jam pridem procreatis liberis, amissaque priori conjugē adulescentulam duxit, ex eaque Polycarpum, seniles delicias, filiolum incredibili gaudio suscepit, blandiusculē cum eo colludens, & infans finitæ manibus effrensus . . . (25) decessit prospera fere semper usus valetudine . . . anno Domini 1588 . . . major octogenario. — Being near eighty, having had some Children, and left his former Wife, he married a young one, and had by her, to his incredible Satisfaction, Polycarp, the delight of his grey Hairs, with which Infant he used to play like a Child, or like a Monkey dandle him in his Arms. Having for above Four score Years enjoyed his Health without any considerable Interruption, he died in the Year 1588.' On the other hand it is notorious, that the Reign of Charles IX extends no farther than from the Year 1561 to the Year 1574. To conclude, I shall observe, that Lorenzo Craffo, who thought that King Henry III conferred the Title of Poeta Regius (26) on Daurat, did not know that this Honour was of a more ancient Date. You see Papyrius Masso says, that Charles IX used Daurat as his Poet.

[H] He was Preceptor to the King's Pages for a Year.] Thuanus does not say how long that Employment lasted; he only says, that Daurat exercised it before he was Professor: Primum pueris regis erudiendis adnotus, dein . . . in regio gymnasio diu professor: a Passage wherein the Translator has committed a Mistake: for he renders it thus; he was first intrusted with the Education of the King's Sons (27); but Mr Menage cites (28) some of Daurat's Verses, whereby it appears that he did not continue in that Post above a Year, and that it had given him a great deal of Vexation:

Aulica nam passus fastidia mille per annum;
Hunc tandem in portum ventis jactatus & undis,
Nauseam ut evomerem tanti maris, alter Ulysses Evasi.

Twelve tedious Months their courtly Snarls I bore,
E'er Fortune threw me on the wif'd for Shore,
On which I might discharge the nauseous load
Like Ithacus of old.

Mr Menage adds, that Papyrius Masso speaks of that Tutorship: I find no such thing in the Elogies of Papyrius Masso.

[I] He undertook to explain the Centuries of Nostradamus, . . . which he did successfully.] Mr Teissier (29) quotes Papyrius Masso, and Sainte Marthe for this, who say nothing of it: he should have cited la Croix du Maine (30) and du Verdier Vau Prigias. The words of the latter are remarkable; Dorat, says he (31), set up for an Interpreter of Dreams: he set a great value upon the Centuries of Nostradamus, containing certain Prophecies to which he gave Interpretations, confirmed by several Events, and he used to say that an Angel had dictated them to Michael Nostradamus.

[K] He married a Maid of nineteen Years.] So these words of Ste. Marthe, undeviginti annorum puella, must be translated. Moreri, Teissier (32), and Bullart (33), who say she was twenty two Years of Age, would doubtless find it hard to quote a cotemporary Author for it, as credible as the Writer, whom I oppose to them. Mr Menage says she was but eighteen (34).

[L] For the Honour of the young Spouse.] In effect Thuanus says, that the thing that moderated the Grief of Daurat's Death, was that Old Age had made him incapable of all the Functions of his Office (35). Who would not believe from these words, that he was not able to get a Child? Who would believe that a good old Man, who had not Spirit enough to explain a Verse of Homer to his Scholars, had the necessary Vigour to consummate a Marriage with a young Maid? And therefore one could not literally give any Credit to Thuanus's Narration, without entertaining strong Suspicions of our Poet's young Wife, as if she had practised this Maxim, that a skillful Woman never wants Heirs, or as if her Husband might have applied to himself this old Saying,

Qu'autant vieillard à la barbe fleurie,
Pour ses voisins que pour lui se marie.

An old Man marries as much for the benefit of his Neighbours, as for his own.

So Amist renders these Greek words (spoken by an Old Man): ταυτὸ γέρον, εὐ οἶδα, καὶ τοὺς γείτονας. Duco uxorem, probe scio, vicinis quæque (36). Truly nothing would appear more contradictory to those, who pay the Pensions of Professors and Ministers, than to see, that, in order to get a Man declared Emeritus, whose Wife should be big with Child, they should alledge that Age had rendered him intirely unfit to mount the Chair.

Note, That some say (37) that, some time before he died, he married a young Servant Maid, though he was eighty Years of Age . . . and that it is not said that he had any Children by her (38), as he had by a very honest Lady who was his first Wife. Thus here is a Man to be placed in the Catalogue mentioned by Mr Menage (39).

[M] A Daughter whom he gave in Marriage to . . . Nicolas Goulu, in whose favour he resigned his Place of Regius Professor in the Greek Tongue.] Sainte Marthe, without setting down the Time, says, that Daurat having been made Poeta Regius, resigned his Professorship to Goulu his Son-in-law. Thuanus speaks of it in a more undeterminate manner: he only says (40) that Daurat, having for a long time discharged the Duties of his Professorship in the Royal College, became Emeritus, laid down that Employ, and had a Pension that was paid him till he died. But du Breul sets down the Time; for he says, that Nicolas Goulu was provided with

(36) Plut. an sen sit gerenda resp. pag. 789.

(37) Peter de Romuaid Journ. nal. Chronol. & Histor. of the facts of Orob. pag. m. 396. He places Ronfard's Death on that Day, 1583.

(38) That is not true. See the Remark [G], Citat. (24).

(39) See the Article BRISSEIS, Citat. (15).

(40) Lib. 83, sub. fin.

French Verses [N]; and indeed he made too many; for whenever a Book was printed, or a Person of Note died, he made Verses on that Subject, as if he had been the common Poet of the Kingdom, or his Muse had been a hired Mourner. This was the Reason, why, if his poetical Vein was not drained to the Lees, it was at least like a low pierced Cask [O], whose Wine, being destitute of the best Part of it's Spirits, runs but faintly.

(41) Antiquitez de Paris, pag. 565.

with Daurat's Place by the King's Writ, the eighth Day of November 1567 (41). I shall make two Remarks upon this; one is, that Thuanus should not have said that the Loss of our Poet was less lamented, because Old Age and the Civil-War, which had driven all the Youth from Paris, began to make his Labours unnecessary. This signifies that he might still have been serviceable, if there had been any Scholars in Paris, and that he had actually been so, till he was overwhelmed by the Infirmities of Old Age. He had not therefore quitted the functions of his Professorship in the Year 1567, in which his Son-in-law succeeded him; for if he had done it at that time, the two Reasons alleged by Thuanus, why the Loss of that Professor was less lamented, would be very false: it seems therefore that this great Historian contradicts himself, with regard to Daurat. He says somewhere, that this Professor laid down his Professorship before the Death of Turnebus (42), and retired to the Suburb of St Victor, whither he (Thuanus) went often to see him. 'Jam Joannes Auratus professioni renunciaverat, & in Sanvictorianum suburbium concesserat; quo frequens itabat Thuanus, ex ejusque colloquiis semper intrinsecus elior redibat, de Budæo quem ille puer viderat, Germano Brixio, Jacobo Tufano sedulo eum percontatus' (43). — John Daurat had now quitted his Professorship, and retired into the Suburbs of St Victor, whither Thuanus often went, and returned always improved by his Conversation, having enquired of him particularly concerning Budæus, whom he had seen when a Boy, as also concerning Germanus Brixius, and Jacobus Tufanus. My second Remark is, that la Croix du Maine declares, in 1584, that Aurat still reads every Day the usual Lectures of his Professorship at Paris; so great is his Desire of being useful to the Public, and of making Scholars. Thuanus, or la Croix du Maine, must needs have been mistaken. What seems most probable to me is, that Daurat, having obtained leave to resign his Professorship to his Son-in-law, did nevertheless teach as before, at least in private.

(42) That is before 1572.

(43) Biblioth. pag. 685.

[N] He made many Verses.] It is likely that Du Verdier Vau-Privas tells us a meer Story, when he says (44) that the Odes, Epigrams, Hymns, and other Poems in Greek and Latin, composed by Dorat, were above Fifty thousand Verses; but, though you abate as much as you please, yet it is certain, that he wrote a great many Poems in those two Languages, to which we must add those which he writ in French: for the same Du Verdier observes, that, although he applied himself wholly to Greek and Latin Poetry, yet he also made French Verses of which but very few have been printed. He gives the Titles of two French Poems, and Mr Teissier gives the Title of the Latin. See the Margin (45). Moreover Mr Menage had no reason to say, that Daurat made no French Verses, and to maintain thereby that Mr Baillet was in the wrong to affirm, that the Pleiad, imagined by Ronsard, was only made up of French Poets (46). If what Mr Menage asserts was true, viz. that Daurat the chief of this Pleiad made no French Verses, Mr Baillet would have been justly criticized: but this Assertion is false; for besides what hath been just now cited out of Du Verdier Vau-Privas, we find in la Croix du Maine, that D'Aurat wrote many very learned Poems, as well in Greek and Latin, as in French. We find elsewhere (47), that Ronsard gave the Name Pleiad to John Antony de Bayf, Joachim du Bellai, Pontus de Tyard, Stephen Jodelle, Remi Belleau, Dorat, and himself, because they were the first and the most excellent, by whose Diligence the FRENCH Poetry was raised to the highest pitch. Agreeably to this, Mr Menage himself had said in his Remarks on Malherbe, that, in imitation of the Pleiad of the Greek Poets, Ronsard made one of the French Poets that were in his time . . . and that those French Poets were Ronsard, du Bellai, Pontus de Tyard, Jodelle, Belleau, Baif, and Dorat. And I find the following Words in the One hundred and eighty sixth Page of his Remarks on the Life of Peter Ayraut: Dorat is the first Poet of the Pleiad; for all those, who have mentioned these

(44) Anti Baillet, Tom. II, pag. 28.

(45) In Ronsard's Life.

These Verses are addressed, Ad Helenam Vendraminam Virginem Venetam. — To Helen Vendramina, a young Venetian Lady. REM. CRIT.] [O] His poetical Vein was reduced to the condition of a low pierced Cask.] Here is a Passage of Sainte Marthe. 'Nullus novus liber in lucem exibat, quin sibi commendatricem Aurati Musam pro Mercurio itineris duce & auspice deposceret. Nullus in tota Gallia paulo nobilior è vivis excedebat, quin ab Aurati liguibribus Camænis tanquam Præfatis solemnes funeri questus & lacrymæ sufficerentur: quo fiebat ut in tanta similibus argumentorum multitudine beata illa quondam uberioris ingenii vena non arefceret quidem, sed fundo propior languidius negligentiusque flueret ac se traheret

Poets, name them in this order, Daurat, Ronsard, Du Bellay, Belleau, Antony de Baif, Pontus de Tyard, and Jodelle. I will not make use of Thuanus's Authority, who says (48) that Ronsard and Daurat made some Verses that were sung by the Queen's Maids, at the famous Interlude that was represented for the Entertainment of the Embassadors of Poland in the Year 1573. For it may very well be, that on such an occasion the Verses sung by the Ladies were in Latin, and some Authors say in express Words, that D'Aurat made the Latin Verses that were recited at the Interlude, that was represented in the Thuilleries in the Year 1573, when the Duke of Anjou was declared King of Poland (49). But though it be certain that Daurat made Verses in his Mother Tongue, it must be confessed that his Merit did not appear so much by that Poetry, as by his Latin Verses. It is also in the Quality of a Latin Poet that he made himself famous in the Republic of Learning, notwithstanding the gross Faults that escaped him sometimes against the Rules of Quantity. Barbinius gives him that stroke by the by, in the One thousand five hundred and sixty ninth page of his Commentary on Statius, and adds one thing of him that deserves to be related (50); which is, that he admired this Epigram of Ausonius (Epigr. 105.)

(48) Lib. 57.

(49) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 565.

(50) He had mentioned this before, pag. 94.

Dum dubitat natura, marem faceretve puellam,
Factus es, ô pulcher, pene puella puer,

Nature, in forming thee, O lovely Boy,
Doubted so long, which Sex she shou'd employ,
That both she blended in thy gentle Frame,
And Boy and Girl, in thee, are but the same.

to such a degree, that he maintained that some Dæmon was the Author of it (§2).

[(§2) We find, at Page 339 of a Book, intituled Veneres Blyenburgicæ, sive Amorum Hortus &c. Opera Damasi Blyenburgii Batavi. Dordraci, 1600, in 8vo, these Verses of a Poet called, Evangelista, which are an imitation of those of Ausonius:

Dum dubitat, faceretne Deam, faceretne puellam,
Juppiter, ecce Dea es facta, puella simul.
Sed Dea dum fieres, dubitat, Venus, anne Minerva,
Virgo, fores; subito es facta Minerva, Venus. &c.

Thus paraphrased.

Long did great Jove the weighty Point debate,
Uncertain, Nymph, or Goddess, to create.
Irresolute, he cry'd, what must be done?
We'll form a Nymph and Goddess both in one.
But from what Pattern of celestial Race
The Features of her Heav'nly Part to trace?
Shall lovely Venus to the Picture sit?
Or shall we copy Pallas' Main and Wit?
Still unresolv'd, thus to the Heav'nly Maid,
As from his hand she rose, he both at once, he said.
Hence both in thy lov'd Composition meet,
As Pallas graceful, and as Venus sweet.

These Verses are addressed, Ad Helenam Vendraminam Virginem Venetam. — To Helen Vendramina, a young Venetian Lady. REM. CRIT.]

[O] His poetical Vein was reduced to the condition of a low pierced Cask.] Here is a Passage of Sainte Marthe. 'Nullus novus liber in lucem exibat, quin sibi commendatricem Aurati Musam pro Mercurio itineris duce & auspice deposceret. Nullus in tota Gallia paulo nobilior è vivis excedebat, quin ab Aurati liguibribus Camænis tanquam Præfatis solemnes funeri questus & lacrymæ sufficerentur: quo fiebat ut in tanta similibus argumentorum multitudine beata illa quondam uberioris ingenii vena non arefceret quidem, sed fundo propior languidius negligentiusque flueret ac se traheret

(p) Scaligerana
1, pag. m. 18.
See Guil. Cante-
rus in Lycophron.
ver. 308.

(g) Thuan. Hist.
lib. 89. sub fin.

faintly. He was so good a Critic, that Scaliger knew none but him and Cujacius that were able to reftore the ancient Authors (p); but he published few Things of that nature [P]. According to Scaliger, He began to be trifling [Q], and pretended to find all the Bible in Homer. He died at Paris, the first of November, 1588, being above eighty Years of Age [R]. The Collection that was made of his Verses, was not for his Honour: the Bookfellers had more regard to Their Interest than to his Reputation. They foisted in some Poems which were none of his, and some Pieces that he would not have owned for his, though he was the Author of them (q).

[§ (a) The Memoirs of the State of France, &c. Tom. I. fol. 28, verso, after having spoken of the Massacre of the Admiral Châtillon, and the manner in which the Body of That Lord was dressed up by the Mob: John Dorat, the Poet, wrote some Latin Verses, in which he derides the Admiral, blazoning each of the Members of his mutilated Body. I question whether This Passage of the Life of Daurat be more to his Credit, than others, with which he has been reproached. REM. CRIT.]

(51) Sammarth.
Elog. lib. 3.
pag. m. 55, 56.

traheret (51). — No new Treatise was published, but it's Author requested of Daurat some Commendatory Verses, like a Gentleman-Usher to introduce it to the World; and no Person of Quality in all France died, but D'Aurat's Elegies, like Mourners, attended his Corpse: whence it happened, in such variety of similar Subjects, that his happy Vein of copious Wit was not indeed drained, but, being reduced nearer to the Bottom, flowed with less Force and Ease. I have said in the Remark [D] of the Article AFER (DOMITIUS,) that Poets should leave Apollo's Service betimes. I add, that if they feel the Return of any Poetical Fit, they should take it for a temptation of an evil Genius, and put up the same Prayer to the Goddesses of Parnassus, that one of their Brethren addressed to the Goddess of Love:

— parce, precor, precor,
Non sum qualis eram bonæ
Sub regno Cynaræ. Define, dulcium
Mater sæva Cupidinum,
Circa lustra decem fletere mollibus
Jam durum imperis: abi
Quò blandæ juvenum te revocant preces (52).

(52) Horat. Od.
1, lib. 4. ver. 2.

O spare, for pity, Venus, spare!
I am not what I was
In lovely Cynara's easy Reign,
When Heat warm'd every Vein,
And manly Beauty fill'd my Face.

Cease, Queen of soft Desires,
To bend my Mind grown stiff with Age,
And fifty Years engage
To crackle in thy wanton Fires:
But Youth and Beauty bear.

CREECH.

The Service of the Muses is in many things like the Service of the Ladies; it is better to leave it too soon than too late, and to say in time, with a firm Resolution to keep one's Word:

Vixi puellis nuper idoneus,
Et militavi non sine gloria:
Nunc arma, defunctumque bello
Barbiton hic paries habebit (53).

(53) Id. Od. 26,
lib. 3. ver. 1.

Once I was gay and great in Charms,
Success still waited on my Arms,
In Venus Battles bravely fought,
I fought and conquer'd when I fought.
But now my Arms and wanton Lyre,
Whose Tunes could spread harmonious Fires,
In Venus Shrine unheeded lie,
With all my Love's Artillery.

CREECH.

(54) Remember that you are a Mortal Man. This is said of Philip of Macedon. Remember the Athenians. Herodotus, lib. 5. cap. 105, concerning Darius Son of Hyaspes.

It is said, that certain Kings ordered some of their Domestics to tell them every Day, remember such a Business (54). If it be allowable to compare little things with great ones, old Poets should have somebody to tell them every Morning, Remember your Age. Horace boasts of having had such Advices given him.

Est mihi purgatam crebro qui perfonet aurem,
Solve senescientem mature sanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus & illa ducat (55)

(55) Hor. Epist.
1, lib. 1, ver. 7.

And still methinks sounds thro' my well purg'd Ear
A little Voice, fond Horace have a care;
And while 'tis well release thy aged Horse,
Lest, when he runs, but with unequal Force,
And stretches hard to win, he break his Wind,
Derided, distant'd, basely lag behind.

And here is what I find in the Menagiana. 'Mr du Perier desired his Friends formerly to be so kind as to tell him, when his Poetical Vein should grow faint, and he should no longer be in a condition to make Verses to his Honour. It is time to do it (56).' (56) Menagiana, pag. m. 384. If Daurat had used such a Precaution, he would not have out-lived his own Glory. But nothing did him more harm than his undertaking to verify on all the Books that were printed. What a sad thing is it, said Balzac (57), to be obliged to praise all new printed Books, that is to say, to be in a worse condition in Prose, than Auratus Poeta Regius was, who did willingly, what I do as a Criminal and Slave. There has been a French Poet of later date (58), who prepared Sonnets for Books that were to come out. See how he is bantered in the Continuation of the Parnasse Reformé.

(57) Letter 25
to Chupelain,
Book 4, pag. m.
194.

(58) His Name was Pelletier. See la guerre des Auteurs, pag. m. 163.

[P] He was . . . a good Critic . . . but he has published but few things of that nature.] Some of his Critical Remarks on the Verses of the Sibyls, are to be seen in the Edition of Ophiopæus. He had much laboured that Subject in his Lectures, as a Letter of Stuckius to Goldast informs us (59). 'Quam doleo, says he, me Jo. Aurati præceptoris mei viri ingenio, summi, & in emendandis antiquis Poëtis Græcis acutissimi dicta, & annotationes in illa carmina ante multos annos, & ejus ore calamo exceptas cum aliis nonnullis meis libris Lutetiae amississe! — What concern is it to me to have lost at Paris among other Books the Diſtates of John Daurat, my most ingenious Master, a Man peculiarly happy in his emendations of the old Greek Poets, as also his Annotations on these Verses which I long ago copied from his own Mouth.'

(59) It is the 13th of the Collection of the Letters, written to Goldast, published at France, in 1688.

[Q] He began to be trifling.] Scaliger speaks in the Present Tense, he begins to be trifling, &c. Upon which see the Remark [E] of this Article.

[R] He died . . . above eighty Years of Age.] La Croix du Maine gives Daurat ten Years less than others do: he places his Birth in the Year 1517, and therefore he must have believed that Daurat died at Seventy one Years of Age. Mr Baillet (60) was in the right not to rely much on that Opinion to the Prejudice of that of Papyrius Masso, Touanus, and Scævola de Sainte Marthe, who all knew Daurat very particularly, since it is certain that la Croix du Maine is mistaken. Here are four Verses of Daurat that demonstrate it: they were made on the Death of Leodegarius à Quercu, who had lived eighty five Years.

(60) Jugem. seu les Poët. Tom. III, pag. 403.

Ostoginta annos quo natus quinque supraque,
Officio functus, plenus honoris obit.
At tuus Auratus pare pœnæ ætate superstes,
Hos elegos tumulo donat habere tuo.

A wondrous Stage! Years, eighty five and more,
Roll'd on, yet be fresh wreaths of Honour wore.
Almost æqueval I this Tribute send
To sweep the parting of a much lov'd Friend.

Mr Menage

(61) Remarg.
sur la Vie d'Ay-
sault, pag. 499.

(62) An't-Bail.
Tom. I, pag.
265.

(63) Remarg.
sur la Vie d'Ay-
sault, pag. 187.

(64) The 27th of
Dec. 1585.

Mr Ménage makes use of them (61) to prove that Daurat lived above eighty Years; in which he is incomparably better grounded than when he accuses Mr Baillet (62) of having said, that that Poet lived but Seventy one Years: for it is true that Mr Baillet says it, as a different thing from the common Opinion; but he observes at the same time, that this common Opinion is preferable to that of la Croix du Maine. I shall observe another small Mistake of Mr Ménage. He says that all the Poets of the time made Verses on the Death of Daurat; and among the rest, Ronsard, his beloved Scholar (63). But it is certain that Ronsard died (64)

some Years before his Master; and if he had but cast his eyes on these words of Papyrius Massé, he would have known that That Scholar could not do any poetical Service to Daurat's Memory. 'O si hodie discipulus ejus Petrus Ronsardus insignis Poëta videret, quas ille nœnias, aut quæ epitaphia scriberet?' — Was his Scholar Peter Ronsard, that excellent Poet, still living, what Elogies, and what Epitaphs would he write? I chuse rather to follow Papyrius Massé than Tibullus. The latter says, Daurat died about the end of November, being near eighty Years old.

(1) He latinized his Name (which was d'Auque,
as Swertius says,
Athen. Belg.
pag. 178) et esse
tres several ways.

(6) Valer. Andrea, Bibl. Belg.
pag. 140.

DAUSQUEIUS, or DAUSQUIUS, or D'AUSSQUEIUS (a) CLAUDIUS, Canon of Tournay, was born at St Omer, the fifth of December 1566 (b). He entered into the Society of Jesuits I cannot tell when, and left it I know not when neither, nor for what Reason. He was still in it, when Father Scribanus published his Amphitheatrum Honoris, in the Year 1607. He was praised in that Work as one of the most learned Men of his Age (c). It is certain that he was learned both in Greek and Latin, and in all which is called Literature; but he did not write well: his Stile is too affected, too obscure, and too full of obsolete Phrases. He is praised for having been a good Preacher (d). His Father Robert DAUSQUEIUS, the fourth Son of Antony DAUSQUEIUS, Bailiff of St Omer, was killed in the King of Spain's Service, during the War that the Duke of Alençon raised in the Netherlands (e). I shall speak of the Canon of Tournay's Writings [A], without forgetting the Imposture of a Bookseller of Paris [B].

(c) Amphitheatr.
Honoris, lib. 2.
cap. 13.

(d) Valer. And.
ibid.

(e) Claud. Daus-quius in S. Josephi sanctifica-tione, pag. 228,
229.

(1) See Baillet,
Jugem. des Sa-
vans, Tom. IV,
pag. 493.

(2) Alegambe,
Biblioth. Societ.
Jesù, pag. 81.

(3) Val. Andr.
Bibl. Belg. pag.
140.

[A] I shall speak of Claudius Dausqueius's Writings. He made a Latin Translation of the forty Homilies of St Basil of Seleucia, and published it with Notes in the Year 1604, in 8vo. It is not good, if we rely on the Judgment of the Dominican Combesis (1). He published some Notes on Quintus Calaber in the Year 1614, and Silius Italicus, with a large Commentary, in the Year 1611, in 4to. His Scutum D. Mariæ Aspicillii, and his Justi Lipsii scutum adversus Agricola Tractat satyricas petitiones, were printed at Duñay in the Year 1616, in 8vo. The Approbation of those two Books, and the Epistle Dedicatory, being dated in the Year 1616, I cannot but believe that there is a Fault in the Place, where Alegambe (2) and Valerius Andreas Desillus (3) affirm that they were printed in the Year 1610. They are moreover mistaken in saying that they were composed adversus Agricola Tractat. That Agricola Tractatus is no other than George Thomson, a Scotchman, who published a Book at London, in the Year 1606, against Lipsius. This is the Piece which Dausqueius confuted. He had a Quarrel with some Franciscans, who maintained that St Paul and St Joseph had been holy in their Mothers Womb. Upon this he published his Sancti Pauli sanctitudo in utero, extra, in solo, & in celo, at Paris 1627, in 8vo; and his Sancti Josephi sanctificatio extra uterum, seu bimotium adversus F. Marchantii Minoritæ Exprovincialis inania, item Apophysarum F. Minorum Audomopolitanorum sponsia, at Lyons 1631, in 8vo. His two best Books are those of which I shall speak in the following Remark.

[B] Without forgetting the Imposture of a Bookseller of Paris. Mr Chevillier tells us wherein it consists. They give themselves too much liberty, and play a thousand Tricks with printed Books, without any regard to Sincerity. Whatever the Bookseller may say, who, since the Year 1677, sells Dausqueius's Book intitled Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica (4), he should not have suppressed the fine Print, wherein are engraved ten Persons, Authors of the Latin Tongue, and wherein we read that the Book was printed at Tournay by Adrian Quinqué in the Year 1632: neither ought he to have left out some other Leaves, whereby one might have known the time of the Impression. And it is no good Reason to say, that the King having taken Tournay, Dausqueius, who was kept there, is become a Frenchman; De Hispano factus jam Gallus. Hereupon he takes the liberty to substitute a first Leaf, wherein he puts his Cypher, and his Sign, with this Subscription, Parisii apud, &c. 1677. As if Victory extended also her Empire over the Difference of Times, and the Distance of Places, or had the Power to make the Year 1632 to be 1677, and the City of Tournay in the County of Flanders to be that of Paris in the Isle of France. I defy those who have bought his Dausqueius, and have seen no other Copy of it, to say who is the Printer of it, and out of what Printing-house it came. Yet this is what our Kings would have us to know. These are the words of their Ordinances, in such a manner that the Buyers of Books may easily know in what Printing-house the Books have been printed. All that he could do, having got into his hands the Copies of that Author that were still left, was to put them off with a Leaf containing these words, Venerunt Parisiis apud, &c. but without altering or leaving out any thing in the Title; letting the Reader see that it was printed at Tournay by Adrian Quinqué in the Year 1602. The most learned Library-keepers have much a-do to discover all the Booksellers Tricks: it is a difficult thing not to be deceived by them. The Library-keeper of the Archbishop of Reims was not imposed upon in his Dausqueius by this Trick; he writes the Date of this Book in his printed Catalogue in these words, which are a Reproach to that Bookseller, Parisii 1677, vel potius Tarnaci 1632, in folio (5). I think such another Fraud was made use of with respect to another Work, which Dausqueius caused to be printed at Tournay in 4to in the Year 1633, with this Title, Terra & aqua, seu terræ fluctuantes; for the Journal des Savans spoke of that Work (6), and of the Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica (7), as if they had been but newly printed. I must observe, that Salmasius thought that the Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica was worth reading. See what he writ to Vossius about it, in his Sixty sixth Letter. See also the Praises that Vossius bestowed upon the same Book (8), and consult Mr Baillet, who believed that this Book had been reprinted in the Year 1676 (9).

* Edit. of Francis I, at Fontainebleau, the 28th of Dec. 1541, and of Charles IX, at Gaillon in May 1574, inserted among the Edits and Ordinances collected by Fontanon, pag. 468, and 474, Tom. IV, Edit. of 1611.

(5) Chevillier, Origine de l'imprimerie de Paris, pag. 210.

(6) Journ. des Savans, August 2, 1677, pag. 233, Dutch Edit.

(7) Ib. Febr. 15, 1677, pag. 55.

(8) Vossius de Philologia, pag. 29.

(9) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, Tom. IV, pag. 12, 13.

(4) It is a Work in two Volumes in folio.

(1) Near Milan.

DECIUS (PHILIP) natural Son of Tristan de Dexio [A], who made a pretty good Figure in the Court of the Dukes of Milan, was a very famous Civilian. He was born in the Year 1454, and was carefully instructed in Philological Learning at Milan. The Plague having obliged him to leave that City, he retired to his Brother,

[A] He was natural Son of Tristan de Dexio. His Ancestors, having left the Village of Dexio (1), settled at Milan, and took the Name of the Village, where they were born (2). That Family had continued above three hundred Years (3) at Milan, with some lustre, when our Tristan was born.

(2) Panzirolus, de Claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. 2, cap. 135, pag. m. 299.

(3) Ultra CCC. annos cum dignitate vixerunt, Id. ibid.

[B] He

who was Professor of the Civil-Law at Pavia [B]. He began to study the same Science at seventeen Years of Age, and gave a great deal of Trouble, by his disputing Humour, to Jafon Mainus and James Puteus, his Masters [C]. He puzzled them several times with his Objections. He also tired his Brothers in such a manner with his Objections, that the Censures he received from him forced him to seek for the Solution of his Doubts elsewhere. He maintained some public Thefes, with very good Success, in the second Year of his Studies of the Civil-Law, and succeeded perfectly well. The next Year he went to Pisa with his Brother, who was invited thither to be Professor of the Civil-Law. He gave so many Proofs of his great Parts and Knowledge in that University, that at the Age of Twenty one Years he was made Professor, to teach the Institutes. He had a great many Auditors, and, among other things, he was admired for his witty Sayings in his public Disputations (a). His Reputation encreased, when, some time after, he was promoted to the Place of Extraordinary Professor of the Civil-Law; nevertheless he was not contented, and complained of the Smallness of his Salary [D]. Francis Accolti, who had been alone Ordinary-Professor for the Evening Lectures, having been dis-

(a) Plura alia que provocatus perleptia dilectis, iocoseque scommata inter disputandum dicebat sepius excepta pro junculis vulgo recitabantur. Panzir. ubi infra, pag. 301. See also Fortioris, Hist. Juris Civil. lib. 3, cap. 39, pag. m. 533.

(4) Id. ibid.

[B] He retired to his Brother, who was Professor of the Civil-Law at Padua. He was born in lawful Wedlock, and his Name was Lancelot. He died at Pavia in the Year 1500 (4).

(5) Id. ibid.

[C] And gave a great deal of Trouble by his disputing Humour to . . . his Masters.] Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 301. Quos argumentis quandoque exagitat, atque assuantes reliquit. Fratri quoque assiduis interrogationibus molestus non semel cum objurgatione re- jectus est (5).—Whom he sometimes puzzled with his Arguments, and left in Confusion; being likewise often reprimanded by his Brother, whom he perpetually teased with Questions. There is nothing more troublesome, than a young Scholar, who has Wit, and loves disputing, and therefore I do not wonder that this young man was reprimanded by his Brother. It is likely that he chid him very much, since the young man durst no more harass his Brother, and even did not consult him when he undertook a public Disputation (6). Lancelot gave him a new Reproof, and called him a rash young man, and disputed with him, thinking, if I am not mistaken, to run him down and humble him; but he was repulsed so warmly, that, being struck with Admiration, he confessed before the Assembly, that his Brother would speedily out-do him. Such an Acknowledgment would not be so hard to a Father as to an elder Brother. Impugnanti problematica Lanceloto tanto acumine argumenta rejecit, ut admiratus coram assistantibus se brevi ab illo superatum iri prædixit (7). Paul Jovius, speaking, as an Eyewitness, says, that our Philip disputed with more eagerness than any body else. Enarrabat subtilissime, & uti sæpe vidimus, longe omnium acerrime disputabat (8). I shall mention another Particular: Decius, being Professor at Pisa, made Laurence Pucci (9) dispute against the Thefes, which Bartolomew Socinus had advised a Scholar to maintain publicly. The next Day after the Disputation, a Paper was posted up, importing, that, within a Week, those same Thefes, converted into Problems, would be maintain'd, on both Sides, by Pucci, among the Students, and by Decius among the Doctors. People were alarmed at it, and feared the Consequences of it; for they were sensible that such a Proceeding tended to the Dishonour of the other Regent Doctors. For which Reason, the Principal of the College forbade Decius to proceed any farther upon pain of Imprisonment (10).

(6) Inconulto fratre propositiones publice disputandas edidit. Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 300.

(8) Paul. Jovius, Eleg. cap. 88, pag. m. 207.

(9) Who was afterwards Cardinal.

(10) Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 301, 302.

[D] And complained of the smallness of his Salary.] This Passage reflects upon his Memory: I confess it would be a greater Blot, if this Fault did not appear often; but in short the great number of mercenary Professors, too self-interested, and soliciting too warmly an increase of Salary, does not excuse the blame of such Conduct. However it be, our Philip, tho' crowned with Glory, and honoured with the public Applause, vexed himself, thinking he had not a sufficient Salary, and complained of it to the Curators of the University. One of them gave him very good hopes; for, said he, I am very well persuaded of your Merit. The Professor answered, I had rather you should have a mean Opinion of me. Being desired to tell the Reason of such an extraordinary Answer; It is, replied he, because if you had an ill Opinion of me, I should hope for a better Salary by undecieving you: But since my Pension is very small whilst you have an Esteem for me, I have nothing to hope for. Panzir. ubi supra expresses this much better; and therefore I shall set down his own words. Cum tenui stipendio se ali apud Gymnasii Praefectos queretur, Alomanusque Renuitius inter illos senior cum bono animo esse jussisset, quod bene apud se audiret; Philippus, Mallem, inquit, ut finitram de me opinionem haberetis. Illis responsi novitatem mirantibus, & rationem perquirentibus, Si de me, respondit, prava concepta esset opinio, detecto errore, amplius stipendium sperare possem; sed cum benediciens parvo adhuc digner honorario, nihil mihi spei reliquum esse potest (11). I have observed a thousand Times, in the Lives of the Civilians, written by Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 301.

to heighten the Glory of the Professors, he takes an exact notice of the Augmentations of their Salaries. This shews, that they were looked upon as Men well qualified to raise the Lustre of an University; 'tis therefore a sign of their great Parts and Ability. Self love, always ready to justify itself, and more ingenious on that Point than can be expressed, does not fail to make use of this fine Turn, and by that means to elude the Reproaches of Venality and Avarice; but it can hardly remove these two Difficulties. The one is, that those Amplifications of Wages are commonly an Effect of the importunate Complaints and Solicitations of those that are gratified with them, or of their threatening to retire, in order to get a more profitable Place (12). The other is, that those Places, which are more profitable, would not be offered to such as are thought to be disinterested, and only sensible of true Glory. This was not the Character of our Decius. He, like a Buck, leaped from place to place, and from one University to another; he went out, and returned according to the Value of the Pensions that were promised him, and he himself thought fit to set down in his Epitaph, that his Wages amounted at last to fifteen hundred Gold Pieces. He was afraid that the word aureus would not sufficiently express the great Price that his Lectures had cost; and therefore he added the barbarous words in auro. Philippus Decius . . . vocatus in Italiam ab excelsa Florentinorum Rep. posleaquam stipendium M. D. aureorum in auro pro leatura consecutus fuisset, de morte cogitans, hoc sepulchrum sibi fabricari curavit. (13) — Philip Decius, being recalled into Italy by the Republic of Florence, and having obtained a Salary of fifteen hundred Crowns of Gold, thought of Death, and caused this Monument to be raised. He intimates that he did not think of Death till he had attained to that great Pension. Titulo res digna sepulchri. That Epitaph was more liable to Censure upon that Account, than for the Grossness of the Style (14). It must not be said that he refused the thousand Crowns of Gold, which the Senate of Milan, the City of Bologna, and the Republic of Venice, offered him, when he had but eight hundred at Pisa; for doubtless he refused them in hopes to be paid, for his Refusal, with Usury; and indeed, it appears, that the University of Pisa augmented his Pension, and made it much more considerable than any he could have got in other Universities. Demum Pisas cum DCCC. aureorum stipendio omnium supremus conductus est, ubi & a Mediolanensi Senatu, & a Bononiensibus, Venitiis, que mille aureorum annua promissione frustra sollicitatus per multos annos perseveravit, donec ad MD. aureorum honorarium pervenit (15). Note, by the bye, that Mr Wharton is somewhat unexact, when he says, that the Florentines recalled him into Italy by a Pension of fifteen hundred Crowns of Gold (16).

(11) Ibid. pag. 301.

(12) Compare this with what is said in Rem. [A] of the Article ACCARISI (FRANCIS C18); and in Rem. [C] of the Article ALCIAT (ANDREW.)

(13) Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 309.

(14) It was ridiculed. See Paul. Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 208.

(15) Panzir. pag. 308.

(16) Henricus Wharton, in Appendice ad Historiam Literariam Guilelmi Cave, pag. 208.

[E] He

pened with on Account of his old Age, Bartholomew Socinus was put in his Place. Our Decius left no Stone unturned to share that Employment, and had already obtained his Wish [E]; but he was deprived of it, when it was known, that Socinus threatened to retire, if it was divided. To make Decius amends, they gave him the Professorship of the Canon-Law. This was done by the Intrigues of Socinus (b), who was in hopes that Felinus, who had taught the Canon-Law for a long time, and understood it perfectly, would have all the Glory of that Function. Socinus was mistaken in his Conjectures; for Decius was more followed than Felinus, who was so vexed at his Superiority of Glory, that he absented himself. Felinus retired abruptly (c). The Curators of the University, knowing the Reason of his Retreat, were very angry with Decius, and deprived him of his Places. They were reproved for it by Laurence de Medicis; which was the Reason, that, when he went to Florence to receive his Salary, they told him angrily, that he might return to Pisa. He answered that he would not, since he had accepted the Professorship, which those of Siena had offered him; but he was forced to resign it, and to take up again his Employ at Pisa, for they threatened to keep from him the Arrears of his Pension, and forbid him to remove his Effects. They granted him some Favours, and promised to associate him with Socinus at two Years end. Socinus, who was at Siena, having heard this, sent word that he would not return to Pisa, if that Promise was performed. This Menace made such an Impression, that they declared to our Philip, that he might retire, if Socinus should come to resume his Professorship. Accordingly, as soon as Socinus returned, he retired to Siena, where he was Professor of the Canon, and afterwards of the Civil-Law. He went to Rome about the Year 1490, where he was appointed Auditor of the Rota by Innocent VIII. He consecrated himself to the Ecclesiastical State; but, having received the first Orders, he could proceed no farther, because he was a Bastard. Some Authors suppressed this Obstacle, and chose rather to say, that out of Complaisance to his Father and Brother, and being weary of repeating his Breviary every day, he left Rome, and returned to Siena (d). He found himself exposed there to the Envy of some other Professors, which obliged him to go to Pisa, where he taught sometimes the Canon, and sometimes the Civil-Law, but not without many Quarrels [F]. He was invited to Padua, to be first Professor of the Canon-Law, in the Year 1502. Lewis XII, looking upon him as his Subject, and having a mind to make him Professor at Pavia, demanded him of the Venetians; who, after a great Opposition, yielded at last to that King's Desire [G]. Decius came to Pavia about the End of the Year 1505, where he answered the Expectation of Lewis XII. After he had been Professor seven Years, he obtained a Salary of two thousand Livres, which was more than any Professor ever had in that University. The Differences between France and the Court of Rome, brought many Misfortunes upon him. Being consulted by Lewis XII about the Convocation of a Council, his Opinion was, that a small Number of Cardinals had a Right to call one; and he

(b) See Forsterus, Hist. Juris Civilis lib. 3, cap. 39, pag. m. 534.

(c) About the Year 1483.

(d) Alii ejus natales celantes rem aliter narrant. Cum Trifolius pater, & Lancelotus frater factum non probarent, & ipse in canonicis horis quotidie recitandis tunc assideretur, relicta Roma, iterum ad Senenses remeavit. Panzirulus, ibid. pag. 305.

wrote

[E] He left no Stone unturned to share the Employment of Accolti, and had already obtained his Wish.] Some affirm, that he actually exercised the Functions of that Place, and that it was not taken from him till after Socinus, who was vexed to see his School empty, desired, that He, or Decius, should be dismissed. Bartholomæus Socinus Juris Cæsarei in eodem Gymnasio Professor, cum se discipulis viduatum doleret, aut semetipsum aut Philippum munere suo dimitti petit (17). I find the Narrative of Panzirulus more likely, which is, that Socinus desired this, as soon as he heard of the Promise that was made to our Philip, and before he could have observed, that such a Competitor was prejudicial to him.

[F] He taught at Pisa, but not without many Quarrels.] Socinus was not the only Person that would not have him for an Antagonist; I mean, that would not make his Lectures on the same Subject, and at the very same Hour with him. It appears by Panzirulus's Work, that, in the Universities of Italy, they match'd Professors in that manner; and that those, who were thus matched, passed for Rivals, Competitors, and Antagonists of one another. They were commonly in open War; and sometimes they grew so hot, and so furious, in their public Disputes, that People went to them, as if it had been a Fight of Gladiators. Our Decius had made himself so dreadful, that few Professors would be matched with him. They complained of his Slanders, and of the Artifice he made use of to get Auditors. 'Ibi (Pisus) eum omnes concurrentem recusare, hominem ut maledicum, male lingue artibus auditores captantem criminari (18). Antony Coccius had the Courage to enter the Lists with him; they engaged in a violent Quarrel, and railed at one another in a most shameful manner, unworthy the Gravity of their Character. 'Mox ad matutinam ejusdem Juris (Pontificii) sedem translatus Antonium

'Cocciū Florentinū ob veterem æmulationem durum adversarium concurrentem invenit. In ea contentione ita se exagitarunt, ut nec scædis socommatibus præter omnem gravitatem abstinuerint (19). Jason Mainus, being appointed Professor of the Civil-Law, would not have Decius for his Antagonist; he represented, that Decency would not permit that two Professors, born in the same City, should oppose each other: whereupon it was ordered, that our Philip should teach again the Canon-Law (20). Mainus was not always so reserved; for he had a violent Quarrel with Decius (21).

[G] Lewis the XIIth demanded him of the Venetians.] The French Ambassador made such pressing Instances in the Senate of Venice to obtain Decius, that the Envoy of the Florentines could not forbear saying he would make a Report of it to his Masters. He found the thing somewhat singular. 'Ludovicus Galorum Rex Decium, velut subjectum, Ticinum revocat, sed Venetis eum dimittere recusantibus, Regius Orator maximam in Senatu contentionem exercuit, quod admiratus Joannes Bernardi Oricellarius, qui ibi pro Florentinis Legatus aderat, se ingentem ob unum hominem inter Excellos Principes ortam altercationem vidisse Florentinis relaturum dixit (22). — Lewis, King of France, demanded Decius, as his Subject, to return to Pavia; but the Venetians refusing to let him depart the King's Ambassador raised an extraordinary Dispute, at which John Bernardi, who was there as Ambassador from the Florentines, being surprized, declared he would inform the Florentines, that he had seen a hot Dispute between two mighty Powers for one Man.' This shews that Paul Jovius is mistaken; for he says, that the French Governor caused our Decius to come from Pisa to Pavia (23). Mr Wharton has committed the same Mistake (24).

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) See the Article MAINUS, Rem. [F].

(22) Panzirulus, ibid. pag. 307.

(23) Ab ipso Pisus ubi uxorem duxerat Ticinum à Gallo præfite opimis stipendiis evocatus. Jovius ubi supra, pag. 207.

(24) Wharton, ubi supra, pag. 202.

[H] Abej

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 203.

(18) Panzirulus, ubi supra, pag. 205.

wrote a Book on that Subject. Pursuant to that Doctrine, a Council was held at Pisa, and he followed the Prelates of the French Party thither, which so exasperated Julius II., that he excommunicated him. It is likely he bore it more patiently than the plundering of his House when Pavia was taken [H]. Not finding himself safe in Italy, he retired into Fance, where he was made Counsellor in the Parliament of Grenoble [I]. By the King's Order, he went to join the Remainder of the Assembly of Pisa at Lyons; and afterwards he taught the Civil-Law in the University of Valence (e). After the Death of Julius II., he was absolved by Leo X., who offered to make him Professor of the Canon-Law at Rome. But being afraid of displeasing the King, if he should accept those Offers, he refused them (f). After the Death of Lewis XII., he was invited to Pisa; but Francis I. would not permit him to go thither, and sent him to Pavia to teach there the Canon-Law. He left that Town because his Salary was not paid, and, seeing that Milan was besieged by the Emperor Maximilian's Forces, he returned to Pisa, where his Professor's Salary amounted at first to Eight hundred Crowns of Gold, and at last to Fifteen hundred. He died at Siena, the thirteenth of October 1535, being Eighty one Years old, and was buried at Pisa, in the Marble Tomb that he had caused to be made for himself. He had a natural Daughter, whom he loved very much, and who was very leud [K]. His Memory was much decayed in the last Years of his Life (g) [L]. There are several Books of his writing: it is observed, that he wrested the Interpreters, and that sometimes his Quotations were false (h). His Commentaries on the Decretals are very much esteemed (i). I will take notice of some of Moreri's Mistakes [M].

(e) See the Remark [I].

(f) Mr. Doujat Præm. Canon. pag. 617, did not rightly apprehend this; for he says, that Decius accepted them.

(g) Taken from Panzirulus de claris Legum interpretibus, lib. 3, cap. 135.

(h) Id. ibid.

(i) Doujat. Præm. Canon. 618.

[H] They plundered Decius's House when Pavia was taken. Pavia being taken, the Cardinal of Sion caused Decius's House to be plundered; his Library was dispersed. Nay, they had a mind to take that Professor's Daughter out of St Andrew's Nunnery, though she was but ten Years of Age; but they left her there at the Request of the Nuns, after having taken all her Estate from her. To compleat their Revenge, it was ordered that Decius's Effects should be delivered to the Public (25). Paul Jovius says, that the Cardinal of Sion suffered none but Decius's House to be plundered in Pavia (26). This happened in the Year 1512. Forsterus is therefore grossly mistaken; for, after having said that this great Civilian complains, 'se egenum, inopem, à patria ejectum, fortunis omnibus absque sua culpa spoliatum, præter spem (unicum miserorum solatium) nihil habere, he adds, hæc autem perpeffus est anno 1498 (27). — That he was reduced to Poverty and want, expelled his Country, unjustly plundered of all his Fortune, and had nothing left but hope, the sole comfort of Persons in his Circumstances. These Misfortunes beset him in the Year 1498. Varillas should have mentioned that Misfortune, since he thought fit to mention a lesser one. 'Philip Decius,' says he (28), was not free from Julius's Resentment. He had exasperated the Court of Rome to the highest degree, by offering the Council of Pisa to digest the Matters of which they were to treat, and to afford the Authorities necessary to support them. The Court of Rome was also afraid that he would write in favour of the Resolutions that should be taken in that Council, and that his Authority would make them acceptable where-ever it was respected. An Excommunication was fulminated against him to prevent it; and he was put into such a condition, that though he was generally beloved and esteemed in Milan, where he discharged so worthily the first Professorship of the Civil-Law, he durst but seldom stir out of his House, and then very well attended.' He is mistaken when he says that Decius was Professor of the Civil-Law in Milan.

[I] He was made Counsellor in the Parliament of Grenoble. That City does not belong to the Gallia Narbonensis, as Panzirulus pretends. In Narbonensis, Provincia, (says he) Gratianopoli cum CCL aureorum honorario Senator est declaratus (29). He does not mention the Year. I cannot tell whether Mr Alard mentions it right, when he says that Decius was honoured with that Office in 1514 (30). And I question what Panzirulus says, that Decius taught the Civil-Law at Valence, after having been Counsellor in the Parliament of Grenoble. I should rather believe that he was Counsellor in that Parliament after he had professed the Law in the University of Valence.

[K] He had a natural Daughter — who was very leud. It is said that her Leudness was attended with Imprudence, so that her Father had the Grief to know it, but pretended to be ignorant of it. She had not the Power to save Appearances: she used to play wanton Tricks with Boys in the Streets; which is not an equivocal sign of Leudness in Italy, as in some other Places, but a convincing Proof of it. Here is another Disorder: instead of getting Money by her ill Behaviour, she spent much by it; for she bought the Careless of young Men very dear. I shall cite Panzirulus's Words: 'Filiam naturalem in deliciis habuit, quæ citharam edocta, dissimulante patre, minus honestam cum adolescentibus, quos magna etiam pecunia conducebat, vitam egisse dicitur, & cum illis in publico joci non erubescerebat (31).' We may rank Decius in the Catalogue that I have mentioned in another place (32). For the rest, if we believe Paul Jovius, his only Daughter (33) was married to a noble Sienese.

[L] His Memory was much decayed in the last Years of his Life. It failed him when he was to confer the Doctor's Degree on Corras (34). Others say, that he could no longer remember any Paragraph, or any Law, and that he could hardly speak a word of Latin. 'Sub finem vitæ adeo factus est obliviosus ut nullius legis vel paragraphi reminisci, & vix Latine quid proloqui potuerit (35).' I have not found these Words in the Author quoted by Freherus; but I find the whole Matter somewhat at large in a Work of Corras himself. These are his Words (36): 'Quin & nostra hac ætate Philippus Decius, egregius Jurisconsultus, anno 1536 (37) (quo tempore me in Senensi Academia Doctoratus titulo donavit) adeo senectute emarcuerat, ut nullius legis aut paragraphi ex jure nostro recordaretur: imo ægre quicquam Latine proloqui posset. Quare quum mihi ipsa gradus insignia conferre conaretur, alium quendam e collegis oportuerit prodire, qui verba solita nuncuparet. — And in our own time Philip Decius, an eminent Civilian, in the Year 1536 (from whom at that time I received the Degree of Doctor in the University of Siena) was so impaired by Age, that he remembered no Chapter or Paragraph of our Law, nay, could scarcely speak a word of Latin: inasmuch that when he attempted to have conferred the Degree upon me, another was obliged to appear and speak for him.'

[M] I will take notice of some of Moreri's Mistakes. I. Exactness will not permit one to say, that Decius lived in the beginning of the XVIth Century; for he was born in the Year 1454, and had got a great Reputation before he was thirty Years of Age. II. He studied first under his Brother at Pavia, and afterwards at Pisa: and therefore Moreri ought not only to have mentioned Pisa. III. Jafon, Bartholomew Socinus, and Jerom Zanetini, were not his Preceptors: he heard their public Lectures; but that is not what is meant in our Language, when we say that such a one had such and such Preceptors. IV. I question whether he was married: Panzirulus says nothing of it, tho' he follows him step by step in the least Passages of his Life, and says, in express Words, that he had a natural Daughter. This negative Argument seems to me to be preferable to the Affirmation of Paul Jovius (38). V. Decius did not retire to Pavia; for he was invited thither by Lewis XII. VI. He did not go to Pavia when he left Pisa: for he was Professor at Padua when Lewis XII sent for him to Pavia. Paul Jovius has deceived many People: 'Ab ipsis Pisis,

(31) Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 308.

(32) In the Article STILPO, Rem. [G].

(33) Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 207.

(34) Senio confectus memoriam adeo infirmæ fuit ut Joanni Corrasio insignia Doctorum traditurus decesseret. Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 309.

(35) Freherus in Theatro, pag. 874. Hæc quæ Forsterus in Hist. Juris Civ. Rom. lib. 2, cap. 39.

(36) Joh. Corrasius Notis in Aræstium Parliamenti Tholosiæ, pag. m. 71. 'I have not the French Edition, and therefore I quote the Latin Version made by Hugh Sureau.'

(37) Panzirulus, and all the other Biographers, place the Death of Decius in the Year 1535.

(38) Pisis ubi uxorem duxerat Jovius Elegiarum, pag. 207.

(25) Taken from Panzirulus, ubi supra, pag. 307, 308.

(26) Unam omnium Decii domum militi diripiendam dedit Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 207. Wharton, ubi supra, says the same, pag. 302.

(27) Forsterus, ubi supra, pag. 535. He quotes the Epistle dedicatory of Decius's Confilia.

(28) Varillas, Histoir. de Louis XII., lib. 8, sub fin. pag. m. 85, ad. an. 1512.

(29) Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 308.

(30) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 87.

(39) Jovius, lib. Wharton, Freher Theatr. Vir. illust. pag. 114, say the same.

(40) In civitate Biturum jus divinum edocuit per duos ferme annos. Jovius El. g. pag. 207. Wharton, Freher, &c. say the same.

'says he (39), ubi uxorem duxerat, Ticinum à Gallo præfide, opimis stipendiis evocatus. — He removed, says he, from Pisa, where he married a Wife, to Pavia by the Persuasion of the French Governor, and a large Salary.' VII. Being retired into France after the plundering of his House, he did not stay two Years at Bourges, as Moreri affirms after Paul Jovius (40). Panzirolus's Silence seems to me demonstrative against it; and besides, the Chronology is not favourable to Moreri. He will have it, that Decius, after two years Stay at Bourges, was sent for to Valence, by Lewis XII, and honoured with a Place of Counsellor in the Parliament. The House of that learned Civilian was plundered in the Year 1512; and it is very likely that he did not come into France 'till towards the end of the same Year. Now

Lewis XII died the first day of January 1515. It is better to believe those, who say that Decius was provided with a Counsellor's Place at his Arrival in the Kingdom. Mr Doujat is mistaken in placing this in the Year 1510 (41). VIII. Decius was not buried at Pavia, but at Pisa. IX. Instead of nimis venuste, in Latomus's Verses, it should be minus venuste.

Take notice of another Fault in Paul Jovius. He says, that Decius, being returned into Italy, engaged himself in the Service of the University of Siena. It was in the Service of that of Pisa. Note also a Mistake of Mr le Laboureur: he says, that John James de Mêmes, Professor of the Law at Toulouse, had Philip Decius for his Colleague (42). But the latter never taught there.

(41) Doujat. Prænot. Canon. pag. 617.

(42) Le Laboureur, Additions to Castelnau's Mémoires, Tom. II, pag. 835.

DEJOTARUS, one of the Tetrarchs of Galatia, aggrandized himself by degrees in such a manner, that he encroached upon most of the Rights of the other Tetrarchs, and obtained the Title of King, and the lesser Armenia, from the Senate of Rome (a). He became at last the only Tetrarch (b). He did the Romans good Services in all their Wars in Asia [A]; and not doubting but that Pompey's Party was the Cause of the People of Rome, and that those who favoured Cæsar were Rebels, he declared for Pompey [B], and brought him a good body of Troops. He was severely censured for it some time after, when Cæsar, returning from Egypt to fight with Pharnaces, King of Pontus, drew near Galatia. Dejotarus, intending to make him forget his Attachment to Pompey, and to be supported against the other Tetrarchs, had supplied him with a great deal of Money (c), and quartered Domitius Calvinus's Forces in his Dominions (d). This was not unserviceable; for, after some sharp Reprimands, he found favour with Cæsar [C]. He asked his Pardon; and, to do it with more Humility, he put off his Royal Robes. Cæsar made him put them on again, and forgave him what was past (e), and confirmed the Title of King to him and his Son (f); but took him along with him to the War against Pharnaces (g), and afterwards he took Armenia, and Part of Galatia from him (b). Some time after, Dejotarus had a troublesome Affair at Rome. He was accused of an Attempt against Cæsar's Life. It was maintained, that, when Cæsar lodged at the House of Dejotarus, the latter had a Design to kill him. Cæsar, the Son of

(a) Hirtius, de Bello Alexand. cap. 67.

(b) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 390.

(c) Cicero, Orat. pro Dejotaro, cap. 5.

(d) He was Cæsar's Lieutenant in Asia.

(e) Hirtius, ibid. cap. 68.

(f) Cicero, ubi supra, cap. iii.

(g) Hirtius, ubi supra.

(b) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 2, cap. 8, & 36, & Philipp. 2, cap. 78.

[A] He did the Romans good Services in all their Wars in Asia Cicero speaks magnificently of it. These are his Words (1): ' Quid de patre (Dejotaro) dicam? ejus benevolentia in populum Romanum est ipsius æqualis ætati: qui non solum socius imperatorum nostrorum fuit in bellis, verum etiam dux copiarum suarum. Quæ de illo viro Sulla, quæ Murena, quæ Servilius, quæ Lucullus, quam ornate, quam honorifice, quam graviter sæpe in senatu prædicaverunt? Quid de Cn. Pompeio loquar? qui unum Dejotarium in toto orbe terrarum ex animo amicum, vereque benevolum, unum fidelem populo R. judicavit. Fuimus imperatores ego, & M. Bibulus in propinquis finitimisque provinciis: ab eodem rege adjuti sumus, & equitatu, & pedestribus copiis. — What shall I say of the Father (Dejotarus), whose attachment to the Roman People is equal to his Age, who was not only our Ally in War, but who also headed his own Forces? With what Force, Esteem, and Eloquence, have Sulla, Murena, Servilius, and Lucullus, often extolled him in the Senate? What shall I say of Cneius Pompey, who looked upon Dejotarus as above all Mankind as a sincere Friend, and a hearty Well-wisher to the Roman People? I and M. Bibulus have commanded in the neighbouring Provinces, and have received, from the same Prince, Assistance, both of Horse and Foot.' See also what he writ whilst he commanded in Cilicia (2).

(1) Philipp. 11, cap. 13.

(2) Id. Epist. 4, lib. 15, ad Famil. pag. m. 388.

[B] Dejotarus declared for Pompey. Immediately after the foregoing Passage, which I have just now set down, Cicero goes on thus: ' Secutus hoc est acerbissimum & calamitosissimum civile bellum: in quo quid faciendum Dejotaro? quid omnino rectius fuerit dicere non est necesse, præsertim cum contra ac Dejotarus sensit victoria belli judicaret. Quo in bello si fuit error, communis ei fuit cum Senatu: sin recta sententia, ne victa quidem causa vituperanda est. — After this, burst out that most bloody and destructive Civil-War. What part was Dejotarus then to act? It is needless to say what had been the fittest, especially since Fortune declared herself quite contrary to the Sentiments of Dejotarus. In which War, if he was guilty of Error, it was the same Error which the Senate followed; but if his Opinion was just, the Cause ought not to be condemned because it wanted Success.' These Words inform us, that Dejotarus believed that Pompey would overcome; so that he engaged in that Party as well for political Reasons, as out of a Principle of Justice. We shall see in the following Remarks, that he always believed he had declared for the good Cause, but that he took care not to speak his Thoughts before Cæsar.

[C] After some sharp Reprimands, he found Favour with Cæsar. He asked Cæsar Pardon for having fought against him in the Battle of Pharsalia; he represented to him the Situation of his Country, which was such, that he could not be maintained by Cæsar's Forces: he added, that it did not belong to him to be a Judge of the Differences of the Roman People, but to obey those, on all Occasions, that were in Possession of the Command. To speak the Truth, they were false Excuses; for he had been fully persuaded that Pompey's Cause was that of the Roman People, and that Cæsar was a rebellious Subject; and therefore he had behaved himself like a Judge of the Differences of the Romans. Nevertheless, it ought not to be thought strange that he concealed his Thoughts; for there is hardly any Man, except the Saints of the highest Order, or Philosophers full of Contempt for worldly Things, that would have been more ingenuous than he was. All his Excuses were rejected; and he was told that his Imprudence was visible, and that he could not be ignorant that Cæsar was Master of Rome, that is, of the Seat of the Senate, and the Center of the Authority of the Roman People. Let this be said in favour of those, who do not understand Latin; for they, who understand it, will rather desire that I should cite Hirtius's Words, which are as follows (3): ' Cum propius Pontum finesque Gallogræciæ accessisset (Cæsar), Dejotarus, Tetrarchæ Gallogræciæ tunc quidem penè totius, quod ei neque legibus neque moribus concessum esse ceteri Tetrarchæ contendebant: sine dubio autem Rex Armeniæ minoris à Senatu appellatus, depositis Regiis insignibus, neque tantum privato vestitu, sed etiam reorum habitu supplex ad Cæsarem venit oratum, ut sibi ignoscere, quod in ea parte positus terrarum, quæ nulla præsidia Cæsaris habuisset, exercitiis imperii in Cn. Pompeii castris affuisset. Neque enim se debuisset judicem esse controversiarum populi Romani, sed parere præsentibus imperiis. Contra quem Cæsar, cum plurima sua commemorasset officia, quæ consul ei decretis publicis tribuisset, cum-

(3) Hirtius de Bello Alexand. cap. 67.

(i) He was come to Rome with the Ambassadors of Dejotarus.

Dejotarus's Son-in-law, carried on that Accusation, and suborned the Physician (i) of his Grandfather, by the Mother's side, to depose against his Master. Cicero pleaded the Cause of the Accused (k), and succeeded admirably well; nevertheless he did not gain the Cause: Cæsar would decide nothing on the one side or the other [D]: those who

(k) Vide Oratorem Ciceronis pro Dejotaro, passim.

que defensionem ejus nullam posse excusationem imprudentiæ recipere coarguisset, quod homo tantæ prudentiæ ac diligentis scire potuisset quis urbem Italianque teneret, ubi Senatus populusque Romanus, ubi Respublica esset, quis deinde post L. Lentulum & M. Marcellum consul esset: tamen se concedere id factum superioribus suis beneficiis, veteri hospitio & amicitia, ac dignitati etatque hominis, precibus eorum qui frequentes concurrissent hospites atque amici Dejotari ad deprecandum. De controversis Tetrarcharum postea se cogniturum esse dixit: regnum vestitum ei restituit. Legionem autem unam quam ex genere civium suorum Dejotarus natura disciplinæ nostræ constitutam habebat, equitatumque omnem ad bellum gerendum adducere jussit. — When he (Cæsar) was arrived near Pontus, on the Confines of Galatia, Dejotarus, undoubted King of Armenia the First, though his Title to the Tetrarchat of Galatia was disputed by the other Tetrarchi as being repugnant to Law and Equity, having put off not only his Regal Ornaments, but even the Habit of a private Gentleman, attended Cæsar in a Suppliant's Habit, humbly begging Pardon, that, since Fortune had placed him in a Country, where Cæsar had no Forces, he had assisted Pompey: for it did not belong to him to decide the Controversies of the Roman People, but to obey the present Power. To which, Cæsar, first reminding him of the many friendly Offices he had done him during his Consulship, to convince him the Defence, he had made, was no Excuse for what he had done, replied, it was impossible for a Person of his Prudence and Experience to be ignorant who was Master of Rome and Italy, where the Senate, People, and Republic were, or who was elected Consul after L. Lentulus, and M. Marcellus: however he forgave him for the former Services he had done, the ancient Acquaintance there had been between them, the Suppliant's Dignity, his Age, and the Entreaties of Numbers of People (Dejotarus's Friends) who interceded for him. Having restored him his kingly Apparel, he declared he would hereafter decide the Dispute about the Tetrarchat, but commanded Dejotarus to attend him to the War, with all his Cavalry, and the Legion which he had caused to be instructed in the Roman Discipline.

[D] He was accused of an Attempt on Cæsar's Life

..... Cæsar would pronounce nothing on the one side or the other.] I can only cite Father Abram on this Subject: he says, 'Videtur Cæsar sententiam distulisse, dum ut statuerat primo quoque tempore proficisceretur in Orientem: certe non fuit absolutus, ut constat è 2 Philippica (4). — Cæsar, says he, seems to have deferred his Sentence, till, according to a Design which he had formed, he should go into the East. It is plain from the second Philippic that he was not acquitted.' I here insert the Words that he quotes out of the second Philippic. 'Quis enim cuiquam inimicior quam Dejotaro Cæsar? ... à quo vivo nec præfens nec absens quicquam æqui bonive impetravit ... at ille nunquam (semper enim absenti affui Dejotaro) quicquam sibi quod nos pro illo postularemus, æquum dixit videri (5). — Who was ever more an Enemy to another than Cæsar to Dejotarus? who neither present or absent could obtain Justice from him whilst he lived. ... I had an intimate Correspondence with Dejotarus; but Cæsar never assented to what we moved in his Favour.' This puts in mind of a thing I have observed elsewhere (6), which is, that Advocates are very often subject to contradict themselves, because they make use of one and the same Fact, or of one and the same Reason, sometimes in one sense, and sometimes in another, according as the Causes they have in hand require. When Cicero confuted the Accusers of Dejotarus, he said that it was no ways credible, that a Prince, who had received so many Benefits from Julius Cæsar, should conspire his Death. Quæ quidem à te in eam partem accepta sunt, C. Cæsar, ut eum amplissimo regis honore & nomine affeceris. Is igitur non modo à te periculo liberatus, sed etiam honore amplissimo ornatus arguitur domi te suæ interficere voluisse, quod tu, nisi eum furiosissimum judicas, suspicari profecto non potes.

(4) Abram, in Cicero's Oration. Tom. II, pag. 467.

(5) Cicero's Philippic, 2, cap. 37.

(6) Before, in the Remark [B] and [C] of the Article ANTONY (MARCE) the Orator.

A CONTRADICTION OF Cicero.

'Ut enim omittam ejus ... tam inhumani & INGRATI animi à quo rex appellatus esset in eum tyrannum inveniri (7). — Which Services, O Cæsar, were so acceptable to you, that you distinguished him by the greatest Marks of Honour, and the Name of King; it is he therefore, whom you saved from Danger, and loaded with Honours, who is accused of an Intent to murder you at his own House; of which crime you cannot suspect him guilty, unless you think him distracted. For, not to insist on the Inhumanity and INGRATITUDE of that Man must be guilty of, who proves a Tyrant to him that made him a King. But when, some Months after, he undertook to prove a Decree to be spurious, which was put forth under the Name of Julius Cæsar, he argued in this manner: This Decree is favourable to Dejotarus, and therefore Cæsar is not the Author of it, since he was always against Dejotarus, and never did him any Favour nor Justice; and thereupon he alledged particularly how Dejotarus had been hardly used by Cæsar even in the midst of Galatia, that is to say, where and when Dejotarus had a mind to kill him, as the Accusers said. Compellat hospitem præfens, computat, pecuniæ imperat, in ejus tetrarchia unum ex Græcis comitibus suis collocat: Armeniam abstulerat à Senatu datam (8). — He had made a positive demand, calculated, and given orders for levying the money, had placed one of his Attendants, a Greek, in his Tetrarchat, and had deprived him of Armenia, which the Senate had given him. Thus Cicero made use of Cæsar's Behaviour towards Dejotarus to different purposes. When there was occasion to prove, that Dejotarus was very much obliged to Cæsar, he said that Cæsar had been very kind to him; but when there was occasion to prove, that Dejotarus never had any share in Cæsar's Friendship, he said that the latter had behaved himself very unkindly towards him. What had been favourable to Dejotarus in Cæsar's Conduct, served for a Proof against the Accusers; and what had been contrary to that Prince, served for a Proof against Marc Anthony. I would fain know what Cicero would have answered to a Man who had told him, I understand by your second Philippic, that when Cæsar went through Galatia, he treated Dejotarus very harshly; it is therefore probable that Dejotarus, to be revenged, conspired against Cæsar: you must therefore strike out of the Plea for Dejotarus, the Proof that you made use of against his Accusers, grounded upon the Gratitude which the great Favours of Julius Cæsar inspired him with.

If the Cunning of Politicians was not well known, it would be a wonder to see that Cæsar did not give a Sentence of Absolution in Dejotarus's Cause; for if we judge of the Accusation by the Answer of the accused, there was never a greater Calumny forged than that of Dejotarus's Accusers. Besides, one of that King's Embassadors offered Cæsar to surrender himself a Prisoner, and to answer for his Master's Innocency, Body for Body: Hieras quidem causam omnem suscipi, & criminibus illis pro rege se supponit reum (9). It seems to me that the most likely thing the Accusers said was, that, during the War of Africa, Dejotarus was very inquisitive after News from that Country, and desirous to hear some bad news concerning Cæsar. Reliqua pars accusationis duplex fuit: una Regem semper in speculis fuisse ... sequutum est bellum Africanum, graves de te rumores qui etiam furiosum illum Cælium excitaverunt. ... Eo, inquit, tempore ipso Nicæam, Ephesumque mittebat qui rumores Africanos exciperent, & celeriter ad se referrent (10).

— The remaining parts of the Accusation consists of two heads, the first that the King was always very curious in learning what passed. ... After this the War in Africa broke out, which was attended with Reports injurious to you, which stirred up the furious Cælius ... at which time, says he, he sent Persons to Nice and Ephesus to receive the Rumours from Africa, and bring them back to him. It concerned him to be no longer in fear of him, that fear being the only thing that hindered him from re-assuming the Possession of what he had lost. Cæsar did not question it; and for that Reason he had no mind to acquit him: by that means he kept him in awe, and encouraged

(7) Cicero pro Dejotaro, cap. 55.

(8) Idem Philippic, 2, cap. 37.

WHY Cæsar decided nothing on either side.

(9) Cicero pro Dejotaro, sub fine.

(10) Id. ibid. cap. viii.

(1) Cicero, Phil.
lib. 2.

who affirm the contrary, are mistaken [E]. Some Months after, he was murdered. As soon as Dejotarus heard of it, he retook all that Cæsar had taken from him (l). His great Age did not hinder him from joining Brutus in Asia (m); and by that Action he confirmed the Promises of his good Designs that were made to the Senate (n). He was not so good-natured as his Orator represents him [F]: he caused his Daughter

(m) Dio, lib. 47.
pag. 388.

(n) Cicero, Phil.
lib. 13, cap. 12.

and

encouraged Spies and Accusers. It was his Interest, that the Punishment of the Calumny in that case should not free his Enemies from the Apprehension they might be in of being calumniated. It is not improper to keep up such a Fear, when one is in such a Post as Cæsar was. What Cicero represented is very fine: if it be permitted to suborn Domestics to depose against their Masters, and if those false Accusers are not punished, it will be declaring War against all heads of Families, no Man will be safe in his own House; and by a strange Metamorphosis, Masters will be Slaves to their Servants, and the latter will become Tyrants over their Masters. Servum sollicitare verbis, spe, præmiisque corrumpere, abducere domum, contra dominum armare, hoc est non uni propinquo, sed omnibus familiis bellum nefarium indicere. Nam ista corruptela ferve, si non modo impunita fuerit, sed etiam à tanta autoritate approbata, nulli parietes nostram salutem, nullæ leges, nulla jura custodiant: ubi enim id quod intus est atque nostrum impune evolare potest, contraque nos pugnare, sit in dominatu servitius, in servitute dominatus. O tempora, o mores (11)! — To inveigle Servants with hopes and promises, to corrupt them with Presents, to decoy them from and arm them against their Masters, is not only declaring open War against one, but all the principal Members of Society; for if the debauching of Servants does not only pass with Impunity, but receives also the Sanction of such Authority, it will be in vain for a Man to hope for security in his own House, or expect it from the Laws. For where the secrets of Families are suffered to be divulged, and rise up against their Masters, the World must be turned upside down, Servants become Masters, and Masters Servants. Cicero was not aware that the Disorder he spoke of will ever be fomented by Tyrants and Uliurpers. They would have us fear lest the Walls and the Floors of our Chambers should witness against us. Observe, that Spies and Informers have at all times taken notice of the manner how People talk of News. It was one of the Crimes that was objected against Dejotarus.

(11) Id. ibid.
cap. 11.

[E] Those who affirm the contrary are mistaken. A Political Discourse printed in the Year 1660, shewing the Reasons of one of the Courts of Accounts of France for ratifying the Patents of the Naturalization of Foreigners, though Protestant, contains these Words (12): If you had read those Pamphlets, perhaps the Opinion, that you have brought with you from home, would drop as easily as the Case of Cæsar's Condemnation against Dejotarus, after he had heard the Great Cicero speak so eloquently and strongly for his Discharge. The Author of these Words has taken Dejotarus for Ligarius. See the Article LIGARIUS, Remark [A].

(12) In the Leaf
A 5 verso.

[F] He was not so good-natured as Cicero represents him. It was objected against Dejotarus, that he had applied a Verse to two Pieces of News which he had received at the same time, one good, and the other bad: one was, that his Friend Domitius had been cast away at Sea; and the other, that Cæsar was besieged in a Castle. Cicero, in order to shew that this was a Calumny, says, among other things, that Dejotarus was a good-natured Man, and that the Verse in question is the most barbarous in the World. Let our Friends persevere, provided our Enemies persevere likewise. This is the Sense of that Verse. Quum esset ei nunciatum Domitium naufragio perisse, te in castello circumfideri, de Domitio dixit verbum Græcum eadem sententia qua etiam nos habemus Latinum, Pereant amici dum una inimici interdicant. Quod ille si esset tibi inimicissimus nunquam tamen dixisset: ipse enim manifestus, versus immanis (13). Plutarch gives us a quite different Notion of Dejotarus. According to Chrysippus, says he, God resembles Dejotarus King of Galatia, who, having several Children, killed them all, except him to whom he designed to leave his Kingdom. To understand this, the Reader must see somewhat at length what goes before and what follows. As Cities over-charged with People send forth Colonies into other Places, and make War upon some, so does God, according to Chrysippus, send the beginning of some Mortality. And he brings in Euripides for a Witness with others, who says, that the Trojan War was caused by the Gods, to exhaust the Multitude of Men. . . . Consider, how Chrysippus always attributes to the Gods specious and kind Appellations; but at the same time, cruel, barbarous, and Galatian Deeds. For those so great Slaughters and Carnages, as were the Productions of the Trojan War, and again of the Median and Peloponnesian, were no way like Colonies, unless these Men know of some Cities built in Hell, and under the Earth. But Chrysippus makes God like to Dejotarus, the Galatian King, who, having many Sons, and being desirous to leave his Kingdom and House to one of them, killed all the rest; as he that cuts and prunes away all the other Branches from the Vine, that one, which he leaves remaining, may grow strong and great; but the Vine-dresser does this, the Sprigs being slender and weak. Τὸ Γαλάτῃ Διοτάρῳ ποιεῖ Χρυσίππῳ ὁμοίον τὸν θεόν, ὅς παλαιοὶ νεν εὐτὴ παίδων γενομένων, ἐνὶ βελόχευος τὴν ἀρχὴν ἀπολαίπειν καὶ τὸν οἶκον, ἀπαντας ἐκείνους ἀπέσφαζεν, ὥστερ ἀμύδι βλαστὸς ἀπολαίπειν καὶ κολλᾶσαι, ἵνα εἰς ὃ λεπτοὺς ἰσχυρὸς γένῃται καὶ μέγας. Dejotaro Galatæ similem deum Chrysippus facit. Qui cum haberet complures filios, cum vellet uni regnum domumque relinquere, cæteros omnes necavit: tanquam vitis palmites si præcideret, ut unus aliquis superstes, validus magnusque fieret (14). And we, to favour a Bitch, take from her many of her new-born Puppies, whilst they are yet blind. But Jupiter, having not only suffered and seen Men to grow up, but having also both created and increased them, plagues them afterwards, devising Occasions of their Destruction and Corruption; whereas he should rather not have given them any Causes and Beginnings of Generation (15). These words of Plutarch contain a Comparison, which puts me in mind of an Impertinence of Vanini, which I have read in the Doctrina Curieuse of Father Garasse, pag. 815. As for Men, said he, we should do with them as the Fellers of Wood do in great Forests; they go and view them, to see the dead and green Wood, they cut off all that is useless and superfluous, or prejudicial, and keep only good Trees, or young hopeful Tillers. In like manner, said that wicked Atheist, a strict search ought to be made every Year of all the Inhabitants of great and populous Cities; and those that are useless, and hinder the rest from living, should be put to Death: such as those who have no Profession useful to the Public, decayed old Men, Vagabonds, and idle Fellows: Nature ought to be pruned, and Cities cleared; a Million of People should be put to death every Year, that are like Briars and Brambles to the rest, and hinder them from growing.

(13) Cicero, ib.
pag. 650.

(14) Plutarch de Stoic. Repugn.
pag. 1049. C.

(15) Idem ibid.

The Action, which Plutarch imputes to Dejotarus, does not seem very certain, when compared with the Praises that Cicero bestowed upon this King of Galatia, and with the Silence of the Accusers concerning such an Inhumanity. Would Cicero have said that Dejotarus was a very good Father, optimus pater familias (16), if his Grandson Cæsar could have reproached him with the Murder of his Children? Would he have said that his Probity, known to every body, was a sufficient Confutation of the Calumny? *Hoc loco Dejotarum non tam ingenio & prudentia, quam fide & religione vitæ defendendum puto. Nota tibi est, C. Cæsar, hominis probitas, noti mores, nota constantia: cui porro, qui modo populi Romani nomen audivit, Dejotari probitas, integritas, gravitas, virtus, fides non sit audita (17)? — Heretn Dejotarus may be defended, not so much for his great Capacity, and Wisdom, as his Integrity, and Sanctity of Life. You, O Cæsar, are no Stranger to his Honesty, his Morals, or his Constancy: and who, that has ever heard the least mention of the Roman People, has not also heard of the Honesty, Sincerity, Constancy, Virtue, and Integrity of Dejotarus? Observe, that Dejotarus had but one Son at the time of the Accusation. Nay, he had but one when Cæsar lodged in his House (18). I may be*

(16) Cicero calls him so, pro Dejotaro cap. 9.

(17) Ibid. cap. 6.

(18) Ib. cap. 3.

told and his Son-in-law to be put to Death, and demolished the Fortrefs where they lived. It is very likely that Castor escaped from him [G]; and that it was he, who obtained, in the Seven hundred and fourteenth Year of Rome, the Country, that Dejotarus and Attalus left vacant by their Death in Galatia. Dejotarus had another Son-in-law, against whom he undertook a Religious War [H]; for, being the Patron of the Temple, and of the Priests of the Goddess Cybele, he could not endure that his Son-in-law Brogitarus should prophane that sacred Place: he armed against him, and drove him from thence. He was

(19) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 391.

(20) Ibid. pag. 387.

(21) Ibid. pag. 390.

(22) Pro Dejotaro, cap. 7.

(23) Others read Luceium.

(24) Cicero pro Dejotaro, cap. 6.

(25) Id. ad Att. c. Epist. 17, lib. 5, pag. m. 525.

(26) Id. pro Dejotaro, cap. 3.

(27) Id. Epist. 21, ad Attic. lib. 5.

(28) Idem Philippi, 11, cap. 7, 35.

(29) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 390.

(30) Dio, lib. 49, pag. 469.

(31) Philipp. ubi supra.

(32) Appian. de Bell. Civil. lib. 5, pag. 715.

(33) Dio, lib. 45, pag. 479.

(34) Id. lib. 48, pag. 437.

(35) Post pugnam Philippiensem scribit Dio, lib. 48, Castor etiam eadem Attali & Dejotari in Gallia decesserunt &c. A. U. 714. debuit dicere Dejotaro non Castori. Dio non semel filios alieno nomine videlicet patrum eorumdem appellat. — Dion says, lib. 48, that after the Battle of Philippi, the Territories of Attalus and Dejotarus, who died in Galatia, were given to one Castor, in the Year of Rome, 714. He ought to have said to Dejotarus, and not to Castor. Dion often gives to the Sons the Name of their Fathers.

(36) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 387.

(37) Dio, lib. 50, pag. 488.

(38) Strabo, ubi supra.

(39) Lib. 12, pag. 391.

told that Strabo (19) mentions a thing that favours Plutarch, which is, that Dejotarus, having taken the chief City of his Son-in-law Sacondarius, caused him to be put to death, as he did his Daughter, the Wife of Sacondarius, demolished the Fortrefs, and plundered most of the Houses. In answer, that this is very different from Plutarch's Narrative. Doubtless Dejotarus did this, to revenge the horrid Treason of that Son-in law, who, probably, had been the chief Director of the Accusation against Dejotarus.

I shall observe by the bye, that the chief City of Sacondarius was called Gorbis: but because Strabo a few Pages before (20) calls the chief City of Sacondarius's Grandson, Morzeus, there is some likelihood that those Names have been altered. Cassaubon conjectures it. The same thing may be conjectured concerning the chief City of Dejotarus; it was called Blucium (21) according to some Manuscripts, and Blabium, according to others. Doubtless there is a Fault in it, since Cicero (22) calls the Castle, where Dejotarus was to receive Cæsar, Castellum Luceium (23)?

[G] It is very likely that Castor escaped from him. Castor was the Promoter of the Accusation at Rome, where he suborned Dejotarus's Physician to make him depose against his Master (24). Judge whether Dejotarus, who did not spare his Daughter, would have spared such a Grandson? We must therefore believe that Castor did not fall into his Hands. I cannot tell what became of Dejotarus's Son, for he did not succeed his Father: he had obtained the Title of King from the Senate (25), and afterwards from Cæsar (26), and was to marry a Daughter of Artavasdes King of Armenia (27). Cicero praises him very much (28). He, who succeeded Dejotarus, was called Amyntas, if we believe Strabo (29). Now this Amyntas had been Dejotarus's Secretary (30), and afterwards General of his Forces in Brutus's Army (31): He forsook Brutus's Party, and went over to Antony's Camp. Doubtless that was it which moved Antony to give him Pisidia in 714 (32), and Galatia, Lycania, and Pamphilia in 718 (33). Now because Dion says, that, in 714, the Triumviri gave Castor the Dominions of Dejotarus, deceased in Galatia, and those of Attalus, deceased in the same Country (34), I could easily believe that Strabo is mistaken when he says, that Amyntas was Dejotarus's immediate Successor. I think it is better to say, with Dion, that Castor succeeded Dejotarus, and then we may say that Amyntas succeeded Castor. Though Father Noris shews by some Examples, that it is usual with Dion to give a Son the Name of his Father, yet I cannot believe that this happened as to Castor; and if it were so, Father Noris would nevertheless have committed a Fault (35): for in such a case Dion could not have taken Castor for Dejotarus, since Castor was not the Son of Dejotarus, but only his Daughter's Son. It is likely that Castor, who accused his Grandfather at Rome of having attempted upon Cæsar's Life, is he, whom Dion mentions, as having succeeded Dejotarus. As for Dejotarus Philadelphus King of Paphlagonia, the Son of Castor (36), I confess I know not from whence to derive his Extraction. I cannot tell whether his Father is the same Castor who accused his Grandfather; that might be: I only know that he left Marc Antony in the War of Asia, to join Octavius (37), and that he was the last King of Paphlagonia (38).

I will not end this Remark without informing the Reader, that when I spoke of Sacondarius, Dejotarus's Son-in-law, I understood Strabo's Words otherwise than they are commonly understood. Τὸ τῷ Κάσορ-ρῳ βασιλεῖον τῷ Σακκονδάρει, ἐν ᾧ γαμετρὸν οὐκ ἔστιν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀντιπαρῶν Διόταρος, καὶ τὴν θυγατέρα τὴν εὐνύ. They are Strabo's Words (39), which may signify, either The Chief City of Castor Sacondarius, wherein his Father-in-law Dejotarus caused him and his Wife to be put to Death, or else The chief City of Castor the Son of Sacondarius, in which the latter was put to Death with his Wife by Dejotarus his Father-in-law. This last Translation (40) seemed better to me than the other, because I am certain that Castor was the Son of Dejotarus's Daughter, and that, not knowing his Father's Name, I may be allowed to call him Sacondarius, as well as by any other Name. Note, by the bye, an advantage of our Language over the Greek. The latter allowed of a Disposition of Words, wherein a Name might as well be taken for the Sir-name, as for the Father of a Man.

Perhaps Suidas may be alledged against me, who called Dejotarus's Son-in law, Castor; but Suidas's Authority is of no Weight in this Case. He supposes that Dejotarus was accused before Cæsar by his Son-in-law, which is a very unexact Account. Cicero the Advocate of the accused, and consequently infinitely more credible than a hundred thousand Suidas's, says plainly and expressly in several places of his Plea, that Castor, Grandson of Dejotarus, was the Accuser, and speaks but faintly and indirectly of Castor's Father in relation to the Plot. I make no doubt that the Son had his Father's Approbation, and that Dejotarus made use of it as a Pretence for the Barbarity wherewith he used his Son-in-law; but after all, Exactness requires that here we should follow the Testimony of Cicero. Moreover does not good Suidas say, that Dejotarus was a Roman Senator? Is it not such a gross Ignorance as makes him altogether unworthy to be believed on this Head? We shall see hereafter whether Dejotarus's Son-in-law was learned, and Author of several Books.

[H] He had a . . . Son-in-law, against whom he undertook a Religious War. The abominable Clodius, having found a Man in Phrygia ready to give a good Sum of Money, upon condition that he should be invested with the Pontificate of Pessinus, gave him a Patent for it. That Man was married to a Daughter of Dejotarus, and his Name was Brogitarus. He was put in possession of the Temple, and the Priests were expelled. But Dejotarus, full of Zeal for the Worship of Cybele, drove out that Usurper, who prophaned all those Holy Ceremonies. See how Cicero displayed his Eloquence upon that Occasion. Sed quid ego id admiror? he directs his Speech to Clodius (41), qui accepta pecunia Pessinuntum ipsam, sedem, domiciliumque Matris deorum vastavit, & Brogitaro (42) Gallogræco impuro homini ac nefario totum illum locum fanumque vendideris: sacerdotem ab ipsis aris pulvinaribusque detraxeris: omnia illa quæ vetulas, quæ Perse, quæ Syri, quæ reges omnes qui Europam Asiamque tenuerunt, semper summa religione coluerunt, perverteris? quæ denique nostri majores, &c. Quod quum Dejotarus religione sua castissimè tueretur, quem unum habemus in orbe terrarum fidelissimum huic imperio atque amanissimum nostri nominis, Brogitaro, ut ante dixi, additum pecunia tradidit. — Quum multa regia sunt in Dejotaro, tum illa maxime, quod tibi nullum munus dedit: quod eam partem legis tuæ, quæ congruebat cum judicio Senatus, ut ipse rex esset, non repudiavit: quod Pessinuntum per scelus à te violatum, & sacerdotem sacrisque spoliatum recuperavit, ut in pristina religione fervaret: quod ceremonias ab omni vetustate acceptas à Brogitaro pollui non finit, maulitque generum suum munere tuo, quam illud fanum antiquitate religionis carere. — But why should I wonder at that? (says he, addressing himself to Clodius) when for Money you gave up Pessinus its self, the sacred seat of Cybele, to plunder, selling the Place and Temple to Brogitarus, a Galatian profane and villainous, tearing the Priest from the Altar, and laying your sacrilegious Hands on those things, which the Persians, Syrians, and all the Kings of Europe and Asia for many Ages, had honoured with uncommon Zeal, nay, and our own Ancestors, &c. which though Dejotarus, the most sincere Friend of this Empire, and who has the most tender Affection for the Roman

(40) Father A. dram keeps to it all along in his Commentary upon Cicero's Oration for Dejotarus.

(41) Cicero, Orat. de Harusp. cap. 13.

(42) Add to this the following Passage out of the Oration for Sex-tius, cap. 26. Lege tribunitia Matris Magnæ Pessinuntis ille sacerdos expul-sus, & spoliatum sacerdotio est.

Annusque sanctissimus, atque antiquissimus religionum venditum pecunia grandi Brogitaro, impuro homini, illi religione, præsertim cum ea sibi ille non colendi, sed violandi causa appetivisset. . . . By the Tribunitian Law, the Priest of Cybele, was deprived of his Office, and that ancient and venerable Temple sold for a small Sum of Money to Brogitarus, a Wretch unworthy of so sacred a Charge, especially as he did not seek it for the sake of Religion, but of Plunder.

Name,

was most superstitiously fatuated to Auguries [I]. Cicero has made very good Reflexions upon this [K]. It does not well appear at what time Brutus pleaded Dejotarus's Cause

'Name, had with a sacred awe maintained, yet, as I said before, you basely sold to Brogitarus for Money. . . . Though Dejotarus has many Royal Virtues, yet that of his never bribing you deserves especial Notice, his not abolishing that part of your Law, which was agreeable to the Senate, his recovering Pessinus, which you had impiously profaned, and plundered, his not suffering it's Rites, which had through unknown Ages been religiously kept, to be trampled on by Brogitarus, and his choosing that his Son-in-law should rather lose his Money, than that the Temple should be deprived of that Veneration it had always enjoyed.'

[I] Dejotarus was most superstitiously fatuated to Auguries.] He undertook nothing without consulting the Flight of Birds, and he was so governed by that kind of Auspices, that he often interrupted his Journeys, and went Home again after he had been several Days in March. He had no other Reasons to do so, but the Prefages which he discovered in his Way. The flight of an Eagle once hindered him from pursuing his Journey; and it was well for him, for, if he had continued it, he had been buried under the Ruins of the Chamber, that was designed for him. It fell the following Night. Being very well skilled in those things, he was his own Prophet, and Soothsayer. He did not forget to furnish himself with the most necessary Qualification for that Profession; which is, never to be at a stand, never to confess he is mistaken, and have always some Evasion at Hand. He found a Subterfuge that was full of Morality, when he lost the greatest part of his Dominions, and a great Sum of Money, for having been in Arms against Cæsar. He led his Forces to Pompey; the March was long, and he had always good Omens on the Way; which made him flatter himself that Cæsar would be defeated. Things turned quite otherwise; Cæsar was victorious, and made Dejotarus feel his Repentment in a very troublesome manner. What did Dejotarus? Had he Honesty enough to acknowledge that his Science had deluded him? Did he shew any Sorrow, or Repentance, for his too great Credulity? None at all; but he had recourse to the finest Maxims of Morality: he said that the Auguries, which had moved him to continue his March to Pompey's Camp, were truly good Auguries, since under their direction he had followed the Party of Justice. It is true that it cost him the best Part of his Dominions; but, said he, the Glory of having performed my Duty is dearer to me than all the Riches of the World. For fear I should be suspected to sophistificate this Passage of Cicero, I insert it at length. 'Quid ego hospitem nostrum clarissimum atque optimum virum Dejotarium commemorarem, qui nihil unquam nisi auspicio gerit? qui quum ex itinere quodam proposito & constituto revertisset, aquilæ admonitus volatu, conclave illud ubi erat mansurus si ire perrexisset proxima nocte corruit. Itaque ut ex ipso audiebam, persæpe revertit ex itinere, quum jam progressus esset multorum dierum viam. Cujus quidem hoc præclarissimum est, quod postea quam a Cæsare tetrarchiæ regno, pecuniæque multatus est, negat se tamen eorum auspiciorum, quæ sibi ad Pompejum proficiscenti, secunda eaverunt pœnitere. Senatus enim autoritatem & P. R. libertatem atque imperii dignitatem, suis armis esse defensam, sibi quæ eas aves, quibus autoribus officium & fidem secutus esset, bene consuluisse: antiquiorem enim sibi fuisse possessionibus suis gloriam (43). — Why should I mention that great good Man Dejotarus, who never undertakes any thing without first consulting Omens? Who, warned by the flying of an Eagle, returned from a Journey he had begun, when the Room wherein he designed to have lodged, had he proceeded, the next Night fell down. So that, as I have heard him often say, he has many times turned back, though he has been advanced several Days Journey. Of whom there is one thing very singular. That, after his being deprived of his Tetrarchat, and fined by Cæsar, he denies ever to have repented the Omens of Success, which attended his going to join Pompey; since the Authority of the Senate and Roman People had been supported by his Arms, and those Birds, which had directed him to follow what his Duty and Honour demanded, had advised him well, for that his Glory was Prior to his Dominions.' Observe that this Man, who had such a religious Respect for the Orders of Providence, as to the Doctrine of Auguries, made no difficulty to usurp his Neighbours Dominions, and to put his Son-in-law and his Daughter to Death for Quarrels, which doubtless Ambition had created. It is likely he would not have spared his Father in a like Case.

[K] Cicero has made very good Reflexions upon this.] He observes, that the Principles of the Romans in the Science of Auguries differed strangely from those of Dejotarus, and that in some things they were quite contrary. This is a very strong Observation against the doctrine of Prefages; for since God only knows things to come, it is he alone that sends them. Now God does not contradict himself, and therefore he does not make the same things serve to foretel Good and Evil. 'Solebat ex me Dejotarus percontari nostri augurii disciplinam, & ego ex illo sui. O dii immortales quantum differat, ut quædam essent etiam contraria (44)! — Dejotarus frequently enquired of me the Principles of our Augury, and I of him those of theirs; but, O heavens! how widely did they differ! nay in some cases were directly contrary.' Here is a Consideration of greater weight. Could Dejotarus say any thing more frivolous, than to maintain, that he did not repent of having followed the Auspices which Heaven had offered him, whilst he marched to join Pompey; that he did not repent, I say, since he had always preferred Glory before the Possession of a Kingdom? What is this to the Auspices? Did you not know, before they were presented to you, what you owed to the Friendship of the Roman People; what Fidelity and Justice required from you? Was you not fully persuaded that Glory, Honour, and Virtue, are preferable to a Crown? The croaking of a Crow in your March was not therefore designed to teach you those Truths. You knew them before as well as now. Auguries do not teach Moral Doctrines, but good or bad Events: if they promised you a good Success, they deceived you: you fled with Pompey, and the Conqueror deprived you of your Dominions. 'Nam illud admodum ridiculum, quod negas Dejotarum, auspiciorum quæ sibi ad Pompejum proficiscenti facta sunt, non pœnitere, quod fidem secutus, amicitiamque Po. Ro. functus sit officio. Antiquiorem enim sibi fuisse laudem & gloriam quàm regnum & possessiones suas. Crederet id quidem, sed hoc nihil ad auspicia. Nec enim ei cornix canere poterat recte eum facere, quod Po. Ro. libertatem defendere pararet: ipse hoc sentiebat sicuti sensit. Aves eventus significant aut adversos, aut secundos. Virtutis auspiciis video esse usum Dejotarum, quæ vetat spectare fortunam dum præstetur fides. Aves vero si prosperos eventus ostenderunt, sefellerunt. Fugit è prælio cum Pompejo, grave tempus: discessit ab eo, luctuosa res: Cæsarem eodem tempore & hostem & hospitem vidit &c. (45). —

It is very ridiculous to say, Dejotarus never repented the Omens he had, when he went to join Pompey, that he had followed the dictates of Honour and Friendship to the Roman people, and had therein discharged his duty, for that Honour and Fame were dearer to him than his Kingdom and Territories. I believe so, but what relation has this to Augury? For neither could the Crow tell him he did well, in endeavouring to defend the Liberty of the Roman people. He was equally sensible of this at that time as at this. The Birds denote good or bad Success. But Dejotarus followed the dictates of Honour, which allows no enquiry into the Success, but the Justice of the Cause. If the Birds promised him Success, they deceived him; he fled with Pompey from the Battle; dreadful day! He parted from him, a melancholy Circumstance! He saw Cæsar at the same time his Enemy and his Guest! It is most certain, that Dejotarus did not examine the Auspices, to know whether by joining with Pompey he should embrace the Good Cause, but to learn whether his Journey should be attended with good Success. He only consulted and studied the Auguries, to know whether he acted prudently: he was fully persuaded that he acted justly; for if, after having seen the entire Ruin of the Republican Party, he continued firmly persuaded that Pompey's Party was the just Side, he could not doubt of it, when Pompey was in a prosperous Condition. It was therefore an unfair thing in him, and an effect of an ill-grounded

(44) Ibid. lib. 2, cap. 8, & 36.

(45) Ibid. cap. 36.

(43) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 2, cap. 15.

Cause before Cæsar [L]. If the Women of the Old Testament might be compared with those of Paganism, we may compare Sarah, the Wife of Abraham, with Stratonice, the Wife of Dejotarus [M]. The latter made an ingenious Answer to Craſſus's Raillery concerning his old Age [N]. Moreri is very short upon Dejotarus, tho' he had plenty of Matter, and nothing to do but collect it. Notwithstanding his Brevity, he has committed gross Mistakes [O]. I shall mention them in the last Remark.

ill-grounded Shame to make use of this shift; the Auguries have not deceived me, since I am better pleased for having acted like a good Man, and a Man of Honour, than if I had purchased a Kingdom. This puts me in mind of a very common Subterfuge among those who, during the Wars for Religion, preach to their People that God promises them good Success, that all Presages are favourable to them, &c. It frequently happens, that all those fine Promises are attended with the Loss of a Battle. The Preacher is not disturbed at it; but finds an hundred admirable Evasions: had we been victorious, says he, we had trusted too much to the Arm of Flesh, we too much praised our Strength; a Defeat teaches us that we are not humble enough; the Finger of God will be more sensible hereafter: after all, the Presages were happy, since the Victory will become fatal to the Conqueror, and the Vanquished will learn the better to trust in him who is the Rock of Ages.

[L] It does not well appear at what time Brutus pleaded Dejotarus's Cause. Cicero speaks of it in this manner: 'Erat à me mentio facta causam Dejotari si delissimi atque optimi regis ornatissime & copiosissime à Bruto me audisse esse defensionem (46).—I have observed before, that I have heard the Cause of Dejotarus, a King of uncommon Honour and Fidelity, gallantly, and with great Eloquence, defended by Brutus. It is not questioned but that the Book, wherein he speaks thus, was written before the Death of Cato Uticensis (47): and therefore it must be said that Brutus did not plead for Dejotarus in Cæsar's Accusation, for it was at the Return from Spain, and after the War of Africa, that Cæsar examined that Accusation. Nay, we may be sure that Brutus did not plead for Dejotarus at Rome, but at Nicaea; and therefore there is reason to believe that he only justified Dejotarus for bearing Arms against Cæsar in Pompey's Army. 'De (Bruto) *Cæsa*rem solitum dicere, magni refert hic quid velit: sed quidquid volt, valde volt, idque animadvertisse, cum pro Dejotaro Nicaeæ dixerit, valde vehementer eum visum & libere dicere (48).—Cæsar used to say of Brutus, that he never intermeddled but in Affairs of Consequence, but that whatever he undertook, he prosecuted in earnest, and that he had made this Observation, when he pleaded for Dejotarus at Nicaea, when he spoke with great Freedom, and an uncommon Resolution.' That Speech of Brutus is not so much praised by the Author of the Dialogue de Causis corruptæ eloquentiæ as by Cicero. Plutarch's Memory did not serve him well upon this Occasion: he tells us of a King of Libya, whose Cause was stoutly maintained by Brutus. He could not justify him; the Crimes were too great, and too evident; but by his many Intercessions he secured him part of his Kingdom (49). This does not concern a King of Libya, but Dejotarus.

[M] Sarah, the Wife of Abraham, may be compared with Stratonice, the Wife of Dejotarus. Stratonice, Wife of Dejotarus, was barren, and being informed that her Husband passionately desired to have Children, that might succeed him in his Kingdom, she advised him to make Use of another Woman, and promised him to own the Children he should get by her. He admired that Counsel, and declared that he would do what she pleased. Upon which she made choice of a very beautiful Maid among the Captives (50), dressed and adorned her, and presented her to Dejotarus. She owned all the Children that were born in that manner, and educated them tenderly and splendidly (51). Plutarch in another Place calls Dejotarus's Wife Berenice, Βερρονίκη. He says one thing of her, which the Sceptics make use of: Which is, that a Woman of Lacedæmon coming near Berenice, it happened that those two Women turned their Heads from each other immediately; Berenice, because she could not endure the smell of Butter; and the other, because she could not endure the smell of Perfumes. Ἦρδς δὲ Βερρονίην τὴν Διοσίπαι τῶν Λακεδαιμονίων τινὰ γυναῖκα ἀφικέσθαι λέγουσιν. ὥς δὲ ἐγγύς ἀλλήλων περσέησαν, ἐνθὺς ἀποστρέφονται, τὴν μὲν τὸ μύρον, ὡς ῥοινη, τὴν δὲ τὸ βύτρυον δυσχερύνονταν. Et ferunt Spartanam quandam mulierem accessisse ad Berenicem Dejotari uxorem, cumque in vicem appropinquassent, averſas fuisset, quod unguentum altera, altera butyrum olfaciens averſaretur (52). The Greek Termination of Stratonice and Berenice might perhaps confound Plutarch's Ideas, so far as to give the same Queen sometimes the first of those Names, and sometimes the last. It may be also, that Dejotarus had two Wives, one called Stratonice, and the other Berenice.

[N] He made an ingenious answer to Craſſus's Raillery concerning his old Age. That Roman Captain went thro' Galatia, in his Expedition against the Partians, and found King Dejotarus there, who, though a very old Man, was building a new City. He told him in jest, it appears to me, Sir, that you begin very late to build, since you begin at the last Hour of the Day. That King of Galatia immediately answered him, neither are you set out very early to make War against the Partians. For Craſſus was above sixty Years old, and his Face made him look older (53). Dejotarus must needs have been very old then; for Cicero, speaking of a time very near that, says, that it was a Wonder how that Prince had the Strength to keep on Horse-back, after several Persons had set him on. Dejotarus quum plures in equum sustulissent, quod hæere in eo senex possent admirari solebamur (54). It was when Cicero commanded in Cilicia in the Year 702. Craſſus had been defeated two Years before. Cicero contracted a very strict Friendship with King Dejotarus whilst he was in Cilicia, and received all manner of Assurances from him (55). He gave his Son and his Nephew to Dejotarus the Son, who carried them into Galatia (56). I have another proof of Dejotarus's old Age. He was already an old Man when Pompey made War against Mithridates. He recommended his Children and his House to Cato of Utica (57). We have seen above (58) that he had but one Son in the time of the War against Pharnaces.

[O] Moreri has committed gross Faults. It is not true, I. That Dejotarus was accused of having caused his Daughter and his Son-in-law Cæsar to be put to Death. II. And that this gave Cicero an occasion to make that admirable Oration in his Defence which is still extant. The true Subject of the Accusation, and of Cicero's Oration has been mentioned in the Text of this Article. III. It is very unlikely that Cæsar the Historian was the Son of Dejotarus's Son-in-law. Why then does Moreri affirm it as an undoubted thing?

Saligner (59), Vossius (60), Father Hardouin (61), and several other great Men, are of Opinion that Cæsar, firamed the Chronographer by Josephus (62), is the Son-in-law of Dejotarus. Three Reasons hinder me from adopting that Opinion. The first is, that this Cæsar, as they own, wrote a Book intituled, χρονικά ἀνομήματα, Chronological Ignorances. Now that Work was cited by Apollodorus (63), who flourished under Ptolemy Evergetes the second of that Name (64): it must needs be then that Cæsar flourished at latest in the same Reign. How then could he be the Son-in-law of Dejotarus? for that Son-in-law was still living when Cicero pleaded for Dejotarus (65), that is to say, in the Year of Rome 709, or thereabout. Could a Man, who had flourished in the Reign of Evergetes, which extends from the Year of Rome 608, to the Year 636, be yet living in the Year 709? I draw my second Reason from this, that Cæsar the Chronographer had composed many Books, on Matters that required the whole Time of a Man. An Author like him must needs have studied extremely, and done almost nothing else. This does not suit Dejotarus's Son-in-law. He is spoken of as a Man who warmly espoused Pompey's Party, inasmuch that his Son out of Complaisance for him was unwilling to lay down his Arms after the Defeat of Pharsalia, though Cicero did his best to persuade him to it. 'Hic vero adolescens . . . cum in illo nostro exercitu equitaret cum suis delectis equitibus, quos una cum eo ad Pompeium pater miferat, quos concursus facere solebat? quam se iactare? quam se ostentare? quam nemini in illa causa studio & cupiditate

(52) Plut. ad-versus Craſsum,
pag. 1109. B.

(53) *Id. in vita
Craſſi*, pag. 553.

(54) *Cicero pro
Dejot. cap. 10.*

(55) See the 426
Letter of the 126
Book ad Familiares, and the Oration pro Dejot.
cap. 13.

(56) *Epist. 17
de 18, lib. 5, ad
Atticum.*

(57) Plut. in Catoe minore,
pag. 765. E.
He uses the plural
Number quidam.

(58) In the Remark [F], Cicero,
(18).

(59) *Anima dv.
in Euseb. pag.
16, & 56.*

(60) *Vossius de Histor. Græc.
pag. 159.*

(61) In *Indice
Autorum Flinii*.

(62) In *Appian-
lib. 2.*

WHETHER Cæsar, Author of several Books,
is the Son-in-law of Dejotarus.

(63) *Biblioth.
lib. 2, pag. m.*

(64) *Vossius, ubi
supra*, pag. 132.

(65) *Cicero, pro
Dejot. cap. 10*,
where directing his Speech to Cæsar, he clearly intimates,
that his Father had a Hand in the Accusation.
He had said a little before, that Cæsar, after the Battle of Phar-salia, perished in Pompey's Party to please his Father. This you will see in the next Quotation.

(45) *Cicero in
Bruto*, cap. 5.

(47) See Fabricius in the Life of Cicero, ad
ann. 707.

(48) *Cicero ad
Attic. Epist. 1,
lib. 14.*

(49) *Plut. in
Bruto*, pag. 986.

(50) Her Name was Eletra.

(51) Taken from
*Plutarch, in his Treatise de Vir-tutibus Mulie-
rum*, pag. 258.

* & cupiditate concedere? Cum vero, exercitu amisso, ego, qui pacis auctor semper, post Pharsalicum praelium, suavis fuisset armorum non deponendum, sed abjiciendum, hanc ad meam auctoritatem non potui adducere; quod & ipse ardebat Audio ipsius belli, & patri satisfaciendum esse arbitrabatur (66).

(66) Cicero, ib. pag. 654.

— What noble Sallies did that brave Youth make in our Army at the head of his chosen Horse, which his Father had sent to Pompey? With what a Majestic Mien, with what a Grace, with what an Ardor and generous Ambition did he enrol himself in that Cause? When the Army was lost in the Battle of Pharsalia, I, who was always an Advocate for Peace, and advised them not only to lay down their Arms, but cast them away, could not prevail upon him to listen to my Authority: his Soul glowed with heroic Ardor, and stood resolute to answer his Father's Expectations. Add to this, that Cicero, in his Plea for Dejotarus, does not say a word whereby it appears that the Son-in-law of that Prince was a Man of Letters. He could not well have been silent about it, if that Son-in-law has been as illustrious by his Books as the Chronographer Castor was. I may be told that this Silence was an Address of Cicero's Rhetoric; he was afraid that the Father's Doctrine would be a favourable Presumption for the Son, who was Dejotarus's Accuser; but this Objection is of no force. Cicero might have aggravated the Fault of the Son a thousand ways, and even that of the Father, by the Consideration of the Learning of the latter. I may be told again, that perhaps Dejotarus's Son-in-law had not yet published his Books. But how comes he then to be cited by Apollodorus? And when was it that he published them? Did not Dejotarus, who did not survive the Process he had at Rome above three or four Years at most, cause him to be put to Death (67)? Besides, I observe that Cicero lays it down for matter of Fact, that Dejotarus's Son-in-law was not known in the World, but by the Honour Dejotarus did him to grant him his Daughter. Before that time, he was an obscure Man. A great Author is not thus spoken of. The vast and prodigious Distance that is between him and Sovereigns, is not a Reason to say that he is unknown, and that he lives in Obscurity; and nothing would persuade me more that he had got a very great Reputation, than to see a Prince make choice of him for his Son-in-law. So that I believe, that if the learned Castor had married Dejotarus's Daughter, he would have attained to that Honour by the Lustre of his Learning, and consequently that Cicero had not dared to say of him what he did say: 'Rex Dejotarus vestram familiam abiecit & obscuram de tenebris in lucem vocavit: quis tuum patrem antea qui esset, quam cuius gener esset, adivit (68)? — King Dejotarus raised your Family mean and obscure: who ever heard of your Father till it was known whose Father-in-law he was?' My third Reason is, that, though several ancient Writers have cited Castor, yet none calls him Dejotarus's Son-in-law: Yet such a Quality is seldom forgotten; for as it is very rare among Authors, and the Lustre it gives to the Person that has it, spreads itself in some manner over all the Common-Wealth of Learning, a Writer takes Pleasure in saying, when he can do it, that the Author, whom he cites, is the Son, or the Son-in-law of a King. If ever such a rare Circumstance ought to have been remembered, it is when a Royal Father-in-law has been as well known to the learned, as Dejotarus was since Cicero's Harangue. How comes it then that the Son-in-law of Dejotarus is never cited under that

(67) Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 391.

(68) Cicero, ubi supra, cap. 11.

Title? Varro (69), Josephus, Plutarch, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Eusebius, St Cyril, Ausonius, and Stephanus Byzantinus have cited Castor, but none of them calls him Dejotarus's Son-in-law. If I am not mistaken, none but Suidas has done it. But who is ignorant of the prodigious confusion of his Dictionary: almost every thing is in disorder: How many times doth he divide what ought to be joined, and join what ought to be divided? We have seen already that Suidas takes Dejotarus for a Roman Senator.

What I have said, that Castor must needs have continually applied to his Studies, will appear most likely to all those, who shall consider the nature of his Works. It appears that he undertook to reform Chronology, and to observe the Errors of the ancient Historians. He is cited (70) concerning the Kingdoms of Sicyon, Argos, and Athens, and concerning the Monarchy of the Assyrians. He wrote a Book concerning the City of Babylon, and concerning the Nations which had been successively Masters of the Sea (71). He wrote a Treatise concerning the Nile, and another wherein he compared the Customs of the Romans with those of the Sect of Pythagoras (72). I do not mention the Rhetorical Books that Suidas ascribes to him, for it may be that they are of another Castor. All good Judges will easily grant that, of all the Productions of the Pen, none requires more Time, Application, and Patience, than those wherein a Man proposes to himself to rectify Chronology, and to criticize the Historians. This is what Castor did: Witness his Errata of Chronologers, ἑσπερινὰ ἀστρονομία, and the Book hinted at by Ausonius (73).

I have been not a little surprized to see, that Antonius CASTOR, mentioned by Pliny, has been confounded with the Son-in-law of Dejotarus. This Father Hardouin has done (74), not considering that Antonius Castor lived in Pliny's time, and above an hundred Years. He was an excellent Botanist, who cultivated a very great number of Plants in his Garden, and spoke learnedly of them. He had never been sick, and being above a hundred Years old, he had still a good Memory, and a great deal of Vigour. Pliny had seen that Garden, and learned a great deal from that Botanist. 'Nobis certe, exceptis admodum paucis, contigit reliquas contemplari scientia Antonii Castoris, cui summa auctoritas erat in ea arte nostro ævo, vivendo hortulo ejus, in quo plurimas alebat: centesimum ætatis annum excedens, nullum corporis malum expertus, ac ne ætate quidem memoria aut virore concussus (75).' Can this suit with the Son-in-law of Dejotarus? Was he not killed with his Wife by his Father-in-law before the Seven hundred and fourteenth Year of Rome, and above fifty Years before Pliny was born (76)? When Father Hardouin conjectures from a Passage of Pliny, that Antonius Castor composed some Volumes concerning Plants, he is much more in the right: nevertheless it may be, that Pliny's words (77) signify only that Castor sowed the Plant in question in his Garden, or that he made the Description of it to the Curious that went to see it. What makes me doubt of the Conjecture of that learned Commentator, is, that if Castor had published some Books of Botany, Pliny would have said something of it, when he speaks of that Man's Garden, and Knowledge (78). However it be, Father Hardouin has been more lucky than Vossius; he applies the Passage of the twentieth Book of Pliny to Antonius Castor, whereas Vossius understood it of Castor the Chronographer cited by Apollodorus.

(69) In libris de Vita Populi Romani. Vossius de Hist. Græc. pag. 158, 159, will tell you in what Places the other Authors mentioned by me have cited Castor.

(70) Eusebius in Chron.

(71) Περὶ θαλάσσης καταστάσεων.

(72) Plutarch, in Questionibus Romanis, citet it.

(73) Quod Castor cunctis de Regibus ambiguis. Ausonius in Proseffor. Burdig. Epig. 23, ver. 7.

(74) In Indice Author. Plinii.

(75) Plinius, lib. 25, cap. 2. Mori quod the 1st Chap. of the 15th Book.

(76) He was born in the 774th Year of Rome, and he died, being about 56 Years of Age, more or less, in the Year 834.

(77) They are at the beginning of the 17th chapter of the 20th Book.

(78) In the 2d chap. of the 25th Book.

DELLIUS (QUINTUS), a Greek Historian. Plutarch mentions him twice: I. When he relates that Marc Antony sent to signify to Cleopatra, that she should come into Cilicia to justify her Conduct (a), for she was accused of having supplied Brutus and Cassius with Succours. II. When he mentions the Disgrace of some of Marc Antony's good Servants (b). The first Passage informs us, that Dellius was sent to Cleopatra, to notify to her the Order to come into Cilicia: the second tells us, that Dellius withdrew from Marc Antony's Court, on the Advice he received that Cleopatra designed to have him killed. In the first Case Plutarch makes him act a cunning Part [A]; and

(a) Plut. in Marc. Antonio, pag. 926.

(b) Ib. pag. 943.

[A] Plutarch . . . makes him act a cunning Part. As soon as he saw and heard that beautiful Queen, he judged there would be quickly occasion for her, and that her Beauty, assisted by her Eloquence, would give her an intire ascendancy over Marc Antony. For which Reason he began to make his court to Cleopatra, and advised her to appear in Cilicia, with all her Ornaments. He assured her that she had nothing to fear from such a polite and courteous General as he that sent for her. She found her self wonderfully confirmed by this Discourse in the hopes she had conceived of making her self beloved by Marc Antony. She argued and in the second, represents him as guilty of a great Indiscretion [B], in relation to what is called good Fortune in point of Galantry. It is in this last Passage that we learn that Dellius was an Historian [C], and that he published the Reason why he withdrew from Marc Antony's Court. He did it in a Circumstance of Time very favourable to Augustus. It was a little before the Battle of Actium, and he was well acquainted with Marc Antony's Designs, and able to inform Augustus of the Condition the Enemy was in (c). Seneca, the Father, relates several things, which are not to the Honour of Dellius [D]. It is thought, with great Probability, that the Dellius mentioned in the third Ode of the second Book of Horace, is the same with him that is mentioned by Plutarch [E], and who was sent several times Embassador by Marc Antony (d). I shall put together, in one Remark, the Faults I have observed upon this Article [F].

(c) Dio, lib. 50. pag. m. 495.

(d) See the Remark [C], at the end.

(1) This puzzles the Critics, for it does not appear at what time Pompey's Son could be in Love with Cleopatra, before the Defeat of Brutus and Cassius. See Mark Vellus's Letters.

(2) Plut. in Marc. Antonio, pag. 925, 927.

(3) Ibid. pag. 927. D.

(4) See his Words in the Remark [F], Citat. (16).

(5) Lib. 49, pag. 474.

(6) That is of Marc Antony.

(7) Voss. de Hist. Græcia, pag. 477.

(8) Lib. 21, pag. 360.

gued with her self in this manner: since Cæsar, and the Son of the great Pompey (1), who only saw me when I was a young unexperienced Girl, and unacquainted with the World, became nevertheless my Conquest, what may I not expect at present, now that my Beauty and my Wit are in their full Perfection? 'H δὲ καὶ Δελλίῳ πεισθεῖσα, καὶ τοῖς πρὸς Καίσαρα καὶ Γναίον τὸν Πομπηίου παῖδα πρότερον αὐτῇ γενημένοις ἀφ' ὧρας συμβολαίοις τεκμαίρεσθαι, μὲν γὰρ αὐτὴν ἐπὶ κέρην καὶ πραγμάτων ἀπειρὸν ἐγνώσαν, πρὸς δὲ τὸν ἐμὲν ποιεῖν, ἐν ᾧ μάλιστα καὶ τῶν γυναικῶν ὡς τε λαυπετότητι ἔχουσι καὶ τῷ φεσθῆναι ἀμύχουσι. Illa tunc ab Dellio induita, tunc conjecturam ducens ex prioribus suis formæ cum Cæsare & Cneo Pompeii filio commercii, facile Antonium speravit se subitum: quando fuellam adducit illi & rerum rudem cognoverant, ad hunc vero ventura erat quo maximè tempore speciem habent sœmine florentissimam & ingenio vigent (2). This way of arguing is much better than those imagine, who speak only of Girls of fifteen Years of Age, of Roses half blown, and in whose Opinion twenty Years is an entrance into Old Age. Impertinent People, who may easily know, both by what passes in their Time, and by the Histories of past Ages, that the Ladies, who have most charmed great Princes, and who made the greatest Noise in a Court, were of an Age that permitted them to acquire the experience of Affairs, and to perfect their Wit; and that there are but few whose Empire is of any long continuance, if the charms of the Body are not assisted by Graces of the Mind. Plutarch observes that Cleopatra was more Charming by the agreeableness of her Words and Conversation, than by her Beauty, which was not extraordinary. Καὶ γὰρ ἢν (ὡς λέγουσιν) αὐτὴ μὲν καὶ αὐτὸ τὸ κάλλος αὐτῆς ἢ πᾶν δυσπαράκλητον, εἰς δὲ οὐκ ἐκπλήξαι τὸς ἰδόντας. Neque enim erat (ut perhibent) figura ejus per se usque adeo incomparabilis, neque ut obstupesceret spectatores (3). — Her Beauty (by report) was not in itself so surprizingly great, or such as could dazzle the Spectators. [B] As guilty of a great Indiscretion [B] He complained at Table that they made them drink Vinegar, whilst Sarmentus drank the most delicious Wine at Rome. This Sarmentus was a young Boy whom Augustus loved passionately. That Comparison went far, and Cleopatra was offended at it; it is a Sign that Dellius had complained that this Queen did not well entertain those, who made her taste the Sweets of Love. This is somewhat extraordinary; for when a Woman is able to buy the most juicy Meats and the best Liquors for such Men, she willingly does it to increase or revive their Vigour. Plutarch does not say in what Author he had read that Cause of Cleopatra's Anger against Dellius; it is not likely that it was to be found in the History of the latter, as it was found there that a Physician, whose Name was Glaucus, gave Dellius notice that Cleopatra had a Design upon his Life. However it be, Plutarch (4) observes that Dellius was one of those, who forsook Marc Antony, being moved to it by the Injuries and the Scurrility of Cleopatra's Flatterers. We shall see, by and by, a Passage of Seneca, which is a Proof that there was an amorous Intrigue between Dellius and that Queen. Dion (5) speaks of a much more criminal Conversation. Κύντον τινὰ Δέλλιον παιδικὰ ποτὶ ἐαυτῷ γυνόμενον περιέλας. Missio ad eum Q. quodam Dellio exoleto suo (6). — Sending to him one Quintus Dellius his Catamite.

[C] Plutarch says that Dellius was an Historian.]

Vossius (7) approves Cassaubon's Conjecture on a Passage of Strabo (8), wherein Adelphius is cited as the Author of the History of Marc Antony's Expedition against the Parthians. Strabo adds, that the Author of that History had commanded part of the Forces in that Expedition, and that he was a good Friend to Marc Antony. All this agrees with Dellius: So that there being no Writer that mentions the Historian Adelphius, it is likely, as Cassaubon conjectures, that we should read Dellius, and not Adelphius, in that Passage of Strabo. When I say all this agrees with Dellius, I do not mean that there is any Authority, whereby it appears that he had a command in the War that Marc Antony made against the Parthians. I only mean, that it is very likely he had. And indeed we know that Marc Antony took him along with him in the Expedition of Armenia in the Year of Rome 720 (9), and that he sent him twice to negotiate with Artavasdes.

[D] Seneca, the Father, relates several things that are not for the Honour of Dellius.] The Name that was given to Dellius, can hardly be expressed in the French Language; Quem Messala Corvinus desultorem bellorum civilium vocat (10). They called him the Runner of Civil Wars. He sided with all Parties, and turned like a Weather-cock. He left Delabella to join Cæsius; he had his Life promised him provided he killed Delabella. He left Cæsius to side with Marc Antony, and lastly, he left Marc Antony, and embraced Augustus's Party. It is he, adds Seneca, of whom there are some lascivious Letters written to Cleopatra (11). Seneca calls him Dellius. Doubtless it is of him that Seneca the Philosopher speaks, when he says that Augustus had so much Clemency, that he made Choice in the Enemies Army of those, whom he intended to admit to his greatest familiarity, the Cocceus's, the Duilius's, &c (12). According to the Remark of Lipsius it must not be read Duilius, but Dellius, or rather Dellius (13). If the Reader remembers what I have said in the Remark [A] of the Article of CHARLES the Fifth, he will be persuaded that Augustus's Clemency was mixed with exquisite Policy.

[E] Dellius, mentioned in the third Ode of Horace, is the same with him who is mentioned by Plutarch.] This is Mr Dacier's Opinion. What he adds does not seem to me in all respects so probable. 'It is probable, says he (14), that he had a share in the Favours, which he pretended to manage for his Master, and that he received from Cleopatra the same Pleasure, which she furnished to Antony; for Seneca speaks of some very free Letters which he had writ to that Princess.' This Passage contains two principal Facts. The one is that Dellius used his skill with Cleopatra to make her comply with Marc Antony's Love; the other is, that he solicited for himself at the same time, and not unsuccessfully. The first is not very likely; Marc Antony had no need of a Solicitor: Cleopatra went to him as to her Judge, and notwithstanding the good Opinion she had of her Beauty and Wit, she conceived new Hopes from what Dellius had told her of Marc Antony's Humour: She dressed herself to the best advantage, and at the first Interview, the omitted nothing to make a Lover of him, and easily succeeded in it: so that a third Person would have been as needless at all times, as he would have been troublesome in some Cases. As to the second Fact, I find it very likely; and after all I do not question, but that if Dellius had acted the Part of a Solicitor for his Master, he would have done what most others do in the like Case: he would have paid himself with his own Hands; and if he had not imitated those who are employed to buy Wine, and who taste it first, he would at least have imitated the Domestics of the second Rank, who eat what comes from their Master's Table.

[F] I shall put together the Faults I have observed.] Andreas Schottus says, that Dion gives Dellius the Title of

(9) Dio, lib. 49, pag. m. 474.

(10) Seneca Father, Saufloria 1, pag. m. 12.

(11) Hic est Dellius ejus epistole lascivæ ad Cleopatram feruntur. Id. ib.

(12) Cocceus & Duilius & totam cohortem primam admissionis ex adversariis ejus castris concitavit. Seneca de Clementia, lib. 1, cap. 10.

(13) Lipsius, in Tacit. Annal. lib. 1.

(14) Remarks upon the 3d Ode of the 2d Book of Horace.

of Historian, and that Plutarch reckoned him among Cleopatra's Flatterers: Οὗ Δέλλιος ὁ ἰσοεικὸς Διονύσιον lib. 50. & Plutarch in Antonio inter Cleopatra's adulatores numeratur (15). These two Facts are false. Plutarch's Words have not been well understood by Andreas Schottus; he refers the Relative ἔν to κλέακας, but it ought to be referred to φίλων. The Sequel of the Discourse shews it plainly. See what trouble the Languages give, whose Grammar is not so rigorous as that of the French. I insert the Words quoted by Andreas Schottus, and I add the Latin Translation to it. Πολλὰς δὲ τῶν ἄλλων φίλων οἱ Κλεοπάτρας κλέακας ἐξέβαλον, τὰς παρρησίας καὶ βοήθειας ἐν ὑπομένοντι, ἔν καὶ Μάρκῳ ἢν Σίλανος καὶ Δέλλιος ὁ ἰσοεικὸς. Complures alios illius amicos expulserunt Cleopatram adulatores, quod contumelias & procacitatem eorum non sustinerent: in quibus M. Syllanus fuit, & Dellius historicus (16). It will appear from them that Plutarch is so far from placing Dellius among Cleopatra's Flatterers, that he says the Flatterers of that Queen drove him away. Lippius, having cited Plutarch's Words, adds, eadem Dio, quinquagesimo libro (17). But it is not true that Dion says the same things; he does not speak of Cleopatra's Flatterers; he does not say that Dellius was an Historian, nor why he retired.

(16) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 943.

(17) Lipf. ubi supra.

DELPHINUS (PETER), General of the Order of Camaldoli in the beginning of the XVIth Century. There are some Letters of his that were written before he was General, in the Time that passed from the Year 1462 to the Year 1480 (a). A curious Passage was left out in the printed Edition, which is to be found in a Manuscript of those Letters [A]. Delphinus died the fifteenth of January 1525, and was buried at Murano, near Venice, in the Monastery (b) of St Michael (c).

(a) Mabillon, Museum Italic. Tom. I, pag. 202.

(b) Of the Order of Camaldoli.

(c) Mabillon, ib.

[A] They have left out . . . a curious Passage, which is to be found in a Manuscript of those Letters.] The curious and learned Father Mabillon tells us what it is (1). The Passage that was left out was in the Thirty fifth Letter of the seventh Book, and contains this. The Inhabitants of Arezzo had thrown into a Well a Lion (2) of Stone, that was at the top of the great Church. When the French entered that Town under Charles VIII, the Lion was taken out of the Well, and placed in the middle of the great Street; and all the Inhabitants of Arezzo, that went by, were obliged to kneel before that Lion, and ask Pardon for their Revolt.

(1) Mabillon, Museum Italic. Tom. I, pag. 279.

(2) It was the Arms of Florence.

DEMETRIUS (MAGNES), a Greek Author, cotemporary with Cicero [A], writ some Books, the Loss whereof is very grievous to those, who apply themselves to know, or compose, the Lives of the ancient Writers. He wrote a Book concerning Authors and Towns of the same Name [B]. That Work was useful and necessary, considering

[A] Cotemporary with Cicero.] This may be proved by these words: 'Memini librum tibi afferri a Demetrio Magnete (ad te missum scio) περὶ ὁμωνύμας. Eum mihi velim mittas. Vides quam caussam mediter (1). — I remember you received (for I know it was sent) a Treatise on CONCORD from Demetrius Magnete. As you know what I am employed about, you would oblige me by sending it.' What follows is a much clearer proof: 'Hæc igitur videbis, & quod ad te ante scripsi, Demetrii Magnetis librum quem ad te misi de concordia, velim mihi mittas (2). — You shall see these things: And I again desire you to send me the Treatise on CONCORD, which Demetrius Magnete sent you.' You see there that Demetrius had sent his Book on Concord to Pomponius Atticus: and therefore he lived at the same time with that good Friend of Cicero. If Vossius had remembered the second Passage that I have cited, there had been no occasion for him to use any Arguments to prove (3), that in the first Passage we must read ὁμωνύμας and not ὁμωνύμων. The learned Maussac was for this last Reading. 'Ego dico restituendum περὶ ὁμωνύμων, de hoc enim opere loqui voluit Cicero. De Concordia autem scripsisse Demetrium illum adhuc non legi (4). He did not therefore remember that he had read Cicero's Letter, wherein the same Book of Demetrius is intitled, De Concordia. Let us learn by this Example how apt the most learned Critics are to give us very false Corrections. Henricus Valefius takes no notice of this Fault of Maussac. Let us observe a Mistake of Jonsius: he says that Cicero reckons Demetrius Magnete among those who taught him Rhetoric, and he cites the Brutus of Cicero (5). I have consulted that Work, but have not found this in it: I only find that Cicero frequented the School of Demetrius the Syrian, and that Dionysius Magnete was constantly with him. 'Eodem tempore Athenis apud Demetrium Syrum, veterem & non ignobilem dicendi Magistrum studio exerceri solebam . . . (6) assiduissime autem mecum fuit Dionysius Magnete (7). You will find in Plutarch (8), that one of Cicero's Masters in the Art of Oratory was called Dionysius Magnete. It is easy to see from whence Jonsius's Mistake proceeds: his Memory transposed the Surnames of the two Persons mentioned by Cicero in the same Page. Mollerus follows Jonsius's Error (9).

(1) Cicero ad Atticum Epist. 11, lib. 8, pag. 78, 788. Edit. Græv.

(2) Id. Epist. 12, ejusd. libri, pag. 799.

(3) Vossius de Hist. Græc. lib. 1, cap. 23, pag. 149, 150.

(4) Maussac not. ad Harpocrat. voce μεδών.

(5) Jonsius de Script. Hist. Phil. pag. 207.

(6) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 91.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Plut. in Cicero, pag. 862, E.

(9) Mollerus de Script. Homonymis, pag. 901.

libro de Poëtis ac Scriptoribus æquivocis (10). In another place (11) he observes, that the Author had mentioned six Persons who were called Thales. I omit the other Passages wherein he cites him. A learned Commentator (12) was of Opinion that the Word ὁμωνύμων ought to be inserted instead of συνονόμων in this Passage of Plutarch (13): Οὐ μὲν ἔγνωμεν πάντη, ἀλλὰ Σαμίᾳ τινι συνώκισεν, ἃς ἰσοπέδι Δημήτριος ὁ Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ συνονόμων. Non duxit eam tamen uxorem (Demosthenes) sed Samiam quandam, ut tradit Demetrius Magnete in libris de synonymis, in matrimonio habuit. — He was not married to her, but to a Samian, as Demetrius Magnete relates in his Treatise of Authors, who bore the same Name. The same Commentator observes, that Demetrius was not the only Person that writ on that Matter, and that the Greeks cite Dionysius the Sinopian in ὁμωνύμοις and one Simarefius in συνονόμοις (14). The first of those two Observations has been very ill understood by Vossius, or rather he trusted too much to his Memory, and it failed him. He pretends (15) that Cajaubon said, that instead of reading περὶ συνονόμων in Diogenes Laërtius, it must be read περὶ ὁμωνύμων. He adds, that nothing must be changed, since Demetrius wrote some Books upon those two Subjects. He proves it by Plutarch's Words above cited. This is to suppose, that there is περὶ συνονόμων in Diogenes Laërtius, which is false. Nor is it true that Cajaubon would have introduced that Term there; it was only in the Life of Demosthenes composed by Plutarch. Ménage (16) has taken notice of those two Faults of Vossius, which nevertheless made a learned Man (17) say lately, that Cajaubon was in the wrong to pretend that ὁμωνύμων must be put in Laërtius's Life of Thales. He accuses Jonsius wrongfully of having pretended the same thing. Ménage might have observed a third Mistake of Vossius, for under pretence that Plutarch quotes the Work of Synonymis, it must not be imagined, that it is a different Book from that which others quote with this Title, de homonymis. Cajaubon should not therefore have desired that an Alteration should be made in Plutarch's Text. It is very likely that Plutarch writ those Words ἐν τοῖς περὶ συνονόμων. An Historian, who quotes many Books, does not confine himself to denote them precisely by the same word that the Authors of them made choice of in their Titles; he is contented to denote them by Words that signify the same thing: now it is certain that in the common Language the word Synonymis was as much made use of as the word Homonymis, when one had a (10) Diog. Laërt. lib. 1, in Epimenide, n. 112, & lib. 5, in Aristot. n. 3.

(11) Id. lib. 1, in Thalete, n. 38.

(12) Isaac. Caubon. in Diog. Laërt. lib. 1, n. 38.

(13) Plut. in Demosthene, pag. 853, A. He cites him also pag. 858, F. without mentioning the Title of the Book, and pag. 850, B. without firming him Magnete.

(14) See below, Citat. 27.

(15) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 150.

(16) Ménage in Laërt. lib. 1, n. 38.

(17) Joh. Mollerus de Script. Homonymis, pag. 902.

[B] He wrote a Book concerning Authors of the same Name.] Diogenes Laërtius gives the Title of it: Δημήτριος ὁ Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ ὁμωνύμων Ποιητῶν τε καὶ Συγγραφέων. Demetrius Magnete in VOL. II.

sidering the many Poets, and Philosophers, &c. who had the same Name. Plutarch, Diogenes Laërtius, Stephanus Byzantinus, Harpocration, &c. have cited this Demetrius. The mind to say that such and such Poets, such and such Towns, &c. had the same Name. It was only in the Logical Books that they made a difference between ὁμώνυμα homonymous, and συνώνυμα synonymous. At present, by the caprice of Custom, we are brought to another Method: we cannot say indifferently, such a Man made a Treatise of Equivocal Writers, or of Synonymous Writers, or of Writers of the same Name (18). The Ideas that are annexed to the Word equivocal, do not allow of such an indifferency, and consequently in the common Language, as well as in Logical Books, we ought to make some Distinction between ὁμώνυμα equivocata, and συνώνυμα synonyma, when we have a mind to express the Sense of those Terms. Plutarch, as I have already said, needed not make any such Distinction upon such an occasion. He was as free to quote the same Book of Demetrius, either with the word ὁμώνυμον, or with the word συνώνυμον, as we are free to quote the same Work of Father Rapius, either with the Title of A Comparison between Plato and Aristotle, or with the Title of A Parallel between Plato and Aristotle. A perfect exactness would require, that in quoting a Book the very words of the Title should be made use of, instead of some that are equivalent, but most Authors cannot confine themselves to it. Some remember Things better than Words; as for example, they remember that David Blondel wrote a Book on the Eucharist, and do not remember that this Book is intitled Eclaircissement familier de la controverse de l'Eucharistie. Nay, they fancy that instead of the word Eucharist, the Author made use of the word Lord's-Supper; so that without any scruple they cite Blondel in his Treatise of the Lord's-Supper, as soon as Blondel in his Treatise of the Eucharist, or Blondel in his Eclaircissement sur la controverse de l'Eucharistie. Some question whether there is Lord's-Supper, or Eucharist, in the Title, but fearing to lose some precious Moments, if they should lay down the Pen to clear the Matter by opening the Book, they are contented with an equivalent Term. Let us apply this to Plutarch as to the difference that is between him and Diogenes Laërtius, with respect to the Book of Demetrius Magnes. He minded the Thing itself more than the Word: he knew that That Author had composed a Book about the Writers of the same Name, and that there was in it a Circumstance of Demosthenes's Marriage; he knew that the Word συνώνυμα was as good to represent the Matter of that Book, as the Word ὁμώνυμα, and that was sufficient for him; he did not think the thing was worth the trouble of interrupting himself, even though he had doubted whether the Author's Title was περὶ ὁμώνυμων, and not περὶ συνώνυμων. I would not have enlarged on these little things, had I not thought it might serve to shew us the Illusions of the Critics. How often do they think that certain Passages ought to be corrected under Pretence of some difference of Letters? How often, say I, do they believe it without any Reason, and how often do they unjustly exclaim against the Transcribers? What shall I say of so many Authors, and of so many Books, which they wrongfully multiply, under Pretence, that they do not find the same Orthography in the Ancients who cite them? Oh, what strange Blunders would be committed by virtue of those Rules a thousand Years hence in commenting upon our Writers, who with the utmost Negligence spell the Names of our Authors (19), and mention the Titles of Books, just as they please (20).

(18) See above, Rem. [F], of the Article AL-LATIUS.

(19) See the Republic of Letters, Sept. 1685, Art. IX, pag. 1024, and following.

(20) See, above, the Article DAMIEN, Citat. (10).

(21) Mauff. Differtat. Critica de Harpocrat. pag. 398.

(22) Steph. Byzant. in 'Αλὰ βίω.

(23) Harpocrat. in Μεθώνυ.

If the learned Mauffac had sufficiently considered this, he would not have thought that the Book of Demetrius Magnes, quoted by Plutarch περὶ συνώνυμων, differs from that which others quote περὶ ὁμώνυμων (21). It is in vain for him to alledge, as a Proof of his Opinion, the Passage of Stephanus Byzantinus, wherein Demetrius is cited, ἐν συνώνυμοις (22). I wonder he did not cite Harpocration (23), who observes that Demetrius Magnes ἐν τοῖς συνώνυμοις πύλασι, in opere de urbibus synonymis, said, that there were four Cities called Metheone. We may infer from thence, that those two Titles suppose no difference, and that in the Notion of those, who quoted them, ὁμώνυμα and συνώνυμα, are the same thing. One may also maintain, that if the Author made use of one of these two Words to intitle one of his Books, and of the other for the Title of the other Book, it was not with a Design to shew any Distinction; for it is plain that the Notion, according to which one writes a Treatise of Towns that are called Antioch, is the same Notion that is followed in writing a Book concerning Authors named Thales, or Aristophanes; so that the Distinction of Logicians between ὁμώνυμα equivocata, and συνώνυμα univoca, can have no place here. Mauffac should have remembered that the Book quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus and Harpocration, ἐν τοῖς συνώνυμοις, treated of Cities that were called by the same Name. Now it is not likely, that Plutarch meant that Book; doubts he quoted the Book wherein Demetrius spoke of the Persons who had the Name of Demosthenes; and therefore Mauffac has not well confused Cajaubon's Conjecture by saying, Stephanus Byzantinus has cited Demetrius Magnes ἐν συνώνυμοις; therefore the Term συνώνυμον, must be left in Plutarch. 'Composuerat & hic autor libros περὶ συνώνυμων, ut scaturit Plutarchus in vita Demosthenis: male enim illo loco vir quidam doctissimus legendum censet 'Δημήτριος Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ ὁμώνυμων pro συνώνυμων, autor Stephanus apud quem voce ἀλλὰ citatur idem Demetrius ἐν συνώνυμοις (24). The Confutation would not be so bad, if it could be maintained that the Book, the Title whereof is to be found in Diogenes Laërtius, is not that which Plutarch mentioned. But this cannot be maintained without offending against Probability; and it is certain, that Cajaubon looked upon the Books mentioned by Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius as one and the same Book; he ought therefore to be attacked on that side. Note one particular thing: Berkelius had no Notion of our Demetrius Magnes, as it appears from the Note he made on these Words of Stephanus Byzantinus, 'Δημήτριος ἐν συνώνυμοις, Fortassis intelligendus Demetrius cognomento Ixion, qui ut Suidas auctor est quædam ad Grammaticam spectantia conscripsit (25). — Perhaps we are to understand Demetrius, surnamed Ixion, who, as Suidas has observed, wrote something relating to Grammar.' It is a surprising thing that his Memory could not supply him with any thing concerning our Demetrius, of whom several ancient and modern Authors have said many things; besides, he is liable to censure for believing that Stephanus Byzantinus quotes a Grammatical Book. It was more natural to say that it was a Treatise that related to History or Geography, for Stephanus quotes him about the Name of a City and of a River. This sort of Homonymous or Synonymous Words do not belong to a Grammarian as such. I add this Restriction, because there is a kind of Homonymies or Synonymies, that belong only to Grammar, and about which the Ancients published some Treatises. Mauffac (26) is in the right to observe, that when the Multitude of Books composed by Authors of the same Name, or upon the same Matter, caused the Writings of one Man to be confounded with those of another, the Critics, who made it their only Business to discern whether a Work was supposititious or genuine, had then a new Task, which was to discern the Works that belonged to each of the Homonymous Writers. He names three Authors, who applied themselves to that part of the Critical Art; the first is our Demetrius Magnes: he calls the second Simarestus, and the third Dionysius Sinopenis. 'Ita Simarestus quidam libros περὶ συνώνυμων composuerat. Hinc etiam Dionysii Sinopenis περὶ ὁμώνυμων tractatus apud Ulpianum Demosthenis ἐξήγησιν (27). Consult Wowerus in the sixteenth Chapter of his Treatise de Polymathia (28). But I must not forget what Jonsius observes, (29), viz. that the Work of Dionysius Sinopenis was a Comedy (30), and that of Simarestus a Grammatical Performance (31), and therefore Cajaubon and Mauffac have matched them wrong with Demetrius Magnes. They would have done better if they had matched him with Agrippon (32), mentioned by Suidas (33). They make no mention of him: this Omission is less pardonable than their omitting what Aulus Gellius tells us concerning a Book, wherein the Author examined, among other things, quot fuerint Pythagoræ nobiles, quot Hippocrate (34).

(14) Mauffac, ubi supra.

(25) Ber. el. in Steph. Byzant. pag. 87.

(26) Mauffac, ubi supra.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Pag. 126.

(29) Jonsius, de Scrip. Hist. Philosoph. pag. 250.

(30) See Athenæus, lib. 9, cap. 7, pag. 381.

(31) Jonsius, ubi supra, pag. 448.

(32) See, above, Remark [H] of the Article A-POLLONIUS (TYRANÆUS).

(33) Suidas in 'Απτολόγειος.

(34) Aulus Gellius, lib. 14, cap. 6.

The thing for which Athenæus quoted him is very remarkable, viz. that Theotimus, who had writ against Epicurus, was accused by Zeno the Epicurean, and condemned to Death (a). There is a Passage in Dionysius Halicarnassensis, of which I shall speak [C].

(a) Athen. lib. 13, pag. 611.

Of all the Moderns, who have applied themselves to that part of Critical Learning, which concerns the ancient Authors of the same Name, none has been so successful in it as Meursius and Jonsius (35). But because the Conformity of Names has not occasioned fewer Mistakes among the Authors of the later Ages, it was necessary to write something on that Subject. A learned German (36) went about it with good Success. His Design takes in the ancient and modern Homonymous Writers. His Book (37) was printed at Hamburg in the Year 1698. He has observed a vast number of Faults which consist in ascribing a Book to an Author who did not write it, and who had nothing common with the true Author but the Name, &c.

(35) Do not forget what I have said of ALLATIS, in the Remark [F] of his Article.

(36) Joannes Mollerus, Flenburgensis.

(37) It is intitled Homonymos, copia Historico-Philologica Critica, five thesaurus quædam de Scrip-toris Homonymis quadrupar-titus, &c. in 2vo.

[C] There is a Passage in Dionysius Halicarnassensis of which I shall speak. That Author, who was both a Critic and a good Historian, observes, that Callimachus, and the other Grammarians of Pergamum had writ nothing but what was very imperfect concerning the Orator Dinarchus. He adds, that Demetrius Magnus, who was accounted a very learned Man, and who had given a very great Character of that same Orator in his Work of the Homonymous Writers, was nevertheless mistaken (38). He sets down the whole Passage, whereby it appears that Demetrius first of all observed that there were four Dinarchus's, and that afterwards he said something of each of them, beginning with the Orator. We find also in that Passage all that he said of that Orator. Dionysius Halicarnassensis makes a very good Criticism upon it: he complains that Demetrius says nothing of Dinarchus's Birth, or of the Time he lived in, or of the Country where his Eloquence was made use of. Demetrius might have been very well informed of those things, if he had taken the Pains to inquire into them. Dionysius Halicarnassensis proves it by setting forth what he had discovered upon that Subject by his Inquiries. I am very well pleased to have had a like tale before I read that Passage of Dionysius Halicarnassensis; I did not know that he had observed those Defects in our Demetrius's Narrative, when I blamed those who write an Elogy upon a Man without mentioning the Place, or the time of his Birth and Death, &c. (39). Notwithstanding those Defects, we ought to be sorry for the loss of that Author's Writings; for his Narratives, tho' imperfect, would be of great use to us.

(38) Δημος (read Δημήτριος) ὁ Μάγνης δὲ ἔδειξε πολὺν ἔργον ἐν τῇ περὶ τῶν ὁμωνύμων πραγματείᾳ. Demetrius Magnus qui poly-histor fuisse videtur, in tractatu de homonymis, &c. Dionys. Halicarn. in judicio de Dinarcho, pag. m. 349.

(39) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, June 1684, Art. V. pag. 500, Edit. 1686.

DEMOCRITUS, one of the greatest Philosophers of Antiquity, was born at Abdera in Thrace (a). He was educated by the Magi [A], who taught him Theology and Astrology. Afterwards he heard Leucippus, and learned of him the System of Atoms, and a Vacuum. The extraordinary Inclination he had for Learning moved him to travel in all the Parts of the World where he hoped to find some great Men. He went to the Priests of Egypt; he consulted the Chaldeans, and the Persian Philosophers; and it is said that he went far into India and Ethiopia, to confer with the Gymnosophists. In those Travels he spent all his Patrimony, which was worth above a hundred Talents (b), after which he was obliged to his Brother for his Maintenance; and if he had not given sensible Proofs of his great Parts, he would have incurred a Note of Infamy for not preserving his Estate [B]. The Spirit of great Travellers was pre-

(a) See the Remark [A].

(b) A Talent is worth about 600 French Crowns.

[A] He was educated by the Magi. Xerxes, King of Persia, having lodged in the House of Demetrius's Father, presented him with some Magi, who were the Preceptors of Democritus (1). Now as there is a very great difference between lodging King Xerxes, and treating his Army, one cannot excuse the Author, who says that Democritus's Father sealed that Monarch's Army without incommoding himself (2). Moreri is trapped here, which he would not have been if he had minded the words of Diogenes Laërtius; but he does not seem to have consulted him. If he had, would he have said, that, according to Diogenes Laërtius, Democritus was a Native of Miletus? Laërtius does not say so; he says only that it is the Opinion of some. I shall observe by the bye that Moreri should not have cited Herodotus without some further Addition. His Readers would be apt to fancy that the thing he speaks of is to be found in the Muses of Herodotus. Which is not true, and it is not likely that Diogenes Laërtius meant the Author of those Muses. I believe that in that place, and in some others, he means a different Herodotus from him that is extant.

(1) Diog. Laërt. in vita Democriti, lib. 9, n. 34.

(2) Val. Maxim. lib. 8, cap. 7, n. 4. ceter.

[B] If he had not given proofs of his great Parts, he would have incurred a note of Infamy for not preserving his Estate. The Laws of the Country enjoined that those who spent their Patrimony should not be buried among their Ancestors. To avoid the Reproaches and Vexations of those, who envied him, and the trouble which they might have given him, in consequence of those Laws, he endeavoured to free himself from the Punishment which he might have incurred. For that end he chose among his Works that which surpassed all the rest (3), and read it to the Magistrates. They were so charmed with it, that they made him a Present of five hundred Talents, and erected Statues to him, and ordered that after his Death the Public should take care of his Funeral. Which was performed (4). The account which Diogenes Laërtius gives of it is so short, that I have thought fit to add here some small Circumstances. Athenæus (5) relates the thing better: He says that Democritus was formally accused, and obliged to plead his Cause, and that having read one of his Books (6), and represented that the Expences he had been at to qualify himself to compote it, had swallowed up his Patrimony, he was acquitted. Every Body knows Horace's Verses, which shew how careless Democritus was in relation to worldly Goods:

Miramur si Democriti pecus edit agellos

Cultaque, dum peregre est animus sine corpore velox (7).

(7) Horat. Epist. 12, lib. 1, ver. 12.

— — is it strange to find

Democritus grown poorer, whilst his Mind

Was gone abroad, and left his Limbs behind?

(8) See Lambin upon that Passage of Horace.

(a) Ἀναξαγόρας τὴν χώραν κατέλιπε (μηδιστάτον). Anaxagoras agrum ovibus pascendum reliquit. Plat. de vitando are alieni, pag. 871. E. τὴν οὐρανὴν ἐκείνην ἐξέλεγε, καὶ τὴν χώραν ἀφῆκεν ἀργῶν καὶ μηδιστάτον ὅτ' ἐκαστασμέναι καὶ ἀεγασθῶσι σύνῃς. Hic nominis afflatus et animi ductus celsitudine doctum deferunt, & agrum reliquit incultum vastatumque. Id. in Pericle, pag. 162. B. See the Remark [A] of the Article ANAXAGORAS.

Simon Bostius (8) was wrong to think that, by a slip of his Memory, Horace said of Democritus what he should have said of Anaxagoras. It is true that Plutarch informs us, that Anaxagoras left his Lands untill'd (9); and so might Democritus too for any thing we know. Did not Cicero say so before Horace? Democritus, 'qui (vere falso ne quaereremus) dicitur oculis se privasse, certe ut quam minime animus a cogitationibus abduceretur, patrimonium neglexit, agros deseruit incultos, quid quaerens aliud nisi beatam vitam (10)? — Democritus, who is reported to have put out his own Eyes, that his Mind might be the less diverted from Contemplation, neglected his Estate, and suffered it to lie waste. What could he propose by this but 'an happy Life?' Pbilo testifies, that the Greeks said that Anaxagoras and Democritus had left their Lands untill'd, that they might with less distraction apply themselves to the Study of Wildom (11). But how, will some say, can this be reconciled with the Narrative of some Authors, who said (12) that Democritus, dividing his Father's Estate with his two Brothers, chose the least share which consisted in Money, and consequently was fitter for a Traveller? I answer that we ought to be contented to know the several Accounts that are given of those things: it were most times too difficult to reconcile them, and to chuse the best. Valerius Maximus tells us that Democritus gave all his Estate to his Country, except a very small Sum. He represents that Patrimony as a prodigious Estate, and makes no mention of Democritus's Brothers. This is to relate things very

(3) It was intitled Μέγας δὲ ἄριστος.

(4) Diog. Laërt. ibid. n. 39.

(5) Athen. lib. 4, cap. 19, pag. 188.

(6) It was the Great Diacrismos, and the History of Hell, τὴν περὶ τῶν ἐν ᾧδου. Id. ibid.

(10) De finibus, lib. 5.

(11) De vita contemplat. pag. 891.

(12) Apud Laërt. in Democrito, n. 35. See also Ælian, lib. 4, cap. 20.

(c) See Valerius Maximus criticized upon this Account, towards the end of the Remark [B].

dominant in him; he travelled to the furthest Parts of India in quest of the Riches of Learning, and cared but little for the Treasures that were almost at his Door. If we believe some Authors, he was never at Athens (c); or if he was there, as some others affirm, he did not discover himself to any Body. He gave two Proofs of an extraordinary Sagacity [C], which made him admired by the great Hippocrates. But we must not very carefully. There are some other Faults in the account he gives of it. 'Democritus cum divitiis censeret posset, quæ tantæ fuerunt, ut pater ejus Xerxis exercitui epulum dare ex facili poterit, quo magis vacuo animo studiis literarum esset operatus, parva admodum summa retenta, patrimonium suum patriæ donavit. Athenis autem compluribus annis moratus, omnia temporum momenta ad percipiendam & exercendam doctrinam conferens, ignotus illi urbi vixit: quod ipse in quodam volumine testatur (13). — Democritus, whose Fortune was so great, that his Father could with Ease furnish out an Entertainment for Xerxes's Army, gave his Patrimony to his Country, reserving only an inconsiderable part to himself, to disengage his Mind from every thing but Study, which he prosecuted for many Years, with the utmost Application, at Athens, unobserved, as he owns in one of his Works.' I have already censured what the Historian says of the Entertainment of that prodigious Army. It is not probable that Democritus made a long stay at Athens, since some Authors say that he never was there. The great Travels of that Philosopher, wholly omitted by Valerius Maximus, deserved to be mentioned much more than his Stay at Athens. The same Author says nothing of a wonderful Circumstance of it. He should have particularly taken notice of the Contempt, which Democritus expressed for the Glory he might have acquired, if he had been willing to make himself known.

[C] He gave two proofs of an extraordinary Sagacity. Democritus went to visit Hippocrates, who called for some Milk. It is not said whether he did it to try Democritus's Skill; it is only affirmed that Democritus positively determined that it was the Milk of a black Goat that never had but one Kid. Hippocrates had brought a Female with him: the first time that Democritus saw her, he called her Maid, but the next Day he called her Woman; and it came to be known that she had been deflowered the preceding Night. This no doubt was a very penetrating Wit, and I should not wonder that Hippocrates admired him for it. If I should be asked what I think of this Story, I should answer without any hesitation that I take it to be false. Not but that I think it possible, that the cause of the blackness of a Beast, and a reiterated Teeming should produce a particular Quality in Milk. It is not impossible that it should be so, and on the other side it is possible that it should not be so. The same may be said of the other Article. It is possible that the loss of Virginity should produce some alteration in the out side of a Woman, and it is possible it should produce none. These two opposite things being possible, let us suppose that there is a particular Quality in the Milk of a black She-Goat that never bred but once, which arises from the Blackness and the First-bearing, is it possible for a Man to know that Quality? I answer that this does not seem impossible to me; but I do not believe that hitherto any Man has attained to that degree of Knowledge. It is said that Bees have the Faculty of discerning, among several Persons that come near their Hives, those who have lately tasted the Venereal Pleasure (14). There is nothing in this but what is probable; for the Organs of Insects are so nice that an Emanation of Corpuscles, which excites no Sensation in a Man (15), may provoke the smell of Bees and Ants. But Democritus's Knowledge would surpass that of Bees, since it is not said that they can discern whether it be the first time that the Venereal Act has been performed or not. I say then, that tho' all that is said of Bees were true, and though it were certain that the loss of Virginity makes some alteration in the out side, it could not be inferred from thence that ever any Man knew that Alteration. However it be, I am persuaded that Democritus did not know the two things in question. Nevertheless I may relate them without being guilty of a Lie; for I only alledged what I find in Diogenes Laërtius.

I should be less innocent than I am, if I should venture to relate this Story with some Additions not to be found in old Authors; and therefore here charge those with a Lie and a Falsification, who say that Democritus knew by the Eyes of the Maid, that waited on Hippocrates, that she had spent the Night with a Man. 'Paellam Hippocratis comitem virginem primo, sequenti verò die sceminam salutavit, quod nocturnæ deflorationis vestigia in ejus oculis perciperet, invisa generis humani dimidio sagacitate (16). What they add, that this Sagacity is odious to one half of Humankind, might pass, if they did not take it from a false Supposition; for it is certain that it would be a most troublesome thing, to be afraid of People, that should know by a Maid's Eyes whether she has lost her Virginity or not. Those, who love pious Frauds, should endeavour to make it believed that many Persons know this; but it were to be feared that this Error would be more strenuously and effectually opposed than any Superstition. A great many People would believe nothing of it, and would not fail to show their disbelief by opposing that pious Fraud. Some say that Democritus knew the deflowering of that Maid by her Voice (17). He observed, say they, that the Tone of her Voice was not as it was the Day before; and hereupon they tell us that Albertus Magnus discovered the mis-conduct of a Servant Maid, without coming out of his Closet. She had been sent to fetch Wine at a Tavern; and came back singing. Albertus, though intent upon his Studies, observed that the Voice of that Maid was not so clear as it was before, and concluded from thence that she had lost her Maiden-head in that small Journey. 'Nec minus vocis mutationem ob eandem fere causam, quo tantum signo ferunt Albertum Magnum ex mulæo suo puellam ex ceno polio vinum pro hero apportantem in itinere vitiatam fuisse deprehendisse, quod in reditu subinde cantantibus ex acuta in graviores mutatas voces agnovisset (18). See the last Paragraph of this Remark.

I have nothing to say against la Mothe le Vayer; for if he says that Democritus knew the Qualities of the She-Goat by the smell of the Milk, he tells us at the same time, that, according to Diogenes Laërtius, it was the Sight, and not the Smell, that discovered it to Democritus. So that la Mothe le Vayer does not deceive us; he does not give room to believe that his Conjecture is a Fact that he took out of ancient Authors. It will not be unacceptable to the Reader to find here the grounds of his Conjecture. Democritus, says he (19), made himself admired in his Conference with Hippocrates, judging in like manner (20) that the Milk that was brought to them was of a black She-Goat, which had never bred but once. I know very well that the Writer of his Life mentions this judgment as an effect of the fight. But what we read, in Philophrastus, of a young Shepherd, who knew by the smell that some Milk was not pure, makes me think the same thing of this Action of Democritus. That Clown, who was a very tall and strong Man, and whose Name was Agathion, desired the Sophist Herod to get him the next Day a Vessel of pure Milk in his Opinion, that is to say, not milked by a Woman's Hand. But as soon as it was brought to him, he perceived that it was not such as he had desired, protelling that the Scent of her Hands who had milked it offended his Nose. Philophrastus calls him a Diviner upon that account.

Though the Story which I have related of Albertus Magnus's Discovery be never so frivolous, yet some learned Physicians do carefully examine the Relations which they pretend to observe between the Organs of Generation, and the Throat; and it is not an uncommon thing to see some Persons, even among the common People, who observe that a Preacher the first Year of his Marriage has a more dry, broken, and hoarse Voice than he had before. Meurfius says, that in ancient Times the Nurses measured every Morning, with a Thread, the Necks of the Maids whom they had under their care, to know whether they had lost their Virginity, or not (21). He proves this by a Passage of Catullus; but I had rather say, that this Passage (16) Jo. Chrysostomus Magnæ in vita Democriti, pag. 7.

(17) Gaspar à Reies, in Elysio jucundar. quest. Campo, quest. 39, n. 7, pag. m. 474.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Tom. X, Letter 4, pag. 31.

(20) That is, as Pherecydes had foretold an Earthquake by the Smell of Well-water.

* Diog. Laërt.

(21) Meurt. Avet. Philol. cap. 16, apud Almelov. Specim. Antiquit. & sacris profanarum, pag. 67.

(13) Valer. Maximus, lib. 8, cap. 7, extern. n. 4.

(14) Plutarch. in Præc. Conjug. pag. 144.

(15) However, see what is said of Father Cotton in the Rem. [C] of the Article MARIANA.

not believe what has been said about it: there is more Reason to think that the History of the ancient Philosophers has been intermixed with as many prodigious Adventures as that of the Knights Errant, and it is certain that, in point of Bravery, the Exploits of the Famous Roland would not be more admirable, than those two Discoveries of Democritus with respect to the Secrets of Nature. Some say that he lived One hundred and nine Years [D]; and that he put off his Death for some Days on his Sister's Account [E]. He wrote many Books (d): which ought not to be wondered at, even tho' he had not lived so long; for he loved a retired Life, and applied himself to study after a very singular manner [F]. Besides, he had a fine Genius, a vast Understanding, and shows only that their Necks were measured on their Wedding-day, and the Day after. See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres for January 1686, p. 27. Isaac Vossius, commenting upon this Passage, makes a Note, wherein he mentions a pretended Book of Democritus, which shews how the Neck ought to be measured: and therefore this of right belongs to this part of my Commentary. 'In veteri scripto de sympathia & antipathia, quod perperam tribuitur Democrito, ita hæc referuntur; Λαζών βυζάδειον καὶ λαμπρῶσαν ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ εἰς αὐτοῦ. καὶ μὴν ἴσον ἔχει, παρ' αὐτοῦ εἰσι. εἰ δὲ μὴ, ἐξοφανταί. Nempe si solum aut funiculum ex lino aut papyro accipias, & anterioris colli spatium ab aure ad aurem, & deinceps cervicem seu averfam metiaris colli partem similiter ad aures, fuerintque hæc intervalla inæqualia, desloratam esse sponfam, contra si æquales fuerint illi semicirculi, esse etiamnum virginem. Aliud quoque addit signum, scilicet si collum fuerit calidum & nates frigidae, & hoc quoque amissæ virginitalis esse indicium (22). — In an old Treatise of Sympathy and Antipathy, which is falsely ascribed to Democritus, There is this Nostrum. Take a String, Cord, or slip of Paper, and measure the fore Part of the Neck from Ear to Ear, and afterward the back Part in the same manner; if these Semicircles be equal, then is she a Virgin, otherwise not. To this be added another Criterion; namely, if the Neck be warm, and the Nates cold, it is a sign of lost Virginity.' There was another Method of measuring: Severin Pineau speaks of it in the fifth Chapter of the first Book of notis Virginitatis, and Gaspar à Reies in his Thirty eighth Question.

(d) Taken from Diogenes Laërtius, Book 9, in vita Democriti, n. 34, & seq.

(D) Some say that he lived One hundred and nine Years. We have no certain Account of the time of his Birth, or of the time of his Death: and therefore Scaliger does only shew wherein Authors contradict themselves (23). According to the Chronicle of Eusebius, Democritus flourished in the beginning of the LXXth Olympiad, and died in the second Year of the XCIIIrd (24). By this Account he must have lived much above One hundred and nine Years, or flourished from his nineteenth Year. Diodorus Siculus says, he died being ninety Years old, in the first Year of the XCIVth Olympiad (25). Lucian affirms, that Democritus starved himself to death at the age of One hundred and four Years (26). If we had any thing certain about the Age of Anaxagoras, we should better know the Chronology of Democritus; for the latter said, in one of his Works (27), that he was forty Years younger than Anaxagoras. But the Authors, who mention the time of Anaxagoras, do not agree together. It is said he was Thirty two Years of Age (28) when Xerxes went into Europe, and that he lived Seventy two Years, and died the first Year of the LXXVIIIth Olympiad. I omit several other Confusions, which are no less difficult to be cleared. One may boldly affirm, that Ælian is mistaken (29) in supposing that Democritus laughed at Alexander's Uneasiness for not having yet conquered one World, there being an infinite number of them, according to that Philosopher. The One hundred and nine Years, which are ascribed to him, cannot bring him to Alexander's Conquests. Aulus Gallius's Opinion is solid: he came by it the right way: he says, that Socrates was younger than Democritus (30). Now Socrates died the first Year of the XCVth Olympiad, at seventy Years of Age (31): therefore Democritus must have been then at least eighty Years old: so that he would have been above One hundred and forty Years of Age, if he had been alive when Alexander ascended the Throne the first Year of the CXIth Olympiad. I will not forget that Marcus Antoninus (32) says, contrary to all other Writers, that Democritus died of the lousy Distemper: it is likely he took Pheretides for Democritus. You will see several Authorities in the Remark [E] concerning our Philosopher's voluntary Death. They may be added to these three Verses of Lucretius:

Denique Democritum postquam matura vetustas
Admonuit memorem motus languescere mentis,
Sponte sua leto caput obviu obtulit ipse (33).

(33) Lucret. lib. 3, ver. 1052.

Democritus perceiving Age invade,
His Body weaken'd, and his Mind decay'd,
Obey'd the Summons with a cheerful pace,
Made haste to welcome Death, and met him half the Race.

DRYDEN.

[E] He put off his Death for some days on his Sister's account. His Sister did grieve, not to see his Resolution to die, but because his Death would prevent her being at the Feast of Ceres. To ease her of that Trouble, he caused hot Bread to be brought to him every Morning; and only with the Steam of that Bread he kept himself alive till the three Days of the Feast (34) were over: after which, he softly fell into the Arms of Death. Thus Diogenes Laërtius relates the Matter (35), which looks very much like an idle Story. Athenæus does not relate the Thing with the same Circumstances. He says that Democritus, weary of his Old-age, resolved to hasten his Death by lessening his Diet every Day. The Festival of Ceres was at hand, and the Women of the House were very much afraid he should die during that Anniversary; for they could not have assisted at that Ceremony if he had died at that time. Wherefore they desired him to put off his Death till after the Feast, that they might joyfully celebrate fame: he consented to it, and ordered a Pot of Honey to be brought to him. The Smell of that Honey alone kept him alive for some Days: after which he had it taken away, and died (36). A modern Author has rashly attempted to criticize Athenæus (37). He makes him say that Democritus's Sister, who was a Priestess of Ceres, desired her Brother not to die during the Feast, and that Democritus caused a great Pot of Honey to be brought to him, and eat nothing but Honey for several Days. This is not probable, says the modern Author; it is much more likely that this good old Man, being ready to expire, and incapable of Nourishment, prolonged his Life only by the Smell of Honey, as my Country-Man Cælius Rhodiginus affirms: 'Et hæc quidem minus probabiliter Athenæus, cum vero sit propius moribundum senem omnisque alimenti incapax non ipso melle, sed sola mellis evaporatione vitam produxisset, ut asseruit Rhodiginus meus (lib. 21. cap. 3.) (38)'. Who can forbear laughing in reading this? For, I. It is not true that Athenæus says that Democritus did eat Honey: he says that That Philosopher only received the Scent of it. Διαζῆσαι ἡμέρας ἱκανὰς τὸν ἀνθρώπον τῇ ἀπὸ τοῦ μέλιτος ἀναφορᾷ μὲν χρῶμενον: In multos dies vitam prorogasse solo mellis odore & balitu continuatam (39). II. It is not true that the Smell of Honey is more proper to prolong a Man's Life for some Days than the Honey it self. Suppose that Man within an inch of his Grave, I will not recall my words. III. Athenæus does not speak of Democritus's Sister, so far as he from making her a Priestess of Ceres, a Dignity which Laërtius does not give her. It is this last Historian who mentions the Intreaties of Democritus's Sister. IV. Lastly, It is ridiculous to cite Cælius Rhodiginus for a Matter of Fact that happened above Two thousand Years ago.

[F] He applied himself to Study after a very singular manner. He made choice of a Room in a House seated in the middle of a Garden, and shut himself up in that Room, with so little concern for every thing that was done round about him, that when they came

(34) It lasted nine Days, according to Ovid; four, according to Helychius; five, according to Aristophanes. See Castellan de festis Græcorum, pag. 173. Ca-fambon, in Laërt. lib. 9, n. 43, will have it, that that Festival lasted but three Days in the Place where Democritus lived; but that it was otherwise at Athens: and yet, in his Notes upon Athenæus, pag. 537, he says, that it lasted but three Days at Athens.

(35) In ejus vita, lib. 9, n. 43.

(36) Athenæus lib. 2, cap. 7, pag. m. 46.

(37) He quotes Athenæus, lib. 2, cap. 31: it should be cap. 7.

(38) Balthaf. Bonifacius, Hist. Ludicra, lib. 1, cap. 11, pag. m. 13.

(39) Athen. ubi supra.

(22) If Vossius in hæc verba Catulli Epith. Pelei & Thetidi: Non illam natrix orienti late recubans Hespero collum poterit circumdare fib. When the pleas'd Goldens' rose next Morn from Bed, Th' officious Nurse in vain essay'd the Thread. pag. 248.

(23) Scalig. in Euseb. n. 1016, pag. 109.

(24) Menage, Not. in Laërt. lib. 9, n. 41, says, that Eusebius places the Death of Democritus in the fourth Year of the XCIVth Olympiad. Jonnius, who says 5, pag. 23, deceived him.

(25) Diod. Sicul. lib. 14, cap. 11.

(26) Lucian, in Macrobiis, pag. m. 639, 640, Tom. II.

(27) In parvo Discurso, apud Laërtium in Democrito, n. 41.

(28) Laërt. lib. 2, n. 7.

(29) Ælian. Histor. divers. lib. 4, cap. ult.

(30) Aul. Gell. lib. 17, cap. 21.

(31) See his Life, written by Mr Charpentier, pag. 284.

(32) Περὶ τῶν εἰς αὐτὸν lib. 3, lect. 3.

and a penetrating Wit. He studied every thing: Natural and Moral Philosophy, the Mathematics, polite Learning, and the fine Arts, were all within the Sphere of his Activity. He got a very great Skill in all those things, so far as to raise himself to the Glory of Invention; as we read in Seneca [G]. I have read in some modern Authors, that his long Life was an effect of his Chastity [H]; but I do not find it in the Ancients.

came to call him one Day to a Sacrifice, he had neither perceived that the Ox that was to be killed was tied near his Chamber, nor that his Father was come to give Orders for that Ceremony (40). He must needs have been a great Lover of Solitude, since he took delight in shutting himself up in the Tombs.

(40) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, n. 36.

Ἡσκη δὲ καὶ ποικίλως δοκιμαζέειν τὰς φαντασίας ἐπιμαζών ἐνίοτε καὶ τοῖς ταύροις ἐνδίατριζων. Nisiabatur autem etiam varie probare imaginationes, sæpe solitarius vivens atque etiam sepulchra incolens (41). He did it to try the Strength of his Imagination, and the different ways it might be employed.

(41) Ib. n. 38.

Lucian tells a pretty Story upon this: he says, that Democritus shut himself up in a Tomb without the City, where he spent Days and Nights in Studying and Writing. Some young Men endeavored to fright him; they appeared in the Disguise of dead Bodies, and put on the most frightful Vizards they could get; they came skipping and capering about him. He did not so much as look upon them; and said only, as he was writing, Leave off playing the Fool. Ὁ δὲ ἔτε ἔδρασε τὴν προσποίησιν αὐτῶν, ἔτε ὅλως ἐνέβλεψε πρὸς αὐτοὺς. ἀλλὰ μετὰ τὸ γράφειν, παύσασθαι ἐβή παύσας. ἔτε βεβαίως ἐτίθει μὲν εἶναι τὰς ψυχὰς ἐν τῷ γυνόμεναι τῶν σωμάτων. Hic neque ipsorum simulationem timuerit, neque ipsos omnino respexerit: sed inter scribendum dixerit, desinite ineptire: adeo firmiter credidit animas nihil esse postquam de corporibus exierint (42). He appeared undaunted, says Lucian, because he was fully persuaded that the Soul dies with the Body, and consequently, that what is said of Apparitions and Ghosts, and the return of Spirits, is a meer Chimera. There is scarce any one who has heard of Democritus, but knows that Hippocrates was called to cure him. Some very good Critics (43) are persuaded, that the Letters that are to be seen upon this, amongst those of Hippocrates, are supposititious: but it cannot be doubted, that this is a very ancient Fiction. For they feign a long while ago, that the Alderites wrote to Hippocrates, to desire him to come and see Democritus. They were afraid he would grow mad, and that his great Knowledge would impair his Brains; which they looked upon as a great Misfortune to the Public. Hic præ multa quæ detestantur ipsum sapientia ægrotat, ut timor sit ne nostra urbs Alderitarum pefundetur, si Democritus mente fuerit motus (44). They saw that Democritus cared for nothing, and laughed at every thing: he said that the Air was full of Images; he enquired what the Birds said, and boasted that sometimes he travelled in the immense Space of things. It appears by one of those Letters of Hippocrates, that the love of Solitude had exposed Democritus to the bad Reports that were spread of him. In veritatis regione quam sapientia collustrat, non est pater, nec mater, uxorve, aut cognati, non liberi, nec fratres, neque famuli, fortunaque, vel aliud ex his quæ tumultum faciunt. Democritus illuc præ sapientia commigravit, & infania teneri creditur ob solitudinis amorem (45). — In the Region of Truth, illuminated by Wisdom, there is neither Father nor Mother, Wife nor Relations, neither Children, Brethren, Servants, Fortune, or any thing else which here creates such a bustle; Democritus took up his abode there, and was from his love of Solitude accounted a Madman. For the rest, Notwithstanding the Forgery of those Letters, I would not deny that Hippocrates was sent for by the Alderites, and that he who forged those Letters built upon a Matter of Fact, grounded upon a good Tradition (46). But here is something yet stronger. Dr Drelincourt, Professor of Physic at Leyden, one of the most learned Men of our Age, assured me, that there is no room to doubt whether the Letters that concern Democritus, amongst those of Hippocrates, are genuine. This he says is the common Opinion of Physicians.

(42) Lucian. in Philopseude, Tom. II. pag. 435.

(43) Menag. in Laërt. lib. 9, n. 4.

(44) Apud Hippocrat. in Epist. n. 5. citante Magneno, ubi supra, pag. 24.

(45) Magnen. ibid. pag. 26.

(46) I do not then destroy what I said before in Citation (47) of the Article ABDERA.

[G] Got a very great Skill. . . . so far as to raise himself to the Glory of Invention, as we read in Seneca.] Here follows the Elogy bestowed upon him by his Historian: Ἦν ὁ ἀλυσῶς ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ πάντα-δλος. τὰ γὰρ φυσικὰ, καὶ τὰ ἠθικὰ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ μαθηματικὰ, καὶ τὰς ἐξουκλιδεῖς λόγους καὶ περὶ τεχνῶν πᾶσαν εἶχεν ἐμπειρίαν.

Erat revera in Philosophia quinque certaminum peritus. Namque naturalia, moralia, mathematica, liberalium disciplinarum orbem, artiumque omnem peritiam callebat (47). — He was actually a great Master of Natural and Moral Philosophy, Mathematics, Languages, and the liberal Arts. As for the things that he invented, you will not find that Seneca praises him much for them. Democritus, inquit, invenisse dicitur formam, ut lapidum curvatura paulatim inclinatum medio saxo alligaretur. Hoc dicam falsum esse. Necesse est enim ante Democritum, & pontes, & portas fuisse, quarum fere summa curvantur. Excidit porro vobis, eundem Democritum invenisse, quemadmodum ebur molliretur, quemadmodum decoctus calculus in smaragdum converteretur, qua hodieque coëtura inventi lapides coctiles colorantur. Illa sapiens licet invenerit, non qua sapiens erat, invenit. Multa enim facit, quæ ab imprudentissimis aut æque fieri videmus, aut peritius, aut exercitius (48). — Democritus, says he, is reported to have invented Arches, that, by a regular Inclination of the Stones, the whole Curvature might be compassed by the middle Stone, which I dare affirm to be false; for there must undoubtedly have been Bridges and Gates before his time, whose summits are most commonly Curves. You seem to have forgot that the same Democritus invented the Method of softening Ivory, how a Pebble might be changed into an Emerald by boiling, and by what Methods Stones might be coloured. Though these things were invented by a wise Man, the Invention is no proof of his Wisdom. For we have seen the most ignorant succeed in such things as happily, nay, have brought them to greater Perfection.

(47) Laërt. lib. 9, n. 37.

(48) Seneca, Epist. 90, pag. m. 37.

[H] I have read in some Modern Authors, that his long Life was the consequence of his Chastity. An Author, whom I have already confuted (49), affirms, that Democritus, who owed his long Life of above a hundred Years to Honey, and to his exact Continency, detested the Work of Love as a thing that made a Man come out of a Man. He quotes Pliny in the sixth Chapter of the Twenty eighth Book; but you will only find these Words in Pliny; Venerem damnavit Democritus, ut in qua homo alius exsiliet ex homine

(49) Ba'tha's Bonifacius. Hist. Ludicæ, lib. 11, cap. 5, pag. 317.

(50). Not a Word of the Virtue of Honey, or of Continency, with respect to the long Life of Democritus. As for the Honey, our modern Authors might have found an Authority for it, since Athenæus assures us, that Democritus had always been a great Lover of Honey, and that he thought, that, to preserve one's Health, one ought to apply Honey to the inward Parts, and Oil to the outward (51): nay, it seems that this Philosopher even promised a Resurrection to Bodies buried in Honey; for it is very likely that these Words of Pliny, Similis & de aservandis corporibus hominum ac reviviscendi promissa Democrito vanitas qui non revixit ipse (52). — Of the same stamp is the Folly of preserving human Bodies, in expectation of their coming to Life again, as Democritus would have persuaded, but the Experiment miscarried on himself, have a Relation to the following Passage of Varro.

(50) Dr Drelincourt has acquainted me with two such like Passages: the one is of Galen, Comm. 3, in 6 Epidemior. pag. 478, lib. 7: the other of Tertullian de Anima, cap. 27, pag. 330. C. See also Clem. Alexandrin. lib. 2, pag. 193, D.

Quare Heraclides Ponticus plus sapit qui præcepit ut comburerent, quam Democritus qui ut in melle servarent: quem si vulgus secutus esset, peream si centum denariis calicem multi emere possemus (53). — Wherefore Heraclides Ponticus, who ordered them to be burnt, was more in the right than Democritus, who would have them preserved in Honey; for had the People followed his Opinion, a Cup of honeyed Wine would bear an exorbitant Price. As for the other Head, I cannot tell where our Modern could find an Authority for it. Give him leave to argue; he will not attain his aim: if he says that Democritus blamed the Sport of Love, only because he found much good by abstaining from it, he will suppose a false Principle, since a great many Persons advise Chastity, because they experience the sad Consequences of Incontinency. Another Modern goes too far, when he says, that Democritus recommended, both by Reasons and by his Example, to come very seldom near the Fair Sex. Morum præterea integritas pudicitiaque tanta, ut rationibus exemploque rarum Veneris usum commendaret (54). He cites Pliny, and the fourth Chapter of the third Book

(51) Athen. lib. 2, cap. 7, pag. 45.

(52) Plin. lib. 7, cap. 55.

(53) Varro in libro 4to pag. 24. Φῶς ἀπὸ Νουμίου, voce vulgari.

(54) Magnenus in vita Democriti, pag. 8.

icients. If all that is cited of him was taken from his true Writings, it cannot be denied but that in some respects he fed himself with Chimeras [1]; for it is pretended that he had a Secret to understand the Singing of Birds. We must also believe that he

Book of Rodericus à Castro de Natura Mulierum. He does not say what place of Pliny must be consulted; but without doubt he means the Words which I have cited out of the sixth Chapter of the Twenty eighth Book, wherein we do not find that Democritus gave himself for an Example. Rodericus à Castro does not say that Democritus alleged himself; and if he should say so, he would be but a blind Man who leads another blind Man.

I do not say this to reflect in the least upon the Continuity of Democritus: I would only make modern Authors sensible of the Obligation they lie under, to advance nothing but what they find credible Witnesses for. We shall see hereafter (55) that Tertullian gives him no good Testimony on this Head.

(55) In Remark [K].

[1] It cannot be denied but that in some respects he fed himself with Chimeras. Columella (56) quotes the Book which Democritus writ concerning Antipathies. Democritus said in that Book, that if a Woman, in the time of her Terms, walks three times round each Knot in a Garden, bare-footed, and with her Hair loose, she would destroy all the Caterpillars in it. Sed Democritus in eo libro qui Græce inscribitur περί ἀντιπαθειῶν, affirmat has ipsas bestias, las enecari, si mulier, quæ in mensuris est, solutis crinibus, & nudo pede unquamque aream ter circumeat, post hoc enim decidere omnes vermiculos, & ita emori. Can any thing savour of a greater Superstition? Democritus said likewise that, to make a Woman confess the Truth, the Tongue of a Frog must be applied to her Heart when she is asleep. Democritus quidem tradit, si quis extrahat ranæ viventi linguam, nulla alia corporis parte adherente, ipsaque dimissa in aquam, imponat supra cordis palpitacionem mulieri dormienti, quæcumque interrogaverit, vera responsuram (57). But it must be a Tongue plucked out of a living Frog, without holding the Frog by any other part (58). Moreover, the Frog was to be put into the Water again. If you desire to know what Judgment Pliny made of that Operation, you need only consult him in the Place where he relates such a like Virtue that was attributed to the Heart of an Owl. It was pretended that, when put on the left Breast of a Woman asleep, it made her tell all her Secrets: Nec omitam in hac quoque alite (bubone) exemplum magicæ vanitatis: quippe præter reliqua portentosa mendacia, cor ejus impositum mammæ mulieris dormientis sinistra tradant efficere ut omnia secreta pronunciet (59). Nor, amongst other monstrous Absurdities of magical Vanity, will I omit that, which is reported concerning the Owl's Heart, which, they pretend, being laid on the left Breast of a Woman asleep, will make her discover all her Secrets. Pliny calls it Magical Romancing: doubtless he made the same Judgment of Democritus's Story; for he observes, immediately after, that the Magicians added some other things, which, if true, would make Frogs more useful to human kind than the Laws. Frogs would supply an infallible Expedient to make Gallantry cease among Women. Pliny's Words are not clear enough, either with respect to the Application of the Remedy, or with respect to a notable Circumstance. He does not say whether the Expedient prevented Cuckoldom, or whether it only hindered a Woman from persisting in Adultery. This is no Logical Distinction; the thing is of great Consequence: all the Words should have been weighed, and the least Ambiguities should have been avoided. They should also have been avoided as to the manner of applying the Expedient: it will appear from the Passage of Pliny that they have not been avoided.

(57) Plin. lib. 32, cap. 5, p. 826.

(58) Or rather, without any other Part remaining fastened to it.

(59) Plin. lib. 29, cap. 4.

Addunt etiamnum alia Magi, quæ si vera sunt, multo utiliores vitæ existuntur ranæ, quam leges. Namque arundine transfixa natura per os, si furtivus in mensuris defigatur à marito, adulteriorum tedium fieri (60). Da Pinet renders those Words thus: If a Frog is spitted upon a Reed from the Head to the Pudenda. Father Hardouin supposes that one was to begin with the Pudenda, arundine transfixa per ranæ pudenda ad os usque. Pliny is therefore obscure as to the Ceremony. I omit his other Obscurities.

(60) Idem, lib. XXXII, cap. V.

Here follow some other idle Conceits of Democritus. He said that the Blood of certain Birds, which he named, being mixed, would produce a Serpent of such an admirable Virtue, that whosoever did eat it might understand what the Birds said to each other. Pliny is in the right to laugh at this Chimera. Qui credit ista, & Melampodi profecto aures lambendo dedisse intellectum avium sermonis dracones non abnuct: vel quæ Democritus tradit nominando aves quarum confuso sanguine serpens gignatur, quem quisquis ediderit, intellecturus sit avium colloquia (61). Since he finds him so credulous that he thinks he may justly insult him, and applaud himself for not adopting such Fooleries, no doubt Democritus's Stories must have been very strange. The Book, which that Philosopher had composed concerning the Cameleon, was, I think, one of the best Magazines of his extreme Credulity. Jungemus illis, says Pliny (62), si millima & peregrina æque animalia: priusque chamæleonem peculiari volumine dignum existimatum. Democrito, ac per singula membra defecatum, non sine magna voluptate nostra cognitis proditiq; mendaciis Græcæ vanitatis. Let us add to these, says Pliny, some other Animals of the same Class, and equally Strangers to our Country; and first the Cameleon, which Democritus, in a whole Treatise, has thoroughly anatomized, and has afforded us no small Entertainment by his absurd Series of Grecian Imperinence. After this Preamble, Pliny gives some ridiculous Extracts of that Book; and then ends thus: Utinam eo ramo contactus esset Democritus, quoniam ita loquacitates immodicas promissit inhiberi: palamque est virum alias sagacem & vitæ utilissimum nimio juvandi mortales studio prolapsum (63). I wish Democritus had himself had a Touch with that famed Bough, since it has, as he pretends, such a Virtue in restraining immoderate talking. It is plain that the Man, otherwise sagacious enough, and a useful Member of Society, had lost himself in an everlast Desire of benefiting Mankind. We shall see some other Passages in the following Remark.

(61) Plinius, lib. 10, cap. 49. See also lib. 29, cap. 4.

(62) Id. lib. 28, cap. 8.

(63) Ibid.

Pliny is to be praised for mentioning the pretended occult Virtues of the Cameleon, in order only to decry, and laugh at them: but he would be still more worthy of Praise, if he had kept part of his Incredulity for Democritus: I mean if he had not too lightly believed that Philosopher to be the Author of that Work, and of several others that went unjustly under his Name. Aulus Gellius's Thought seems very reasonable to me, viz. That Democritus is not the Author of those Stories concerning the Cameleon, and the understanding of the Singing of Birds, but that some Quacks had covered themselves with the Authority of that famous Philosopher. Librum esse Democriti nobilissimi Philosophorum de vi & natura chamæleontis: eumque se legisse Plinius Secundus in naturalis historię vicesimo octavo refert; multaque vana atque intoleranda auribus deinde quasi à Democrito scripta tradit. His portentis atque præstigiis à Plinio Secundo scriptis non dignum esse cognomen Democriti puto. Multa autem videntur ab hominibus istis male sollicitibus hujusmodi commenta in Democriti nomen data, nobilitatis auctoritatique ejus profugio utentibus (64). Pliny, the Younger, relates that there was then extant a Treatise of Democritus, an eminent Philosopher, on the Virtue and Nature of the Cameleon, and that he himself had read it; then quotes several monstrous Absurdities from it, as though they had been wrote by Democritus; but the Name of Democritus ought never to be put to such palpable Fictions. They seem rather to be the Imposition of some Quack, who strove to shelter them under the Protection of so awful a Name. We cannot but make this Judgment, when we remember the Character that Lucian gave him. He reckons Democritus, Epicurus, Metrodorus, among those stubborn Free-Thinkers, who will by no means give credit to those that would make them believe Prodigies. According to his Account, Democritus remains always persuaded, that the makers of Miracles do nothing but by Artifice; he endeavours to find out their way of deceiving Men, and though he cannot find it out, he believes it is all Imposture: ὥστε πᾶν τὸ μυστήριον εἶναι διανοητὸν τινός. . . . ἀδελανθῶντες τοὺς ταῦτα καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα τὴν γνώμην ἔχοντες ὡς ἀπίστους. Ut res planè Democritum aliquem requireret . . . qui adversus

(64) Aul. Gell. lib. 10, cap. 12.

he was very much addicted to Magic [K]; I mean the Magic that is grounded upon a Compact with the Devil. I do not think he was such an Enthusiast as to put out his

(65) Lucianus in Pseudem. pag. 83. Tom. I. adversus hæc & similia mentem haberet adamantinam ut non crederet, &c. (65). — It would require the Incredulity of a Democritus, whose Mind was sealed against the Belief of these and such like miraculous Performances, &c.

(65) Plin. lib. 30, cap. 1.

(67) Futher Hardouin cites, upon this Occasion, Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1, Stromat. pag. 303, who says that Democritus explained a Column of Aciuri, a Babylonian Author, and inserted the Explanation of it in his Writings.

(68) Plin. lib. 24, cap. 17.

(69) This is a weak Reason; for how many bad Books come out under great Names, especially in point of Magic?

SOME Remarks concerning the Book intitled, CHIROCINETA.

[K] We must also believe, that he was very much addicted to Magic.] This does not at all agree with the Words of Lucian, which I have just now alleged. However it is just to hear Pliny (66). 'Certè Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato ad hanc (Magicen) discendam navigare, exiliis verius, quam peregrinationibus, susceptis. Hanc reveri prædicare, hanc in arcanis habere. Democritus Apollobechem Coptiten, & Dardanum à Phœnice illustravit: voluminibus Dardani in sepulchrum ejus petitis: suis (67) vero ex disciplina æro editis: quæ recepta ab aliis hominum, atque transisse per memoriam, æque ac nihil in vita, mirandum est. In tantum fides istis fasque omne deest, adeo ut ii qui cetera in viro illo probant, hæc ejus esse opera incipient. Sed frustra. Hunc enim maxime affixisse animis eam dulcedinem constat. Ple-numque miraculi & hoc, pariter utrasque artes effloruisse: Medicinam dico, Magicenque, eadem ætate illam Hippocrate, hanc Democrito illustrantibus. — Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, and Plato, went abroad to learn Magic, and may be rather said to have banished themselves, than to have undertaken Voyages. At their return they boasted of what they had learned, and proclaimed it a Mystery. Democritus explained the Works of Apollobeches the Coptic, and Dardanus the Phœnician. The Works of Dardanus were deposited in his Grave, but his own were founded upon his Books. It is matter of the greatest wonder to me how they have been handed down to us. Truth and Probability are such entire Strangers to them, that they, who approve his other Works, deny these to be his. But to no end. For it is certain his Mind was strangely addicted to such Reveries. Nor does it seem less than a Miracle to me, that Magic and Physic should flourish together, the former under Democritus, and the other under Hippocrates. I have set down this Passage somewhat at length to inform my Reader. I. That the Favourers of Democritus have always denied that he was the Author of the Magical Books ascribed to him. II. That Pliny maintains against them, that are in the wrong to deny it. Let us proceed to another Passage of Pliny (68). 'In promissio herbarum mirabilium occurrit aliqua dicere & de magicis: quæ enim mirabiliores sunt? Primi eas in nostro orbe celebrare Pythagoras atque Democritus consecrati magos. — In his Narratives of uncommon Plants, he makes mention of the magical ones. For what can be more uncommon than they? Pythagoras and Democritus, in Imitation of the Magi, were the first, in this Quarter of the World, who ever bustled themselves about them.' He observes, a little after, that some denied that certain Books, ascribed to those two great Men, were written by them: to which he answers: 'Nec me fallit hoc volumen ejus à quibusdam Cleomporo Medico adscribi: Pythagoræ pertinax fama antiquitasque vindicavit. Et id ipsum auctoritatem voluminibus affert (69), si quis alius curæ suæ opus illo viro dignum judicavit: quod fecisse Cleomporum cum alia suo & nomine ederet, quis credat? Democriti certe chirocineta esse constat. At in his ille post Pythagoram magorum studiosissimus quanto portentosiora tradit? — Nor am I ignorant that this Part of his Works is ascribed to Cleomporus the Physician. But all Ages have consistently asserted the Title of Pythagoras. This likewise may be another Argument. Had Cleomporus judged a Treatise of his own worthy Democritus, he would have published it under his own Name, as he did others. It is certain the Chirocineta is Democritus', who after Pythagoras was the greatest Admirer of the Magi, but what more monstrous things does he publish than his Predecessor?' Before I proceed farther, I shall dwell a little upon the Title of the Book just now mentioned by Pliny. Salmasius happily found out that this Book ought not to be intitled Chirocineta; and therefore he corrected that Word which was in Pliny's Editions, and shewed that Chirocineta must be put in the room of

it. He corrected at the same time a Passage of Vitruvius, wherein the same Work of Democritus is mentioned: 'Multas res attendens, says Vitruvius (70), admiror etiam Democriti de rerum natura volumina, & ejus commentarium quod inscribitur χηροκινητων, in quo utebatur annulo signans cera molli quæ esset expertus. — Among other things, says Vitruvius, I admire Democritus's Treatises on the Nature of Things, and his Commentary intitled, χηροκινητων, wherein he sealed, with soft Wax, all those Accounts which he himself had experienced to be true.' We read before, in Vitruvius, χηροκινητων in quo etiam utebatur annulo signans cera ex milio quæ esset expertus. By the same means Salmasius corrects a Passage of Diogenes Laërtius, where it is said that Democritus composed χηρικη α ευσικη αρο-ελημαδα. It ought to be χηροκινη α ευσικη αρο-ελημαδα (71). Casaubon's Criticism went no farther than to conjecture, that perhaps the Passage of Diogenes Laërtius might be mended by the Chirocineta of Pliny (72). But this had been to drive out one Evil by another. Those, who believe that the Word Chirocineta ought to be left in Pliny, explain it according to their Fancy: Some say that That Title signifies, that the Work was to be handled often (73); others believe that this Book was so intitled, because it was to be handled with great Ceremony (74). He-sychius wonderfully confirms Salmasius's Corrections; for he informs us, that the Critics put a Piece of Wax upon such Places of a Book as seemed obscure to them, and worthy to be further examined. There remains a great Objection. If the Chirocineta of Democritus was a Work, wherein he had put his Seal on all the things of which he spoke by experience, how came that Book to be so full of Fables, and ridiculous and superstitious Stories? Pliny is not contented to say in general, In his Democritus post Pythagoram magorum studiosissimus quanta portentosiora tradit? but he quotes several things out of it which favour of black Magic.

I find something very perplexing in all this, and I think the best Expedient is the NON LIQUET, or the εἰς τὴν α of the Sceptics. It may be that Democritus, without too nicely examining the Consequences of his System, was in hopes to discover several occult Qualities, and the Art of doing a thousand extraordinary things by the help of Magic. This being once granted, we may imagine that he eagerly read all the Books of Magic, and compiled all the pretended Wonders that he saw in them, and those that he might hear viva voce. He might have made some surprising Experiments of the Virtue of certain Herbs, and put his Seal to the Passages of his Chirocineta wherein he set forth his Experiments. That Book might have been intitled in that manner, though most things contained in it were not approved by the Author; and so Pliny might have found many Fables in it. This is one way of explaining the thing; but it is not that which seems to me the best. I had rather say that Democritus did not write the superstitious, fabulous, and magical Books that went under his Name. Diogenes Laërtius (75) gives a long List of that Philosopher's Works, and then adds, that others were falsely attributed to him (75). Columella (76) acknowledges it as to a certain Book, whereof the true Author was one Dollas (77) Mendefus. It seems Suidas assigns but a very small number of Books for the true Works of Democritus. We have seen, above, the Complaint that Aulus Gellius makes. Lastly, It may be said, that, if Diogenes Laërtius did not reject more, it proves only that there were some Impostors, who, a little after Democritus's Death, published several Books under his Name; they were looked upon as genuine, and the following Ages believed it likewise: this was sufficient for Pliny (78), and Diogenes Laërtius (79), to receive those Works as the genuine Productions of Democritus. And what easily deceived People at first is, that the excessive Curiosity of that Philosopher, his Love of Solitude, his Application to Experiments, and the Success of some of his Predictions, easily persuaded them that he had left in writing all the Secrets and Remarks that were seen in the Books which appeared under his Name.

Petronius says, that Democritus spent his Life in making Experiments on Vegetables and Minerals: 'Omnium herbarum succos Democritus expressit: & ne lapidum

(70) Vitruv. lib. 9, cap. 3.

(71) Salmasius in Exercit. Plinianis, pag. 1100, 1101.

(72) Casaubon. in Laërt. lib. 9, n. 49.

(73) Nec melius interpretantur ita dicta quod assidue manibus tractanda essent. Salmasius, ibid. pag. 1100, C.

(74) Du Pinet in the Margin of his French Translation of Pliny.

(75) In ejus vita, sub fin.

(76) Colum. de Re Rustica, lib. 7, cap. 5.

(77) Or rather Bolus according to Suidas.

(78) Pythagoram pertinax fama antiquitasque vindicavit. It is the Proof alluded by Pliny, lib. 24, cap. 17.

(79) The Works rejected by him are those, which had been rejected by a general consent, ἐπελα-γμινος ἐκ τῶν ἀλλότριά, omnino aliena consensum omnium sunt.

his own Eyes [L], as some have said. His manner of comforting Darius was ingenious

* lapidum virgultorumque vis lateret, ætatem inter experimenta consumpsit. — Democritus extracted the Juices of every Herb, and, to discover the Virtues also of Fossils and Shrubs, spent his whole Life in making Experiments. It is said that, having foreseen that it would be a bad Year for Olive Trees, he bought a great Quantity of Oil at a low Price, and got prodigiously by it; of which nevertheless he made no advantage, being contented to make it appear that he might be rich if he would. People wondered that a Man, who was never seen to mind any thing besides his Studies, should on a sudden concern himself with Trade: Doubtless when the Reason of it came to be known, many looked upon him as a Magician: Others thought he deserved Divine Honours. Ὅς δὲ πρὸς πᾶσι τὰς τῶν μελλόντων εὐδοκίμους, λοιπὸν ἐνθάδε δόξας παρὰ τοῖς πλείστοις ὑψίστην (80). Ubi vero futura quedam prædixerat, sequensque rerum eventus fidem fecerat, divinis jam honoribus dignus à plerisque judicatus est. — Having foretold certain things, which accordingly came to pass, he was esteemed by some worthy of divine Honours. Here is a Passage that concerns his trading in Oil, and the rest: Ἐκέρυεντο Democritum, qui primus intellexit, ostenditque cum terris cœli societatem, spernentibus hanc curam ejus opulentissimis civium, prævisa olei caritate ex futuro Vergiliarum ortu, qua diximus ratione, ostendimusque jam plenius, magna tum vilitate propter spem olivæ, commississe in toto tractu omne oleum (81), mirantibus qui paupertatem & quietem doctrinarum ei sciebant in primis cordi esse. Atque ut apparuit causa, & ingens divitiarum cursus, restituisse mercedem anxie & avidæ dominorum penitentiae, contentum ita probasse, opes sibi in facili, cum vellet, fore (82).

(80) Diog. Laërt. lib. 9, n. 33.

(81) Cicero lib. 2, de Divinatione, cap. 3. Aristotele, lib. 2, Politic. cap. 7. Diogenes Laërt. in Thaletæ, ascribes it to Thales, but with this Difference, that Thales bought the Oyl to come according to Cicero, and the Oyl Presses according to Aristotle and Diogenes Laërtius. See Father Hardouin upon this Passage of Pliny, and Menæse upon Laërtius, lib. 1, n. 20.

(82) Plin. lib. 18, cap. 28, pag. 524.

(83) Plin. ibid. cap. 35.

— It is said that Democritus, who first discovered and demonstrated that the Heavens had an influence upon the Earth, foreseeing, from the rising of particular Stars, that Oil would be very dear, notwithstanding the promising Prospect of Plenty, bought up great Quantities at a cheap Rate, to the Admiration and Astonishment of all who knew his fondness for Poverty, and a retired studious Life; but when the reason appeared, and a vast profit offered itself, he generously restored it to the Persons from whom he had purchased the Oil, who being now convinced of their Error had heartily repented, and meanly begged for Relief, contenting himself with shewing them that Riches were at his call, whenever he pleased to command them. Another time he advised his Brother to set all his Reapers to work, to carry into the Barn what Corn was already cut down, for he forelaw a furious Storm, which happened soon after. Tradunt eundem Democritum, metente fratre ejus Damaso ardentissimo æstu, orasse ut reliquæ segeti parceret, raperetque defecta sub tectum, paucis mox horis sævo imbre vaticinatione approbata (83). — The same Democritus is reported to have desired his Brother Damasus, who was reaping on an excessive hot day, to leave the rest of the Corn standing, and carry what was cut into the Barn, foreseeing that a terrible Storm would immediately follow, which accordingly did. I have been told that a Gentleman of Normandy, perceiving by his Barometer that it would quickly rain, housed his Hay whilst it was very fine Weather, which made the Country People of the neighbouring Villages say that he kept Correspondence with the Devil, since he could so well foresee the alteration of the Weather. Were People less rash in their Judgments upon their Neighbours in the Age of Democritus? Were not the Secrets of Nature in fewer Hands at that time than they are now? Democritus was therefore more exposed to magical Suspicions than he would be at present.

I shall occasionally observe, that Salmastus does not seem to confute Solinus well, concerning the contest of Democritus with the Magi. Solinus says, that That Philosopher made use of the Stone Catocrites to advantage against them. Accipimus Democritum Abderiten ostentatione scrupuli hujus frequenter usum ad probandam occultam naturæ potentiam in certaminibus quæ contra magos habuit (84). — I am informed that Democritus often made use of this Stone, to prove the hidden Power of Nature in his disputes with the Magi. Salmastus (85) alleges against Solinus several Passages of Pliny, which, as we have seen in this Remark, shew that Democritus applied himself (84) Solin. cap. 3, sub fin.

(85) Salmast. in Exercit. Plin. p. 6. 98, 99.

very much to the Magicians. But who told Salmastus that Emulation does not prevail among such People? Is it not very likely that they contend for Reputation? Is not this confirmed by our Demonographical Writers? Do they not tell us that some Magicians can undo what others do? It is likely that Jannes and Jambres, who resisted Moses (86), took him for a Magician. In like manner Democritus might for a considerable time have been an humble Sectator of the Magicians, and then, when he thought he knew as much or more than others, have contradicted those he met with, to raise his Reputation above theirs.

[L] I do not think he was such an Enthusiast as to put out his Eyes. Several Authors mention this foolish Story. The most common Reason that is given why he did so, is, that he hoped to meditate more profoundly, when the Objects of Sight should create no Diversion to the Intellectual Power of the Soul (87). Democritum Philosophum in monumentis historiarum Græcæ scriptum est luminibus oculorum suæ sponte se privasse, quia exilimaret cogitationes commentationisque animi sui in contemplandis naturæ rationibus vegetiores & exactiores fore, fit eas videnti illecebris, & oculorum impedimentis liberasset (88). — In the History of Greece it is recorded, that Democritus voluntarily deprived himself of Sight, thinking that the Operations of his Mind would be more vigorous and regular, when freed from the Impediments and bewitching Diversion which the Eyes occasion. Was it not sufficient for him to shut himself up in a dark Place, or to keep his Eyes shut during the time of his Meditation? Laberius, in a Dramatic Piece, feigned that That Philosopher blinded himself, that he might no longer see the Prosperity of the wicked. I say, Laberius feigned this without any other Reason, but because that Hypothesis was convenient for him to act the Part he had in hand. He even explained how Democritus had blinded himself; it was, said he, by exposing himself to the Light, which a Shield reflected upon him (89). Cautiam voluntarie cœcitatæ finxit aliam Laberius (90) veritque in eam rem, quam tum agebat, non inconcinne. Est enim persona, quæ hæc apud Laberium dicit, divitis avari & parci sumptum plurimum aotiamque adolescentis viri deplorantis.

(86) 2 Tim. chap. iii, ver. 8.

(87) Cicero, de finib. lib. 6, cap. xxix, neither affirms nor denies the thing; but if he had affirmed it, he would have given this Reason for it.

(88) Aul. Gell. lib. 10, cap. 17.

(89) Idem. ibid.

(90) In mimo quem scripsit Rationem. Ibid.

Democritus Abderites phisicus philosophus
Clypeum constituit contra exortum Hyperionis,
Oculos effodit ut posset splendore æreo.
Ita radiis solis aciem effodit luminis,
Malis bene esse ne videret civibus.
Sic ego fulgentis splendorem pecuniæ
Volo elucidicare exitum ætati meæ;
Ne in re bona esse videam nequam filium.

Laberius assigns another cause of this voluntary Blindness, and turns it agreeably to his Subject. The Person, whom Laberius introduces, speaks in this manner of a rich old Miser, fretting at the prodigality of a rakish Son.

*When Virtue griev'd, and Vice triumphant rode, Abdera's Sage with Indignation glow'd.
His honest Heart was mov'd; with eager haste,
Full in the Sun a beamy Shield he plac'd.
Then, from such Sight to free his troubl'd Mind,
Catch'd the full Blaze, and as he look'd grew blind.
So shall my Gold, the Rival of it's Sire,
Pour on these Eyes an ever streaming Fire,
Till Sight be lost; for I will never bear
To see it squander'd by a wanton Heir.*

Plutarch had heard say that Democritus had made use of Burning-Glasses, upon which he fixed his Eyes that no Object might hinder his Meditation. Ὅθεν ἐκείνο μὲν ἡεὶ εἰς τὸ Δημόκριτον ἐκείνιος σέβεται τὰς ὁφθαλμοῦ ἀπερὶσσομένην εἰς ἑσπέρην πυρρὴν τὰ καὶ τὴν ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἀνάκλασιν δεξάμενον. Equidem falsum est quod dicitur Democritum sponte sua oculos extinxisse in ignem speculum eos deflentem luminisque reflexionem accipientem (91). — So the Report, which says, that Democritus voluntarily deprived himself of Sight, by catching the Reflexion of a Burning-

(91) Plut. de curiositate, pag. 521, C.

nious enough [M]. His laughing at human Life may be excused [N]: it was better for him to do so, than to imitate Heraclitus, who cried continually. He was the Forerunner of Epicurus [O]; for the System of the latter differs only from that of Democritus in some Amendments. It is also Democritus, who supplied the Sceptics with what they said against the Testimony of the Senses; for, besides that he used to say, that Truth was hid in the bottom of a Well, he maintained that there was nothing real but the Atoms and Vacuum, and that every thing else consisted only in Opinion (e). This is what the Cartesians say now concerning the corporeal Qualities, Colour, Smell, Sound, Savour, Heat, Cold; they are only, say they, Modifications of the Soul. Democritus was very far from being orthodox concerning the Divine Nature [P], and he believed supra, n. 44.

(e) Laërte ubi
Sext. Empiricus
adv. Mathemat.
p. 163. See also Cicero (lib. 1) of the Article ARCE-
SILAS.

Burning-Glass, is false. But he rejects this as a meer Fable. The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, having mentioned the Reason, which, according to Laberius, moved that Philosopher to blind himself, adds, 'Others say that he blinded himself to meditate with less distraction. This is more probable, though perhaps false; for is it likely that Democritus, who laughed at every thing, should have been vexed at the Prosperity of a wicked Man? Such a thing must needs be a Subject of Diversion to such a Philosopher as he, who made it his Business to turn the World into Ridicule (92).' He might thereby have fed himself with an imaginary Triumph over Religion.

(92) Nouv. de la
Rep. des Lettres, for February.
1686, pag. 155.

Quare religio pedibus subiecta vicissim
Obteritur, nos exæquat victoria cælo (93).

(93) Lucrét. lib.
1, ver. 79.

Thus by his Conquest we our Right regain;
Religion be subdued, and we now reign.

Tertullian alleges another Reason of that Philosopher's Conduct. He pretends, that Democritus could neither look upon a Woman without desiring to enjoy her, nor miss the Enjoyment, without vexing and tormenting himself, and therefore he thought the best Way was to deprive himself of his Sight. Tertullian gives this as an Instance of the Triumph of the Faithful over the wife Heathens. 'Democritus excæcando semetipsum, quod mulieres sine concupiscentia aspicere non posset, & doleret si non esset potius, incontinentiam emendatione proficetur (94).' It is a very imaginary Triumph; for what we most certainly know concerning Democritus overthrows Tertullian's Supposition. He was a Man weaned from his Senses, given to Meditation, who despised Honour and Riches, and travelled till the Age of eighty Years (95). But a Man will hardly undertake great Journeys when he is blind; and if those, who are above eighty Years old, stand in need of losing their Eyes, it would not be because the sight of Women kindles the Fire of Love in them. A desire, attended with vexation for not enjoying the beloved Object, will not be cured by the loss of one's sight: the Lewdness of the Heart wants another Remedy. Clemens Alexandrinus says a thing, which, if we take it right, irrefragably confutes Tertullian. I have mentioned it at the end of the Text of this Article. These are that Father's own words: Δημήκετος δὲ γάμον καὶ παιδοποιήσαν παρστύται, διὰ τὰς πολλὰς ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀνδρίας τε καὶ ἀρεκάας ἀπὸ τῶν ἀναγκαιοτέρων. Democritus autem repudiavit matrimonium & procreationem liberorum propter multas quæ ex ipsis oriuntur molestias, & quod abstrahant ab illis quæ sunt magis necessaria (96). — Democritus was averse to Matrimony, and the increase of a Family, from the Troubles which attend them, and because they divert the Mind from things of greater Consequence.

(96) Clem. Alex.
Stromat. lib. 2,
pag. 421.

(97) La Mothe
de Vayer, Tom.
VIII, pag. 340.
See also Father
Garasse, Doctrine
curieuse, pag.
297.

(98) Essais, lib.
1, cap. 50.

(99) Letter 21,
pag. 715.

(100) See Cicero,
lib. 1, de finib.
cap. 5, 6.

[M] His manner of comforting Darius was ingenious enough. I shall not mention it; it may be read in Moreri, and in an Author, whose Books are to be had every where (97). The latter has a little flourished upon it. He quotes no Body; and therefore, to supply that Fault, I shall observe, that this Story is only to be found in a Letter of the Emperor Julian.

[N] His laughing at human Life may be excused. See upon this Montagne (98), quoted by the Author of the new Letters against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (99).

[O] He was the Forerunner of Epicurus. I cannot approve those who say, that the few Innovations, that were seen in the System of Democritus, after it was adopted by Epicurus, are as many Depravations (100). But I own, that Epicurus did not add many things to it, and that he spoiled some of them. 'Quid est in Physicis Epicuri non a Democrito? Nam etsi quædam commutavit, ut quod paulo ante de inclinatione atomorum dixi, tamen pleraque dicit eadem, atomos, inane, imagines, infinitatem locorum, innumerabilitatemque mundorum, eorum ortus & interitus, omnia fere quibus nature ratio continetur. . . . (101). Democritus vir magnus in primis cujus fontibus Epicurus hortulos suos irrigavit (102). — What is there in the Physics of Epicurus that is not to be found in Democritus? For though he has altered some few things, as I observed above, concerning the Inclination of Atoms; yet in general, where Nature is concerned, they agree, viz. in Atoms, Vacuum, Images, Infinity of Space, Infinity of Worlds, with their Formation and Dissolution. . . . Democritus was an eminent Philosopher, from whose Fountains Epicurus watered his own Nurseries.' He did himself wrong in not owning his Obligations to Democritus, and in calling him a Dotard, or a trifling Man, ἀνήμετος, nugarum censor. This was one of his Quibbles.

[P] He was very far from being orthodox concerning the Divine Nature. If he had only said, that God was a Spirit placed in a Sphere of Fire, and the Soul of the World (103), he would be an hundred times less intolerable than he is; but I find that other Doctrines much more dangerous are attributed to him in Cicero's Books. 'Quid? Democritus, qui tum imagines, earumque circuitus in Deorum numero refert, cum illam naturam quæ imagines fundat ac mittat, tum scientiam intelligentiamque nostram, nonne in maximo errore versatur? cumque idem omnino, quia nihil semper suo statu maneat, neget esse quicquam sempiternum, nonne Deum ita tollit omnino ut nullam opinionem ejus reliquam faciat (104). — Is not Democritus guilty of an egregious Error, when he reckons both the Images of Objects, which present themselves all around us, and that Nature from which these Images flow, as also our Knowledge and Perception, in the number of Gods? Does he not likewise destroy the Being, nay, the very Idea of a God, in denying any thing to be eternal, because every thing he sees is placed in a fleeting State?' These are the Doctrines, which Velleius, one of Cicero's Interlocutors, attributes to Democritus: they are such, that it may be affirmed of those who embrace them, that they are truly in the case of him, who said, O Jupiter, I know nothing of thee but thy Name (105). For Nature, which Democritus called God, had neither Unity, nor Eternity, nor Immutability, nor the other Attributes that are essential to the divine Nature. He lavished the Name of God upon the Images and Ideas of Objects, and upon the the Act of our Understanding whereby we know Objects. I dare say that this Error, though never so gross, will never come from a Man of mean Understanding, and that none but Men of a great Genius are able to produce it. I cannot tell whether any Body took notice, that the Opinion of one of the most sublime Wits of this Age, That we see all things in the Infinite Being, in God, is Democritus's Doctrine unfolded and mended. Observe that Democritus taught, that the Images of Objects, which are scattered round about us, or which turn on every side to present themselves to our Senses, are Emanations from God, and are themselves a God, and that the actual Idea of our Soul is a God. Is there a great difference between this Thought, and saying, as Father Maillebranche does, that our Ideas are in God, and that they cannot be a Modification of a created Spirit? Does it not follow from thence, that our Ideas are God himself? Now our Ideas and our Knowledge may easily pass for the same thing. Though Cicero brings in one of his Interlocutors, saying, that those Thoughts of Democritus became an Abderite, that is a Sot, and a Fool, I am sure that a Man of mean Parts will never

(101) Cicero de
Nat. Deorum,
lib. 1, cap. 12,
20, & 43.

(102) Ibid. cap.
33. See also
Plutarch. adversus Calotem,
pag. 1168.

(103) Plut. de Plac. Philosoph.
lib. 1, cap. 7,
pag. 881. D.
Ἀντιφύσιος τοῦ
τῶν Θεῶν ἑστῶτος
ποσῶς, τὸν τῶ
ἀέρος φύσιν.
Democritus mentem Deum in
igne globoso,
mundi animam.

(104) Cicero de
Natura Deorum,
lib. 1, cap. 12,
& 33.

(105) See Plu-tarch's Treatise of Love, cap. 12.

(17) Cicero de
finib. lib. 5.

believed that our ultimate End is the Tranquillity of the Mind (f). Plato hated him, and was very near burning all Democritus's Books; which seems to me to be more glorious

(106) Cicero de
Nat. Deorum,
lib. 1, cap. 43.

form them. In order to form them, a Man must comprehend the whole extent of Power that belongs to a Nature capable of representing in our Minds the Images of Objects. Democritus . . . tum censet imagines divinitate præditas inesse universitati rerum: tum principia mentisque quæ sunt in eodem universo Deos esse dicit: tum animantes imagines, quæ vel prodesse nobis solent vel nocere: tum ingentes quædam imagines, tantæque ut universum mundum complectantur extrinsecus. Quæ quidem omnia sunt patria Democriti quam Democrito digniora (106).

— Democritus thought the whole Universe was filled with Images, endued with a divine Nature, and says, that the Principles and Spirits, which exist in the same Universe, are Gods, as also those Images which are endued with an animal Virtue, and are accustomed to affect us with Pleasure or Pain: to these he adds certain Images of immense size, capable of containing the whole Universe. All which Imaginations are more worthy of Democritus's Country than of himself. The Species Intentionales of the School-men are the shame of the Peripatetics: a Man must be I know not what to persuade himself, that a Tree produces its Image round about in all Parts of the Air, to the very Brains of an infinite number of Spectators. The Cause that produces all those Images is quite another thing than a Tree. Seek for it as long as you please; if you find it any where but in the Infinite Being, it is a sign that you do not understand that matter well. I do not deny that those Doctrines of Democritus are at the bottom very absurd. St Augustin has solidly confuted them, and shewn a difference between Democritus and Epicurus, which few Authors have mentioned. He observes, that, according to Democritus, there was in the Atoms either an animated and spiritual Virtue, whereby the Images of Objects partook of the divine Nature, or at least a Soul capable to do us good or harm; but Epicurus acknowledged only the nature of Atoms or Corpuscles in his Principles. Democritus hoc distare in naturalibus questionibus ab Epicuro dicitur, quod iste sentit, inesse concursionem atomorum vim quandem animalem & spiritalem: quæ vi eum, credo, & imagines ipsas divinitate præditas dicere, non omnes omnium rerum, sed deorum, & principia mentis esse in universis, quibus divinitatem tribuit; & animantes imagines, quæ vel prodesse nobis solent, vel nocere: Epicurus vero neque aliquid in principii rerum ponit, præter atomos (107). — Democritus, in his natural Questions, is said to have differed in this from Epicurus, that he thought that there was an Animal and Spiritual Nature in the concourse of Atoms, by the Virtue of which, I think, he makes the Images themselves to be indued with Divinity, not all the Images of all things, but of the Gods; and that the Principles of Spirit are inherent in all, to which he allows a divine Nature, and Images invigorated with Soul, which are capable of doing us good or harm: Whereas Epicurus in his Principles supposes nothing but Atoms. I cannot tell whether St Augustin did well understand the words of Cicero which he paraphrases. He would be excusable if he had not understood them; for Cicero did not explain himself very clearly. However here is a piece of St Augustin's paraphrase: 'Quanto melius ne audissem quidem nomen Democriti, quam cum dolore cogitarem, nescio quem, suis temporibus magnum putatum, qui deos esse arbitraretur imagines, quæ de solidis corporibus fluere, solidæque ipsæ non essent, easque hac atque hac motu proprio circumeundo atque illabendo in animas hominum facere, ut vis divina cogitur; cum profecto illud corpus, unde imago fluere, quanto solidius est, tanto præstantius quoque esse judicetur? Ideoque fluctuavit, sicut isti dicunt, nutavitque sententia, ut aliquando naturam quandam, de qua fluere imagines, deum esse diceret; qui tamen cogitari non posset; nisi per eas imagines, quas fundit ac emittit, id est, quæ de illa natura, quam, nescio quam, corpoream & sempiternam, ac etiam per hoc divinam, putat: quasi vaporis similitudine continuâ velut emanatione ferrentur, & venirent atque intrarent in animos nostros, ut Deum vel Deos cogitare possemus (108). — It had been infinitely better, I had never heard the Name of Democritus, than with Grief to reflect, that one, who in (107) August.

Epist. 56, pag.
m. 273.

(108) Id. ibid.

his own time was esteemed EMINENT, should imagine to be Gods: those Images which flow from solid Bodies, and are not themselves solid, and by winding themselves in a peculiar manner round us, and making their way into our Souls, should give us the Idea of a divine Nature, when in reality the Body, from which the Image flows, is by so much more excellent, as it is more solid. Therefore he doubted, as they say, and wavered in his Opinion, whether he ought not to have made that Nature, from which the Images flowed, a God, but in what manner it is impossible to conceive, unless those Images which it emits, that is, which from that Nature (which he imagines to be somehow Corporeal, Eternal, and Divine) rise like Vapours by a continual Emanation, come and present themselves to our Souls, and give us an Idea of a God or Gods. See the Margin (109).

[2.] Plato hated Democritus, and was very near burning all his Books. He carefully collected them, and was going to throw them into the Fire, when two Pythagorean Philosophers represented to him, that it would be to no purpose, because several People were already furnished with them. Plato's Hatred to Democritus appears by this; he mentioned almost all the ancient Philosophers, and yet he never cited him, no, not in those Places where he contradicted him. Diogenes Laërtius, who says this, adds, that it was a well contrived Policy, since by that means no Body knew that Plato contradicted the most excellent of all Philosophers. It is likely that Historian had better hit the Mark, if he had made use of a Thought of Mr Salo, when he made the Extract of a Book (110). 'People find fault with that Cardinal, says he (111), because he makes it appear that his chief Design is to shew all the Faults that are in Fra Paolo, and because he names that Author almost in every Chapter. It is said that Baronius went more cunningly to work; because, though he undertook his Annals to oppose the Heresies and Fallacies of the Centuriators of Magdeburg, yet he took care not to contradict them visibly in his Book: But he composed his History without naming them otherwise than by the general Name of Heretics and Innovators. And the Reason why he did so, is, that he thought the less they were spoken of, the better it would be; for fear of raising the Curiosity of the Readers, and exciting a desire to see a Book, whose reading is always dangerous: Whereas Cardinal Palavicini used such a Method, that his Book cannot be understood without reading that of Fra Paolo. And then it is to be feared that Fra Paolo's History, which is very well done, will be preferred before that of the Cardinal, which may be more true, but is not more probable.' It seems to me that the Inconvenience, which Baronius intended to avoid, is the same with that which Plato was aware of. This is all the Cunning, Diogenes Laërtius was little acquainted with the Stratagems of Authors, since he did not mention this, speaking of Plato's Conduct. It has been said, that Aristotle did really what Plato had a mind to do, and that, in order to be the only Philosopher that Posterity should have the Knowledge of, and to appropriate to himself with Impunity the Treasures of those, who had philosophized before him, he burned all their Writings. A Professor of Pavia says this as a certain Truth, and pretends that Pliny speaks plainly of it. 'Quod Plato designaverat, exequutus est Alexandri ope Aristoteles, quasi parum esset Alexandro, si se monarcham redderet Asia, nisi Aristoteli jus in philosophos daret, qui quod sua tantum de tot antiquis monumenta supersse voluit, tyrannidem in ingenia videret affectasse. . . . Dum itaque Regum fortunas unica vincendi libidine ductus everteret Alexander, superbissimo furore ambitiosus nominis Aristoteles in philosophorum Principes est debacchatus, unoque incendio congestas triginta sex seculis tot sapientiæ divitias absumpsit, & si quæ voluit supersse fanerit, ea omnium ludibrio diceritque laceffenda tradidit posteris, dum in optimorum bona invehens, abscissis perditisque sapientiæ statuarum capitibus, suum imposuit singulis: neque obscure literarii peculatus reum facit Aristotelem curiosissimus Plinius, in præfat. ad D. Vespasianum Imp. (112). — What Plato designed, Aristotle, by the help of Alexander, performed; as though Alexander

(109) We shall see, in the Remark [E] of the Article LEUCIPPUS, a Passage of Plutarch, whereby it appears, that Democritus seems to have ascribed some Sensation to the Atoms.

(110) The History of the Council of Trent, by Cardinal Palavicini.

(111) Journal des Savans, March 23, 1665.

(112) Jo. Chrysostomus Magnus in Prologomenis Democriti revivificatis, pag. 23.

(g) Suidas mentions it.

(h) See Lærtius, n. 41.

(i) He was a Physician of Cafres in Language. The Catalogue of the Books he promised, is prefixed to his Antiqu. Gauloises, printed at Paris, in 1655. See also the Preface to the second Century of his Observations Medico-Physicæ.

(k) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 1, cap. 23.

rious than prejudicial to the latter. The System of Atoms is not by much so absurd as Spinozism [R]: but what Moreri says, that, according to Democritus, the Atoms were infinitely great, is very comical: for on the contrary they were of an unconceivable Smallness. I shall say, in the Remark [K], that many Books have been ascribed to him, which are none of his. Doubtless we might see more clearly into this matter, if we had the Treatise of Callimachus (g), or the Treatise of Thrasyllus concerning his Works (h). I cannot tell whether Peter Borel (i), who promised three Volumes in folio, De Vita & Philosophia Democriti, could have given us any light into it. If Ælian (k) said, that Protagoras was the Son of Democritus, he is mistaken. Democritus did not approve of Marriage, or of amusing one's self to get Children; which, says he, occasions a great deal of Trouble, and keeps a Man off from more necessary Employment. See the Remark [L], towards the end. He said also that the Pleasure of Love was a little Epilepsy [S].

What they say of the Displeasure his Servant-maid did him, by informing him of a thing, for which he was seeking a natural Reason, is curious enough [T].

xander thought it too little to make himself Monarch of Asia, unless he likewise established Aristotle's Supremacy over the other Philosophers, who seems to have usurped a Tyranny over the learned World, by destroying so many Monuments of Antiquity, that his own might be the only remaining. . . . Whilst the Thrift of Victory solely prompted Alexander to overturn Kingdoms, the same ambitious Spirit lighted up the Flames to those Treasures of Learning, the Labours of the Princes of Philosophy for Thirty six Ages, which Aristotle consumed in one Pile; and those which he spared, he spared out of Cruelty, reserving them only for the scorn and ridicule of Posterity; On the most valuable he exercised his sacrilegious Hand, by cutting off the Heads of Busts consecrated to Wisdom, and placing his own on their Shoulders. Pliny, in his Preface to Vespasian, plainly convicts Aristotle of Plagiarism. He is mistaken as to the second Head. Pliny says nothing whereby it may appear that he makes Aristotle a Plagiarist rather than any other Author, and I do not question but that he is mistaken as to the burning of the Books. See what Charles Emanuel Vizzani observes upon this in his Commentary on Ocellus Lucanus (113). The Jews tell a foolish Story, that Aristotle, having learned all his Philosophy in the Books of Solomon, that were found in Jerusalem when Alexander made himself Master of that City, burnt them to appropriate to himself the Wisdom contained in them (114).

(113) Pag. m. 144.

(114) Bartolucci in Biblioth. Rabbin. in the Journ. des Savans, 1692, pag. 464. See above Citat. (27) of the Article ARISTOTLE.

[R] The System of Atoms is not . . . so absurd as Spinozism. For the Atomists acknowledge at least a real Distinction between the things that compose the Universe; and so it is not incomprehensible that whilst it is cold in one Country, it should be hot Weather in another, and that, whilst one Man enjoys a perfect Health, another should be sick. In Spinozism, according to which the whole Universe is but one Substance, it is a perfect Contradiction; I say it is such a Contradiction, as to maintain that Peter is a learned Man, whilst William is an ignorant Man, and so with all sorts of contrary Attributes that are verified all at once in many Persons, some in one and some in another. Supposing an infinite number of Atoms really distinct from each other, and all essentially endowed with an active Principle, one may conceive Action and Re-action, and the continual changes that are observed in Nature: but where there is but one only Principle, there can be no Action and Re-action, nor any change of Scenes. So that he, who departs from the right Way, which is the System of a God, who freely created the World, must necessarily admit of a multiplicity of Principles, acknowledge Antipathies and Sympathies among them, and suppose them independent from each other as to their Existence and Power of Acting, and yet capable to annoy each other by Action and Re-action. Do not ask why in certain Cases the affect of Re-action is rather this than that; for no Reason can be given of the Properties of a thing, but when it has been made freely by a Cause, that had some Reasons and Motives in producing it.

[S] He said, that the pleasure of Love was a little Epilepsy. This Thought was ascribed to Democritus, if we believe Galen. Τίς γὰρ ἀνέγνω γράφειν Δημόκριτον μὴ εἰρηναίως μὴδ' ἐπιληπτικῶς εἶναι τὴν συνέσιαν (115). Where is the Necessity of saying, that Democritus maintained Enjoyment to be a little Epilepsy. Clement Alexandrinus meant the same thing (116); for his Sophist of Abdera is no other than Democritus; but he did not understand that Philosopher's meaning; for he says that Democritus gave to understand by it, that the Venereal Act is a Distemper that cannot be cured (117). Aulus Gellius ascribes the Definition I speak of to Hippocrates, and not to Democritus. These are his words. 'Hippocrates autem, divina vir scientia, de coitu venereo ita existimabat, partem esse quandam morbi terribissimi, quem nostris comitalem dixerunt, namque ipsius verba hæc traduntur, τὴν συνέσιαν εἶναι μὴδ' ἐπιληπτικῶς' (118). — Hippocrates, a Man of more than human Knowledge, thought thus of Enjoyment, that it was a branch of a very bad Distemper, which he calls Epilepsy, &c. Macrobius (119) has transcribed this whole Passage of Aulus Gellius word for word according to his Custom, so that there is but one Evidence for ascribing this Thought to the great Hippocrates, viz. Aulus Gellius. Now the Authority of Aulus Gellius is not comparable to that of Galen upon such a matter of Fact as this. No Body knew better than Galen whether Hippocrates had not said such a thing; and therefore, since he ascribes it to Democritus, it is a strong Presumption that it came from that Philosopher, and not from the Physician Hippocrates. The learned Perizon, whom I have cited before (120), has done me the Honour to write to me, that he does not doubt Aulus Gellius is mistaken. His reason is, that Galen's exactness in a thing relating to Physic is much more likely than that of Aulus Gellius. Besides, those words are not to be found in any Book of Hippocrates, tho' it is true that he insinuates that Opinion in some Places of his Works (121): and further, we see that Clement Alexandrinus agrees with Galen, and not with Aulus Gellius. I see also that Menage declares for Galen against Aulus Gellius. He cites Stobæus, who attributes that Definition of the Venereal Act not only to Erysimachus, but also to Democritus (122).

(115) Galen. Comment. 1, in librum 3, Epilepticorum Hippocratis.

(116) Μὴδ' ἐπιληπτικῶς, τὴν συνέσιαν δ' Ἀβδερῆος Ἰπποκράτους ἐπὶ τῆς ἐπιληψίας διεκρίθησαν. Sophista Abderites. Clem. Alex. lib. 2. Paedagog. pag. 193.

(117) Νέον ἀνέγνω γράφειν, τὴν συνέσιαν δ' Ἀβδερῆος Ἰπποκράτους ἐπὶ τῆς ἐπιληψίας διεκρίθησαν. Id. ibid.

(118) Aul. Gell. lib. 19, cap. 2.

(119) Macrobi. lib. 2. Saturn. cap. 8.

(120) Dr Drelincourt, Professor of Physic at Leyden. See the Remark [G], towards the end, and the Remark [H], Citat. (50).

(121) Sub initium, lib. de Genit. pag. 27, lin. 35, & lib. de Off. nat. pag. 62, lin. 19. I am no less certain that these Quotations are right, than if I had verified them. I give them as I find them in Dr Drelincourt's Letter to me.

(122) Menage. in Lært. lib. 9, n. 41, pag. 410, 411.

(123) Kuhnus, in Diog. Lært. lib. 9, n. 38, pag. 539.

(124) Plut. Sympos. lib. 1, cap. 10.

[T] What they tell of the Displeasure his Maid-Servant did him . . . is curious enough. I have as yet found no Modern that cites any ancient Author for this: thus Montagne tells the Story. 'Democritus, having eat at his Table some Figs, which smelled of Honey, immediately began to revolve in his Mind: whence this unusual Sweetness should proceed, and, to find out the Reason of it, he arose from Table to see the Situation of the Place where the Figs were gathered. His Maid, hearing the Reason of this riling, told him laughing, that he need not trouble himself, for she had put them into a Vessel that had had Honey in it. He was vexed that she had deprived him of a Subject for his Curiosity. Go, said he, you have vexed me; I shall nevertheless enquire into the Cause, as if it was a natural one; and he would not have failed finding some true Reason for a false and imaginary effect.' Mr Kuhnus relates the same Story (123), without citing any Author. He might have cited Plutarch (124).

DEMONTJOSIUS, or DEMONTJOSUS (LEWIS). See MONTJOSIEU.

DEMPSTER

DEMPSTER (THOMAS), taught Claſſical Learning at Paris, towards the beginning of the XVIIth Century. He was a Scotchman, and ſaid, when he came into France, that he had left a great Eſtate in his Country for the Catholic Religion. He boated alſo of a great Nobility. Though his Buſineſs was to teach a School, he was as quick at drawing his Sword, and as quarrellſome as a profeſſed Duelliſt. He either fought with a Sword, or boxed almoſt every Day, inſomuch that he was the Terror of all the Schoolmaſters. He did a courageous Action at Paris, in the College of Beauvais [A]; which brought him into great Trouble, that he durſt not hazard the Conſequences of; therefore he retired into England, where he found, not only a Place of Refuge, but alſo a handſome Wife, whom he carried with him to Paris, when he returned thither. One day, as he was going along the Streets with that Woman, who ſhewed her fine naked Breſt and white Shoulders [B], he found himſelf ſurrounded with ſo many People, that it is likely the Crowd would have ſmothered them both, if they had not retired into a Houſe. A Beauty, thus ſet forth in a Country, where ſuch a thing was not practiſed, drew in that multitude of gazing Fools. He went into Italy, and taught Philological Learning in the Univerſity of Piſa with a good Salary. Returning one day from the College, he found that his Wife had been ſtolen away; his own Scholars had lent an helping Hand to that Elopement. He bore it patiently like a Stoic. Perhaps he was not ſorry to be rid of a Treafure, the keeping whereof was ſo troubleſome to him. He removed to Bologna, where he was Profeſſor for the remaining part of his Life. He was alſo admitted there into the Academy della notte (a). There are ſeveral Books of his writing [C]. He died in the Year 1625, according to Moreri's Dictionary, where you will find ſeveral Univerſities, wherein he taught, but not all [D]. He was a Man of a prodigious Memory [E], indefatigable, a zealous Friend, and a violent Enemy (b): he had no great Judgment (c), nor much Honesty,

(a) Taken from Nicus Erythreus. Pinac. I, pag. 24, 25.

(b) Moribus appetitis & ſimulandi neſcius, live amore odlove quempiam proſequatur utrumque palam. Ut amicis obſequentiſſimus, ita inimicis maxime inſenſus. . . . He was of an open Temper, an entire Stranger to Diſſimulation, profeſſing his Hatred or Reſpect to all the World; a hearty Friend, and an inveterate Enemy. Aub. Miræus in Script. Sæc. XVI. pag. 161.

(c) Homo multæ lectionis, ſed nullius plane juvenis. Uſurus. Antiq. Brit. Eccl. cap. 11.

[A] He did a courageous Action in the College of Beauvais. Grangier, Principal of that College, being obliged to go a Journey, made Dempſter his Substitute. The latter exerciſed Juſtice on a Scholar, who had challenged one of his School-fellows to fight a Duel; he ordered him to be taken up upon the Shoulders of a luſty Fellow, and whipped him ſeverely in a full Claſs. The Scholar, to revenge this Affront, brought three Gentlemen of his Relations, who were Life-guards, into the College. Dempſter made the whole College take up Arms, ham-ſtrunged the Horſes of thoſe three Guards before the Gate of the College, and put himſelf into ſuch a poſture of Defence, that thoſe three Gentlemen were forced to beg Quarter. He granted them their Lives, but had them dragged into the Belfry, where he kept them Priſoners, and did not reſeaſe them till ſome Days after. They went another way to revenge themſelves, and cauſed an Information to be made of Dempſter's Life and Behaviour, and had ſome Witneſſes heard againſt him: which obliged him to go for England (1).

[B] His Wife ſhewed her fine naked Breſt and white Shoulders. I ſhall cite Nicæus Erythreus. Ubi (in Anglia) non modo totum ab inſectatoribus ſuis perſugium, verum etiam mulierem naſtus eſt, forma & vultu, adeo liberali, adeo venuſto, ut nihil ſupra, quam in uxoris habuit loco. Quæ mulier, cum luce quadam, Pariſiis, quo rursus Thomas cum ea ſe receperat, conſpecta eſſet, & quia forma præſtabat, ut diximus, & quia habitu erat dementiſſimo; nam & pectus & ſcapulas, nive ipſa candiores, omnium oculis expoſitas habebat; tantus, viſendi gratia, hominum concurſus factus eſt, ut niſi ſe in domum cujuldam, una cum viro, recepſiſſet, nihil propius factum eſſet, quam ut ambo à multitudine opprimerentur (2). — In England he not only found Refuge from his Perſecutors, but a Woman alſo of incomparable Beauty, and of an air ſo noble and graceful, that nothing could be more charming, whom he took for his Wife. As ſhe was one Day ſeen at Paris, whither Dempſter had carried her in his return, and being as I ſaid extremely beautiful, and in a moſt enchanting dreſs, expoſing to public view a Neck and Breſt, whiter than the pureſt Snow, ſuch a crowd of People ſtocked together from all ſides to her, that, had they not taken ſhelter in a neighbouring Houſe, it is more than probable they would have both been cruſhed to death. From this we may learn how much it concerns every Body to conform to the Cuſtoms of the Places where they are, particularly with reſpect to public Decency.

[C] There are ſeveral Books of his writing. His Supplements to Reſponſus de Antiquitatibus Romanis ſhew that he was a Man of great reading. He wrote Commentaries upon Claudian; and Corippus (3); four Books of Letters; ſeveral Dramatic Pieces, and ſome other Poems (4); ſome Law Books; an Apparatus to the Hiſtory of Scotland, a Martyrology of Scotland, and a Liſt of the Scotch Writers (5); I may truly call it a Liſt, for he only names thoſe Writers.

[D] You will find in Moreri's ſeveral Univerſities where he taught, but not all. Moreri does not mention the Academy of Nîmes, where Dempſter diſputed for a Profeſſor's Chair, and carried it, as he himſelf informs us (6): "Quem (locum Virgilii) ut nodum mihi inſolubilem obſect quidam, dum profeſſionem in Regia Nemaufenſium Academia, diſputationi commiſſam, magno licet concurſu, obtinui, reſectiſque aliis, ſolus, quod inter plures dividere volebant quidam addeſiones, ſummo cum honore conſequabar, ſenatu faventiſſimo, unico Barnerio in tot egregiis viris, & omni literarum genere eminentibus, contradicente, maximo conſenſu Conſulum, Civiumque aliorum, exceptis quibuſdam, quos ſi mererentur nominare; nunc quia indigni ſunt tanto honore, cum ſuo livore, imo & malignitate callida intermori patiar, potiùs quam nominibus compellatos vivere meo beneficio velim. — Which Paſſage of Virgil was objected to me as a difficulty not to be ſolved; when I obtained the Chair in the Royal Academy of Nîmes, by Diſputation, from a Multitude of Candidates; and, with the univerſal Applauſe and Favour of the Senate, alone carried off the prize, which ſome buſy People would have had divided, Barnerius being the only one, amongſt ſo many eminent and learned Men, who oppoſed it; The Conſuls and all the Citizens applauding the choice, except a few, whom I ſhall not mention, becauſe they are unworthy of that Honour, but ſuffer their Malice and Envy to be buried in Oblivion, rather than cauſe them to live by taking notice of them." The Paſſage that was propoſed to him as an indiſſoluble Knot is this:

Non ego te, menſis & diis accepta ſecundis

Transieram, Rhodia, & tumidis, Bumafte, racemis (7).

The Rhodian, grateful to the Gods above,

In ſecond Services is pour'd to Jove;

Nor muſt Bumafte his old Honours loſe,

In length and largeneſs like the dugs of Cows.

It is very likely that he was then accounted a Huguenot (8); for the Academy of Nîmes was only deſigned for the Proteſtants.

[E] He was a Man of a prodigious Memory. He ſaid that he did not know what it was to forget any thing. Mentis acumine ſatis valuit, ſed memoriae tenacitate longe plurimum, adeo ut multoties diſceret ignorare ſe quid ſit obliſio (9). — His Conception was ready enough, but his ſtrength of Memory was moſt ſurpriſing, being often heard to ſay, he knew not

(7) Virgil. Georg. lib. 2, verſ. 101.

(8) Hankins de Script. Rom. lib. 2, pag. 174, ſays, that Dempſter left his Eſtate for having preferred the Reformed Religion to the Romiſh; but he had put a wrong Senſe upon the Words of Nicæus Erythreus.

(9) Miræus, ſupra.

(1) Ex Nicæo Erythreo, Pinacoth. I, pag. 24.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 25.

(3) Erythreus has committed a Fault here; inſtead of Corippus he ſays Criſpus.

Honesty; for he published I know not how many Fables without Shame [F]. Some of his Books were condemned by the Inquisition of Rome [G]. His passionate way of writing could not but bring such a Disgrace upon him.

(10) Id. ibid. 'what it was to forget.' I can hardly forbear taking this for a Romance. We are told that he remembered the most hidden Passages of Antiquity. 'Nihil adeo abditum in antiquitatis monumentis cuius non meminisset, ita ut Franciscus Cupius vir in literis omni comparatione major Dempsterum magnam Bibliothecam loquentem compellere consueverit (10). —

'There was nothing in the Monuments of Antiquity so hidden but what he remembered, inasmuch, that F. Cupius, a Man of incomparable Learning, used to call him the great speaking Library.' This being so, he very well deserved to be called a speaking Library, as some Authors have called him. Besides being extremely laborious, for he used to read fourteen Hours every Day without Intermission (11), he could not but know a vast number of things. If his great Reading would have permitted him to write with great Politeness, and with all the Beauties of a very exquisite Judgment, he would have been a greater Prodigy than his Memory was: but he could not write judiciously and politely (12): I remember a Passage of Balzac, which I cannot produce upon a better Occasion. 'If our Courtiers, says he, cannot endure our young Doctor, who sacrificed to the Graces, how would they treat the wild Heinsius, if he should appear amongst them? With how many hootings would they have driven away the nasty Crassot, and the clownish Dempster? Who could secure from their insults those two Anticourtiers, Frederic Morellus, and Theodorus Marcius, who always seemed to come from another World, and spoke a Language, that was neither human, nor articulate, so far was it from being common, and intelligible. Those Men were unpolite and wild, yet they had their Value, as well as rough Diamonds (13).'

(11) Stylus ei copiosus, confragiosus tamen. Ib.

(12) Balzac, Letter 3, 10. Chaplain, Book 4, pag. m. 209.

(13) Jac. Warreus de Script. Hibernie, pag. 219, apud Blount, Censura Author. pag. 643.

(14) Jac. Usserius de Britan. Eccles. Primord. pag. 463, apud eund. ib.

[F] He published I know not how many Fables without shame. In his Catalogue of Scotch Writers, he not only mentions many Authors, who were English or Irish, but also many Books that were never extant. Dempsterus in suum scriptorum Scotia Catalogum pro libidine sua Anglos, Wallos, & Hibernos passim retulit, & ad assertiones suas firmandas finxit sapissimæ authoræ, opera, locos & tempora (14). — Dempster, in his Catalogue of Scotch Authors, has not only often inserted those of England, Wales, and Ireland, in a peremptory manner, but, to prove his Assertions, has also very frequently quoted imaginary Authors, fictitious Treatises, Times, and Places. See what the learned Archbishop Usser said of Dempster. Comment genus est illi homini non minus familiare, quam librorum qui nunquam scripti sunt esse in otioso deprompta cerebro recensio (15). — There is

'a sort of Invention no less familiar to him, than that of his mentioning Authors, which never existed, but in his own Brain.' Here follow the words of a third Author: 'Quod verò Dempsterus Hist. Scot. lib. vi. num. 536. affirmat Fastidium nostrum Scotorum Chronicon scripsisse, id homini nugivendolo, & in gentis suæ rebus pene semper ineptienti condonandum est (16). — What Dempster affirms in his History of Scotland, Book VI. Num. 536. That our Fastidious wrote a Chronicle of the Scots, may be pardoned in a retailer of Trifles, and a Man that is always playing the Fool with the Affairs of his own Nation.' It cannot be said, that they are only English Authors, who judge so disadvantageously of him; for their Judgment is approved by the Catholics of other Nations. I shall only quote Mr Baillet, a French Priest. 'Thomas Dempster, says he (17), has given us an Ecclesiastical History of Scotland in nineteen Books, wherein he very much speaks of the learned Men of that Country. But though he was a Man of Learning, he had not a more solid Judgment, nor a better Conscience for it. He could have wished that all learned Men had been Scotchmen; he forged several Titles of Books, that never appeared in the World, to set off the Glory of his Country, and committed several other Cheats, that have cried him down among the Learned. These are in some measure the Complaints, that Usser, Ware, Father Labbe, Sandius, Nicolas Antonius, &c. make of him.' Father Labbe observes in the place quoted by Baillet, that he never saw the Judicium de omnibus omnium Gentium & Temporum Historicis, which is ascribed to Dempster. I believe the Title is not well set down, and that Father Labbe only means the Judgment, which Dempster made of a great many Authors, and that in very few words, prefixed to his Supplement to Relinquin.

[G] Some of his Books were condemned by the Inquisition. You will find, in the Decree of the sixteenth of March 1621, Thomas Dempsteri de Antiquitate Romanorum, donec corrigatur; and in the Decree of the seventeenth of December 1623, Scotia illustrior, seu Mendicabilia repressa modesta parechasi Thomæ Dempsteri. Sir Thomas Pope Blount says (18), that in this latter Decree is found, Liber inscriptus Hiberniæ sive antiquioris Scotia vindiciæ adversus immodestam parechasi Thomæ Dempsteri. This is not to be found in my Edition (19). We see in the Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum of Father Labbe (20), that the Author of the Book intitled, Hibernia sive antiquioris Scotia vindiciæ, is called G. F. Federicus Hibernus, and that his Book was printed at Antwerp in the Year 1621, in octavo.

(16) Gul. Cave ad ann. Chr. 423, apud eund. ib.

(17) Jogem. des Savans, Tom. II, pag. 183.

* Jac. Usser. de Britan. Eccles. Primord. cap. 13, pag. 463.

† Jac. Warreus, Rer. Hibernicæ.

‡ Ph. Labbe Biblioth. Bibl. pag. 159.

† Christoph. Sand. Animadv. in Voff. pag. 175.

* Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Hisp. Præfat. pag. 34.

(18) Ubi supra, pag. 643.

(19) Thot of Geneva, 1667, printed from that of Rome of the same Year.

(20) Pag. 192, Edit. Rhotom. 1678: the Passage is misplaced.

DES-BARREAU (JAMES DE VALLEE, Lord), born at Paris in 1602, of a very noble Family [A], was one of the Wits of the XVIIth Century. He made a great Progress in his Studies, under the Jesuits, who, perceiving he had a Genius capable of the greatest things, endeavoured to get him into their Society; but neither he nor his Family would hearken to such a Proposal. He did not love them, and would sometimes inveigh against them very agreeably. His Intimacy with Theophile [B] no doubt contributed very much to this, as well as to the Libertinism which made him so famous. He was yet very young, when his Father procured him a Counsellor's Place in the Parliament of Paris. His Wit was admired there, though he would never report a Cause [C]. We shall see, in the Remarks, what obliged him to quit this

Post

[A] He was of a very noble Family. He was the Son of JAMES DE VALLEE Lord Des-Barreaux, who died Master of the Requests, and President of the Great Council, and Grandson of JAMES DE VALLEE, Knight, Lord des Barreaux, Chateaufort, and Chenaillen, Comptroller-General of the Finances, a Man so considered in the Reign of Henry III, and the beginning of the following Reign, that he had a great share in the Councils, and the King often held a Council at his house, and frequently wrote to him with his own hand upon important Affairs. Mr Des-Barreaux, who is the Subject of this Article, was second Cousin to Mr de Laubespine Chateaufort, Keeper of the Seals, and by his Mother's side he was first Cousin to the Countess of Bouville (1), and consequently Uncle, after the custom of Bretagne, to the Marshal de Luxembourg, and to the Duchs of Mecklenburg. Mary de Vallée, his eldest Sister, left no Children by her Marriage with the President Viole. Elizabeth de Vallée, his other Sister, was married to Mr du Boulay-Favier, Master of the Requests, Intendant in Normandy. From this Marriage proceeded two Daughters, one of which was married to Mr Talon, (2), and the other to Count de Tilieres and de Carouge.

[B] He had a great intimacy with Theophile. He was a very beautiful Youth, and it is pretended that Theophile loved him, and sometimes was jealous of him. That Poet, speaking of him, somewhere, says Valleus noster qui fuit olim meus. Some say he had abused him; but we are assured by persons, who are intimate

(1) Advocate-General, and afterwards President au Mortier, in the Parliament of Paris.

Post [D]. He was too great a Lover of Pleasure and Liberty not to think himself happy in parting with the Gown. He made abundance of French and Latin Verses, and some very pretty Songs; but he never published any thing, minding nothing but good Chear and Diversions. He was admirably entertaining at Table, known and beloved by the greatest Lords, and the most worthy Men in the Kingdom. He had his particular Friends in every Province, whom he visited very often, taking a Pleasure in changing his Quarters according to the Seasons of the Year [E]. Four or five Years before his Death, he entirely reformed his disorderly Life, paid his Debts, and gave up to his Sisters the Remainder of his Estate (a), reserving to himself an Annuity of Four thousand Livres; and retired to Chalon upon the Soane, which was, he said, the best and purest Air in France. Here he hired a small House, and was visited by the best sort of People, and particularly by the Bishop, who gave him a good Character. He died at this Place like a good Christian, in 1674. Two or three Years before his Death, he made a devout Sonnet, which is an excellent one, and known by every body [F].

Neither

ly acquainted with Mr Des-Barreaux, that he always abhorred that unnatural Sin, and that ne agens nec patiens voluit unquam interire præposteræ libidini. See the margin (3).

[C] His Father procured him a Counsellor's Place . . . he would never report a Cause. He said it was a forbidden Employment, and unworthy a Man of sense, to apply himself to unravel wrangling papers. Once he undertook to report a Cause: it was of no great Consequence; but, being pressed by the Parties concerned, he sent for them, and burnt the Writings in their presence, paying the money that was demanded.

[D] We shall see in the Remarks what obliged him to quit this Post. It was, they say, an Amour of Cardinal Richelieu with the famous Marion de Lorme, who was in love with our Des-Barreaux. I shall produce my Author. 'The Cardinal saw Marion de Lorme without being seen by her, and found her a thousand times more charming than he had imagined. He desired to know whether St Mars was loved by her, and ordered Bois-robert to find it out. The Abbot immediately gave his Eminence all the Information he desired, acquainting him, that Vanity had a greater share in Marion de Lorme's Complaisance for the King's Favourite than Love, but that she had a real tenderness for Des-Barreaux, Counsellor in the Parliament, a young man of Wit, well made, and of a lively Conversation, but debauched and impious to the last degree. The Cardinal bid Bois-robert offer Des-Barreaux, that, if he would yield up his Mistress to him, and engage her to be favourable, he would gratefully accept the Sacrifice, and do any thing to promote his Fortune that he should desire. Bois-robert discharged his Commission with the greatest address; but Des-Barreaux only answered in a jelling way, always pretending to believe the Cardinal incapable of such a weakness: this provoked the Cardinal to such degree, that he persecuted Des-Barreaux as long as he lived, and forced him to lay down his Office, and leave the Kingdom (4).

He that furnished me with some Memoirs concerning Des-Barreaux, had promised to consult this Passage in the Gallantries of the Kings of France; but a long Sickness has hindered him from doing it.

[E] He took a pleasure in changing his quarters according to the Seasons of the Year. He went to seek the best Fruits, and the best Wines, in the climates where they excelled, but especially he went in Winter to enjoy the warmth of the Sun, upon the Coasts of Provence. The three worst months of the Year, he spent at Marseilles. The House, that he called his favourite House, was in Languedoc: It was that of the Count de Clermont de Lodeve, where he used to say, good Chear and Liberty were upon their Throne. He had in Anjou the house of Lude, which was formerly the resort of the greatest Wits, and the best sort of People. He went sometimes to visit Mr de Balzac (5) upon the banks of the Charante; but his chief Post was at Chenailles upon the Loire, an agreeable House and formerly a House of Pleasure and good Chear. It belonged to one of his Uncles, and afterwards to Mr de Chenailles, his first Cousin, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris (6). I must add that sometimes the pleasures of the Mind were the cause of his Journeys, as when he went on purpose to Holland to see his Friend Mr des Cartes, and to improve by the Instructions of that great Genius (7).

[F] He made a devout Sonnet . . . which is known by every body. I shall insert it here at length.

Grand Dieu, tes jugemens sont remplis d'équité;
Toujours tu prens plaisir à nous être propice:
Mais j'ai tant fait de mal, que jamais ta bonté
Ne me pardonnera sans choquer ta justice.
Oùy, Mon Dieu, la grandeur de mon impiété
Ne laisse à ton pouvoir que le choix du supplice:
Ton intérêt s'oppose à ma félicité,
Et ta clémence même attend que je périsse.
Contente ton desir puis qu'il t'est glorieux;
Offense toy des pleurs qui coulent de mes yeux:
Tonne, frappe, il est temps, rends moi guerre pour guerre:
J'adore en périssant la raison qui t'aigrit:
Mais dessus quel endroit tombera ton tonnerre,
Que ne soit tout couvert du sang de JESUS-CHRIST.

Great God, thy Judgments equitable are:
Mercy is still thy darling Attribute:
Yet such a Wretch, so full of Guilt am I,
Thou Mercy pleads, Justice forbids to save.
Yes, yes, my God! my great Impiety
Leaves thee the choice of Punishment alone:
Thy Interest is against my Happiness,
And even thy Clemency awaits my Fall.
Then satisfy thy Glory's just demand,
And let my falling Tears provoke thy Wrath:
Now, thunder, strike, and give me War for War;
Falling, I own the Justice of the Blow:
But, marked for Vengeance, let me not despair:
Fall where thy Thunders will, the Blood of Christ is there.

The Author of the Art of speaking finds the Sonnet admirable. He inserts it in his Book as an example of the figure Rhetoricians call Epistrophe, or Consent (8). We find this Sonnet in a letter of Mr Bourfault. The Title of this letter shews it was written to Mr Des-Barreaux; who did not believe in God, but when he was sick (9). The Author mentions to him 'the death of an unhappy Woman, who was the disgrace of her Sex, and who left Children the heirs of her Infamy.' He pretends, that by her death 'God had removed the Obstacles which hindered Des-Barreaux from drawing near to him.' From hence we conclude, that this Woman had been Des-Barreaux's Mistress. He adds, 'that he did not doubt, but by the mutual ill Examples they gave one another, she had also learned from him to believe in God, only in time of sickness.' He represents to him what the Mercy of God had often done for him. 'Was is not that Mercy, says he him (10), which, in order to reclaim you from your disorders, sent you the last Sickness you had, when, touched by the greatness of your Sins, you made that Sonnet, which has procured you as much Glory, as one day it will cause Confusion to you, that, having had a Capacity of thinking so well, you should be so unhappy as to live so ill. Let us for a moment lay aside the Christian, and speak only of the honest Man. Tell me, I beseech you, whether a Man who should have said to another what you say to God, and should have basely violated his word as you do to him, could be an honest Man? . . . What are you going to do, with death that follows within two,

(a) His Share of his Father's and Mother's Estate amounted to above 400,000 Livres, besides some collateral Succession.

(1) The Collection of Des-Barreaux's Letters, published by M. yret, contains two French, and several Latin ones, from Des-Barreaux to Des-Barreaux, and one Latin one from him to Des-Barreaux.

(4) Gallantries des Rois de France, Tom. II, pag. 189, Edit. Holland. 1695.

(5) See Balzac's Letter to him of Oct. 12, 1641: it is the 20th of the 2d Book of his Lettres Choisies: the Cousin he mentions, that would not marry again, is doubtless the Countess of Bouville.

(6) He retired to the Hague for his Religion, in 1694.

(7) Baillet Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. II, pag. 176.

(8) Art of Speaking, lib. 2, cap. 3, pag. 100, Dutch Edit. 1679.

(9) Lettres Nouvelles de Mr Bourfault, pag. 18, Dutch Edit. 1698.

(10) Ibid. pag. 21.

Neither his Friends nor Relations can deny that he was a great Libertine

(11) Ib. pag. 22.

two steps of you, to day at the Capuchins, to-morrow at the Menims, but seek what you ought to shun, and, if I dare say so, insult God where others adore him (11). He refers him to the Fable of the sick Falcon, and maintains 'that if there is any thing in the World more extravagant than not to believe in God, it is to have the weakness to invoke him without believing in him; and as he is no more God when we are sick than when we are well, there is neither more nor less reason to believe in him one time than another (12). He supposes this to be the answer of the Falcon's Dam; and declares, 'that he knows none but Æsop that could put such a judicious Answer into her Mouth.' Lastly, he earnestly exhorts Mr Des-Barreaux not to weary the Divine Mercy. Note, the Fable of the Falcon, or, to say better, of the Kite, runs thus in the new Edition of Phædrus.

(12) Ib. pag. 24.

Multos cum menses ægrotasset milvius,
Nec jam videret esse vitæ spem suæ,
Matrem rogabat, sancta circumiret loca,
Et pro salute vota faceret maxima.
Faciam, inquit, fili; sed opem ne non impetrem
Vehementer vereor; sed qui delubra omnia
Vastando, cuncta polluisti altaria
Sacrificiis nullis parcens, nunc quid vis rogem (13)?

(13) See the Phædrus, printed at Amsterdam, 1698, pag. 325, of the Commentary of Goussier, Appendix. Feb. 7, in Edit. P. Bussm.

Kite had lain ill three months or more.
And all the Quacks had giv'n him o're.
Mamma be calls, then thus began,
All Fleß is Grass, and Life a Span,
Eut Prayers, perhaps, may still prevail,
The Gods can cure, when Doctors fail.
I'd pray, my Son, Mamma reply'd,
But fear, alas, to be deny'd.
They'll say, this sudden Reformation,
Is nought but base Dissimulation.

(14) They are in the time Edition of Nevelet.

I do not find this Fable among those which are attributed immediately to Æsop in Nevelet's Edition; but I have found it among those, which are turned into Verse by an anonymous Author (14), and which he gives as the genuine Fables of Æsop: but I can see no footsteps in it of the Thought Mr Boursault mentions, and which he believes Æsop alone capable of inspiring. This is by the by.

(15) Rom. x., 24.

He is in the right to say, that it would be the utmost Extravagance to direct Prayers to a Deity, that we do not believe to exist; but I do not know that ever Des-Barreaux was guilty of such a Folly. St Paul seems to suppose, that such an Extravagance is not to be found among Men. How shall they call, says he (15), on him, in whom they have not believed? It seems to me possible enough that those, who are come to no positive Determination, either for or against the Existence of God, should address their Prayers and Vows to him upon the sight of imminent Danger. Now this is the Condition of almost all the Incredulous. They doubt of the Being of a God; they do not clearly know that he exists; but then they are not certain that he does not exist. The Bishop of Tournay begins his Reflections upon Religion with this Thought. It is natural for such Men, at the approach of Death, to take the surest side, and ad majorem Cautelam to recommend themselves to the Divine Favour and Mercy (16): They hope for something from their Prayers, in case there is a Being than hears them, and can help them; and they have nothing to fear in case there is no such Being. But if any one was arrived to such a degree of Infidelity, as to be firmly perverted of meer Atheism, and should continue in that Persuasion till he is seized by a dangerous Sickness, I do not conceive it possible for such a one, from the bottom of his heart, to call upon God. Let us not imagine then, that Des-Barreaux fell into the Extravagance he is charged with of crying to God, without believing there was a God; but rather say, that his Custom of praying to God in his Sickness is a sign that either in the time of his health he did not doubt of the Existence of God, as the Memoirs which are sent me, assure me, or that, at most, he made a Problem of it, the affirmative of which he embraced when he was afraid he should die. His Inclination to Pleasure made him return to his former Course and Language, when his health was restored. This does not prove that he was really an Atheist. It only proves, either that he rejected all the particular Doctrines of positive Religion, or that, thro' a Principle of Pride, he was afraid of being rallied for quitting the Title of a Free-thinker, if he did not continue to talk as a Libertine. It is probable enough that those who, in Company, affect to oppose the most common Truths of Religion, say more than they think. Vanity has a greater share than Conscience in their Disputes: they imagine the singularity or boldness of the Sentiments they maintain will procure them the Reputation of great Wits. Thus they are tempted, against their own Persuasion, to expose the difficulties, to which the Doctrines of Providence, and the Gospel are subject. By little and little, they get a habit of impious Talk, and, if their Vanity is attended with a sensual Life, they make a swift Progress in Wickedness. This ill habit, contracted on one hand under the guidance of Pride, and on the other prompted by Sensuality, deadens the Impressions of Education. I mean that it suppresses the sense of those Truths they learnt in their Infancy concerning the Deity, Heaven, and Hell. But it is not a Faith quite extinguished; it is only fire concealed in the Ashes. They perceive the Activity of it, as soon as they reflect within themselves, and particularly on the approach of any Danger. Then they are more afraid than other men (17); nay, they grow superstitious. The remembrance of having expressed more contempt for holy Things, than they were convinced they deserved, and of having endeavoured to destroy their Power upon the mind, redoubles their uneasiness. It is seldom ever known that a grave Man, free from sensuality, and the Vanity of the World, argued, in Company, for Impiety, even tho', by a long series of profound, but ill conducted, Meditations of Things, he has inwardly rejected all Religion. Such a Man is so far from banishing out of the Minds of young People the Doctrines which may preserve them from Debauchery, so far from desiring to inspire them with his Opinions, which they might make an ill use of, or which might deprive them of the comfort, which the hopes of a happy Eternity make them feel in their miseries, that he would rather strengthen their belief in that respect from a principle of Charity and Generosity. He keeps his Sentiments either entirely to himself, or communicates them only to Persons, whom he thinks capable of receiving them without injury. This is the practice of speculative Atheists, who have not been spoiled by Vanity or Vice (18). The unhappiness of having been too much struck with a certain Principle, and following its Consequences too far, has led them to a certain Persuasion. The grace of God may reclaim them from it, at the sight of Death; but, without that Grace, they persist in their indolence in the midst of Diseases and Storms; and, if they conform to the funeral Ceremonies of the Church, it is to free their Relations from any Inconvenience on account of such Refusal. This inclines me to believe, that Libertines, such as Des-Barreaux, are not much perverted of the Truth of what they say. They have but a little examined things; they have learnt some objections, which they are always harping upon; they talk out of a swaggering Principle, and in time of danger believe themselves (19). Mr de Balzac has drawn the just Character of them, when he ridiculed a Grammarian of Gascogne, who heftored the Deity, and yet upon every little thing would fall into the most timorous Superstition. His words are so fine both in Verse and Prose that I cannot forbear relating them. 'Audisti in quotidianis Comædiis Pyrgopolinicus partes bellè agere. Audisti usurpantem crebro, sibique affingentem Virgilianum illud:

(16) See Remark [E] of the Article BION (BORISTRE-NITA).

(17) See, before, the Passage of CHARRON, in the Rem [I] of his Article.

(18) See the Rem. [C] of the Article VAYER, at the End.

(19) See the Article of BION (BORISTRE-NITA), Rem. [E]; and the Article HE-NALT.

Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
Atque metus omnes & inexorabile fatum
Subject pedibus, stetitque Acherontis avari.

Ne vobis imponat verborum illa magnificentia: Hic Trio & Recitator Virgilianus est, non Philoprophus Virgilianus.

(b) This, and whatever, in the Remarks, is not warranted by a public Citation, is taken from Memoirs which come from a good Hand, the Original of which I keep by me.

tine [G]; but they pretend that common Fame, according to Custom, has aggravated Matters [H], and that towards the Close of his Life he acknowledged the Truth of Religion; and as to other things they maintained, that according to the World he was always a good Man, and a Man of Honour, that he had an honest Heart, was kind, courteous, charitable, a good Friend, generous, and liberal (b). He was never married, nor had any Brother, but only two Sisters (c).

(c) See Rem. [A].

Virgilianus. Meticulosissimum omnium animal timet etiam non timenda. Neque ignem modo sed suspicionem quoque ignis, & fumum & longinquo volentem, & sublustriorem umbram timet.

Vilis Grammaticus, gentis pars fœda togatæ,
Impuro tantum ore ferox, ne credite verbis,
Corde pavet gelido, quamvis verba ardua jactet
Sæpius, & tragicas effundat in æra voces.
Non furor huic constans, non Numina fortiter odit,
Intrepidusque Polos audet ridere tonantes,
Ut quondam Capaneus Thebana ad mœnia pugnant,
Cum non arma Jovis flammæque timeret Olympi.
Hic dubii imbellis ventura pericula casus,
Et simulachra malorum, & larvas horret inanes,
Contemptor placidique Jovis Cœlique fereni.

Quas non ille aras humili formidine tactâ
Mente peter, quos non Superos in vota vocabit,
Si videat maris iratos insurgere fluctus,
Sentiat aut propriis ardere incendia venis,
Insolite ve urgeri oppressum pondere pectus,
Æger, inops animi, atque instantis victima Fati (20)?

(20) Balzac, Ep. Select. p. m. 279.

You have heard him daily at some part of a ranting Play, and repeating these lines of Virgil, which he has had the Impudence to ascribe to himself.

Happy the Man who studying Nature's Laws,
Thro' known effects, can trace the secret Cause;
His Mind possessing in a quiet State,
Fearless of Fortune, and resign'd to Fate.

DRYDEN.

Let not his Rhodomontade impose upon you, tho' he may at and repeat what Virgil has wrote, he will never reason like him. Fear is his predominant Passion, even when there is no danger nigh. He is not only terrified at the sight, but at the name of Fire: a smoke rising at a distance, or the shadow of a Pest in the Moon-shiny-night, make him tremble as tho' he had got an Ague.

Grammarian Vile! of base Plebeian mould,
In Soul how tim'rous! and in Tongue how bold!
In Buskins tread, in Tragic numbers roar,
Yet thy base Fear's a Comedy all o'er:
Defy the Thunder of a sleeping God,
And stand as fast at the imperial Nod.
Not like Capaneus on the Theban Plain,
Who unappall'd provoked the Thunderers train.
The empty Forms and Phantoms of the night,
The Dreams of danger or of ill's affright,
In mild Serenity securely rave,
With Arrogance condemn the peaceful Wave;
But if a Tempest rouse the angry Flood,
Or wastful Fires boil feverish in thy Blood,
All wild with fears that labour in thy Breast,
To every Sbrine, and every God a jest,
Low, prostrate low, for Mercy shalt thou crave,
A base distressed Victim of the Grave.

We may observe, upon this Occasion, that many Persons, who are thoroughly persuaded of the Truth of the Christian Religion, yet forget their Vows, when the danger is over. From hence comes the Proverb, Passato il pericolo gabbato il Santo. How many Orthodox Sinners are there, who, when they are in danger of being cast away, or dying by a Distemper, promise Almighty God, how religiously they will live if they escape? They do escape, and live as ill as ever. Would not one think they allude to those human Laws, which dispense with promises obtained by Force, in Prison, by an Enemy that holds a pistol to your Throat; or, in a word, when a Man is seized with a just fear, meta cadente in constantem virum.

[G] His Friends cannot deny he was a great Libertine. They say he was not averse to the Truths of Christianity, and that he wished he could have been persuaded of them; but he pretended there was nothing so difficult to a Man of Wit as to believe. He was born a Catholic, but he had no manner of Faith in the Worship or Doctrines of the Romish Religion; and he used to say, if the Scriptures and Gospel are the Rule of our Belief and Actions, then there was no better Religion than the Reformed.

[H] But they pretend that common Fame has aggravated Matters. Many, without knowing him, spoke of him as an impious Man, and an Atheist: but the Truth is, that, excepting some fallies in the heat of Dispute, when he pushed his Argument too far, he never made it appear that he denied the existence of God. He was sometimes too free in his loose Songs. This is the import of the Memoirs, which have been communicated to me. In the second Edition of the Menagiana, there is a thing which I think deserves no Credit; for it is told every where, and imputed to a thousand different People. However this is Mr Menage's Story. That one Day Mr Des-Barreaux and Mr D'Elbeuf, being together in Lent, were resolved to eat Flesh, but they could get nothing but Eggs, of which they had an Omelette made: Whilst they were eating it, there happened so terrible a Storm of Thunder, that they thought the House where they were would have been overthrown. Monsieur Des-Barreaux, without being concerned in the least, opened the Window and threw out the Dish, crying out, what a Noise is here for an Omelette (21). I give no more Credit to another Story I have heard. It is pretended, that Des-Barreaux, being very ill, sent for the Priests with as much Diligence as if he had been an old Votary. His Bed was surrounded with the holy Water, the holy Candles, the Crucifix and Images, and all the Apparatus of the Romish Devotion. Some body asking him how he did, he answered You may judge of the ill Condition of my Body and Soul by the train that surrounds me. It is probable they have forged this Story upon the Model of the answer Pericles made, when he suffered an old Woman's Remedy to hang about his Neck. Ο γυναιξὶς Θεοῦ ἐν ταῖς νηκτοῖς διαπορισσῶς ἐν ἀπὸς τῶν τυχῶν ἀνέστηται τὰ πόνη καὶ κινεμένα τοῖς τὰ σώματος ἀδελφῶν, ἐξίσταται τῆς ἀρετῆς, ἰσθρῶκεν ὅτι νοσῶν ὁ Περικλῆς ἐπισκοπῶν τινὶ τῶν φίλων δεξιᾶς περιπαλῶν ἐπὶ τῶν γυναικῶν τὸ πρῶτον πειρητημένον, ὡς σφόδρα κακῶς ἔχων ὅπου καὶ ταύτην ὑπὸ μνησιν τῆς ἀδελφίας. Scriptum reliquit in Ethica Theophrastus, ubi disputat an mutantur cum fortuna mores, & corporis agitata affectibus deficiant a virtute, agrum Periclem amico culpam, qui ipsum invisebat, amuletum ostendisse à mulieribus ex collo suo suspensum, quasi, quum eas etiam toleraret ineptias, graviter admodum aegrotaret (22). — Theophrastus in his

* A Pancake made of Eggs.

(21) Menagiana, pag. 240, 241, Edit. 2, of Holl.

(22) Plutarch, in Pericle, pag. 173. A.

Ethica, tabere be bapdes this Question, Whether a change of Fortune creates a change of Manners; or whether the Affections of the Body have any Moral effect on the Mind, reports, that Pericles in his sickness shewed to a Friend, who came to see him, an Amulet which some old Woman had hung about his Neck, intimating that he must be in a very bad way when he suffered himself to be amused with such fooleries. What I am going to relate, is taken from the Letters of Guy Patin. I am just informed, that the Libertine Mr Des-Barreaux is dead, a fine Soul before God, if he had believed in him! At least he spoke like a Man who had no Faith in the Affairs of the other World, but he has infected abundance of young Men with his Libertinism; his Conversation was dangerous and contagious to the Public: it is said he was tinctured with Irreligion before he went into Italy, but at his return he was perfected in it. One wittily said, his too frequent Conversation with the Monks had spoiled him, not with the Anchores of the Thebaid, or those good Souls who apply themselves to Devotion and Study, but those who are in such Plenty in the Cities of Italy, who think of no

(23) It is the 40th Letter. See Tom. III, pag. 203.

(24) Letter 407.

'thing less than of God.' As Patia wrote this the twenty eighth of May 1666 (23), it is plain he went upon a false report of Des-Barreaux's Death. He was not undeceived the eighteenth of June following; for thus he writes in a Letter dated that Day (24). 'They say nothing of Des-Barreaux, I know not where he is at present. He was of the Sect of Créminius: he took no care of his Soul, and but little of his Body. He has corrupted the Minds of a great many young Men, who were infatuated by that 'Libertine.' What he wrote four Years after concerning St Pavin, shews that he had discovered the falsity of his News, for he speaks of Des-Barreaux as alive and doing penance. Here died lately, says he (25), a great Servant of God, called Mr de St Pavin, a great Friend of Des-Barreaux, who is another very illustrious Israelite, si credere fas est. — If you will believe it. This Discourse I think plainly intimates, that these two famous Libertines were willing the World should think they were converted, and thus the event would soon have proved contrary to Mr Boileau's predictions, who had put the Conversion of St Pavin among the Moral Impossibilities.

Avant qu'un tel dessein m'entre dans la pensée,
On pourra voir la Seine à la Saint Jean glacée, Arnaut à Charenton devenir Huguenot,
Saint Sorlin Janféniste, & SAINT PAVIN BIGOT.

(25) Boileau, Sat. 1, ver. 125.

Sooner may the Seine be frozen over at Midsummer, Arnaut of Charenton turn Huguenot, St Sorlin a Janfénist, and St Pavin a Bigot.

No doubt St Pavin was still in a bad way when Boileau said this of him. Whence comes it then that the learned Hadrian Valesius places the Conversion of St Pavin on the Day of Theophile's Death? He was certainly mistaken. See the Valesiana (27); where you will find something also concerning our Des-Barreaux. 'When I was young, I saw Messieurs Des-Barreaux and Bardouville, who were great Friends; they were the Disciples of Theophile. . . . As to Des-Barreaux, after he had made himself much talked of at Paris, and perceiving old-age creeping upon him, he devoted himself to Religion. Somebody, who did not believe this change of Life proceeded from a Principle of Piety, made this invidious Epigram upon him:

Des-Barreaux ce vieux débauché
Affecte une Réforme austère:
Il ne s'est pourtant retranché
Que ce qu'il ne sauroit plus faire (28).

So Des-Barreaux in Vice grown old,
His Strength decay'd and Vigour spent,
Is by his feeble Members told Repentance is his Punishment.

(27) Pag. 325,
Dutch Edit.

(28) Ibid. pag.
31. Valesiana.

DIACCETO. Look for JACCETIUS.

DIAGORAS, a famous Wrestler of the Isle of Rhodes, reckoned one of his Ancestors among the most illustrious Men of Antiquity [A]. The Glory he obtained by his Victories in the public Games of Greece, became very remarkable by his Sons and Grandsons also carrying away the Crowns there (a). He once brought two of his Sons with him thither; they obtained the Crown, and taking their Father upon their Shoulders, carried him through an incredible multitude of Spectators, who threw whole handfuls of Flowers upon them, applauding their Glory and Success (b). Some Authors say, he was so transported with Joy upon this Occasion, that he died of it [B]. But there is reason to think this is false [C]. The Time he lived in may be seen in one

(a) See Rem. [C] of the Article BERENICE, Daughter, Sister, and Mother, &c.

(b) Taken from Pausanias, lib. 6, pag. 184.

[A] He reckoned among his Ancestors one of the most illustrious Men of Antiquity. I mean that he was descended from a Daughter of Aristomenes, the greatest Hero that was among the Messenians. This Aristomenes had given two of his Daughters in Marriage, a third remaining with him. Damagetus, King of Salamis, in the Island of Rhodes, desired her, the Delphic Oracle having advised him to marry the Daughter of the honestest Man in Greece. Aristomenes not only granted him his Daughters, but brought her himself to Rhodes. Damagetus had by her a Son, named Diagoras. If Pausanias, who has furnished me with this Account (1), means that Diagoras the Wrestler, Father and Grandfather of so many victorious Wrestlers, was the Son of Damagetus and of the Daughter of Aristomenes, he did not consult Chronology well; on one side he says (2), Death prevented Aristomenes from visiting Arctus and Praortes, the former King of Lydia, and Son of Gyges; the latter King of the Medes; and in another place (3), he assures us, that Dorieus, the Son of Diagoras the Wrestler, lived in the Time of Conon the Athenian General. Now the Reign of this Arctus extends from the second Year of the XXVth Olympiad, to the third Year of the XXXVth (4). Praortes reigned from the second Year of the XXXIst Olympiad, to the last Year of the XXXVth, and Conon flourished in the XCVth Olympiad, or thereabout; therefore it is not probable that Dorieus, Cotemporary with this Conon, should be the Son of a Man, whose Father married under the Reign of Praortes. See the Remarks [D] and [F].

(1) Lib. 4, pag. 134.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Lib. 6, pag. 185.

(4) See Calvisius.

Note, That by examining the Greek of Pausanias, a little better than Romulus Amosius, his Latin Translator, examined it, we find he says, That Diagoras the Wrestler, was the Son of one Damagetus, whose Father was named Dorieus (5), and was the Son of Damagetus and of the Daughter of Aristomenes. [B] Some Authors say he was so transported with joy that he died with it. I believe this is only to be found in Aulus Gellius among the Ancients; and that it is he, who in this respect ought to be reckoned

(5) It is τῷ Δωριέῳ in the Editions of Pausanias, lib. 4; but, according to the Conjecture of Camerarius, it should be read Δωριέως, as in the sixth Book.

the Original of an infinite number of Moderns, who have cited this Instance every time they have mentioned Joy, as capable of causing Death. When I say that Aulus Gellius was their Original, I do not mean that they have all consulted him; he is the immediate Original of some, and by reduction of all the rest. These are his words, in which he does not merely relate the matter of fact, as Pausanias does; but, without doubt, he adds some Rhetorical Embellishments. 'De Rhodio etiam Diagoras celebrata historia est. Is Diagoras tres filios adolescentes habuit, unum pugilem, alterum pancratiastem, tertium luctatorem; eoque omnes vidit vincere coronari eodem Olympiae die: & quum ibi eum tres adolescentes amplexi, coronis suis in caput patris positis, suaviarentur, quumque populus gratulabundus flores undique in eum jaceret: ibi in studio, inspectante populo, in osculis atque in manibus filiorum animam efflavit (6). — There is a famous Story of Diagoras the Rhodian. This Diagoras had three Sons, who were Combatants in the Olympic Games, all of whom he saw crowned Victors on the same day; after which the three Sons, embracing their Father, placed their Crowns on his Head, whilst the People congratulated him with all the Marks of Honour. The Father was so transported that he died in the Stadium, in the Arms and Endearments of his Sons, in the Sight of all the People.'

[C] We have reason to believe that this is false. The Fact was too singular to have been omitted by those, who have spoken of Diagoras at large. I cannot imagine that Pausanias, who speaks so tediously of him (7), and with several Digressions, could have passed over in Silence a Death of that nature, if he had heard it talked of as a certain Event. Now, without doubt, he would have heard of it, if the thing had been true. Note, he not only explains to us the Situation of the Statues erected to Diagoras, his Sons and Grandsons, and touches upon several particular Circumstances relating to that Family, but also speaks of that glorious Day, when he was honoured with so many Applauses and Congratulations on his Sons Victory.

(6) Aulus Gell. Noct. Atticar. lib. 3, cap. 15.

(7) Lib. 6, pag. 184.

of the Authors cited by Moreri [D]; but those Authors do not say there are various Reports of the Cause of his Death, though Moreri affirms it [E].

Since the first printing of this Article, I have found an Ode in Pindar's Works in Honour of Diagoras. It informs us (c), that this Wrestler had twice obtained the Victory in the Rhodian Games, four times in the Isthmian, and twice in the Nemean Games; and that he had been victorious in the Games celebrated at Aibens, at Argos, in Arcadia, at Thebes, in Boeotia, in the Isle of Ægina, at Pellene (d), and at Megara. That Ode was made on the Crown of the Pugilate, which he obtained in the Olympic Games in the LXXIXth Olympiad (e). His Father Damagetus and Tlepolemus, the Founder of the Rhodians, and the Stock of the Family, are not forgotten. It may be said, on the contrary, that Pindar's Digression about Tlepolemus's Adventures is somewhat prolix. However, we are informed by it, that our Diagoras descended from Jupiter [F]. Others say his Extraction was immediately divine

(c) Pindar. Ode 7, Olympior.

(d) Six times.

(e) See Benedictus in Pindar. pag. 123.

Could he on this occasion have omitted this Remark, that Diagoras died of Joy under the Flowers they threw upon him, and under the good Wishes of the Assembly: therefore we may take Pausanias's Silence for a Proof of Aulus Gellius's Want of Discernment. Cicero and Plutarch afford us another Proof: they both relate what was said to Diagoras on the Day of that famous Victory. A Lacedæmonian came up to him, and exhorted him not to lose so fair an opportunity of dying. What need had there been of such a Remonstrance, if he had indeed died of Joy? Would he not have prevented that Lacedæmonian's Saying, and taken due Care, that neither Cicero, Plutarch, or any other Moralist, should ever be able to cite Diagoras in the manner they have done: they have cited him, not as a Man that died for Joy, in the Height of his Happiness, but as a Man whom they advised to die at such a Conjunction. Is not this a convincing Proof against Aulus Gellius? I must observe, that Cicero and Plutarch relate so differently what the Lacedæmonian said, that Light and Darknels are not more contrary. They agree only in their general Drift, which is to prove, that Death ought not to be grievous to those who are in the Enjoyment of great Happiness. Die, Diagoras, for thou wilt immediately go to Heaven. Secundis suis rebus volet etiam mori, non enim tam cumulus bonorum iucundus esse potest, quam molesta decessio. Hanc sententiam significare videtur Laconis illa vox, qui quum Rhodus Diagoras Olympionices nobilis uno die duos suos filios victores Olympiæ vidisset, accessit ad senem. & gratulatus, morere, Diagora, inquit. Nunc enim in celum ascensus es. Magna hæc & nimium fortasse. Græci putant, vel tum potius putabant. Ique qui hoc Diagoræ dixit permagnum exultans patrem quum duobus filiis treis Olympionicas una ex domo prodire, cunctari illum diutius in vita fortunæ obiectum inutile putabat ipse (8). . . . He would chuse to die in his Prosperity; for the Tide of Success is not so pleasing as it's Ebb is troublesome: which seems to be the meaning of that Saying of the Lacedæmonian, who, when Diagoras, of Rhodes, a noble Victor in the Olympian Games, saw his two Sons crowned at the same place, came to him, and congratulating him, said, Now die, Diagoras, and thou shalt go to Heaven. The Greeks perhaps think, or rather than thought, an Instance of this nature even too grand; and he who spoke it esteemed it prodigious, that a Father, and two Sons, should be Victors in the Olympic Games, and that a longer Life would be no Reward to him, since it would expose him to the Caprice of Fortune. This was the Compliment according to Cicero: Plutarch has it thus: Die, Diagoras, for thou canst never go to Heaven. Οὐ γὰρ (ὡς Αἰγὼς ἔφασκεν) χαλεπωτάτος ἐστὶν ὁ τὸν εὐτυχύνον θάνατος, ἀλλὰ μαχαριώτατος εἰς ἀθάνατον ὡς αὐτὴν τὰς εὐτυχίας καλῶν ἰδόμενον τῶν ἀγαθῶν καὶ τυχῶν μετὰ βέλους ἀπολιπόν. διδόντα μὲν οὐδὲν ἄλλο τὸν εὐτυχεῖν ἔχοντα, ἐπιδόνα δ' οὐδὲν καὶ θυγατέρας, ἀπαρσάμενον, κατὰ θυμὸν (εἶπε) Διαγόρας, κ. εἰς τὸν Ὀλυμπον ἀναέρων. Non enim (ut Alopus ait) mors est felicius acerbius, verum beatissima: quæ res bonorum virorum lætas securo loco deposuit, & fortuna declinavit conversionem. Melius ergo Lacon ille qui Olympionices Diagoram, quum spectasset filios ille victores Olympiæ, spectasset etiam nepotes ex filiis & filiabus, salutans, Morere, Diagora, inquit: non enim in celum ascensus es (9). For Death is not (as Alopus said) the greatest Calamity, but the greatest Blessing, to the Favonrites of Fortune, fixing their Happiness on a solid Foundation, and placing it out of the reach of Fortune. With good reason therefore did the Spartan compliment Diagoras a Victor in the Olympic Games, who saw his Sons also crowned, and Grandsons both from sons and daughters, in this manner. Now die, Diagoras; thou shalt never mount the Skies. I must confess the Lacedæmonian's Reasoning is obscure to me, turn it which way you will, either to Cicero or Plutarch's Sense: I should understand it best according to the latter. I should imagine he argued in this manner: You are arrived at the highest pitch of Glory you can aspire to: for you must not flatter your self, that if you lived much longer you should ascend to Heaven. Die then, that you may not run the risque of a Fall. I desire those who have nothing more important to do, to examine all this. Volaterran makes an Innovation in it. Diagoras Rhodus cum se victorem duosque Olympionicas filios vidisset, Nunc ait tibi Diagora moriendum, ne amplius Olympiam ascendas, quod sane præ gaudio accidit: Autores Plin. Gellius (10). — Diagoras the Rhodian, having been himself Victor in the Olympic Games, and seen his two Sons crowned with the same Success, Now die, Diagoras, said he, and never more go up to Olympia, which he did in Excess of Joy: my Authors are Pliny and A. Gellius. The Subject will afford many subtil and learned Observations: for my part, I shall only quote the Poet Terence, who makes one of his Actors say, Nunc est profecto interfici cum me perpeti possum, Ne hoc gaudium contaminet vita aegritudine aliaque.

(10) Volaterran. lib. 15, pag. 539. Pliny says nothing of this, and Aulus Gellius does not tell it in this manner.

(11) Terent. Eunuch. Act. III. Scen. V. ver. 3.

[D] The time he lived in may be seen in one of the Authors cited by Moreri. Not exactly, but in general Terms thus. Dorieus, the third Son of Diagoras, was expelled Rhodes with his Brother Pisidorus. They retired to Thurium in Italy: for which reason, when they were crowned, at the Games, the public Crier called them Thurians. Dorieus returned to Rhodes, when the Faction that drove him thence had no longer the Ascendant. He embraced openly the Lacedæmonian Party in the War of Peloponnesus, fitted out Ships at his own Charge, and fought like a Lion against the Athenians. They hated him to such a Degree, that, having taken him Prisoner, they resolved to be very severe with him; but the Assembly were struck with his Presence: and being touched with Pity to see a Person captive, whose Glory had been so eminent, they set him at Liberty (12). The Lacedæmonians were not so generous: they took him as he was travelling near Peloponnesus, at the time the Rhodians, by the Instigation of Conon made an Alliance with the Persians and Athenians, and treated him as a State-Criminal, that is, they put him to Death. Conon brought off the Rhodians from the Alliance with the Lacedæmonians (13) in the CXVth Olympiad (14); whereby may be known, in general, at what time Diagoras lived.

(11) Terent. Eunuch. Act. III. Scen. V. ver. 3.

(12) Pausanias, lib. 6, pag. 184, 185.

(13) Andronicus in Comment. Rerum Atticarum, apud Pausaniam. Ibid.

(14) Diodorus Siculus, lib. 14.

(15) These are the four Authors Moreri cites.

[E] But those Authors do not say . . . what Moreri affirms. If Plutarch, Pausanias, Aulus Gellius, and Cicero (15), related a little differently the Cause of Diagoras's Death, as Mr Moreri assures us, some must have attributed his Death to one Cause, and some to another; but they do not do this. Aulus Gellius makes him die of Joy; the other three say nothing at all of his Death.

[F] Our Diagoras descended from Jupiter. For Tlepolemus was the Son of Hercules, and of Astydemia divine [G]. That Ode of Pindar, written in golden Letters, was placed in Minerva's Temple (f).

(8) Plut. in P. Iopeida, pag. 297. A, B.

(f) Ibid.

(16) Pindar. Ode 7. Olymp.

(17) See Benediculus in Pindar. pag. 129.

(a) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, & 2. Diodor. Siculus, lib. 13, cap. 6. Laëtant. de Ira Dei, cap. 9, & multi alii.

nia the Daughter of Amyntor (16). Some say that Amyntor also derived his Extraction from Jupiter (17); and thus Diagoras might have traced his Genealogy up to the greatest of the Gods, both by male and female Line, beginning with Telephus.

[G] Others say that his Extradition was immediately divine. An ancient Scholiast says, there was a Tradition that Diagoras was the Son of Mercury, which happened in this manner: His Mother taking a walk in the Country, and finding herself incommoded with the excessive Heat, retired into the Shade of a Wood to repose herself; Mercury, to whom the Wood was consecrated, took hold of that Opportunity and enjoyed the Woman, and she was delivered of Diagoras.

DIAGORAS, surnamed the Atheist (a), lived in the XCIII Olympiad [A]. He may be called an Athenian Philosopher, for he philosophized in that City; but he was not a Native of it. The Isle of Melos, one of the Cyclades, or the City of Melia in Caria, was the Place of his Birth [B]. An insatiable and excessive Fondness for a Production of his own Mind hurried him into Impiety [C]. He was one of the most barefaced and determined Atheists in the World; using no equivocating Subterfuges, but boldly denying there were any Gods [D]. The Athenians summoned him

[A] He lived in the XCIII Olympiad. It was then that he left the Country of the Athenians, for fear of being punished for his Atheism (1). Therefore Eusebius is mistaken when he places him under the LXXIVth Olympiad. Scaliger (2) took notice of this Fault, wherein he finds sixty six Years misreckoned: He ought to have said sixty seven; for he observes, that in the second Year of the XCIII Olympiad, the Athenians promised a Talent to him that should kill Diagoras, and two Talents to any one that should bring him alive. Now Eusebius places Diagoras under the third Year of the LXXIVth Olympiad; so that he is mistaken by sixty seven Years. Vossius (3) has not avoided the same Error. Laëtantius is more mistaken in another sense, that is, by making Diagoras less ancient than he was. He not only makes him live after Epicurus, but also after the Ages in which Philosophy flourished. He places him in the times when that Science was decayed. Verum his postea temporibus quibus jam philosophia desoluerat, extitit Athenis quidam Diagoras, qui nullam esse omnino Deum diceret, ob eamque sententiam nominatus est Atheos (4). — But afterwards when Philosophy had ceased to flourish, there appeared at Athens one Diagoras, who entirely denied the Being of a God, and for his Doctrine was surnamed the ATHEIST.

[B] The Isle of Melos . . . or the City of Melia . . . were the place of his Birth. He was surnamed Melius, the Melian. This Epithet is given him by Cicero (5), Ælian (6), and Diogenes Laërtius (7). Eusebius (8), who calls him the Melian, is mistaken, as is also Vossius, who makes him an Athenian. I say he makes him an Athenian; for, after speaking of Diagoras the Philosopher, he adds, puto eandem esse Diagoram Atheniensem, qui reliquit sermones Phrygiis (9). — I take him to be the same Diagoras who wrote the Sermones Phrygiis. He quotes Tatian's words, who says, that Diagoras was of Athens. Διὰ τὸν Ἀθηναῖον ἢν. Ctesyllus (10) speaks only of one Diagoras of Athens, who is the same that is cited by Tatian; so that, in all probability, as Tatian had no other in view than Diagoras surnamed the Atheist, we may conclude they none of them knew of what Country he was. Volætan and Benediculus have followed Eusebius's Error, the former in the fifteenth Book of his Compilation, and the other in his Commentary upon Pindar (11).

[C] An Insatiable . . . hurried him into Impiety. It happened in this manner. He took a pleasure to make Verses, and had composed a Poem, which a Poet stole from him. He prosecuted the Thief, who swore he had not taken it, and presently after published it as his own, which gained him a great Reputation. Diagoras, considering that the Person, who had done him this injury, was not only unpunished for this Theft, and Perjury, but had also got Glory by it, concluded there could be no Providence or any Deity, and wrote Books to prove it. This Story is told us by the Account Hesychius Illustrius (12) gives. It must be confessed, never was Author more fond of his own Perfor-

ras. No body, since Hercules, was born after this manner. Ὅς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀπ' Ἡρακλέους ἀγέλαται τοῖς ὕστεροις γένεσθαι, they are the Words of the Scholiast (18). Benediculus has translated them very obscurely, qui primus, says he (19), ab Hercule tantus dicitur habitus. Note, it is very true, that they did say, that, after Hercules, there was no Woman that had a Child by Jupiter (20); but it is not true that this was said of all the other Gods, with respect to the whole time that passed between Hercules and Diagoras; the latter was alive in the LXXIXth Olympiad, long after the Birth of Romulus, the Fruit of the Embraces of the God Mars and Rhea Silvia.

mances than Diagoras, or that ever durst rate them at such a Price. What, because Diagoras is deprived of the Glory he promised himself from one of his Books, must the Universe suffer for it, must all Nature be robbed of her Governor and Preserver? What proportion is there in this? Let it not be said that my Reflexion is forced. I grant there is something wrong and aggravated in this turn; but I maintain that Diagoras would not have argued as he did, if he had not had a very particular and intimate Affection for what he lost. I know not whether ever the Prosperity of a wicked Man made those question a Providence, who shared in that Prosperity, or who at least never received any damage from it. We shall see, in the following Remark, other Causes of Diagoras's Impiety.

[D] Boldly denying there were any Gods. In this manner his Doctrines are characterized, when they would distinguish them from those of Protagoras, who only looked on Religion as a Problematical thing. In hac questione plerique, quod maxime verisimile est, & quo omnes duce natura venimur, deos esse dixerunt: dubitare se Protagoras; NULLOS ESSE OMNINO Deos Melius & Theodorus Cyrenæicus putaverunt (13). — The generality of those, who have been engaged in this Controversy, have agreeably to the light of Nature maintained the Existence of a GOD; Protagoras made it a doubt; Diagoras the Melian, and Theodorus the Cyrenæian thought there was no such thing. Therefore it is very probable Valerius Maximus is mistaken when he says, Diagoras was banished Athens for saying, he did not know whether there were any Gods, and that, if there were any, he knew nothing of their nature. Athenienses Diagoram Philosophum populerunt, quia scribere ausus fuerat, primum ignorare se an Dii essent: deinde, si sint, quales sint (14). This agrees perfectly well to Protagoras, but not to Diagoras, so that we may suppose Valerius Maximus took the one for the other (15): which is an usual thing with him. Mr Moreri copies him without distrust, and according to his Custom is guilty of many Omissions. See the Passage of Athenagoras below (16), and the Remark [G], where we shall say something of the Title of a Book of Diagoras against the Deity. What Sextus Empiricus observes, is worth our Consideration. Diagoras had been superstitious to the last Degree, and had begun his Poem in a devout manner; but as soon as he perceived that the perjured Man, who had wronged him, escaped unpunished, he maintained there was no God. Διὰ τὸν ἄνθρωπον δὲ ὁ Μήλιος, διδουμένης αὐτῷ, ὡς φασὶν, τὸ πρῶτον γενόμενος, ὡς εἴτις, καὶ ἄλλος δεισιδαιμονῶν, ὅς γε καὶ τῆς ποιήσεως αὐτῷ καθήκετο τὴν τρίτον τέτον κατὰ δαίμονα καὶ τύχην πάντα τελεῖται ἀδικηθεῖς δὲ ὑπὸ τινος ἐπιπονήσαντος καὶ μηδὲν ἐνεκα τῶν παθόντος, μεθινομήσαντο εἰς τὸ λέγειν μὴ εἶναι θεόν. Diagoras autem Melius, qui fuit, ut dicunt, primum Dithyrambicus, ut si quis

(18) See the Greek Summary of Pindar's 7th Olympic Ode, pag. 77. Oxford Edit. 1698.

(19) Benediculus, in Pindar. pag. 123.

(20) See the Remark [N] of the Article HERCULES.

(1) Diodor. Sic. lib. 13, cap. 6.

(2) Ad n. 1535, pag. 101.

(3) Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pag. 436.

(4) Laëtantius de Ira Dei, cap. 9.

(5) De Natura Deorum, lib. 1.

(6) Var. Hist. lib. 2, cap. 23.

(7) In Diogene, lib. 6, n. 59.

(8) In Odyss. lib. 3.

(9) Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pag. 436.

(10) Theatr. Sophist. pag. 72.

(11) Benediculus in Pindar. Ode 7, Olymp. pag. 123.

(12) In Diagoras.

(13) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, initio. He says in the same Book: Quid Diagoras, Atheos qui dictus est, postea quæ Theodorus, nonne aperte Deorum naturam sustulerunt?

Nam Abderites quidem Protagoras . . . cum in principio libri sui se posuisset, de Dii neque ut non sint habere dicere, Atheniensem iussu urbe atque agro est exterminatus. See Laëtantius de Ira Dei, cap. 9.

(14) Val. Max. lib. 1, cap. 12, sub. fin.

(15) See Leontius, Emendat. lib. 11, cap. 12.

(16) Citat. (35).

(b) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 13, pag. 611.

(c) Athen. lib. 13, pag. 611.

(17) Sext. Empiric. adversus Mathematic. pag. 318.

(18) Scholiast. Arist. in Nub. Act. III, Scen. I.

(19) "Ο: Χρηματα παραδιδόντες τὴν καὶ ἀποστρέφοντες εἰς ἀθίαν ἐργασίαν. Having lodged some Effects with a certain Person, and being defrauded thereof, he turned Atheist. Ibid.

(20) *Η διότι μῆλον ἐτολμῶσαν Ἀττικοί. Ibid.

(21) Schol. Arist. in Avib. fol. 193, verso. Edit. Florent. 1525.

(22) Perhaps he should have said, Pellonians, that is, the Inhabitants of Pellene, a Town in Attica, according to Stephanus Byzantinus.

(23) *Εν ἧ ἐπακέρυεν καὶ αὐτὸν καὶ τὸς ἐκιδόντας Πελαγονεῖς. In which Edit they professed him, and the Inhabitants of Pellene, who published his Writings. Schol. Aristoph. in Avib. folio 193, verso.

(24) Idem. in Nub. Act. 7, Scen. 1. fol. 78.

(25) Διεβέβηται δὲ ἐπὶ ἀθίαν οἱ Μελῖαι ἀπὸ Διαγόρου. Id. ib.

(26) In Nub. Act. 3, Scen. 1.

(27) Diod. Sicul. lib. 13, cap. 6.

to give an Account of his Doctrine, but he fled, and they set a Price upon his Head (b). They promised, by Sound of Trumpet, a Talent to any body that should kill him, and two Talents to bring him alive; and they ordered that Decree to be engraved on a Pillar of Brass. Their Severity extended very far [E]; but they could not take him; for he took Shipping, and was cast away (c). Tatian (d) says, he was punished for having divulged the Athenian Mysteries [F]. It is the Conjecture of some alius superstitiosus, qui etiam poësim suam inchoavit hoc modo, A Dæmone & fortuna fiunt omnia. Injuria autem affectus ab aliquo qui pejeraverat, & propterea nihil passus fuerat, eo deductus est ut diceret non esse Deum (17). — Diagoras the Melian, a Ditbyrambic Poet by report, was at first addicted to Superstition, and no one more so; He began his Poems in this manner,

On Jove and Fate all human things depend.

But having received an Injury from a Villain, who triumphed unpunished in his Perjury, he was induced to maintain there was no God. The Scholiast upon Aristophanes assures us, that Diagoras, who before was very religious, was precipitated into Impiety, by having lost, in a fraudulent way, what he had deposited with a Man he confided in. Διαγόρης ὁ Μήλιος ὅς τὸ περὶ τὸν ἦν θεοσεβὴς, παρκαταθήκην ὑπὸ τινος ἀποστρέψας ἐπὶ τὸ ἀθεῖον ἐξέδραμεν (18). This Deposit did not consist in Verses, but in Effects or Money (19). The same Scholiast says, Diagoras became an Atheist, because the Athenians had subdued his Country (20). To this I think we may refer what the same Scholiast relates in another place; that the Edict of Proscription against this impious Man for divulging the Mysteries, and hindering People from entering themselves into them, was chiefly published at the taking of Melos; for before that time he did not hinder any Body from initiating themselves. The Edict promised one Talent to whoever should kill him, and two Talents if he was brought alive. Οὕτω γὰρ ἐκέρυξαν τὸν μὲν ἀποκτείναντα αὐτὸν ταλαντὸν λαμβάνειν. τὸν δὲ ἀγαγόντα δύο. ἐκέρυχθη δὲ τὸ τοῦ διὰ τὸ ἀσεβὲς αὐτῷ ἐπεὶ τὰ μυστήρια πᾶσι διηγείτο κοινοποιῶν αὐτὰ. καὶ τὸς βυλομένους μυσεῖσθαι ἀποτρέπων καθάπερ Κρατερὸς ἰσορεῖ. ἐκκεκρυκται δὲ μέλιστα ὑπὸ τὴν ἀλωσιν τῆς Μήλου ἐδὲν γὰρ καλύει πρῶτον (21). Craterus did not forget this Edict in his Collection of the Athenian Decrees. We have just now seen that the Scholiast upon Aristophanes cites this Collection. He cites it also in his Notes upon the Comedy of the Frogs, at the seventh Scene of the first Act. See the 105th Leaf of the Florence Edition 1525.

[E] The severity of the Athenians extended very far.] For, besides setting a price upon Diagoras's Head, as we have just observed, they persuaded all the People of Peloponnesus to do the same. This may be collected from the Scholiast upon Aristophanes, in the place I have quoted of the Notes upon the Comedy of the Frogs. He borrows it from Craterus. In another place he cites Menander, who said, in his Treatise of Mysteries, that the Proscription not only concerned Diagoras, but also all the Pellonians (22), because they had published his Work (23): the same Scholiast relates, that the Rage of the Athenians against Diagoras prompted them to do a great deal of Mischief to Melos, the Birth-place of that Atheist. *Εὖ ὅ οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι ἀγανακτήσαντες, τὴν Μήλον ἐκάκωσαν (24). The Melians got such an ill Character after the affair of Diagoras (25), that it is thought Aristophanes (26) gave Socrates the surname of Melian, for no other reason than to make him pass for an Atheist. Aristophanes* gave Socrates that name, because he had been the Disciple of Aristagoras, who was of the Isle of Melos, and because all the Melians had the Reputation of being Atheists ever since the Philosopher Diagoras, who took upon him to deny the Deity. These are the words of Madam Dacier in the Three hundred and forty ninth page of her Notes upon the Clouds of Aristophanes. She had them from the old Scholiast, and consequently it is not against her, but against him, that I am going to make an Observation. The Athenian Decree against the impious Diagoras was made the first Year of the XCIII Olympiad (27); therefore it is after that time that the Melians must have been under this ill Character. Now Socrates was at that time above fifty Years old. Therefore many Years had passed since he had heard the Lectures of Aristagoras, and it would have been a very sorry Jest to have gone so very far back, and ascribed such a remote effect to the scandals Diagoras raised against his Country. Aristagoras must have been then in his Grave, or at least very old. Who can imagine that Aristophanes should think to do Socrates a great injury, by putting the People in Mind that he had been taught by Aristagoras the Melian? I might raise another Objection. The Comedy of the Clouds, in which Socrates is called the Melian, was acted before the Proscription of Diagoras (28): but if the Scholiasts are to be believed (29), there are things in that Comedy referring to Facts later than the Proscription: so that I do not insist on this difficulty. Now, as neither Diogenes Laërtius, nor his Commentators, have any Knowledge of this Aristagoras the Melian, the Master of Socrates, I am apt to suspect that the word Aristagoras crept into the Scholia upon Aristophanes instead of Diagoras. What confirms my Conjecture is to see that the Scholiast gives two Characters to his Aristagoras, which agree with Diagoras (30): he makes him a Ditbyrambic, and a profaner of the Mysteries: in another place of the Scholia (31) it is said, that Diagoras was cotemporary with Simonides and Pindar. According to this Supposition he might have been Socrates's Master.

[F] Tatian relates that he was punished for divulging the Mysteries of the Athenians. Tatian's words are (32): Διαγόρης Ἀθηναῖος ἦν, ἀλλὰ τῶτον ἐξορχισάμενον τὰ παρ' Ἀθηναίοις μυστήρια, τιμιωρήκατε. καὶ ποῖς Φρυγίοις αὐτὰ λόγους ἐντυγχάνοντες ἡμᾶς μεμισήκατε. Diagoras Atheniensis erat, sed quod mysteria apud Athenienses probassisset, punitus est: bujus Phrygiis libros can legatis, nos odisti. I know not whether a good Rhetorician would have reasoned in this manner: You have punished a Man who profaned your Mysteries, and too you read his Books, yet you hate us. Tatian's design is to make it appear, that the hatred of the Gentiles against the Christians was unjust, and, order to prove it, he alleges two Things: one, that they had punished the profane Diagoras; the other, that they read his Books. I think it was no great Prudence to recall to their Mind the ancient Severity of the Athenians against those who ridiculed the Religion of the Greeks, as the Christians also did. And might not Tatian see that it was easy to answer him? When you are used as Diagoras was, your Books shall be used as his were: there will be curious Men, who will peruse the Writings you compose against our Gods: do not trouble your self about it. Only suffer such a Punishment as Diagoras suffered, which you put us in mind of. I hope I may be pardoned for criticising sometimes false Reasonings. It is more useful to discover it to young Readers, than to point out false Facts. But return to my Text.

Both Athenagoras and Suidas inform us of this divulging of the Athenian Mysteries. I shall here insert Suidas's Words. Τὰ δὲ μυστήρια ἔως νῦν τιλίζον, ὡς πολλὰς ἐκτρέπειν τῆς ἀρετῆς. . . . τὰ μυστήρια πᾶσι διηγείτο, κοινοποιῶν αὐτὰ, καὶ μικρὰ ποῖων καὶ τὸς βυλομένους μυσεῖσθαι ἀποτρέπων. Mysteria adeo contemnebat ut multos a virtute averteret. . . . mysteria narrabat omnibus ea vulgans & extenuans, & illos, qui volebant initiari, avertere. (33). They shew that this impious Man was not content to discover those Mysteries to every body, but he laughed at them, and dissuaded those from initiating themselves who were willing to do it. We have already cited (34) the Scholiast upon Aristophanes for this Fact. Let us see what Athenagoras says. Διαγόρα, μὲν γὰρ εἰκότως ἀδύνητα ἐπεκάλον Ἀθηναῖοι, μὴ μόνον τὸν ὄρεον ἐν μέσση κατατιθεῖν λόγον, καὶ τὰ ἐν Ἐλευσίνῃ καὶ τὰ τῶν Καβείρων δημεύοντι μυστήρια, καὶ τὸ τῷ Ἡρακλέει, ἵνα τὰς γομφύλας ἐλπί, κατακλύπτωντι ἔσαν. ἀντικρυς δὲ ἀποφαινομένων μὴδ' ὧλας εἶναι Θεῶν; Diagoræ quidem sacrilegum (d) Suidas in Διαγόρα, & Melanthes in libro de Mythesi, apud Scholiasten Aristophanis, in Avib. fol. 193, verso. Edit. Florent. 1525.

(18) The first Year of the XCIII Olympiad, and revised the next Year. See Samuel Petit. Mifcel. lib. 1, cap. 6.

(20) Sam. Petit. ibid.

(30) *Ἐπειδὴ τις Ἀρισταγόρας διθυραμβικός ἐξορχισάτο τὰ ἑλευσίνια. Schol. Aristoph. ibid.

(31) Id. ibid. fol. 105.

(32) Tatian. Orat. contra Græcos, pag. 164.

(33) Suidas in Διαγόρα.

(34) In Rem. [D], Cisar. (21).

some learned Men, that the Book he attributes to him treated of the Mysteries of the Goddess Cybele [G]. Others say, that Diagoras dictated very good Laws to the Legislator of the Mantineans [H]. Cicero mentions some prophane Repartees of Diagoras gam impietatem jure damnabant Athenienses, qui cum arcanos Orphei sermones vulgo exponerent, tum Eleusinia & Cabirorum mysteria publicabant: & Herculis statuam, ne ligna rapis coquendis deessent, dissecabant: denique palam & disertè Deum esse negabant (35). -- The Athenians justly condemned Diagoras for Atheism, since he not only publicly expounded the mysterious Discourses of Orpheus, but likewise divulged the mysteries of Ceres, and the Cabiri, clove Hercules's Statue to boil his Pulse; and, lastly, openly denied the Being of a God. Read the sequel of his discourse, in which you will find solid reasoning, founded upon the vast difference between the Christians and Diagoras. The latter laughed at the Gods, and mysteries of the Greeks, without substituting better in their room; but the Christians substituted the true Deity. I find one thing here, which very few prophane Authors have mentioned. I mean Diagoras's Treatment of an Hercules. Father Garasse speaks of it, and flourishes too much. His words are (36): 'I expect our pretended Wits will tell me, that Diagoras the Milesian

(35) Athenag. in Legat. pag. m. 36.

(36) Doctrine Curieuse, lib. 2, Sect. 5, pag. 139.

(37) It is wrong, it should be Milesian.

(38) Among all the Pagans I find only one Author, who relates this Adventure. It is the Scholiast upon Arifophanes, in Nob. Al. 3. Scen. 1. However, it is false that Antiquity praises this Action. St Epiphanius, in Anchirastis, pag. m. 106, reproaches the Heathens with not hearkening to Diagoras's Lesson; and thereupon he relates, somewhat at large, this Action of his against the Idol of Hercules. Clement Alexandrinus tells it also. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 15.

(39) I do not know that this is said of Diagoras. Valerius Maximus tells it of Pabius Claudius, lib. 1, cap. 4, n. 3.

(40) De Histor. Græc. pag. 437.

(41) Έννεσθων ε Διαγόρας λυπηθείς, έγραψε τις αποπυγίζοντας λόγους. Έκπασιον έχοντας της περι το θετον δεύης. Quam ob rem maxime Diagoras λόγους έscribit αποπυγίζοντας que deificationis euliam a communi de Dis persuasione continebant. H. F. B. Illustrius, in Diagoras, de For. fine Hadriani Junii Emilii Portus, the Translator of Suidas, saith, que continent refutationem opinionis de divino numine.

thrown down the Gods from Heaven, into the Abyss of nothingness; according to that of Emilius Portus, he boasted, he had levelled the Ramparts that Religion was fortified by. Perhaps his Book was levelled at Cybele, as Vossius pretends; at Cybele I say, the Mother of the Gods, a Goddess all covered with Towers.

Qualis Berecynthia mater

Invehitur curru Phrygiæ TURRITA per urbes,
Læta Deum partu, centum complexa nepotes,
Omnes cœlicolas, omnes supera alta tenentes (42).

(42) Virg. Æn. lib. 6, ver. 785.

High as the Mother of the Gods in Place,
And proud, like her, of an immortal Race;
Then when, in pomp, she makes the Phrygian round,
With Golden Turrets on her Temples crown'd;
An hundred Gods her sweeping train supply,
Her Offspring all, and all command the Sky.

DRYDEN.

Perhaps he imagined that, by destroying the Mother, he destroyed the whole Family, without taking the trouble of attacking each God, one after another. According to this conjecture, which does not appear to me very solid, Tatian might easily be reconciled with Suidas, and Hesychius, concerning the Title of Diagoras's Book.

[H] Others say that he dictated very just Laws . . . to the Legislator of the Mantineans.] There will be nothing in this Remark but what deserves our Attention. Ælian, having said (43), that the Laws of Mantineia were most just, and as good as the Laws of the Locrians, Cretans, Lacedæmonians, and Athenians, adds, that he, who gave these Laws to the people of Mantineia, was Nicodorus the Wrestler, very famous for his Victories: but, in his old age, applying himself to the framing of Laws, he did his Country a much more useful service, than the Proclamations of the Prize, he was honoured with, could do (44). Ός της ηλικίας, και μετά την άδελφειαν και νομοθέτης αυτοίς έγένετο, μακρότερον άμεινον πολιτευσάμενος τη πατρίδι των κληρονομήτων των τοίς σοδοίς. Ætatis sue tempore, έx αλλία pugilatione legislator eis extitit, longe utiliorem se patriæ in ea re præstans, quam quum publice victor in stadiis proclamaretur (45). This is not all: Ælian observes that, according to the common Opinion, those Laws were composed by Diagoras, who gave them ready drawn up to his Friend Nicodorus; in short, Ælian declares that he could say a great deal of Nicodorus, but he forbears, least the Praises he should bestow on him, should seem to belong also to Diagoras. This is very remarkable. A downright open Atheist giving Laws to a State, as just as the Laws of Solon or Lycurgus. On the other side, behold a Priest, who sets up for an Historian, and who suppresses the Praise that Nicodorus has justly deserved, who suppresses it, I say, for fear the Glory should redound to Diagoras. Not that Diagoras did not deserve to partake of the Praise; but he denied the Deity, and consequently the Historian must not be equitable to him; he must prevaricate with the Laws of History, since by this he deprives an Atheist of what is due to him. One would be more astonished at this depraved Morality, if it was not remembered, that a Pagan Priest is the Author of it. Wretched Men! you look upon yourselves as necessary to the Deity; you think he stands in need of the political use you make of Injuries and Applauses. You would not think so, if you had any Faith in the Oracles of Job (46).

(43) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 2, cap. 22.

(44) The Greek Cities accounted themselves most happy and glorious, when any of their Inhabitants carried away the Prize at the public Games.

(45) Ælian. ubi supra, cap. 23.

I must observe here a strange whim of the Civilian Baudouin. He gives an account of the Legislator of the Mantineans, and then makes this Reflexion: That Impiety is not only a great grievance to the Laws, but also the ruin of States; and that it is rather to be witheld, there were no Laws, no Government, no Society, than that the Administration of Justice should be in the hands of Impiety; that he will always maintain, the Laws of Diagoras are to be suspected. Narrat Ælianús, quendam olim pugilem Nicodorum apud Mantineas, (46) Chap. xiii, ver. 7.

goras [I]. Some say, the impious Diagoras owed his Liberty to Democritus [K]. Peter Gregory of Toulouse is guilty of a strange Blunder, to imagine that Diagoras was accused of having stolen the Poems of another Author [L]. Clemens Alexandrinus was not

Mantinenfes factum esse præstantissimum Legislatorem: nec alio quàm Diagoræ athei hominis consilio ulum esse, ab eoque leges accepisse, quas ferret. De Diocletiano, & ipsi adeo Romani juris auctoribus, idem dici posse videtur. Ego verò in ea perisso sententia, magnam esse & legum labem, & civitatum perniciem, impietatem: & potiusquam hæc jus dicat, optandum esse, nullam planè esse jurisdictionem, nullam legem, civitatem nullam. Fremant licet Epicuræi hujus ætatis legulei: ego tamen Diagoræ leges suspectas esse contendam (47). — Ælian speaks of one Nicodorus, who, from a famed Wrestler, became an excellent Lawgiver at Mantineæ, who never consulted any Person but Diagoras the Atheist, from whom he received his Laws. The same may probably be said of Dioclesian, and the Founders of the Roman Laws. But I am confirmed in my Opinion, that Impiety is a great blemish to Laws, and detriment to Society, and it were rather to be wished there were no Laws, no Society, than that the executive Power should be lodged in the hands of an impious Man. Let pettifoggish Epicuræans bawl: I shall still maintain, that the Laws of Diagoras are suspicious. An accurate Man would not have spoken in this manner, but would have set down with more care what ought to be distinguished. If those who administer Justice, either by enacting of Laws, or by the execution of the Edicts and Ordinances of the Legislator, were both Atheists and open Enemies to Piety and Virtue, it is certain it would be better to live without Laws and without Tribunals, than to be subject to such a Jurisdiction: but if, notwithstanding their Atheism, they were zealous for the public Good, and endeavoured to promote the Execution of such Laws as they judged most proper to restrain offenders, to prevent disputes, to maintain the Rights of Widows and Orphans, faithfulness in Trade, peace in Families, &c. Who doubts that it would be incomparably more beneficial to live under such Legislators, or such Judges, than without any Jurisdiction at all: but, the better to know what wrong notions Baudouin had, when he composed this part of his work, it is sufficient to consider two things, one, that having no other knowledge of Diagoras's Laws than what he had acquired by reading Ælian, he does not scruple to say they are to be suspected, and nevertheless Ælian, though never so much inclined not to do Diagoras Justice, had extolled them exceedingly. The second thing to be considered is, that Baudouin compares the Emperor Dioclesian, and the Authors of the Roman Laws, with the Mantinean Legislator, directed by our Diagoras. He admires the fine Laws they made, and only wonders that such impious Men could form so excellent a Work, and yet three Lines after he tells us, that it were better to have no Laws, nor any Policy, than that they should be framed by Impiety, that is by the Emperors who persecuted the Christians. Equidem cum sæpe cogito, in rebus civilibus præstantissimos fuisse leges, quos hæcenus Ecclesiæ hostes acerrimos fuisse dixi: & eorum quotidie nomina & tituli in iis, quos sæpe volvimus, libris Juris Civilis occurrant, sæpe etiam attonitus obstupesco tam & à vera religione averfam esse sapientiam (ut vocantur) hominum mentem, tamque omnium propè regnorum imperiorumque omnem constitutionem esse à recta pietate alienam & abhorrentem: ut quos aliqui prudentissimos nomothetas laudare solemus, insanos carnifices in hac causa excrari cogamur (48). — Indeed when I reflect, that those, whom I have hitherto called the most inveterate Enemies to the Church, have, in civil Matters, been excellent Legislators; and that their Names and Titles are often recorded in the Books of Civil-Law, I am often amazed, that the Minds of Wise Men, as they are named, should be so averse to true Religion, and that the Constitution of almost all States and Empires should be so contradictory to the Rules of Piety, that they, who in other Respects must be allowed most prudent Lawgivers, must in this case be branded with the Character of inhuman Butchers. The more I read, the more I am persuaded that it is not so difficult to find Writers that have good and fine Thoughts, as it is to meet with those who express their Conceptions without entangling themselves in false reasoning. A good Logician is scarcer than is imagined.

[I] Cicero relates some prophane Repartees of Diagoras. Being at Samothracia, they shewed him several Pictures of Persons that had escaped Shipwreck, which had been vowed and hung up in the Temples: look upon them, say they to him, you who do not believe there is a Providence. I do not wonder, answered he, to see the Pictures of those who have escaped; it is customary to draw such Persons; but those are no where represented, who perished at Sea. Diagoras cum Samothraciam venisset, Atheos ille qui dicitur, atque ei quidam amicus, tu qui Deos putas humana negligere, nonne animadvertis ex his tabellis pictis quam multi votis vim tempestatis effugerint, in portumque salvi pervenerint? Ita fit, inquit, illi enim nusquam picti sunt qui naufragium fecerunt, in marique perierunt (49). Diogenes Laërtius tells it after a much better manner: he discovers at first sight the sting of it; but as Cicero relates the Story, it is almost impossible to understand the sense of it. Θαυμάζοντες γὰρ ἐν Σαμοθράκῃ ἀναθήματα, ἔχον, πολλὰ δὲ ἐν τῇ πᾶσι καὶ οἱ μὴ σωθέντες ἀντιθέσαν. Admirante quodam ea quæ in Samothracia sunt donaria, longe, ait, plura essent si qui servati non sunt ea dedicassent (50). — As a certain Person seemed surprized at the number of votive Pictures which hung up in Samothracia, he said there would be many more, had those that have been lost hung them up. What follows is better displayed. Diagoras being on board a Ship in a terrible Storm, in the height of it they told him, they well deserved what they suffered for taking such an impious Wretch as he was on Board: he replied, behold the great number of Vessels that are in the same Tempest with ours; do you think that I am also in every one of those Ships. Idemque cum ei naviganti vectores adversa tempestate timidi & perterriti dicerent, non injuria sibi illud accidere qui illum in eandem navem receperunt, ostendit eis in eodem cursu multas alias laborantes, quasvisque num etiam in iis navibus Diagoram vehi crederent (51). This should teach the Faithful and the Orthodox not to urge all sorts of Unbelievers with the Reasons, which are drawn from the common course of Providence.

[K] Some say he owed his Liberty to Democritus. It is reported that That Philosopher, seeing him exposed to sale among other Slaves, examined him, and found such fine natural Parts in him, that he bought him for ten thousand Drachms, and made him, not his Servant, but his Disciple (52).

[L] Peter Gregory thought he was charged with stealing the Poems of another. These are his words. Diagoras Teleclidis filius impius dictus, quod plagii accusatus à Poëta quodam, de surrepto pæane à se conscripto ejurasset furto se non teneri, atque ille paulo post prolatum in lucem pæane secunda fama hominum uteretur, quamobrem & mœstus Diagoras orationes scripsit ἀποπρυγίζοντας, quasi de turribus præcipitantes dicas, quæ defectionis causam à communi de Diis persuasione continebant, ut scribit Helychius Milesius Illustrius (53). — Diagoras, Son of Teleclides, called the Impious, being accused by a certain Poet of stealing from him an Hymn, forswore the Plagiarism: the other soon after published the Hymn, whereby he gained a great Applause. Diagoras, uneasy at this Success, wrote his Orations ἀποπρυγίζοντες, (that is, casting from the summit of a Tower), which, as Helychius Illustrius writes, contained his Reasons for dissenting from the received Opinion concerning the Gods. Peter Gregory did not understand the Author he cites. Diagoras was not the Accused, but the Accuser. This falsehood deserves to be taken notice of; for one may be deceived by it. An innocent Man purging himself upon Oath, and calling the Gods to witness his Innocency, is likely enough to be terribly provoked, when he sees his Calumniator triumphing over him. Wherefore the Narration of Peter Gregory, being almost as probable as that of Helychius, is very capable of misleading People from the Truth.

[M] Clemens

(47.) Franciscus Balthusius ad Edicta Principum Romanorum de Christianis, pag. m. 111.

(49) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3, cap. 37.

(50) Diog. Laërt. in Diagora, lib. 6, n. 59.

(51) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 3, cap. 37.

(52) Suidas, & Helych. Illust. in Διαγόρας.

(53) Syntagm. Juris Universi, lib. 36, sub fin. pag. m. 745. Thomasius observes this Error in Tractatu de Plagio Literario, n. 405.

(48) Id. ibid.

not well acquainted with the Doctrines of this Philosopher [M].

[M] Clemens Alexandrinus was not well acquainted with the Doctrine of this Philosopher. He thought that Diagoras, and some others who passed for Atheists, had that ill Character only for knowing more distinctly the falsity of the Pagan Religion; and he wonders that Men of so regular Lives should be diffamed as impious Men (54). They were not arrived, says he, to the Knowledge of the Truth, but they were sensible of Error, and that sense is a good Seed to produce the Light of Truth. Εἰ καὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν αὐτὴν μὴ νενοκώτας, ἀλλὰ τὴν πλάνην γε ὑποπτεύοντες ὅπερ ἡ σμικρὴν εἰς ἀληθείας φρονήσεως ζώουσιν ἀναφύεται σπέρμα: Etiam si veritatem ipsam non consideraverint, sed errorem quidem certe suspicati sint; quod quidem non parvum exoritur semen ad excitandam scintillam intelligentiæ veritatis (55). This is a Doctrine very different from the Judgment of a great many People, who imagine it is more easy to convert a superstitious Pagan to the true Religion than an Atheist. Muret (56) approves the Opinion of that Father concerning the Cause of Diagoras, and some others, being reckoned Atheists: but it is certain they are mistaken. Diagoras had the Reputation of an Atheist, because he rejected absolutely, and without any restriction, the Existence of a Deity. See, above, the Remark [D]. What is said in the Scholia upon Aristophanes deserves no regard. Διαγώρεος καλῶν ποιητῆς ἄθεος, ὃς καὶ κατὰ δαιμόνια εἰσενέειτο: That is, Diagoras the Poet, an Atheist, who also introduced new Gods. Such a Testimony as this, opposed to the contrary Authorities, is like setting a Fly against an Elephant.

(56) Muret. Variar. Lect. lib. 10, cap. 17.

DIANA (JOHN NICOLAS DE), a Jesuit, is only known to me by the Persecution he suffered for a Sermon he preached on St Lucifer. The Inquisitors of Sardinia condemned this Sermon, and shewed great Animosity against that Jesuit. He did not submit to their Judgment; but employed so many Methods to vindicate himself, that at last he obtained the Victory, in the thirteenth Year of the Process. Diego Arze-Reynoso, Inquisitor-General, annulled all the Proceedings of the Tribunal of Sardinia, and punished some of the Assessors; and, the better to restore Diana's Reputation, he created him Qualificator of the Supreme Council of the Inquisition, clearing him from all Disgrace by a Decree issued out the nineteenth of December 1653 (a). I shall set down part of it [A], that the Iniquities of those Proceedings may be seen, which are not always unpunished.

(a) Taken from a Writing, intituled, Libellus supplicis à Patribus Societatis Jesu Provinciae Toletanae Catholico Hispaniarum Regi oblatum Madridi anno 1696, mense Aprilii, contra Libellum supplicem eidem regiae Majestati oblatum à R. R. P. P. Carmelitis ad studendum ut universis imponatur silentium circa antiquitatem Ordinis Carmelatici tenendum, post Decretum Inquisitionis Toletanae contra 14 Volumina de Actis Sanctorum.

[A] He was cleared by a Decree of the nineteenth of December 1653. I shall set down part of it. I take it from the Petition presented by the Jesuits of the Province of Toledo to the King of Spain, in the Year 1696 (1). They pretend, that the Petition, presented by the Carmelites to the same Prince, is unjust, since it tends to obtain, that silence should be kept on both sides, after the Inquisition of Toledo had condemned fourteen Volumes of the Acta Sanctorum. These Jesuits, among other things, set forth that, according to the Stile of the holy Office, it is permitted to provide against the Decrees of the Inquisition, and that, when the Inquisition has condemned any Book, it does not pretend to hinder the Author from vindicating his Sentiments. They show, that sometimes the Apology for a Book, condemned by that Tribunal, has been found so convincing, that the Inquisition has revoked its Sentence, and they prove it by the Issue of the long Process against the Jesuit John Nicolas de Diana. 'Quod ita non raro factum est ut Inquisitio edicta sua revocaverit, ac propositiones modo confixas suo pristino restituerit splendori, quin & novis approbationibus ac laudibus exornarit (2). — It is no uncommon thing that the Inquisition should re-call its Edicts, and reverse Propositions before condemned to their pristine Honour, and recommend them, moreover, by peculiar marks of Approbation.' His Reputation was stained for many Years, but, having shown the partiality of his Judges, he gloriously obtained the annulling of their Sentence. 'Per annos omnino duodecim & quinque menses gravissimè passus est optimus ille Jesuita pro defensa veritate: & fuit hæc quidem veritas densis adeo passionum obfusca nebulis ut tantum non pateretur eclipsim. Fuit auctori necesse aduersus Sardiniae Inquisitores excipere velut parciales & passioni obnoxios. Suam autem exceptionem illam & dam-natas propositiones eâ probavit Diana argumentorum energia & evidentia ut, &c (3). — For twelve Years and five Months did that good Jesuit suffer in the Cause of Truth, and so thick were the Clouds of Passion which overshadowed it, that it was well nigh eclipsed. The Author was under a necessity of excepting against the Sardinian Inquisitors, as being partial, and liable to Passion; and Diana proved his Exception, and the Propositions which had been condemned, with that force and clearness of Argument, that, &c.' And because the proceedings of the Inquisitors of Sardinia had caused great scandal, the supreme Council of the Inquisition thought themselves obliged to remove it by a public Decree, part whereof you have here. 'Ut in omni tempore præfenti perinde ac futuro constet, innote-scat atque publica fiat innocentia dicti Patris Diana; ut item illi ad quos hujus rei notitia pervenerit quique proinde scandalum fuerint passi ex processibus in illa causa commissis, & in libello impresso supra relatis, publicam hanc satisfactionem habeant super dicta præfati Patris innocentia & catholica illius in Evangelio exponendo doctrina. . . . Pariter sciant omnes quod Tribunal atque supremum sacre Inquisitionis Concilium non solum convictos contra fidem castiget, sed innocentiam etiam præmet inculpatorum, addita satisfactione publica contra notorias inde impactas injurias, ad Deum denique Dominum nostrum omnipotentem remittente dicto P. Diana, publicam ac justam vindictam de gravi sibi illata injuria per delatorem, conjuratores æmulos ac falsos testes, minisque bene affectos ministros, supplicando divinæ Majestati ejusque pie clementiæ quatenus omnium talium mentibus lucem dignetur infundere, qua illustrati errore suo cognito correctoque & peculiariter in hoc casu commissa culpa animas suas possint salvas facere, &c (4). — That the Innocence of the said Father Diana may stand confirmed, and be publicly known by all future Ages, as well as the present, that likewise those to whom the Knowledge of this Matter may come, and also they who have been injured by the Processes in that Cause carried on, as has been related in the printed Case, may have their public Satisfaction of the Innocence, and Orthodoxy of the said Father in expounding the Gospel. . . . Be it therefore known unto all Men, that the Tribunal and grand Council of the holy Inquisition do not only punish those that are convicted of Heresy, but will likewise reward the Innocent, and make them public Satisfaction for the Injuries they may suffer. Lastly, the said Father Diana resigning to GOD our Almighty Lord the public and due Punishment of the wrongs he has suffered from the Informer, Contrivers, Abettors, false Witnesses, and ill affected Persons, beseeching his divine Majesty, and holy Clemency, so to enlighten their Minds, that they might see their Error, and the Crimes they have in this case committed, and by Repentance save their Souls alive, &c. I am satisfied many Readers will be glad to see the other like Instances, which the Jesuits mention in their Petition. The first is that of Julian Archbishop of Toledo. He wrote a Book de tribus Substantiis, which was condemned by Pope Benedictus II. He justified what he had done by a vigorous Apology, and gave such strong Reasons, that the Pontiff took off the Prohibition, and commended

(1) See the Title of it in Citat. (a) of this Article.

(2) Libell. Supplex, pag. 5.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Ibid. pag. 6.

(5) Ibid. pag. 20, commended highly the Archbishop (5). The second instance is that of Stephen Fagundes a Jesuit. He published a Book (6), which was forbid to be read: but when his Apology came out intitled, Apologeticus Tractatus pro suo libro in 5 Præcepta Ecclesiæ ad questionem de latitiorum eorumque usu tempore quadragesimæ, they ordered his Book to be re-examined, and it was found that none of the condemned Propositions were worthy of Censure; so that by a new Decree of the eighteenth of April 1630, the Tribunal of the Inquisition permitted the reading of his Book. The third instance is that of the great Tostatus. Some of his Opinions having been condemned, he desired to be heard, but could not obtain it: by the Intrigues of his Enemies this Justice was denied him. He made such loud Complaints of this that it reached the Ears of Eugenius IV., who ordered Tostatus to appear personally at the Court of Rome, there to maintain his Opinions. Tostatus appeared, and made so good a Defence, that he obtained a glorious Victory (7).

(7) Libell. Supplic. pag. 21, et Proemio Apologeticæ Tostati, Part. 2.

DICÆARCHUS, a Disciple of Aristotle, composed a great Number of Books, which were very much esteemed [A]. Cicero, and his Friend Pomponius Atticus, set a great Value upon them [B], and I even believe their Esteem extended also to that Book, wherein he opposed the Immortality of the Soul [C]. Mr Moreri attributes this

[A] He composed a great number of Books which were very much esteemed. It is thought his Work upon Music contained not only the Description of the Customs and Method concerning the exercise of that Art, but also the History of the Theatrical Pieces, which had contended for the prize: therefore they judge his Treatise περί μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Musicis (1), was but a part of the Treatise περί μουσικῆς, de Musica (2). They will have it also that the Treatise περί διονυσιακῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Dionysiacis (3), and even another Treatise intitled παλαιωναιων (4), were parts of the Treatise περί μουσικῶν ἀγώνων de Certaminibus Musicis.

Jonfius says: 'Liber hic Dicæarchi περί μουσικῶν ἀγώνων de quo diximus, omnino pars fuit ejusdem operis περί μουσικῆς de Musica, quo & de ipsis antiquis Musicis atque Poëtis eorumque fabulis, de saltationibus & de certaminibus musicis eum egisse verisimile est (5). — This Treatise of Dicæarchus περί μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, of Musical Contests, of which I have been speaking, was only a part of the same Author's Treatise περί μουσικῆς, of Music, wherein it is probable he spoke about the ancient Musicians, and Poets, and their Fables, of Dances, and Musical Contests.' Such a book as this would be an excellent Repertory for the Author of an Historical Dictionary, as also Dicæarchus's Book περί βίων, de Vitis, cited by Diogenes Laërtius (6). I have the same Opinion of a Work of his intitled περί τῶν τῆς Ἑλλάδος βίῶν, de Vita Græciæ (7), where he gives a Description of Greece, and of the Laws and Customs of the Greeks. St Jerom (8) has cited this Book, and I doubt not but Porphyry had this Book in view, when he placed Dicæarchus among those who had briefly and accurately collected what concerned the Greeks (9). See in Vossius (10) the Title of some other of Dicæarchus's Works. Consult also what I am going to say.

(1) It is cited by the Scholiast upon Aristophanes, ad Vespas, folio 519, apud Jonfium de Scriptor. Hist. Philol. pag. 36.

(2) It is cited by the same Scholiast, ad Nub. fol. 99, apud Jonfium, pag. 89.

(3) It is cited by the same Scholiast, ad Aves folio 606, apud Jonfium, pag. 88.

(4) It is cited by the Scholiast, ad Vespas, folio 457, apud Jonfium, ibid.

(5) Jonfius, ibid. pag. 89.

(6) Lib. 3, in Platone.

(7) Athenæus, lib. 13, pag. 595, & lib. 14, pag. 636.

(8) Adversus Jo-vinianum, lib. 2, and not as More-ri says lib. 11.

(9) Τὸν συντό-μας τὰ καὶ ἀ-ντιβῆζε τὰ ἑλ-ληνικὰ συνα-γαγόντων. Unus eorum qui res Græcicas breviter & accurate collegunt. Porphyry, lib. 4, de Abstinent. apud Vossium de Hist. Græc. pag. 47.

(10) De Hist. Græc. pag. 46, 47.

(11) See the 18th Letter of the 7th Book to Atticus.

(12) Athenæus, lib. 13, pag. 504, cites Dicæarchus, Περὶ τῆς εἰς Τροφονίῳ κα-ταβάντος, De descensu in an-trum Trophonii.

(13) Cicero Epist. 2, lib. 6, ad Atticum.

showed it to Dionysius. He was likewise at first somewhat surprised, but having no less an Esteem for Dicæarchus than you for C. Vestorius, and I for M. Cluvius, he questioned not but that we might credit him. I took therefore the whole passage from Dicæarchus word by word. This passage is corroborated by the words of the twelfth Letter of the second Book (14): 'Dicæarchum rectè amas: luculentus homo est & civis haud paulo melior quam isti nostri ἀδικαίᾳχοι; and by these (15), Nunc profus hoc statui ut quoniam tanta controversia est Dicæarcho familiari tuo (16) cum Theophrasto amico meo, ut ille ruus τὸν ἀπακτινὸν βίῳ longe omnibus anteponat, hic autem θεωπετι-κὸν, utrique à me mos gestus esse videatur. Puto enim me Dicæarcho assatim satisfecisse. — You have reason to esteem Dicæarchus. He has an extensive Genius, and is a much more valuable member of Society than our ἀδικαίᾳχοι (unjust people): — since therefore there is such a controversy between your Dicæarchus, and my Friend Theophrastus, the former preferring a Life of Practice, the other that of Theory, I was determined to observe a due Decorum, and I imagine I have entirely satisfied Dicæarchus.' But Cicero shows no where more esteem for Dicæarchus than in the second letter of the second Book (17). He cries out O magnum hominem! see the whole passage. It is justly wondered at, that Vossius did not observe it (18). He has also omitted that of the third book of Legibus, and says nothing of the Book de interitu hominum. In the third Book de Legibus, Cicero informs us that this Philosopher had published some very good political Discourses. 'Theophrastus institutus ab Aristotele abundavit ut scitis in eo genere rerum, ab eodemque Aristotele doctus Dicæarchus huic rationi studioque non defuit. — Theophrastus, as you know, being instructed by Aristotle, abounded in Precepts of that Nature, and Dicæarchus taught by the same Aristotle spent much time in the same Study.' In another place he mentions a very curious Thing, which is, that Dicæarchus, having made a Computation of all the accidents which occasion the Death of Men, found that War destroys more Men than any other thing. 'Est Dicæarchi liber de interitu hominum, Peripatetici magni & copiosi, qui collectis ceteris causis eluvionis, pestilentiae, vastitatis, bellorum etiam repentinæ multitudinis, quarum impetu docet quædam hominum genera esse consumpta, deinde comparat quanto plures deleti sint homines hominum impetu, id est bellis & seditionibus, quam omni reliqua calamitate (19). — Dicæarchus, an eminent and copious Peripatetic, wrote a Treatise of the Death of Men, who, having collected the several causes thereof, as Deluges, Plagues, Tempests, the sudden Irruption of wild Beasts, by the Violence of which he shews some part of Mankind is taken off, then calculates how many more are cut off by the Fury of their own Species, that is, by Wars and Seditions, than by all other Calamities put together.' All this is a proof of Cicero's esteem for the Author. I shall quote a passage by and by, wherein he calls him his Delight.

[C] And I even believe their esteem extended also to that Book wherein he opposed the Immortality of the Soul. He composed two Treatises upon that subject, each divided into three Books. Dicæarchus in eo sermone, quem Corinthi habitum tribus libris exposuit doctorum hominum disputantium, primo libro multos loquentes facit, duobus Pherecratem quandam Phthiotam senem, quem ait à Deucalione ortum, differentem

(14) Ad Attic.

(15) Epist. 16, lib. 2, ad Attic.

(16) See also Epist. 13, lib. 13, ad Atticum.

(17) Ad Attic. See also the 4th Letter of the 8th Book.

(18) Rupertus, Epist. ad Reine- sum, pag. 503.

(19) Cicero de Officiis, lib. 2, cap. 5.

this to another Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon [D], the Disciple of Aristarchus: but he is wrong

• differentem inducit, nihil esse omnino animum, & hoc esse nomen totum inane, frustra & animalia & animantes appellari, neque in homine inesse animum vel animam, nec in bestia. Vimque omnem eam, qua vel agamus quid, vel sentiamus, in omnibus corporibus vivis æqualiter esse fufam, nec separabilem a corpore esse, quippe quæ nulla fit, nec sit quicquam, nisi corpus unum & simplex, ita figuratum ut temperatione naturæ vigeat & sentiat

(20) Id. Tusc. I. fol. m. 250. A.

(21) Ibid. fol. m. 250. D.

... (20). Accerrime delitiae meæ Dicæarchus contra hanc immortalitatem differuit. Is enim tres libros scripsit qui Lesbiaci vocantur quod Mitylenis sermo habetur, in quibus vult efficere animos esse mortales (21). — Dicæarchus, in his discursibus inter multos philosophos, disputans at Corinthi, quibus se dividit in tres partes, introducit in his primis fœderatim Speakers, in the other two he makes one Pherecrates of Pbibia, whom he derives from Deucalion, to argue that the Soul was nothing but an empty Name, and that the word Animal was an insignificant Term, since neither Man nor Beast had either Soul or Mind, and that the Power by which we either act or think was equally diffused through all living Bodies, inseparable from them, being nothing but a simple and uniform Body, so modelled as to move and think by the Direction of Nature. My beloved Dicæarchus has argued very warmly against this immortality. For he has wrote three Books called Lesbian, because the scene is supposed to be at Mitylene, wherein he endeavours to prove the Soul to be mortal. Cicero says in one of his Letters, that he wanted these two Books, and desires Pomponius Atticus to send them to him (22).

(22) Dicæarchi xxi. 1. utroque velim mittas. Idem, Epist. 32. lib. 13. ad Atticum.

INVINCIBLE Objection against Dicæarchus about the Immortality of the Soul.

I must observe by the way that this Opinion of Dicæarchus is unworthy a Philosopher. Such a way of arguing betrays a want of Principle, and overthrows the harmony of a System. If once you lay it down, as this Author does, that the Soul is not distinct from the Body, that it is nothing else but a Power equally common to all living Things, and which forms but one simple being with the Bodies called living; either you know not what you say, or you are obliged to maintain that this Power is always inseparable from the Body; for what is not distinct from Body is essential to Body, and, according to the first Principles, it is a Contradiction to say that a Being is ever without it's essence. From whence it plainly results, that the Power of Sensation does not cease in dead Bodies, and that the parts of living Bodies preserve each their Life and Soul when they are corrupted. Then there is no room to flatter our selves that Sensation ceases after Death, and that we shall not be subject to any pain. If a Body is capable of pain when it is placed in the Nerves, it is also capable of it, wherever it is found, either in stones or metals, in the Air or in the Sea, and if an Atom of Air was once destitute of all Thought, it seems utterly impossible that being converted into that Substance, which is called Animal Spirits, should ever make it think. This seems as impossible, as it is to give a local Preference to a Being, that has been for some time without any local Preference. So that to argue consequently, it must be concluded either that the Substance which thinks is distinct from the Body, or that all Bodies are thinking Substances; since it cannot be denied that Men have Thought. From whence it follows, according to Dicæarchus's Principle, that there are a certain number of Bodies that think. Cicero argues very ill against Dicæarchus: he pretends that according to this Philosopher, a Man must feel no pain, since he cannot feel that he has a Soul. Dicæarchum vero cum Aristoxeno æquali & condiscipulo suo doctos sanè homines omitamus, quorum alter ne condoluisset quidem unquam videtur qui animum se habere non sentiat: alter ita delectatur suis cantibus, ut eos etiam ad hæc transferre conetur (23). — I shall pass over Dicæarchus with his Cotemporary and School-fellow Aristoxenus, the one of which never seems to have been concerned at his not perceiving he had a Soul. The other is so pleased with his Fiddle, that he would make the Soul to consist in Harmony, so great a Bigot was he to his Profession. This Philosopher might easily have answered, I do not deny that Man feels, and that he is conscious of his feeling, but I deny that he knows that That, which feels in him, is a Soul distinct from Body. It is very true he does not feel it, for he knows it only by reasoning; Laërtius makes use of this fallacious Syllogism of Cicero (24).

(23) Cicero, Tusc. I. fol. 248. B. He had said, Citat. (10). that Aristoxenus, a Musician and Philosopher, made the Soul to consist in an harmonious Agreement of the Organs, hic ab artificio suo non recellit. See Laërtius, in lib. 7. cap. 13, & de Opificio Dei, cap. 16.

I just now perceive that some may prepossess themselves against the argument I have opposed to Dicæarchus's System. Which obliges me to obviate an Objection. It may be said, that Sensation may be only a Modification of Body; from whence it would follow that Matter, without losing any thing of what is essential to it, may cease to feel when it is no longer inclosed in the Organs of a living Machine. I answer, this is an absurd Doctrine; for all the modes of existence, that we have any knowledge of, are of such a Nature, that they do not cease, but only to give place to another Mode of the same kind: there is no Figure that is destroyed but by another Figure; and no Colour that is destroyed, but by another Colour (25). I confess that, according to the old Philosophy, Cold and Heat, which expel one another from a Subject, are not accidents of the same Species; but it must be owned that at least they belong to the same Genus of Qualities, that are called Tactiles: so that to argue aright, it ought to be said that no Sensation is expelled from it's Substance, but by the Introduction of some other Sensation; nothing hinders but that Sensation should be a Genus, having other Genus's under it, before we arrive at what we call species infima. According to this, my Objection loses no strength by the answer I have refused, and I shall always affirm, that if the Animal Spirits have not the Sensation out of the Nerves, which they have in them, it is because they lose it by acquiring another kind of Sensation. It will be said perhaps, that there are Modifications which cease without any other positive Modification succeeding to them, as Motion for instance; for they will say nothing of Figure, as being too plainly contrary to Dicæarchus's Axioms; but I answer, that Motion and Rest do not differ, as they suppose, after the manner of positive Modifications and Privations. Both Rest and Motion are a most real and positive local Preference: their difference consists only in external Relations which are perfectly accidental. Rest is the Duration of the same local Preference, Motion is the Acquisition of a new local Preference, and consequently that which ceases to move does not lose it's Modification without obtaining another of the same Nature; it has always a Position equal to it's Extension among the other parts of the Universe. When they can give us an example of a Body that loses one place without acquiring another, we will agree that certain Bodies may lose a Sensation without obtaining another; but as it is impossible to produce such an instance as this, we have a Right to maintain that every body that once has had a Sensation will always have it. Is not the Conversion of being to nothing impossible in the order of Nature? Would not the Conversion of a Figure into the Privation of all Figure, or the Conversion of local Preference into the Privation of all local Preference, be the Conversion of something real and positive into nothing? therefore they are impossible in the order of Nature, and therefore the Conversion of Sensation into a Privation of all Sensation is impossible, for this would be the Conversion of something real and positive into nothing. Lastly, I say that all the modes of Bodies are founded upon the essential attributes of Bodies which are the three Dimensions. This is the Reason that the loss of one Figure, or of one local Preference, is always accompanied with the Acquisition of another Figure, or of another local Preference. Extension never ceases nor is ever lost; therefore the Corruption of one of it's modes is necessarily the Generation of another; for the same Reason no Sensation can cease but by the existence of another; for by the System which I am refusing, Sensation would be a mode of Body, as well as Figure, and Place. If you would found Sensation upon some Attribute of Matter, different from the three Dimensions, and unknown to our Mind, I answer that the changes of that Attribute ought to resemble the Alterations of Extension: the latter cannot make all manner of Figure or local Preference to cease; and so the Alterations in this unknown attribute would never cause

(24) Lib. 7. cap. 13.

(25) I mean only of Bodies visible to Man.

wrong to make him the Author of several Books since Suidas, who, perhaps is the only one that mentions this Dicæarchus, ascribes no Books to him at all. This furnishes me with a Remark against Meursius [E]. There is a Passage in Pliny, which shews that Dicæarchus was employed by some Princes to take the Height of the Mountains [F]. Geography was one of his chief Studies (a), and we have a Treatise still extant that he wrote upon that Subject (b). His Book concerning the Republic of Lacedæmon was extremely honoured (c). He held it for a Maxim, that a Man ought to behave himself so as to be beloved by all, but should contract an intimate Friendship with none but good Men (d). What he found fault with in Plato deserves to be censured [G]. Vossius ought not to have imputed to him a Treatise upon Dreams 659.

(a) See Strabo, lib. 2, pag. 71, who observes that Polybius often censures Dicæarchus.

(b) It was printed at Augustus by the Care of Hæschellius, in 1600.

(c) See Remark [E].

(d) Plut. Sympo. lib. 4, Init. pag. 659.

all Sensation to cease; they would but be the passage from one Sensation to another, as the Motion of an extended Body is but the removal of it from one Place to another.

[D] Mr Moreri attributes it to another Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon. I cannot imagine how he fell into this Error; for after having cited the Passage of Cicero concerning the Impiety of Dicæarchus upon the nature of the Soul, he adds, that Tertullian does also take notice of the Error of that Philosopher. Now these are Tertullian's words produced by Moreri. Denique qui negant principalem ipsam prius animam nihil censuerunt, Messenius aliquis Dicæarchus. The Philosopher whose Error Tertullian takes notice of is Dicæarchus of Messina; why therefore does Moreri impute that Error to Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon? He heaps fault upon fault, by referring us to a great number of Authors who have mentioned Dicæarchus, since he appropriates all their Testimonies to one Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon, to whom Suidas ascribes no Book great or small, and since it cannot be denied that part of these Testimonies do not concern Dicæarchus of Messina. A learned Critic (26) thought that the Arguments of Sophocles and Euripides Tragedies, cited by Sextus Empiricus (27), are the Productions of the Grammarian Dicæarchus, mentioned by Athenæus in his first Book (28). I confess that such a work would better suit with Dicæarchus, the Grammarian of Lacedæmon, and the Disciple of Aristotle, than with Dicæarchus the Messinian, and Disciple of Aristotle; but nevertheless, when I consider that Suidas attributes no Book to the former, and that he assures us the latter was a Philosopher, Orator, and Geometrician, I rather chuse to ascribe to Aristotle's Disciple all the works that are cited under the name of Dicæarchus. If he that Athenæus speaks of in the fourteenth page of his first Book, without calling him Grammarian, whatever Reinesius says of it, was the Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon, he would rather have attributed to his Country, than to the City of Sicyon, the Invention spoken of in that place, since there are Authors which ascribe it to the City of Lacedæmon. This Invention concerns Dancing, and probably it is in the Book περί μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Musici, that Dicæarchus treated of it, and also of the Dance called the Crane (29).

[E] To whom Suidas . . . ascribes no sort of Books. This furnishes me with a Remark against Meursius. He pretends (30) that Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon wrote for excellent a Book upon the Government of Sparta, that it was read every Year before the Youth in the Assembly of the Ephori, and that the Edict for that Practice was executed for a long time. What he cites from Suidas is very just, except one Clause; which is, that Suidas speaks there of no other than Dicæarchus the Messinian. Ἐργαὶς τὴν πολιτείαν Σπαρτιατῶν. καὶ νόμος ἐτίθη ἐν Λακεδαιμονίᾳ, καὶ ἕκαστος ἔτος ἀναγινώσκεσθαι τὸν λόγον εἰς τὸ τῶν Ἐφῶρων ἀρχαίων. τὰς δὲ τὴν ἡβητικὴν ἔχοντας ἡλικίαν ἀνεγχεσθαι. καὶ τὸτο ἐκράτισσε μέγχι πολλῶν. Scripsit Republicam Spartanorum. Et Lacedæmonæ lex est lata, ut quotannis liber iste in prætorio Ephorum legeretur, & juvenis auscultaret. Idque diu obtinuit (31).

[F] Pliny says, he was employed by some Princes to take the height of the Mountains. These are his words. 'Globum tamen effici mirum est in tanta planitie maris camporumque. Cui sententia adest Dicæarchus vir in primis eruditus, regum cura permixtus montes, ex quibus altissimum prodidit Pelion. 1250 passuum ratione perpendiculari, nullam esse eam portionem universæ rotunditatis colligens (32). — It is wonderful that a Globe could be formed where there is such a flatness of Sea and Land. Which Opinion is confirmed by Dicæarchus, a Man of great Learning, who, having measured the Mountains by the direction of some Princes, found Pelion to be the highest, being 1250 Paces in perpendicular height, which he concluded to be no portion of the universal round. I wonder that Father Hardonin should not observe that this Passage is not consistent with what he cites from Geminus; for Geminus affirms (33) that, according to Dicæarchus's Calculation, Mount Cellene in Arcadia is 15 Stadia high, or thereabout, that is to say, near 1500 Paces. Then it is not true that Mount Pelion which is but 10 Stadia high was the highest Mountain Dicæarchus measured. However that be, we have here a Confirmation of what is found in Suidas, that Dicæarchus wrote a Book upon the measure of the Mountains of Peloponnesus. The Passage in Pliny had escaped the Diligence of Vossius.

[G] What he censures in Plato deserves to be censured. He blamed Plato for giving too much Power to Love, as Cicero informs us (34), and I believe his words will help us to understand those of Diogenes Laërtius, which seem to have been ill translated. Laërtius's words are (35): Λόγον δὲ πρῶτον γέγραπται αὐτὸν τὸν Φαίδρου καὶ γὰρ ἔχει μετὰ τὴν αὐτοῦ τὴν ἀρχαίαν. Δικαίτατος δὲ καὶ τὸν πρῶτον τῆς γράφης ἵλον ἐπιμεµέναι ὡς πορτικόν (36). They are translated in this manner. Phædrum primo illum scripsisse fama est, habet enim questio illa nonnihil juvenile. Porro Dicæarchus totum id scribendi genus ut grave ac molestum carpit. This Translation does no Honour to the Original: it supposes that Laërtius, after having said that there is something that betrays the young Man, in the Phædrus of Plato the Philosopher, thought to confirm what he had said by quoting a Man who looked upon that Philosopher's way of writing in that Treatise as harsh and heavy. I think it will be better to suppose that Diogenes Laërtius means thus. It is pretended that Plato's first Work was that called Phædrus, and indeed the question he examines in it favours of a young Man. Therefore Dicæarchus condemns the whole Character of that Piece, for the excessive Sallies, and impetuous Flights of Imagination he observes in it; this is what is insinuated by Cicero, as I have already said; for the Excess, which he pretends Dicæarchus charged Plato with, on account of the Power of Love, no doubt related to the Phædrus. One of the Commentators upon Cicero's Letters (37) makes use of this Passage of Laërtius, to confirm a very ingenious Conjecture. He pretends that Dicæarchus wrote a Book intitled, Φαίδρου πειρασμοί, The superfluities of the Phædrus, and that Cicero asks his Friend Atticus for this Book. Cicero expresses himself in this manner. 'Libros mihi de quibus ad te antea scripsi velim mittas, & maxime Φαίδρου πειρασμῶν & Ἑλλάδος.' Upon which Bosius makes this Note. 'Videntur his verbis duo libri Dicæarchi significari, quorum primo auctor ille multa de Phædro Platonis ut superflua & redundantia rescandenda esse docuerat: altero virorum illustrium quos Græcia tulisset vitam conscripserat, huncque librum vocarat Ἑλλάδος βίον, ut illum Φαίδρου πειρασμοί. Laërtius vulgo traditum refert Platonem (38) omnium dialogorum totam ejus scripti rationem ut nimis insolentem & fastidiosam damnasse. — I entreat you to send me those which I mentioned in a former Letter, but especially Φαίδρου πειρασμῶν, and Ἑλλάδος.' Here is Bosius's Note. 'By these words seem to be meant, the two Treatises of Dicæarchus, in the former of which that Author had shewn that many useless Parts, and superfluous Branches, were to be lopped off in Phædrum con- Plato's Phædrus; In the other he had wrote the Lives of the most celebrated Men of Greece, to which he had given the Name of Ἑλλάδος βίον, and to the former Φαίδρου πειρασμοί. Laërtius says, that it was generally reported that Plato wrote his Phædrus first, and

(31) In Element. Astronom. cap. 14, pag. 55, and Hardonin in Plin. Tom. II, pag. 217.

(34) Quem (Platonem) non injuria Dicæarchus accusat qui amoris auctoritatem tribuerit nimis.

(35) Diog. Laërt. lib. 2, in Platone, n. 38.

(36) See Remark [E] of the Article BION (Box 19, THEATRE) Citat. (8).

(37) Simeon Bosius in Epist. Cicero, ad Attic. 39, lib. 13.

(38) I relate this Passage according to the Edition of Mr Grævius. It is plain the Editors have left out three or four Words, which might be these, primus and superfluous Branches, were to be lopped off in Phædrum con-

(26) Reinesius, Epist. 69, pag. 608.

(27) Adv. Mathem. cap. 19.

(28) Pag. m. 14.

(29) See Plutarch in the Life of Theæus.

(30) Meurs. Miscell. Lacon. lib. 4, pag. 334.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) Plin. lib. 2, cap. 65.

Dreams [H]. Laëtantius does not assign the true Time he lived in [I]. I never was more surprized than to see how barren the Jesuit Jerom Ragusa [K] has been upon so illustrious a Subject as that of Dicæarchus, who has done so much Honour to Sicily, his native Country (e).

A Person, who was not pleased to make himself known, has sent me some Objections, which I shall examine. They are concerning the Argument I have proposed (f) against Dicæarchus concerning his Opinion of the Nature of the Soul [L]. This gives me

(e) He was of the City now called Messina, but formerly Messana, Suidas.

(f) In Remark [C].

(33) In Eutico.

(40) Re'nefius, Varior. Lect. lib. 3, cap. 3, pag. 377.

(41) Menag. Not. ad Diog. Laërt. lib. 3, n. 4, sub. fin.

(42) Vossius de Hist. Græcis, pag. 47.

(43) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1, cap. 3.

(44) Id. Ibid.

(45) In Remark [C], Citat. (20).

'and that Dicæarchus had condemned the manner in which all his Dialogues were wrote, as being too insolent and overbearing.' Bosius alleges the Greek of Diogenes Laërtius, and quotes a Passage out of Plutarch (39), wherein certain Descriptions inserted in the Phædrus are condemned as superfluous. See Re'nefius and Mr Menag. The former (40) thinks that Cicero asks for the Book of Phædrus, an Epicurean Philosopher, περί Θέων, and that of Dicæarchus βίος ἑλλάδος. Thus he partly agrees with, and partly differs from Bosius; but he did not know that Bosius had committed an Error here, which is his confounding Dicæarchus's Book intituled Bios, with that intituled, βίος ἑλλάδος. The first contained the Lives of illustrious Men; the second was a Description of Greece, and the Customs of the Greeks. Mr Menag has observed this Mistake (41).

[H] Vossius ought not to have attributed to him a Treatise of dreams. Let us hear Vossius's Words. 'Nec magis ambigere licet de libro quem Tullius eum de divinatione, & somniis scripsisse auctor est (42).

— Neither need we doubt concerning the Treatise which Cicero makes him to have wrote on divination and dreams.' He cites no proof of this Fact. It is probable he depended upon some Author who had said the same thing, without quoting any body for it, and he would not take the trouble to look for it in Cicero. I do no doubt but if this Particular is to be found any where in Cicero, it must be in his Book de Divinatione. Upon perusing it, I found four places concerning Dicæarchus. In the first, he assures us that he rejected all sorts of Divinations, except that of Dreams and that of Fury. 'Dicæarchus Peripateticus cætera divinationis genera fustulit, somniorum & furoris reliquit (43).' From whence I infer, that, at the worst, it must be confessed that Vossius ought to have said de divinatione ex somniis, and not de divinatione, & somniis. The second place is a confirmation of the first, and I should not have mentioned it, if it did not furnish me with an incidental reflexion. 'Nec vero unquam animus hominis naturaliter divinat nisi quum ita solutus est & vacuus, ut ei planè nihil sit cum corpore; quod aut vatibus contingit, aut dormientibus. Itaque ea duo genera à Dicæarcho probantur (44).' Either Cicero did not understand Dicæarchus's Doctrine, or the latter contradicts and does not understand himself. Can a man, who does not acknowledge any distinction between a human Soul and the Body, believe that Fanatics, Enthusiasts, and Dreamers, have Thoughts which are not material: that is to say, that in that State their Soul is perfectly disengaged from any Correspondence it had with the Body? It is certain, that if such a man should believe this, he knows not what he says, and must involve himself in an evident Contradiction. Now we have seen (45), that Dicæarchus admitted of no distinction between the Souls of living Bodies, and the living Bodies: so that if he believed, as Cicero will have it, that because in Extasies and Dreams the human Soul is perfectly disengaged from all Commerce with the Body, therefore the Divinations of Enthusiasts and Dreamers are not to be rejected, he contradicts himself and ruins his own Hypothesis by unintelligible Nonsense. But let us not condemn him before we have heard him. Perhaps his Reasons for retaining the Divinations of Extasies and Dreams, whilst he rejected all other ways of foretelling future Events, are not well related by Cicero. This Exception in favour of Dreams, and Alienations of Mind, was an ill step of Dicæarchus, and I would fain know how he extricated himself out of that plunge. The third Passage says no more than the second; however I think it not amiss to give it a place here. 'Me Peripateticorum ratio magis movebat & veteris Dicæarchi, & ejus qui nunc floret Cratippi, qui censent esse in mentibus hominum tanquam oraculum aliquod ex quo futura presentiant; si aut furore divino concitatus animus aut somno relaxatus solute moveatur ac libere (46). — There seems to me to be more weight in the Opinion of the Peripatetics, of old Dicæarchus, and of Cratippus who flourishes at present, who imagine there is in the minds of Men something like an Oracle from which they receive a knowledge of what is to happen, as when the mind is transported with a Divine Fury, or released by sleep has a full Liberty to move.' The fourth is more favourable to Vossius than any of the others. 'At nostra interest scire ea quæ eventura sint. Magnus Dicæarchi liber est nescire ea melius esse quam scire (47). — It would be of great use to know what shall happen. But Dicæarchus has largely shown it would be much better not to know, than to know.' But that book of Dicæarchus is not the same that Vossius speaks of; it is neither intituled de divinatione ex somniis, nor de divinatione & somniis, and perhaps is not different from the Book of the Descent into the Cave of Troponius. In a word, that Philosopher might have explained his Opinion upon the Subject of Divinations, in one of the Books which Vossius had already given the Title of, and therefore it was not necessary to quote, by itself, that de divinatione & somniis.

[I] Laëtantius does not assign the true time he lived in. He justly condemns Dicæarchus upon the mortality of the Soul; but he is mistaken when he charges him with being the forerunner of Democritus, with respect to that false Doctrine; for Dicæarchus having been one of Aristotle's Disciples did not flourish till long after Democritus. 'In eadem sententia fuit etiam Pythagoras antea, ejusque præceptor Pherecydes: quem Cicero tradit primum de æternitate animarum disputavisse. Qui omnes licet eloquentia excellenter; tamen in hac duntaxat contentione non minus auctoritatis habuerunt, qui contra hanc sententiam differebant, Dicæarchus primo, deinde Democritus, postremo Epicurus (48). — Pythagoras was of the same Opinion before, and his Master Pherecydes, whom Cicero mentions as the first who disputed concerning the Eternity of Souls. Who, although they were Men of great Eloquence, yet in this one Controversy, those who disputed against it, namely Dicæarchus first, then Democritus, and lastly Epicurus, had no less Authority.'

[K] I was never more surprized than at the Barrenness of the Jesuit Jerome Ragusa. His Elogia Siculorum qui veteri memoria floruerunt, printed at Avignon in 1690, contain only the Titles of a small part of Dicæarchus's Books, and an extract of Charles Stephens's. This Extract imports, that, according to that Philosopher, Mankind had no beginning, and the Soul perisheth with the Body. This latter Doctrine is agreeable to his Notions, and Cicero, cited by Charles Stephens, ascribes it to Dicæarchus, as we have seen above (49): but I know not in what Author Charles Stephens found that; the other Doctrine was also taught by that Philosopher. If the Jesuit had been content with copying Charles Stephens, he would not have committed such a gross mistake, he would not have charged him with believing, that the Dicæarchus, who held those ill Opinions, was not the Messinian (50); for Charles Stephens plainly ascribes them to that Dicæarchus. It is true, by a most gross Error, he imagines that Dicæarchus, Native of Messana, and Disciple of Aristotle, is not Dicæarchus, the Messinian, which the Jesuit ought to have reproved him for.

[L] I shall examine some Objections . . . concerning his Opinion of the Nature of the Soul. The Author of those Objections begins by explaining the System of our Philosopher. He pretends that Dicæarchus's meaning is, that living Bodies differ only from Bodies void of Life, in this, that their parts are figured and disposed after a certain Manner: he compares this Opinion with that of Des Cartes thus. If a Dog differs from a Stone, it is not that he is composed of a Body and a Soul, while the Stone is only Body; but it is solely in this, that he is composed of Parts

(46) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 2, fol. 320. B.

(47) Id. ib. C.

(48) Laëtant. Divinat. Instit. lib. 7, cap. 8. See also cap. 72 and 13.

(49) Rem. [C].

(50) Qui tamen Dicæarchum talis opinionem aliam fuisse à Dicæarcho nostro opinatur. Hier. Ragusa, pag. 94.

me an Opportunity to say something of a Dispute which has made a great Noise in England [M].

ranged after such a manner as to form a Machine; which the ranging of the Particles of a Stone does not. This is the Opinion of Mr Des Cartes. This Idea is very proper to make us understand the Opinion of Dicæarchus: We are only to suppose that he extended to all sorts of living Bodies, what the Cartesians say only with respect to Beasts: We are only to suppose that he reduces Man to the Condition of a Machine; from whence it will follow that the human Soul is not distinct from the Body, but that it is only a machinal Construction and Disposition of several parts of Matter. This being supposed, the Author of the Objections pretends that the difficulty I have started is so far from being considered as invincible, that it does not in the least affect the System of Dicæarchus. I affirmed that Dicæarchus either did not know what he said, or that he was obliged to maintain, that the Virtue, which he made the Soul to consist of, always accompanied the Body: he answers that he was obliged only to maintain that it always accompanies the living Body; he adds, that if I had always joined together these two Terms, Body and living, my Consequence might have been entirely admitted by Dicæarchus, and so would have done no injury to his System: he pretends then that Dicæarchus may deny that, because the Soul is a Virtue of living Bodies, it therefore follows that this Virtue is found in dead Bodies; for if it does consist in nothing but the machinal Disposition of certain Bodies, as he supposes, it evidently follows that it ought to cease as soon as that Disposition ceases, as soon as the machine is dissolved. Thus, continues he, a Cartesian would answer those who should maintain, that according to his Hypothesis the Souls of Beasts subsist even after they are killed: you are mistaken, would he say, for, since I suppose that it consists only in a certain Disposition of the Organs, I must necessarily suppose that it perishes as soon as that Disposition is destroyed. The Author of the Objections supposes, that it was never concluded against the Cartesians, that the Virtue of Sensation does not cease in dead Bodies, and that the Parts of living Bodies preserve in themselves their Life and Soul when they are corrupted. It is certain this Consequence is not objected to the Cartesians, but it is because they attribute no Sensation to the Soul of Brutes; for if they made it sensitive, the same difficulties, that I have objected to Dicæarchus, would fall upon them, and they would be obliged as well as he to obviate them. Lastly, he objects that what I have said, that all the Modifications we know of do not cease to be, but by making room for other Modifications of the same kind, from whence it follows that a Body, which once has had Sensations, will always continue to have them; he objects, I say, that Dicæarchus is little concerned in this, for he never attributed Life to matter, till after the requisite Modification to make it a living Body, to wit, by the various disposition of it's Parts; so that I had no right to make him ascribe Life to any part of matter after it's Dissolution, though, before and after, it is Body, but not living Body. This is the Conclusion of the Author of the Objections. Note, he does not enter the Lists in defence of the Doctrine itself of Dicæarchus. He acknowledges the Falseness and Impiety of it. His design is only to shew that I was in the wrong to charge him with Inconsistency, and that the System was justly connected together, although the Philosopher did not admit of Sensation, and an unperishable Life, in Bodies that had been once alive.

You see here the full state of the Question: the Question is to know, whether a Philosopher, who believes that there are Bodies who think, and Bodies that do not think, reasons consistently: I say he does not, and that whoever once admits that, for example, a Collection of Bones and Nerves, feels and reasons, ought to maintain, on Pain of being declared guilty of not knowing what he says, that every other System of Matter thinks, and that Thinking, which did subsist in a Combination of Matter, does still subsist under other Modifications in the separated Parts, after the Dissolution of that Combination. I shall not repeat the proofs I have already given upon this Subject; nor is it necessary to strengthen them, for the Author of the Objections has not attacked them. He has only observed that Dicæarchus ought not to trouble himself about it, considering he has declared that Matter does not begin to live till after a certain Disposition of it's Parts. But it is chiefly upon this very thing that I would charge him with not knowing what he said: he did not mean merely, by Life, breathing, eating, walking. He meant all the Operations of a Man; the Action of the five external Senses; the Imagination, Reflexion, Reasoning, &c. I maintain that he supposes what has hitherto been inconceivable to all Mankind, if he supposes that the sole Disposition of the Organs of a human Body should cause a Substance to become thinking, that never thought before. All that the Disposition of these Organs can do, is confined to local Motion, variously modified, as in a Clock; all the difference being only from more to less. But as the ranging of the several Wheels, which compose a Clock, would signify nothing to produce the effects of that Machine, if each Wheel, before it was placed after a certain Method, had not actually an impenetrable extension, the necessary Cause of Motion, as soon as it was pushed forward with a certain Degree of force: so I say also, the ranging of the Organs of a Man's body would be of no Service to produce Thought, if each Organ, before it was fixed in it's place, had not actually the faculty of thinking. Now this faculty is quite another thing from impenetrable Extension; for all you can do to this Extension by pulling, striking, or pushing it all manner of ways, is a change of Situation, the whole Nature and Essence of which you can fully conceive, without having recourse to any Sensation, and even when you deny there is any Sensation in it. There have been some great Genius's, who have shewed themselves a little too slow of Heart to believe the Distinction of the Soul of Man from the Body; but no Body that I know of ever dared hitherto to say that he clearly conceived, that, in order to make a substance pass from the privation of all thought to actual thinking, it was sufficient to put it into Motion (51), so that this change of Situation was, for instance, a sense of Joy, an Affirmation, an Idea of moral Virtue, &c. and tho' some should boast that they had a clear Conception of it, they would not deserve to be credited, and we might apply to them a Passage of Aristotle that I have quoted in another place (52). What an absurdity would it be to maintain that there are two species of Colour, one which is the Object of sight, and no more, and the other the Object both of sight and smell. It is yet more absurd to maintain that there are two Species of Roundness, one which consists merely in the parts of the Circumference of a body being equally distant from the Centre, the other, which together with that is also an Act by which the round body perceives that it exists, and fees round about it several other Bodies. It is the same absurdity to assert that there are two kinds of circular Motion, one which is nothing else but the change of Situation upon a line, the parts of which are equally distant from the Centre, the other, which together with this is an Act of Love to God, of Fear, Hope, &c. What I have said of Roundness, with respect to Vision, may be applied to all sorts of Figures, with respect to all kinds of Thought; and what I have said of circular Motion is equally strong, with respect to all other lines in which a Body can move, slowly or swiftly: and therefore we ought to conclude, that Thought is distinct from all the Modifications of Body that are come to our Knowledge, since it is distinct from all Figure, and from all change of Situation: but this not being the Question here, I shall content my self with concluding that Dicæarchus, in order to argue consistently, ought to have admitted that every System of Matter is endued with the faculty of thinking; for without that it was absurd to pretend that provided several Veins, Arteries, &c. were placed one by another as the different parts of a Machine, it would produce the Sensations of Colour, Taste, Sound, Smell, Cold, Heat, Love, Hatred, Affirmation, Negation, &c. See the Margin (53).

VOL. II.

[M] This will give me an Opportunity to say a word upon a dispute which has made much Noise in England. Methinks if I had plainly and absolutely affirmed, that no body had hitherto boasted of having a clear Idea of a Modification of Matter, which is an Act of Sensation, I should not have proceeded with Rashness; for I see in the News from the Republic of Letters, that Mr Locke, one of the profoundest Metaphysicians in the World, confesses ingenuously that a Body, endowed with

(51) Note, The Peripatetics in ascribing Thought to Beasts do not ascribe this Power to Matter, but to a substantial Form, which, according to them, is neither Matter nor Body; and which is produced anew in Matter, without being composed of Matter. So that they agree Matter never acquires Sensation or Knowledge.

(52) In the Article ARRIA-GA, Citat. (8).

(53) He believed that the Soul was the Harmony of the four Elements, Plat. de Plac. Phil. lib. 4. cap. 2. He ought then to believe, that all mixt Bodies have a Soul. For the four Elements must needs be reduced there to Harmony. But is it not as absurd to suppose, that the Harmony of the four Elements produces Thought, as to suppose that a certain Consort of Music should be a Sound that is conscious of itself, and should know the neighbouring Objects.

8 E

with Thought is an incomprehensible thing. And observe he makes this Confession in answer to an Objection, founded upon this Incomprehensibility. It was therefore very much his Interest to deny the Foundation of this Objection, from whence it must be concluded that this Confession was very sincere, and an effect of the Power of Truth, and a proof that all his utmost endeavours to comprehend the Union of Thought with a material Substance were fruitless. Now since so great a Man confesses this, is it not probable that never any Person durst boast to comprehend such an Union? This would be too general, if I added nothing more to it. Let it be observed then, that the Question, whether the Soul of Man is distinct from Matter, is part of the famous dispute between Dr Stillingfleet (54) and Mr Locke: the former maintained that Matter is incapable of thinking, and thereby became the Defender of a fundamental Article of Philosophical Orthodoxy. Among other Arguments he makes use of this, That it cannot be conceived how Matter can think (55). Mr Locke confesses the Truth of this Principle, and contents himself with denying the Consequence; for he pretends that God can do things which are incomprehensible to human Understanding, and therefore, because Man cannot comprehend, that a Portion of Matter can acquire the faculty of thinking, it does not follow that God, who is Almighty, 'cannot give if he pleases some degrees of Sense, Perception, and Thought, to certain Collections of created Matter, combined together as he thinks proper' (56). 'All the difficulties that are raised, says he (57), against the possibility of there being thinking Matter, derived from our ignorance, or the narrow Limits of our Conceptions, do not in the least affect the Power of God, if he pleases to communicate to Matter the faculty of thinking, and they do not prove that he has not actually communicated such a faculty to certain parts of Matter disposed as he thought fit, till it can be made out that it is a Contradiction to suppose such a thing.' This is a formal Confession of the Incomprehensibility of the thing, and a recourse to the Almighty Power of God, for Effects which are beyond the limits of our Understandings. It is much after the same manner that the Schoolmen suppose an Obediential Power in the Creatures, whereby God might, if he would, raise them to any State whatsoever. A Stone might become capable of the beatific Vision, and a drop of Water capable of washing away all the pollution of Original Sin. Note, That in order to confute this Obediential Power of Matter, with Respect to Knowledge, one might make use of an Argument, which it does not appear (58) that Dr Stillingfleet has made use of. That Argument always seemed to me very proper to shew the impossibility of joining Thought, and the three Dimensions, together in the same Subject. You will find the Particulars of this proof in the Book I quote (59). A passionate Divine, arguing against the Abbot de Dangeau, who had urged this Argument, criticized him as well as he could; but he only talked impertinently (60).

Consider well my expression of Philosophical Orthodoxy; for I do not pretend that, with respect to Theological, Evangelical, or Christian Orthodoxy, Dr Stillingfleet is superior to Mr Locke. To affirm that because the Soul of Man thinks, it is therefore immaterial, is, I think, right Reasoning, and is also establishing a most solid Foundation of the Immortality of our Souls, a Doctrine which ought to be considered as one of the most important Articles of true Philosophy; but this Truth, as it is grounded upon such a Principle, does not belong to Christian Theology. A Christian Divine, every Christian in general, as a Christian, believes the Immortality of the Soul, Heaven, Hell, &c. because these are Truths which God has revealed to us. It is upon this account only that his Faith is a true Act of Religion, a meritorious Act (61), acceptable to God, the State of a Child of God, and of a Disciple of Jesus Christ; and those who should believe the Immortality of the Soul, purely upon those Philosophical Ideas, which their Reason furnishes them with, would be no farther advanced in the Kingdom of God, than those who believe that the Whole is greater than its Part. Therefore since Mr Locke founds his Belief of the Immortality of the Soul upon the Scripture, he has as much Christian, Evangelical, and Theological Orthodoxy, as he can have. What he says upon this Subject is admirable (62). I shall probably cite it in some other place (63).

(58) In the Extraits of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Novemb. 1699, Art. 1.

(59) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, August, 1684, Art. VI.

(60) Ibid. Janu. 1685, pag. 12.

(61) I speak here upon the Hypothesis of the Merit of Works.

(62) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Novemb. 1699, pag. 512, and the Book intitled, Portiana, pag. 388, and following.

(63) In the last Remark of the Article PERROT (Nicolas Sieur d'Abancourt).

(54) One of the most learned Men in Europe; he died Bishop of Worcester, in 1699.

(55) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Novemb. 1699, pag. 500.

(56) Ibid. pag. 497.

(57) Ibid. pag. 500.

(a) Taken from Polyb. Histor. lib. 17, cap. 35, pag. m. 705.

DICEARCHUS, Commander of the Fleet which Philip, the last King of Macedon but one, fitted out, to attack, contrary to all Right and Justice, the Islands Cyclades. He began this unjust Enterprize by a most abominable Action; for, as if he would, at the same time, have terrified both Gods and Men, he was no sooner in a Condition to sail, than he erected two Altars, one to Impiety, and the other to Injustice, upon which he celebrated the very same Divine Service, and paid the same Homage to those two Crimes, as he would have done to the Gods. Polybius, if we had him entire, would have informed us of the Success of this War, and the Sequel of Dicearchus's Actions: the Fragments we have remaining of that Author only let us know, that this impious Wretch, engaging in a Conspiracy, expired under the Torture (a).

DIEU (LEWIS DE), Minister of Leyden, and Professor in the Walloon College, in the same City, was a very able Man, and very well versed in the Oriental Languages. He was born the seventh of April 1590, at Flushing, where his Father DANIEL DE DIEU, a Man of Merit and Quality [A], exercised the holy Ministry. He studied under Daniel Colonius, his maternal Uncle, who was Professor at Leyden, in the

[A] His Father DANIEL DE DIEU was a Man of Merit and Fortune. He was a Native of Brussels, and had been a Minister there twenty two Years: from thence he removed to serve the Church at Flushing, after the Duke of Parma had taken Brussels (1). He understood Greek, and the Oriental Languages, and could preach with great Applause in High Dutch, Italian, French, and English. He was much beloved by Sainte Aldegonde. The Netherland Churches sent him with some other Ministers, in 1588, to Queen Elizabeth to inform her of the Intrigues of the Duke of Parma, who secretly amused her with Proposals of Peace, whilst the King of Spain was fitting out a powerful Fleet against England. LEWIS DE DIEU, the Father of Daniel, was a long time Domestic to Charles V., and obtained Patents of Nobility for himself and his Posterity, as a Reward for his Services. He embraced the Reformation, and died in that Persuasion, so that his Friends were obliged to conceal his Body for six Weeks at Brussels, and then removed it to Antwerp, where it was interred by Night. He had married the Daughter of Peter van Ceulen, better known under the Name of Colonius, which his Schoolmaster gave him. This Colonius (2) insinuated himself into the favour of Robert Stephens, who advised him to go to Geneva, where he was recommended to Calvin, who instructed him in his Opinions, and exhorted him to study Divinity. He devoted himself to the Ministry, and performed the first Functions of it at Metz, where the Baron de Clermont had procured a new Church to be built. Francis de Beaucaire, Bishop of Metz, wrote a Book full of Reflections upon the Ministers and their Doctrine. Colonius vigorously confuted him in a few words. This Answer was published at Geneva in 1566. He was persecuted by the Catholics of Metz, and kept some time in Prison: and when that Church was ruined by the Persecution, and the Temple demolished in the King's Presence, he retired into the Palatinate with John Tufsin his Colleague. They were both Ministers at Heidelberg:

(a) See his Article under the Word COLOGNE.

the Walloon College. He was for four Years Minister of the French Church at Middleburg [B]. He might have succeeded Uytenbogard, who had been the Court-Minister at the Hague [C]; but his natural Aversion to the Manners of a Court would not allow him to comply with the Desires of Prince Maurice in this Matter. He was called to Leyden, in the Year 1619, to teach, together with his Uncle Colonius, in the Walloon College; and he diligently discharged that Office 'till his Death, which happened in the Year 1642. He published a Commentary upon the four Gospels [D], and Notes upon the Acts of the Apostles, and upon the Apocalypse of St John, which he printed in Hebrew and Syriac [E], with a Latin Version (a). I shall give an Account of his other Books in the Remark [F]. He refused the Employment that was offered him of Divinity-Professor in the new University of Utrecht, and if he had lived long enough he would have had the same Post in that of Leyden (b). He married the Daughter of Henry Rogard, Counsellor of Flushing, by whom he had eleven Children, one of which practised Physic at Leyden (c), and afterwards at Amsterdam; and another studied Divinity, and was Minister at Woubrugge. The Physician left two Sons; one follows his Father's Profession at Amsterdam, and the other studies the Civil-Law (d).

(a) Ex Epistola Dedicatoria &
Præfatione novæ
Editionis, 1693.

(b) Leydeckerus,
Præf. Aphorismi
Lud. de Dieu.

(c) Ex Oratione
Funebris.

(d) Ex Epist.
Dedicator. novæ
Edit. 1693.

(3) Ex Oratione
Funebris Ludov.
de Dieu.

(4) Aphorismi
Theologici Lud.
de Dieu, cum Præfatione Mel-chioris Leydeckeri.

(5) Melchior.
Leydeckerus
Præf. Aphorismorum
Theologicorum Lud.
de Dieu, ex Con-
cione Funebris
Lud. de Dieu,
habita Belgice ab
Abrahamo Heidano.

(6) Leydecker.
ibid.

(7) This is a remarkable Fact,
and I believe unknown to all those who have writ of Calvin,
no Body that I know of having observed that he travelled into England.

(8) Leydeckerus
Præf. Aphorismorum
Theologicorum
Lud. de Dieu,
ex Concione
Fun. Lud. de
Dieu.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) In Præf.

berg: Tassin preached in French, and Colonius in German. The latter died young, and left a Son named Daniel Colonius, who was Minister and Principal of the Walloon College at Leyden (3). I have already said, that the Sister of Daniel Colonius was the Mother of Lewis de Dieu. A Book (4) lately fell into my hands which obliges me to add something to this Remark. I find there that Lewis de Dieu, the Grandfather of him, that is the Subject of this Article, accompanied Charles V, his Master, in his Expeditions into Africa and Germany; and did not conceal from him his being a Protestant. Only the Emperor advised him to take care of himself, for it would not be in his Power to screen him from the Inquisition (5). Lewis de Dieu was forced to conceal himself soon after the Abdication of Charles V; for that Prince was no longer able to secure him against the Hatred of the Jesuits (6). It is pretended that this honest Man was instructed by Calvin himself. He was going over to England, in Company with other young Men; Calvin, who was also going over in the same Ship (7), represented to them that they ought not to swear at Cards: Lewis de Dieu was the only one that submitted to his reproach, the others laughed at it: for this Reason Calvin taking his Opportunity, when he was alone with him, spoke to him of God, and converted him so effectually, that the young Man wrote to his Friends, that nothing should ever make him depart from the Faith of John Calvin (8). He devoted his Son Daniel to the Ministry. They also tell another Circumstance; That a certain Jesuit informed this Daniel that those of his Order were seeking for the dead Body of Lewis de Dieu, in order to hang it on a Gibbet: whereupon Daniel dug it up, and hid it. The Jesuit, who gave him the Information, offered to assist him in taking up and concealing the Corpse (9).

[B] He was four years Minister . . . at Middleburg. Mr Leydecker, Professor of Divinity at Utrecht (10), assures us that Lewis de Dieu, after he had been two years Minister of Flushing, went to Leyden in 1619. I have followed Polyander, Author of the funeral Oration; but I must inform my Reader, that it appears by the sequel of Polyander's discourse, that Lewis de Dieu was Minister of the Church of Flushing, and not of that of Middleburg.

[C] He might have succeeded Uytenbogard, who had been the Court-Minister at the Hague. Mr Leydecker mentions some Circumstances in this Affair, which deserve to be known. Prince Maurice, being in Zeland, heard Lewis de Dieu preach, who was then but a Student, and sent for him to Court some time after; the young Man modestly excused himself, declaring that he would satisfy his Conscience in the discharge of his Ministry, and freely censure what he thought deserved it, a Liberty which was not endured in a Court; moreover he thought the Post they offered him was fitter for a Man in Years than for a Student. His Modesty and Prudence were commended by Prince Maurice.

[D] He published a Commentary upon the four Evangelists. This was in 1631. His first care had been to examine the Latin Versions of the New Testament in Syriac, made by Tremellius and Guy le Fevre de la Boderie, and that of St Matthew's Gospel in Hebrew, by Munster and Mercerus. He found many Errors in these Versions. This put him upon examining the vulgar Version, those of Erasmus, and Theodorus Beza, the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic. He compared them one with another, and all of them with the Greek Text. He made no scruple of censuring Beza in what he thought deserved Censure, and he did justice to the Author of the vulgar Translation. 'Magnus vir fuit Beza, says he (11), eximie eruditionis, ac cœrissimi judicii; quique suis in Novum Testamentum laboribus nunquam laudatam satis operam Ecclesiis navavit, æternumque & supra invidiam nomen comparavit. Verum si Vulgatum quoque Interpretem, quisquis is tandem fuerit, doctum imo doctissimum virum fuisse asseram, non me peccasse judicavero. Suos habet, fœtor, nævos, habet & suos barbarismos. Sed quin passim ejus fidem judiciumque admirer, etiam ubi barbarus videatur, negare non possum . . . Beza was a Man of great Abilities, an extensive Knowledge, and a refined Judgment, whose Labours on the New Testament, for the service of Religion, can never be sufficiently commended, and which have gained him immortal Honour beyond the reach of Envy; and should I likewise say the Author of the Vulgate, whoever he be, was a very learned Man, I shall think I only do Justice. I own he has his failings, nor is he intirely free from Barbarisms, Yet even in them I cannot but admire his Fidelity and Judgment.' Mr Simon speaks well of Lewis de Dieu's Writings in the thirty fifth Chapter of his Critical History of the Commentators of the New Testament.

[E] He printed the Apocalypse in Hebrew and Syriac. This must be explained; it must not be imagined that he published two Apocalypses, one in the Hebrew Tongue, and the other in the Syriac. Lewis de Dieu only published the Apocalypse in Syriac, but he got one Impression made in Syriac Characters, and another in Hebrew Characters. Mr de la Roque, Minister at London (12), gave me this Information.

[F] I shall give an account of his other Books. He published, with learned Notes, the History of the Life of JESUS CHRIST, written in the Persian Language by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier, and he added to the Original a Latin Translation: he also published, with Notes, the History of St Peter written in the Persian Tongue. As to the two first Chapters of Genesis, translated into Persian by James Taivasus, he only published them with an Advertisement to the Reader. I say nothing of the Rudiments of the Hebrew, and Persian Tongues, which he published, nor of his Parallel of the Grammar of the Oriental Languages (13). After his Death, they printed his Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans, with a Collection of Observations on all the other Epistles of the Apostles, and a Commentary upon the Old Testament (14). His Treatise de Avaritia, his Rhetorica Sacra, and his Aphorismi Theologici (15), have appeared in the World by the care of Mr Leydecker. They reprinted at Amsterdam, in Folio, in 1693, his Observations upon the Scriptures, corrected and enlarged, together with the Apocalypse in Syriac. Note that Alegambe owns that Lewis de Dieu has faithfully translated Jerome Xavier's Book; but he charges him with annexing to it heretical Observations that deserve to be burnt; 'additis Animadversionibus hereticis & rogo dignis. Ceterum non infideliter textum interpretatus est, si nonnulla demas que fortasse codex ipse vitiata habuit.' Thus he expresses himself in the 189th Page of the Bibliothecæ of the Writers of his Order.

(11) Ibid.

(12) See, before, Citat. (30) of the Article COLOMIES.

(13) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by Polyander.

(14) Witte in Diario Biograph.

(15) Those Aphorisms were printed at Utrecht, in 1693.

DIGBY (Sir KENELM), became very illustrious in the present Age, by his Virtue and Learning. He was descended from a very ancient Family in England. His Great-Grand-father, Everard Digby, accompanied with his six Brothers, fought bravely, at the Battle of Bosworth, for Henry VII., against the Usurper Richard III. His Father, named also Everard, did not follow this Example of Loyalty; but suffered himself to be engaged in the Gunpowder-Plot against James I., for which he lost his Head. His Son, the Subject of this Article, gloriously effaced this Blemish, and presently rendered himself so worthy of this Prince's Esteem, that he restored him to his Estate. He afterwards appeared with Splendour at Court, being no less beloved by Charles, than he had been by King James. Charles I. made him Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, First Commissioner of the Navy, and Governor of the Trinity-House. He granted him Letters of Reprisals against the Venetians, by Virtue of which he took several Prizes from them, and with the small Fleet under his Command, made his way through the Venetian Fleet, near Scanderoon, and brought off his Booty. As he was all his Life a Lover of Learning, he attained to a very great Knowledge in Languages, and the Sciences, and became a good Philosopher. He translated several Authors into his Mother-Tongue, and in his Treatise of the Nature of Bodies, and the Immortality of the Soul, he has discovered an excellent Judgment, and a great Understanding. His particular Attachment to the Mathematics did not hinder him from a studious Enquiry into Chymical Secrets, in which he found out some excellent Remedies, which he freely gave away to all sorts of Persons, and especially to the poor. At Montpellier he made a public Discourse upon the Sympathetic Powder, which was published, and sold in great numbers. In the Year 1661 he published his Treatise of the Immortality of the Soul, upon which he had long Conferences with Mr Des Cartes. Those two Philosophers met at the College of Bon Court, at Paris. The principal Subject of their Conversation was the Nature and Condition of the Soul. And though they could not agree upon some Articles, yet they parted full of Esteem for each other. These were the least considerable Qualities of Sir Kenelm Digby. His Attachment to the Royal Family driven from the Throne of England, his two Embassies to Innocent X., from the Queen, Widow of the unfortunate Charles I., whose Chancellor he was, the Resolution with which he confessed to the Parliamentarians his being a Catholic, and his Courage in undergoing the Confiscation of his Estate, and Banishment on that Account, conspire to render him more illustrious. He retired into France, where he made himself beloved by all Men of Wit and Honour. Upon the Restoration of Charles II., Sir Kenelm Digby returned to London, where he continued, till having been long troubled with the Stone, and perceiving his Kidneys ulcerated, he resolved to go back to France. He was carried in a Litter towards the Sea; but his Distemper increased upon him in such a manner, that they were forced to bring him back to London; he died at London, the eleventh of March (his Birth-day) 1665, in the sixtieth Year of his Age. He married the only Daughter of Sir Edward Stanley, Son of the Earl of Derby, by a Daughter of the Duke of Norfolk, by whom he had three Sons, the eldest of which was killed near Brentford, in an Engagement with the Rebels, and left no Children. The youngest died in his Infancy, the other Son left only two Daughters (a).

(a) Bullart. Acad. des Scien. Tom. II, p. 137, and following.

DIYLLUS, a Greek Historian, Native of Athens. I should not mention him, but to observe an Error of Mr Moreri [A].

[A] I speak of it only to observe an Error of Moreri. He assures us, that Diyllus began his History at the Place where Ephorus ended his: he is mistaken (1); but if this Circumstance were true, yet would he deserve to be blamed, since he gives his Reader the Trouble to go and seek where the History of Ephorus ends. In vain would he look for it where it is most natural to expect he should find it, I mean in the place where Moreri speaks of Ephorus; for he forgets to inform us of it there as well as here. But to pass over his Omissions, and say something of his Fault of Commission. He is the more inexcusable, as he is guilty of this Error, as I may say, under the Eye of Vossius, who pointed out so clearly what he ought to have said. Vossius (2) quotes two Passages, in one of which it is affirmed (3), that Diyllus had composed a History divided into Twenty seven Books, beginning at the taking of the Temple of Delphi, and containing the Transactions of those times in Greece and Sicily. The other Passage imports, that Ephorus finished his History at the Siege of Perinthus, and that Diyllus begins at the same Siege the other part of his Work (4), and ends it at the Death of King Philip, the Father of Alexander. It is therefore undeniable that Diyllus's History reached from the Invasion of Delphi to the Death of Philip; that is to say, it began at the time that Philomelus, General of the Phocians, made himself Master of Delphi, towards the end of the CVth Olympiad, about the Year of Rome 337. The Siege of Perinthus falls in the second Year of the CIXth Olympiad, and the CCCCXth of Rome. Moreri's Citations are false (5), and if he had considered well what the passage of Athenæus, quoted by Vossius, contains, he would not have advanced such a wrong Conjecture. Diyllus, according to Athenæus, speaks of Demetrius Phalereus; therefore he is not to be placed, as Moreri does, in the CCCCXth Year of Rome, since that Demetrius flourished after the Death of Alexander. For the rest, Cassaubon has happily restored in Athenæus the Citation of Diyllus (6), which made Mausæus do the same in Harpocration's Dictionary (7).

(4) Διύλλος δ' Ἀθηναῖος τῆς δευτέρης συντάξεως ἀρχὴν πεποιμέναι τῆς ἑξῆς ἱστορίας τὴν τελευτὴν τὴν Διύλλου καὶ τὴν Ἀθηναίου alterum opus exoritur inde ut Ephorus Historiam finierat. Id. ibid. cap. 47, pag. 795.

(5) He cites Diod. Siculus, Book 10; and Vossius, pag. 30.

(6) Cassaub. in Athen. lib. 4, cap. 14, p. 281.

(7) In Voce Ἀπικύων.

(1) The learned Reinsius committed the same Error. See the Place where he speaks of Diyllus, in his Varia Lectiones.

(2) Voss. de Hist. Grec. pag. 360.

(3) Diodor. Sic. lib. 16, cap. 14, pag. m. 747.

(a) Lewis Gulicard, Descript. Belgii, pag. m. 507.

DINANT, a City in the Netherlands, upon the Meuse, between Charlemont and Namur. It's Situation near the Mines of Iron and Copper, and several Quarries of black Marble, and other sorts of Stones, enabled the Inhabitants to carry on a Trade that greatly enriched them (a); but they were divers times reduced to a miserable Condition by the Calamities of War: especially in the Year 1466, they suffered grievously, grievously, as I have said elsewhere (b). An Italian Author has committed an Error which may mislead his speculative Readers [A]. This City was very ill treated by the French in the Year 1554. Count de Souches, General of the Imperial Troops, made himself Master of it in 1674. The next Year it was taken by the French. By the Treaty of Nimègue it was agreed, that, if they restored it, Spain should yield up Charlemont to them; and that, if Spain chose rather to keep Charlemont, it should obtain of the Bishop of Leige, that Dinant should be yielded to the French (c). This Cession not having been obtained, France got Charlemont delivered up, and kept Dinant till the Peace of Reswic, by Virtue of which this City returned to the Obedience of its first Master, the Bishop of Leige.

[A] An Italian Author has committed a fault which may mislead his speculative Readers.] A Monk, called Remigio Fiorentino, has writ a Political Discourse upon the misfortunes which may arise from the Infotence of those people who affront the Effigies of a Prince. He gives, for an Example among others, what Charles Duke of Burgundy did to the inhabitants of Dinant. Carlo Duca di Borgogna ultimo non ufo tanta e si memorabil crudeltà contra di Nantes, se non perche i Nantesi havevono fatto la statua sua e d'alcuni altri Gentiluomini suoi amici, e l'havono appiccate per la gola alle forche (1).—Charles, the last Duke of Burgundy, would not have practised such a remarkable Cruelty to Nantes, if the Inhabitants had not banged up his Effigies, and that of a Gentleman who was his Friend. It is plain he names Nantes for the City that did this, and was chastised for it (2). His mistake arises from taking the first Syllable of Dinant for an Article. Now as there is a City called Nantes, it is evident this mistake is likely enough to deceive the Reader: for if the State of Learning should be a thousand Years hence in the same Condition it was in the XVth Century, there would be Critics who would pretend that it was at Nantes in Bretagny, and not at Dinant, upon the Meuse, that the Burgundian shewed himself so revengeful: they would boast of a discovery, that no Body had mentioned before, I mean of an Expedition of the last Duke of Burgundy against the Bretons. They would seek for the Time, the Cause, and the Circumstances of this War, and would find a great many things to support their Conjectures. In short, this would make a fine long Chapter of their Adversaria, variae Lectiones & Emendationes, sive Racemationes. Those, who have read this sort of Works, will agree with me that I argue from what is past to what is future. But not to pry into future Ages, let us content ourselves with the present. I am sure many perions have already been deceived by Remigio Fiorentino, or by those who deceived him. I doubt not but more than one Compiler will place Nantes among the Cities that have been ravaged for insulting the Statues of a Sovereign Prince.

(b) In the Article BURGUNDY (CHARLES Duke of) Remark [C].

(c) See the thirteenth Article of the Treaty of Nimègue, concluded between France and Spain, September 17, 1678.

(1) Remigio Fiorentino, Con sulatione Civili sopra l'Historie di Guicciardini e d'altri Historici, cap. 43, fol. m. 59.

(2) He says in the Margin: Carlo Duca di Borgogna gastica con severità la città di Nantes. . . . Charles, Duke of Burgundy severely chastised the City of Nantes. The same is to be found in the Table of Contents.

DINOTH (RICHARD), was of Coutances in Normandy, and lived in the XVth Century. Among other Latin Books he published the History of the Civil-Wars made upon account of Religion in France and the Low Countries [A]. There is no question but he was of the Protestant Communion, and I suppose he settled at Montbelliard, under the Character of a Refugee. He had made some stay at Strasbourg before that time (a). His Style is pretty moderate.

[A] He published, among other Latin Books, a History of the Civil-War . . . in France, and the Low Countries.] The Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca (1) informs me, that they printed at Basil in 4to, in 1582, Richardi Dinoti de Bello Civili Gallico Religioni causa suscepto libri VI. The Oxford Catalogue mentions three other Books of Richard Dinot, viz. de Bello Civili Belgico libri VI, in 4to, at Basil in 1580; Adversaria Historica, in 4to, at Basil 1581; de Rebus & Factis memorabilibus Locis communes Historici, & Sententiæ Historicorum, in 8vo, at Basil in 1580. I know not whether this date of the History of the Civil-Wars of the Low Countries is right; for the Edition, I make use of, is of the Year 1586, and I have observed nothing in it to induce me to think it is the second Edition: the Author dedicates it to the Senate and Academy of Strasbourg, and dates the Epistle Dedicatory from Montbelliard, the eighteenth of August 1586.

(a) See his Epistle Dedicatory to the History of the Civil Wars in the Netherlands.

DIOGENES, the Cynic, was one of those extraordinary Men who are upon Extrems in every thing, without excepting Reason, and who verify this Maxim, That there is no great Wit without a Mixture of Folly. He was born at Sinope, a Town in Pontus, and expelled from it for the Crime of coining false Money (a). His Father (b), who was a Banker, was banished for the same Crime. Diogenes retired to Athens, and by his great Perseverance prevailed upon the Philosopher Antisthenes to become his Master [A] (c). He not only gladly submitted to that kind of Life, which was peculiar to the Followers of that Founder of the Cynics, but also added new Degrees of Austerity to it; so that there never was a Philosopher who did so much despise the Conveniences of Life. It were a Mistake to think, that with his Staff and Waller, and the

(b) His Name was Iseus. Some said that he died in Prison, and that his Son made his Escape before the Judges gave Sentence against him. Diog. Laert. ib.

(c) Id. ib. n. 21. Aelianus, Var. Hist. lib. 10, cap. 16.

[A] By his great Perseverance he prevailed upon the Philosopher Antisthenes to become his Master.] A very learned Man, who mentions this, has committed a great Fault in Chronology. These are his Words: (1): 'It is reported of the same Diogenes, that the Philosopher Antisthenes, the Founder of the Sect of the Cynics, his Master, having turned Socrates's Disciple, and accordingly dismissed all his Scholars, Diogenes would not leave him; whereupon Antisthenes, being angry with him, took a Cudgel to turn him out: But Diogenes was not frightened at it: he bent his Head to receive the Blow, and said, 'There is no Stick, tho' ever so hard, but I can bear, to learn some good things of you.' Socrates died the first Year of the XCVth Olympiad; and the Death of Diogenes ought to be placed in the same Year with that of Alexander the Great, or a few Years after (2).

But that Prince died the last Year of the CXIIIth Olympiad, according to Eusebius; or the first Year of the CXIVth, according to Petavius. We may therefore suppose, that Diogenes died the third Year of the CXIVth Olympiad: and therefore, since he died being about ninety Years old, he was born the first Year of the XCIIId Olympiad: and therefore he was only about twelve Years of Age when Socrates died, and so could not have been turned out of Antisthenes's School, for the Reason alledged by Mr Joly. If we should strictly keep to the Account of those, who say that Alexander and Diogenes died the same day, we may get some Years by it; but it will not remove the Difficulty: for we must remember, that Socrates's Trial lasted some time; but during the Proceedings against him, Antisthenes did not shut up his School to go to that of Socrates: this is plain.

8 F

Besides,

(1) Mr Joly, Avis Chrétiens, & Mœurs pour l'Institution des Enfants, pag. 4 & 5. He quotes no Body, but he might have quoted Aelian. Var. Hist. lib. 10, cap. 16, as to Diogenes's Answer after he had received a Blow with a Stick.

(2) See the Remark [H].

the Tub, which served him for a Dwelling [B], he was more humble than those who pamper themselves, and fare deliciously [C]. He looked upon every body with Scorn; he censured all Mankind magisterially; and doubtless thought himself much above all other Philosophers. One cannot help seeing something great in his Behaviour, if it be considered in a certain Sense; and it must have been so, since Alexander the Great, who was a good Judge, acknowledged the same [D]. We are not to trust to those who Besides, Diogenes did not remove to Athens till after he had coined false Money in his own Country, and even exercised an Office in the Mint (3), and till he went to Delphi to consult the Oracle (4). How then can it be said, with any shew of Reason, that he was but fifteen or sixteen Years of Age, when he desired to be admitted among Antisthenes's Scholars at Athens?

(3) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 20.

(4) Ibid. n. 21.

[B] A Tub served him for a dwelling. He ordered somebody to prepare a Cell for him; but because his Order was not speedily performed, he grew impatient, and lodged himself in a Tub, that was in the Temple of the Mother of the Gods. This is what he himself said in one of his Letters (5). I with the Commentators upon Diogenes Laërtius had enquired, how he came to be permitted to appropriate to himself a thing that belonged to a Temple.

(5) Ibid. n. 23.

He had not always the same Tub: A young insolent Fellow broke the first in pieces, for which he was condemned to be whipped. The Athenians, who insisted that Punishment upon him, presented Diogenes with another Tub (6); which was, without doubt, different from that which he had at Corinth, where he lived when Philip King of Macedonia designed to attack that Place. All the Inhabitants worked hard on the Fortifications of the Town. Diogenes, being unwilling to be the only Man that should be idle, fell a rolling his Tub (7): From whence Menage infers, that this Tub was not made of Clay; but he owns at the same time, that a Tub made of Clay may be rolled without breaking to pieces.

(6) Ibid. n. 43.

(7) Lucianus de de conscrib. Historia, Tom. 1, pag. m. 659.

‘Testaceum non fuisse Diogenis dolum, sed ligneum, illud convicerit, quod illud, ne otiosus esset, saepe verfaret; de quo est apud Lucianum in Libello Quomodo conscribenda sit historia. Quamquam testaceum dolum versari & circumagi potuit; in simeto, vel solo subacto, vel restitilibus agris, vel in aquato etiam pavimento; cum praesertim ampla illa & capacia dolia pro amplitudinis modo solida fuisse & spissa credibile sit’ (8). — That Diogenes's Cask was not made of Potter's Ware, but of Wood, may be proved, by his often rolling it without any damage from Place to Place, that he might not be idle, which Lucian relates in his Treatise on writing History; tho' an earthen Cask might be rolled and removed in manured or tilled ground, or on a smooth Pavement, since those large and capacious Casks may probably have had a thickness and Solidity proportionate to the Size. He did not make this Remark without Reason: he had in view the Verses of a Latin Poet (9), who says, that Tub was made of Clay:

(8) Menag. Not. ad Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 23, pag. 234.

(9) Juven. Sat. 14, ver. 308.

Dolia nudi
Non ardent Cynici: si frigeris, altera fiet
Cras domus, aut eadem plumbo commissa manebit.
Sensit Alexander, testa cum vidit in illa
Magnum habitorem, quanto felicior (10) hic, qui Nil cuperet, quam qui torum sibi posceret orbem.

(10) Moret reads feliciter, and says, it is thought Juvenal designed these Verses in praise of Diogenes. The thing is undoubtedly certain; so that his it is thought is good for nothing.

*The naked Cynic's Jar ne'er flames; if broken,
'Tis quickly fodder'd, or a new bespoken.
When Alexander first beheld the Face
Of the great Cynic in that narrow Space,
His own Condition thus he did lament;
How much more happy thou, that art content
To live within this little hole, than I,
Who after Empire that vain Quarry fly?*

D R Y D E N.

I should not think it strange, if any one should blame Diogenes for affecting so great a Poverty, as to desire no other Lodging than a Cask; but it is ridiculous to infer from it, that he was a Drunkard. Here follows a long train of Impertinences, which will not be so tiresome as the remainder of this Article.

As for Diogenes the Cynic, his name shews what he was; for it is as if one should say, Diogenes who lived like a Dog. This Spark pretended to be a Philosopher. And his most remarkable Actions are these. 1. He lived Night and Day in a Cask. Thus the Companions of Aeneas eat their Plates, having made an end of their Meat, menfas consumimus inquit Iulus (Aeneid lib. VII. v. 116.) in like manner, Diogenes, having drunk the Wine, made use of the Cask; that is, he loved it so well, that he was resolved to live in it. Thus an Old-woman in Aristophanes ordered that she should be buried in the Cellar, under a Cask, to wet her Bones. Thus Tipplers, when they have emptied the Bottle in a Tavern, make use of the Neck of it for a Candlestick, to play after eating. Thus Buchanan, in his last Sickness, would have a Hoghead of Bordeaux Wine set by his Bed-side, that he might give up the Ghost with the Smell of such a delicious Liquor (11). Thus Betteau the Fisherman, says Ronsard, would be buried in his Boat. Thus Diogenes lived Night and Day in his Cask, being, no doubt, very sorry that it was empty. Thus our pretended Wits live Night and Day in the Tavern (12). No Man did ever less deserve to be called a Toss-pot than Diogenes. He thought it very strange that those who are thirstily do not drink at the first Spring they meet with; they seemed to him more unreasonable than Beasts, and the River Water was the only Remedy he wanted to quench his Thirst. ‘Ἡδίων ἔπινα τὸ πρῶτον ὕδατος, ἢ οἱ ἄλλοι τὸν ἄριστον εἶνον. Καὶ γὰρ ἡ δὲ τὸν ὕδατος διδόντα τὰς μὲν κρήνας παρερχομένων. Ζητήσαντες δὲ ὅπισθεν πάντας ὥρῃσαντο χεῖρον ἢ λίαν. καὶ πολλὸν ἔρασκον ἀπορροεῖν εἶναι τῶν βοσκημάτων. Jucundius bibit fluentem aquam quam alii vinum Thasum. Deridebat autem eos qui quum sitirent, praeferrent fontes, quarenterentque unde omnino emerent Chium vel Lesbium, & multo hos dicebat esse insipientiores jumentis’ (13). — He drank with more Pleasure the running Water, than others the most delicious Wines; and laughed at those who, being thirsty, passed by a Fountain, and sought for Chian and Lesbian Wine, saying they had not near so much sense as Brutes. But after all, it is not certain that he had no other Lodging than a Cask. Being asked one day, Who shall bury you when you die, since you have neither a Man nor a Maid? he answered (14), Any one who wants a House: Which supposes that he had a House.

(11) See the Remark [D] of the Article BUCHANAN.

(12) Gossie, Doct. Curienae, pag. 134, 135.

(13) Dio Chrys. Orat. 6, pag. 39.

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 52.

[C] It must not be thought that he was more humble than those who pamper themselves, and fare deliciously. He said that all the Curies of the Stage had fallen upon him, since he was a Vagrant, had no Country, nor House to dwell in, a Beggar, ill clothed, and one that lived from Hand to Mouth. And yet, says the Historian, he took as much Pride in those things, as Alexander could do in the Conquest of the World. Διογένης ὁ Σινωπεὺς συνεχῶς ἐπέλεγεν ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ, ὅτι τὰς ἐκ τῆς τραγωδίας ἀπὸς αὐτοῦ ἐκπληροῖ, καὶ ὑπομένει. εἶναι γὰρ πλάνους, ἀοικον, πατρίδα ἐσχημένον, πτωχόν, δυσέμουν, βίον ἔχον τὸν ἐρήμειον, καὶ ὅμως ἐπὶ τέτοις μέγα εὐφρονεῖ ἔδεν ἥτιον, ἢ Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπὶ τῇ τῆς οἰκουμένης ἀρχῇ, ὅτε καὶ Ἰνδὸς ἐλθὼν εἰς Βαβυλῶνα ὑπέσπευεν. Diogenes Sinopensis de seipso dicere solitus est, se implere & ferre tragicas exco-rationes. Nam errantem se esse, domo & patria carere, mendicum agere, male vestiri, & in diem vivere. Nihilominus tamen in his sibi non minus placebat, quam Alexander in terrarum orbis imperio, quam subactis Indis in Babylonem reverteretur (15).

[D] Alexander the Great found something great in his behaviour. That Prince must have found something great in that Philosopher, since he said that, if he was not Alexander, he would be Diogenes (16). I do not wonder that he admired a Man, who, though he might have obtained great Advantages from him, would ask him nothing, and even bad him, without any

(15) Aelian. Var. Hist. lib. 2, cap. 29.

(16) Plot. in Alex. pag. 67.

who criticize Alexander upon this Head [E], nor to those who blame that Philosopher's Behaviour towards that Prince [F]. Some are of Opinion, that there are Contradictions in (17) Id. ib. Val. Max. lib. 4, cap. 3, sub fin. Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 38.

(18) Plut. ubi supra.

(19) Plut. ubi supra, etiam de Fortun. vel Virtute Alex. pag. 331.

(20) Seneca de Benefic. lib. 5, cap. 6.

(21) Id. ibid. cap. 4.

(22) Plut. ubi supra.

(23) He says, lib. 6, n. 60, that Alexander came unexpectedly to Diogenes, and told him, I am the Great King Alexander. Εὖναι αὖτις Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ μέγας βασιλεύς. And I am Diogenes the Dog, replied the Philosopher, καὶ γὰρ Φύλαξ Διογένης ὁ κύων. Which is to suppose, that Alexander had then vanquished Darius; for when he saw Diogenes, he was only King of Macedonia, and it did not belong to him to stile himself the Great King.

(24) Balzac, Socrat. Chretien. pag. 243.

any Complement or Ceremony, to stand off, and not keep the Sun from him (17). Can a Prince, who is daily beset with craving People, and who, notwithstanding his great Power, is not in a capacity to satisfy them all, forbear admiring a private Man, who refuses the Riches that are offered him? Statesmen and Philosophers flocked to Alexander from all Parts (18): every body was fond to make his Court to him: Diogenes was the only Man who did not stir out of his Place. Alexander, who expected he should come to him, was obliged to give him a Visit: such an Indifference appeared uncommon to him, and he admired the greatness of Soul which that Philosopher expressed by his Answer. Λέγεται τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπὶ διατρίβειν καὶ θανάτῳ καταφρονεῖν τὴν ὑπερβολὴν, καὶ τὸ μέγεθος τῆς ἀνδρείας αὐτοῦ. Peribetur in tantum permotus Alexander fuisse & obsequisse contemptus despicientiam hominis & animi celsitudinem ut, &c (19). Seneca is in the right when he says, that upon this occasion Alexander was overcome by a meer private Man. 'Eadem re gloriari Socrates potuit, eadem Diogenes a quo victus est (Alexander). Quid ni victus fit illo die quo homo supra mensuram humanæ superbæ tumens, vidit aliquem cui nec dare quidquam posset nec eripere (20). — In the same thing might Socrates glory, in the same might Diogenes, by whom he (Alexander) was conquered. For what could be said of a Man, who, elate with Pride, that day fancied himself a God, yet saw one to whom he could give nothing, and from whom he could take nothing away, but that he was conquered? It plainly appears from these Words, that Seneca believed Alexander discoursed with Diogenes after the Conquest of Persia, and when that Prince, dazzled with the Lustre of his Fortune, would be called a God. But if any one should think that this Opinion of Seneca is not clearly contained in those Words, he needs only read the following Passage. 'Necesse est à Socrate beneficio vincari: necesse est à Diogene, qui per medias Macedonum gazas nudus incessit, calcatis regis opibus. Nonne ille tunc merito & sibi & ceteris, quibus ad despiciendum veritatem non erat offensa caligo, supra eum eminere visus est, infra quem omnia jacebant? Multo potentior, multo locupletior fuit, omnia tunc possidente Alexandro. Plus enim erat, quod hic nollet accipere, quam quod ille posset dare (21). — I must submit to Socrates, and to Diogenes also in Generosity, who walked naked through the Macedonian Wealth, treading under his Feet the Royal Treasures. Might he not seem to himself, and to the rest, whose Eyes were not dimmed to that degree, that they were incapable of seeing Truth, to look down on him, who had all things under him? He was much more powerful and wealthy than Alexander who had every thing. For there was more which the one would have refused, than the other could have given.' Here is an instance of those Mistakes that are committed for want of Attention. Every body knows, I. That Alexander never returned into Greece after he went into Asia. II. That Diogenes continued in Greece whilst Alexander was subduing Asia: and therefore Seneca has confounded times here for want of Attention, and because he was too intent upon his Antitheses. It is certain that Alexander and Diogenes discoursed together before the Persian War. Alexander saw that Cynic at Corinth, when he was declared Captain-General of all Greece to make War with Darius (22). Diogenes Laërtius seems to be guilty of the same Anachronism (23).

[E] We are not to trust those who criticize Alexander upon that head. 'If Alexander had not been Alexander, he would have been Diogenes: so true it is that an honest Poverty will be esteemed even by the greatest Princes.' These words are to be found in a Sermon which Balzac criticized. His Censure upon them runs thus (24). 'The Preacher thought this a very good saying; but I think it a very bad one: for in truth what is it to be Diogenes? I will tell you what it is, translating the Greek Text, without adding any thing of my own. To be Diogenes, is to violate the Laws and Customs established; to be deprived of all Shame and Modesty; to know neither Relations, nor Guests, nor Friends; to be continually barking at or biting People; to eat a raw Sole or bloody Meat in a full Market; to be guilty of still more filthy Actions in every body's sight. Actions which cannot be performed with too great secrecy and retirement. This it is to be Diogenes, and what Alexander wished to be, had he not been Alexander! The Disciple of Aristotle could not have uttered a worse thing, and the Preacher could not have said any thing more disobliging to those whom he intended to praise, than by using a Comparison that is so odious, at least to those who are not unacquainted with good Books.' Balzac criticizes two Persons here, Alexander and the Preacher: The latter seems to deserve the Censure put upon him; for those who praise the Monks for their begging, should take all possible care to prevent the Reader's thinking on the Cynic Philosophers. As for Alexander, I maintain that he is unjustly censured, as it will appear from these Words of Cæsar (25): 'Do you think, Sir, that Balzac has fully apprehended Alexander's Meaning? That Conqueror was ignorant of this Definition of Diogenes, and desired only to be like him in what he had then observed in that Philosopher, which was a very great Contempt of the most shining and glorious things of this World. He offered him his Riches and his Protection; and the only Favour That ragged wild Man desired of him was, that he would stand out of his Sun; as if he had meant, Do not deprive me of the good Things of Nature, and I leave you those of Fortune, which I think below my care. Alexander was very sensible of the Firmness of so noble a Soul; and turning to the Lords of his Court, told them, Do not laugh at that Man: if I was not what I am, I would be what he is; that is, if I was not in possession of all manner of Wealth and Glory, I would think myself happy in despising them, as that Philosopher does. Notwithstanding what Balzac says to the contrary, this is certainly a delicate and fine Thought for a Disciple of Aristotle. A Man of never so little Judgment must needs perceive that Cæsar is in the right, and that Balzac's Criticism is very false. Plutarch's Paraphrase upon that Saying of Alexander is worth reading (26).

[F] Nor to those who blame that Philosopher's Behaviour towards that Prince. 'He was so brutish, that when Alexander, who went to see him in his Tub, asked him a Question, he answered him just as Brusquet (27) used to speak to the King; who making a wry Face, and showing him, Alexander, said he, art thou not afraid that I should bite thee, for I am a mad Dog; that is, I am enraged against thy Luxury, thy Excesses, and thy insolent Majesty. And then, being asked by some in Alexander's Retinue, who laughed at him as if he had been the Fool of a Play, Whether he had ever seen any good and wise Princes, he fell a laughing, and said, in a bantering way, ἐς κολαίων ἀετομένων, I have seen as many as there are Crows and May-bugs in the Spring. Such was the Wit and Civility of that Man, who deserved to be exemplarily punished (28). There are many things to be censured in these words besides that which Prior Ogier censured (29). I. Alexander did not go to Diogenes to divert himself; it was a serious Visit. II. When a Man acts honestly, he does not relate things as he finds them in Books of no Authority; he takes them out of grave and credible Writers, as those are, with respect to this Visit, who have writ the Life of that great Prince, or that of Diogenes. But what has Father Garasse done? he has wholly suppressed Plutarch's and Laërtius's Narrative, and given a quite different one, without saying from whom he had it (30). III. Nothing can be more absurd, than to alledge this Visit of Alexander, in order to cast a Blot upon the Memory of Diogenes; for every body knows that Prince conceived a great Admiration for him; and whoever thinks of such an Admirer, will be more inclined to admire Diogenes than to despise him: and therefore, though Garasse took care not to mention what Alexander said upon that Occasion, he acted the part of a wretched Orator; for he put his Readers in the way of remembering a thing quite contrary to his design.

If any one desires to see an Answer to Garasse's Investigations against Diogenes, let him read la Motte le Vayer. One of our Writers, says he (31), was so unjust (I will

(25) Cæsar, Suite de la Défense de Voiture, pag. 39.

(26) Plut. de Fortuna vel Virtute Alexandri, Orat. 1, circa fin. pag. m. 331, 332.

(27) He was the King's Jester.

(28) Garasse, Doctrine Curieuse, pag. 135.

(29) He laughed at Garasse, for his Ignorance, who did not know that every body was Thoud in Greece, and that therefore Diogenes did not Thoud Alexander out of Incivility. Censure de la Doctrin Curieuse, pag. 175.

(30) Dion Chrysostome made a whole Oration about Alexander's and Diogenes's Conference, wherein, doubtless, there are an hundred things of his own Invention. What Garasse says is not to be found in it.

(31) Traité de la Vertu des Païens, in the fifth Volume of his Works, Edit. in 12mo, pag. 133, 134. He does not name the Writer whom he refutes: It was Father Garasse.

in the things related of Diogenes [G]; but they ought to consider, that a Man of his Humour must needs have been of a very uneven Temper. He had a great Presence of Mind: this appears from his witty Sayings and quick Repartees, most of which are very smart. He, who called him a mad Socrates (d), had a right Notion of him. He spent a considerable part of his Life at Corinth, where he died in a very old Age. They do not agree when, or what sort of death, he died [H]. Though he little cared to be buried, he had an honourable Burial [I]. The Reason why he lived at Corinth was,

(d) Plato called him so. See Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 14, cap. 33.

(32) The King's Jester.

(33) Theo. in Progygn. cap. 5, pag. m. 71.

will not use a harsher Word) that he made no Scruple to compare Diogenes and Democritus with Brusquet, and such another Man commonly known by the Name of Maître Guillaume (32), whom he affirms to have been at least as wise as those Philosophers. How can any one allow himself the liberty of talking at that rate? He says, that Plutarch and Laërtius needed not transmit to us the Fooleries of these two Scoundrels, one whereof, viz. Democritus, deserves no other Title than that of a Merry Andrew, and the other of a sturdy Beggar. In short, says he, there is no other Difference between them than what is between Maître Guillaume and Jack-Pudding, or Brusquet and Pantalon, Diogenes being a downright Madman, and Democritus a continual Buffoon: They are his own words. Certainly every reasonable Man, though never so little acquainted with the nature of Things, will be offended at it, and express his Indignation at such extravagant Comparisons.

It is reported (33) that Alexander, finding Diogenes asleep, spoke the Twenty fourth Verse of the second Book of the Iliad, Οὐ χρεὶ παννύχιον εὐδῆιν βυλνφόρεν ἀνδρῶν.

Stertere perpetuam non dignum est principe noctem.

Ill fits a Chief the Night in Sleep to spend.

And that Diogenes spoke immediately the Words that come next to that Passage of Homer:

Ωὐ λαοίτ' ἐπὶ[ε]ράφα[ι]αι καὶ τόσσα μέμλε.

Cui populiue salus, & tanta negotia curæ.

On whom his People and their Hopes depend.

That Philosopher could not have answered with a greater Presence of Mind, nor more to the Purpose. He vindicated himself, and shewed at the same time what Alexander was bound to do. He made it appear that if it be a Fault to sleep all Night, it is when a Man is intrusted with the Government of a Nation.

[G] Some find Contradictions in the things related of Diogenes. We are told, on the one hand, that he had no other Lodging but a Tub, and that he threw away his wooden Cup, when he perceived that he could drink in the hollow of his hand. Quodam vero tempore habens ad potandum cavum ligneum vidit puerum manu concava bibere, & elisive illud fertur ad terram dicens, nesciebam quod natura haberet poculum (34). — He used a wooden Bowl to drink out of; but observing, on a time, a Boy drinking out of the hollow of his hand, he broke it, saying, I was indeed ignorant that Nature had supplied us with cups.

This is taken from Diogenes Laërtius, who says Θεασάμενος ποτὶ παιδίον ταῖς χερσὶ πίνειν, ἐξέβρι-ψεν τὴν κοῦλην, εἰπὼν παιδίον με νενίκηκεν ἐν τέλει. Intuitus aliquando puerum manibus bibentem, cotylam pera produciat abiecit dicens, puer me vilitate superavit. And it is expressly said, that he had neither a Man nor a Maid (35). But on the other hand, we are told, that his Man ran away from him. Some might think that this was inverted, in order to ascribe a witty Saying to Diogenes. It is said that he answered those, who advised him to make an Enquiry after that Fugitive, Were it not a ridiculous thing if Menades could live without Diogenes, and if Diogenes could not live without Menades (36)? For my part, I do not find any Contradiction in those Stories. Could such a cross-grain'd Man be uniform in all his Actions? There is no doubt that he was sometimes for one thing, and sometimes for another. His life was long enough to afford some Years in which he had Servants, and some in which he had no other Cup than the hollow of his hand. This is what might be said, if the Life of that Cynic, written by Diogenes Laërtius, was the only historical Monument concerning him; but there is a Chapter in Ælian, which dispenses us from making use of such a Solution. Ælian informs us, that Diogenes was not yet a Philosopher when his Servant left him. It was at his coming away from Sinope that he took along with him one of his Slaves, who left him. He had then some Notions of Philosophy, which made him say, It would be a shameful thing if Manes could be without Diogenes, and Diogenes could not be without Manes; Οὐκ αἰσχρὸν Μάνην μὲν μὴ δεῖσθαι Διογένην, Διογένην δὲ Μάνην; An non turpe esset quum Manes Diogenes non egeat, Diogenem Manis indigere (37)? but he was not a Cynic, and did not lay aside all Superfluities, till a long time after. Ælian adds, that this Servant wandered from place to place till he was at last torn in pieces by Dogs at Delpi.

[H] They do not agree when, or what sort of death, he died. Some say (38) he died of an overflowing of the Gall, occasioned by eating a Neat's Foot raw (39); others, that he stifled himself by holding his Breath (40); others, that he died of the biting of a Dog (41); others, that he threw himself headlong down a Precipice (42); others, that he strangled himself. This last Opinion is mentioned by St Jerome as the true one, and with some Circumstances that deserve to be known. His Death, says he, shews his Temperance and Virtue; for as he was going to the Olympic Games, a Fever seized upon him. He laid himself down under a Tree, and refused the Assistance of those who accompanied him, and offered him a Horse or a Chariot. Go to the Games, said he, to them; this Night, will determine my Dis temper; if I recover, I will go to morrow to the Olympic Games; if I die, I will go into the Elysian Fields. He strangled himself that very Night, pretending that he lost his Fever, rather than his Life. Abite quæso, & spectatorem per-gite. Hæc me nox aut victorem probabit aut victum. Si febrem vicero, ad agonem: si me vicerit, ad inferna descendam: ibique per noctem eliso guttore, non tam mori se ait quam febrem excludere (43). Some (44) say that he and Alexander died on the same day, in the CXIIIth Olympiad. He was near Ninety Years of Age (45). But if he had not lived after Alexander, how could Perdiccas have sent for him, and threatened to kill him if he did not come (46)? Could Craterus have desired a Visit from him (47)?

[I] Tho' he little cared to be buried, he had an honourable Burial. It is said, that when he was a dying, he ordered that his Body should not be buried at all, or only covered with a little duff in a ditch. He was willing that all sorts of Beasts should feed upon him (48). Besides, we find in Diogenes Laërtius, that he desired to be thrown into the Ilfus, for the Service of his Brethren: but those Words have been soited into the Text of that Historian; for can any Writer be so absurd as to say, that this Philosopher desired to be thrown into a River, to be of some use to the dogs? and therefore it is not likely that Laërtius should have said so. Those words were at first put into the Margin to shew Ælian's Opinion (49), viz. that our Cynic ordered his dead body should be thrown into the Ilfus; and then some Transcriber foolishly inserted them in the Text. Take notice, that the Ilfus is a River of Attica, and that Diogenes died in a Suburb of Corinth (50); from whence you may conclude, that Ælian has committed a Mistake. Menage made a very learned Note upon this (51). There is a Passage in Cicero that deserves to be set down: we find in it, that Diogenes being asked by his Friends, Whether his desire of lying unburied tended to the Benefit of wild Beasts or Birds? answered them, that he would have them put a Stick into his Hands, that he might fright them away: How will you be able to do it? said they: you will feel nothing. Well then, replied he, what's that

(37) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 13, cap. 28. Seneca says the same thing de Tranquill. c. 8.

(38) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, cap. 76.

(39) Bois pîda. It is doubtless a Fault, which ought to be mended by παλόςδεα; for many Authors quoted by Menage, in lure locum, are agreed, that the eating of a raw Polytus occasioned the Death of Diogenes.

(40) 'Αλλ' ἀνέβα χυλός ποτ' ὀδόντας ἐπείλας καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα συνδακύν. Item qui sibilatus est cum labris dentes obfirmasset, & spiritum continuisset. Coricoides apud Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 77.

(41) Diog. Laërt. ibid. Suidas.

(42) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 8, cap. 14.

(43) Hieronymus, lib. 2, ad Jovinianum.

(44) Demet. in Æquivocis, apud Laërtium, n. 79. Plutarch. Sympos. lib. 8, c. 1. Suidas.

(45) Laërt. lib. vi. n. 76.

(46) Id. n. 44.

(47) Id. n. 57.

(48) Id. n. 79.

(49) Var. Hist. lib. 8, cap. 14.

(50) 'Εν τῷ Κρανίῳ, τῷ πρὸ τῆς Κορίνθου γυμνασίου. In Cranio id erat gymnasium ante Corinthum. Diog. Laërt. n. 77.

(51) In Laërt. lib. 6, n. 79.

* Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 37. See also Seneca, Epist. 90.

(35) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 52.

(36) Id. ibid. n. 55.

was, that a Man of that Town bought him [K], and made him Tutor to his Sons. Notwithstanding his being a Slave, he kept up his whole Character (e). What is most impudent and inexcusable in his Life, is, that he brutishly would commit Acts of Impurity in the public View of the World [L], for which he gave very bad ibat to me, whether I be devoured by Beasts? • Durior • Diogenes, & idem quidem sentiens, sed ut Cynicus • asperius, proci se iussit inhumatum. Tum amici, • volucrisbusne an feris? Minime vero, inquit, sed • bacillum prope me quo abigam, ponitote. Qui poteris? illi, non enim senties. Quid igitur mihi ferarum laniatus oberit nihil sentienti (52)?

(52) Cicer. Tusc. 1, cap. 43.

No regard was had to his great Indifference for his Sepulchre. His Friends, finding him dead, did not doubt that he had put an end to his Life by holding his Breath. Every one of them was fond of having the Honour of burying him; and they grew so hot upon it, that they were like to come to Blows: but some Persons of Authority composed their Difference. Diogenes was buried near the Gate of the Isthmus, and his Tomb was adorned with a Column, on which they placed a Dog of Marble (53). Pausanias mentions that Tomb (54). The Inhabitants of Sinope erected Statues of Brals to that Philosopher, who was their Country-man (55). I had almost forgot to say, that there is an Opinion importing that he was buried by the Sons of Xeniades, whose Tutor he had been (56). It is further said, that Xeniades asked him how he would be buried; and that he answered, with his Face downwards: for, replied he, being asked what was his Reason for such a Fancy, there will quickly be an overturning, that will put things upside down. He meant, if we may believe the Historian, that the Kingdom of Macedonia would become very great, though it was inconsiderable, Διὰ τὸ ἐπικρατεῖν ἡδὲ τῆς Μακεδονίας ἢ ἐκ ταπεινῶν ὕψους γίνεσθαι. Quia Macedones jam potentia majori dominantur, atque ex humilibus sublimis ferent (57). This

(53) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 77, 78.

(54) Pausan. lib. 2, pag. 45.

(55) Diog. Laërt. n. 78.

(56) Id. n. 31.

(57) Id. n. 32.

Explanation is not right, since Diogenes died when the Macedonians were arrived to the height of their Power. Some say he died the same Day that Alexander did; and therefore he had seen the Glory of that Nation prodigiously raised. According to some others, he outlived that Prince, and saw the Divisions of his Successors; and therefore he should rather have foretold the Declension of the Macedonians than their Grandeur. The Expression of Diogenes Laërtius cannot be right, unless it be supposed that it relates to Philip King of Macedonia. It was under Philip's Reign that that Nation, which had made but an indifferent Figure, began to grow formidable.

[K] A Man of Corinth bought him.] Passing by the Isle of Ægina, he was taken by some Pirates, who brought him to the Isle of Crete, and exposed him to sale. He answered the Crier, who asked him what he could do, that he knew how to command Men (58); and perceiving a Corinthian, who was going by, he shewed him to the Crier, and told him, Sell me to that Gentleman, for he wants a Master (59). That Corinthian's Name was Xeniades. He bought Diogenes, and carried him to Corinth, and made him Tutor to his Sons: He also committed to him the Management of his House. Diogenes did so well discharge the Duties of those Places, that Xeniades could not forbear saying every where, that a good Genius was come into his House. Diogenes's Friends had a mind to redeem him. You are silly Fools, said he (60), Lions are not Slaves to those who feed them, but the latter are the Lions Servants. He roundly told Xeniades, You must obey me; for Governours and Physicians, though Servants, require the Obedience of those whose Governours and Physicians they are (61). He gave a good Education to Xeniades's Children, and was so well beloved by them, that they recommended him earnestly to their Father and Mother. He grew old in that Family; and some say he died there, and was buried by his Pupils (62). The Sale of Diogenes was a Subject for some Authors. Menippus and Eubulus wrote some Tracts intitled, Διογένης πωρεῖς, Diogenis autio (63). Suidas observes, that Diogenes was already an old Man when the Pirates took him. But if he spent the remaining part of his Life in Xeniades's Service, how can what Dion Chrysostom says be true, that Diogenes was in the Winter at Athens, and in the Summer at Corinth? Whoever will consider the persuasive Eloquence Laërtius ascribes to him, and the Effects of that Eloquence (64), will not wonder that he had so good a Success

(58) Philo mentions this with other Circumstances. See his Tract quod omnis probus liber, pag. 883.

(59) Laërtius, who says this, n. 74, had been saying, n. 50, that Diogenes earnestly desired the Crier to say, Who will buy this Master?

(60) Taken from Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 74, 75.

(61) Id. Diogen. n. 30.

(62) Id. n. 31.

(63) Ibid. n. 29, 30.

(64) Ibid. n. 75.

in the Education of Xeniades's Children. Onesicritus sent one of his Sons to Athens: that young Man having heard Diogenes, settled in that Town; and his eldest Brother did the same, as soon as he was sent thither by Onesicritus. Onesicritus himself, who had the Curiosity to hear that Philosopher, became his Disciple; so great were the Charms of Diogenes's Eloquence (65). Onesicritus was a considerable Man: he was very much esteemed by Alexander (66); he followed him in his Wars, where he had great Posts bestowed upon him; and he wrote a History. Phocion, a more illustrious Man than he, was also Diogenes's Disciple (67); and so was Stilpo of Megara (68).

[L] He brutishly would commit Acts of Impurity in the public View of the World.] He argued thus: It is not a Sin to dine; therefore it is not a Sin to dine in the Streets (69). Upon this Ground he eat in any Place whatsoever, and pretended that his Principle was to be extended to all natural Necessities; so that, as he believed that it was a lawful thing to lie with a Woman, he concluded that there was no harm in lying with her in public (70). This was calling Reason to the Assistance of his Passions; he strained it; he did not understand it by using too many subtleties to understand it: it was in a manner resā cum ratione infingere, — Going mad with Reason. This Verse of Terence may be applied to the Cynics, Facient nā intelligendo ut nihil intelligant (71).

By over acting their Knowledge they appear like Fools.

Diogenes, an Enemy to all Superfluity, and seeking as much as possible to be independant, committed publicly what the Casuists call the Sin of Effeminacy, and would impudently say he wished he could in like manner satisfy the cravings of his Stomach. Χειρουργῶν τε ἐν τῷ μέσῳ συνεχές, εἶδε ἡν, ἔλεγε, καὶ τὴν κοιλίαν παρῆρται· λαμβάνον τὴν λιμὴν παύσασθαι. Cumque ante ora omnium turpiter sepe operaretur, utinam liceret, ojebat, perfricatio ventre a fame conquiescere (72). He gloried in this Impudence, pretending to find in himself, and without any charges, what brings other Men to a thousand Expences and Ravages. He added, that if all the World had been like him, Troy had not been taken, nor Priam murdered upon the Altar of Jupiter. Οὐ γὰρ εἶδε αὐτὸν ἑδαιμόσει ἐλθεῖν ἀπερδισίαν ἐνεκεν, ἀλλὰ παύζων ἔλεγε, ἀπανταχῶ παρῆρται αὐτὸν τὴν ἀπερδίστην παρῆρται. Neque enim usquam illi eundem erat ob rem venerem, sed jocans dicebat ubique sibi adesse venerem gratis (73). He endeavoured to justify himself from Nature and Mythology. He alledged the Example of some Fishes. Ἐφ' οὗ δὲ τὸς ἰχθύδας σχεδὸν τι φρονιμωτέρως φαίνεται τὸν ἀνδρῶπων ὅταν γὰρ δύνανται τὸ σπέρμα ἀποβαλεῖν ἐλθόντες ἔξω πρηνῶσθαι πρὸς τὸ τελεῖν. Dicebat autem et pisces nonnihil prudentiores apparere quam homines. Quum enim illis opus est ut semen emittant, egredi et sese affricare ad aspera (74). He urged also the Example of Pan. He said, that Mercury pitying his Son Pan, who ran Night and Day over the Mountains mad for Love of a Mistress he could not enjoy, (it was the Eccho), taught him this way of Relief, and that Pan taught it afterwards to the Shepherds (75). Martial, as lewd as he was, understood the Voice of Nature, better than this Philosopher.

Ipam crede tibi NATURAM dicere rerum, Istud quod digitis, Pontice, perdis, homo est.

Thus he speaks, in the Forty second Epigram of the ninth Book, to a Man who followed the Maxims of Diogenes. This filthiness is to be found, not only in the two Authors I have cited, but also in Athenæus (76), in Plutarch (77), in St Chrysostom's Homily upon the Martyr Babylas, in the Thirty fourth Homily of the same Father upon St Matthew, in the Antologia, in Galen, &c. It is very surprising therefore that Erasmus, who was so well acquainted with the Babylas of St Chrysostom (78), should be so grossly mistaken on the place where Diogenes Laërtius mentions the impure

(65) Τολαύση τὴν προσὶν ἰσχυρὴν διὰ τὸν ἐν τῷ λόγῳ. Τὰτα Διογένης sermonibus illecebra inerat. Id. n. 76.

(66) Plutarch in Alexandro, pag. 701, & de de Fort. aut Virt. Alexandri, pag. 331, affirmat, that Onesicritus, one of Alexander's Court, had been the Disciple of Diogenes.

(67) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 76.

(68) Id. ib.

(69) Id. n. 69.

(70) Εἰδὼς δὲ πάντα τοῖς ἐν τῷ μέσῳ καὶ τὰ δαιμόνια καὶ τὰ ἀπορδις. Solebat autem omnia palam facere & que ad Cicerem & que ad Venerem pertinent. Id. ibid.

(71) Terent. in Prologo Andrie, ver. 16.

(72) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 69, and also 46.

(73) Dio Chryf. Orat. 6, pag. m. 90.

(74) Id. ibid.

(75) Idem. ibid.

(76) Athen.

(77) Plut. de Stoicor. Repug. pag. 1044.

(78) See the Remark [C] of the Article BABYLAS.

(f) See Remark [K], at the end.
(g) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 30.

bad Reasons [M]. He had some illustrious Disciples (f), and wrote many Books (g); but it is questioned whether the Tragedies, that went under his Name, were his. One cannot certainly tell whether he was an Atheist [N]; but it is certain that his Precepts Practice of Diogenes. It can hardly be imagined, if one did not see it with ones Eyes, that Erasmus could have made such a Blunder. He thought Diogenes Laërtius had said, that his Cynic, having applied himself to bodily Labour, and having by this means got a very good Appetite, wished he could satisfy his Belly by rubbing it. Erasmus discovers in this the humour of studious Persons, who are sorry that their bodily wants take them off from their Books, and he places this Saying among the Apophthegms of Diogenes. He has been cruelly censured for it by Robertel, and very ill defended by Nannius. Erasmus's words are (79). 'Quum in foro in conspectu omnium fuisset operatus, utinam quoque liceat (inquit) sic perfricō ventre à fame esse quietum, sentiens agitatione corporis acui stomachi orem, à qua necessitate cupiebat esse liber.' Itidem studiosi graviter ferunt, à literis naturæ necessitatibus advocari. Here are two Verses out of the Antibologia.

Πάντ' ἄρα Διογένης ἐρυγαν τάδε τὸν δ' ἐμύ-ναλον

Ἥειδεν παλάμη λαίδος ἢ χατῶν.

Omnia sane Diogenes effugit hæc: nuptias verò
Perfricta dextra, Laide nihil opus habens.

(80) The Scab of Agathias gives a Catalogue of many Inconveniences a Man is exposed to, that devotes himself to the fair Sex, and which Diogenes delivered himself from. I am surprized that Galen should rather endeavour to extenuate than condemn this Crime. He says that this Cynic Philosopher, though the firmest of all Men against the pleasures of Sense, yet tasted that of Love, not thro' the allurements of Voluptuousness, but to avoid the mischief that a Retentio seminis usually causes. A Woman of the Town had made an Appointment to meet him, but staying too long, he could not have patience, and . . . ; afterwards when she came, he sent her back, telling her, he had already took care of it, and had no occasion for her.

Βραδύνοσις αὐτῆς, ἀπετρίλατο τὸ σπέρμα προσαπτόμενος τῇ χειρὶ τὸ αἰδοῖον καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα παραγενομένην ἀπέπεμψε, εἰπὼν τὴν χείρα φάσαι τὸν ὑμναῖον ἄσαι. Cum diutius essaret ipse manu pudendis admota semen excussit, ac venientem deinde mulierculam remisit, inquit, manus hymenæum celebrando prævenit te (81). He did not serve the celebrated Courtesan Lais after this Manner. The scandalous Chronicle says, that this Woman who by her Charms drew so many fine People to her, and who set so high a price upon her Favours, bestowed them freely upon our Cynic, as slovenly as he was with his dusty Feet (82). She permitted him to enjoy her for nothing: Σὺ μὲν αὐτῇ τοσούτον ἀργύριον δίδως, ἢ δὲ προῖκα Διογένης τῷ κυνὶ συγκαλίσται. You give her so much Money, said Aristippus's Footman to him, and she lets that Dog Diogenes tumble with her without a Farthing (83). We shall see Aristippus's answer in the Article
L A I S (84).

(82) He always went bare footed.
Dio Chrysost.
Orat. 6, pag. 89.

(83) Athen. lib. 23, cap. 6, pag. 583.

(84) Rem. [F].

[M] For which he gave very bad Reasons. I have mentioned them in the beginning of the preceed-Remark, and shall speak more fully of the same in the Remarks of the Article HIPPARCHIA.

[N] We cannot certainly tell whether he was an Atheist. For they bring nothing but dubious Proofs of it. Father Garasse alleges two: one that he laughed at the Gods which were commonly adored by the People; the other, that he taught that we ought not to be ashamed of doing whatever Nature dictates to us (85). The first of these Proofs is impertinent; for nothing was more worthy a Philosopher, fully persuaded of the Existence of the true God, than to laugh at the Superstitions of the Pagans. The second Proof is not conclusive, since it is possible to believe a God, and at the same time be persuaded that shame is only founded upon a positive Law. Did not the Adamites maintain their Errors by Scripture misunderstood? They were not therefore Atheists. But here are other Proofs of Diogenes's Atheism. I.

He said, when he saw Tutors, Physicians, and Philosophers, that Man was the wisest of all Animals; but when he saw Interpreters of Dreams (86), Diviners, those that gave credit to them, the Covetous, and the Ambitious, he thought Man was the most foolish of all Beings (87). II. He refused to be initiated, and when they told him that those, who had that advantage in this World, reigned in the other; he replied, that nothing would be more ridiculous than to see Aggeilaus and Epaminondas in the Mire, whilst many initiated Scoundrels would sit upon the Throne of the Blessed (88). III. They impute to him the Raillery I have mentioned in the Article of DIAGORAS (89) viz. that many more perish notwithstanding their Vows, than those whose Prayers are heard (90). IV. He said that the long Prosperity of Harpalus bore Witness against the existence of God (91). 'Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere solebat Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo foelix habebatur, contra Deos testimonium dicere, quod in illa fortuna tandiu viveret. . . . Improborum igitur prosperitates secundæque res redarguunt, ut Diogenes dicebat, vim omnem Deorum ac potestatem (92). Of these four Proofs, the two first are so weak that they deserve no Examination. The third is a little better, but not a convincing one: for how many people are there now a days, who, notwithstanding they are Papists, might think and say, when they see the Ex voto's of our Lady of Loretto, what they make Diogenes say upon the Ex voto's of Samostracia? There are so many other Proofs of the existence of God, besides those which are drawn from the efficacy of Prayers, that a Man, who should reject this, might nevertheless be fully persuaded, that there is a God who governs all Things. If the fourth was a convincing Proof, Claudian would also be reckoned an Atheist, who said the very same thing of Ruffinus, that Diogenes said of Harpalus (93). He said the Punishment of Ruffinus was a Sentence of Abolution for the Gods: therefore he thought that Ruffinus, during his Prosperity, bore Witness against the Gods. Malherbe, a Christian Poet, had the same Thought, concerning the Marshal d'Ancre (94). If all those, who have said that the long Prosperity of the wicked is a Reason to doubt of a Providence, were Atheists, there would have been abundance of Atheists among Authors; but they are two very different things to say, such a Fact furnishes me with a strong Objection against the existence of God, and to say, That Objection convinces me that there is no God.

What has been said may be confirmed by three Observations. I. The Ancients, as far as I can remember, who have treated of Atheists, have never reckoned Diogenes the Cynic for one of that number (95). II. St Jerom ascribes a Discourse to this Philosopher, which favours of the Immortality of the Soul (96). III. Among the witty Sayings of Diogenes, there are some which seem to prove that he believed a God. Being asked one day, if he believed there were Gods? How can I doubt of it, said he to the Person that asked him, since I am persuaded they hate thee (97). Another time, perceiving that a Woman transported with Devotion had prostrated herself before the Gods in a very indecent Posture, he ran to her, and told her that God was every where present, and that she should take care not to behave indecently. Θεσάμενος ποτὲ γυναῖκα ἀσχημονέστερον τοῖς θεοῖς προσπίπτουσαν, βολόμενος αὐτῆς περιελεῖν τὴν δεισιδαιμονίαν κατὰ φησι Ζεῦλος ὁ Περγαιός, προσελθὼν εἶπεν, ἢ εὐλαβῆ ὁ γυναι μὴ ποτὲ θεῷ ἐπισθῆν ἐσώτος (παύ-τα γὰρ εἰν αὐτῇ πλήρη) ἀσχημονήσης. In-spexerat mulierem inbonestius coram diis procedentem, ejus superstitionem auferre volens, ut Zoilus Pergeus ait, accurrit dicens, non vereris mulier ne forte stante post tergum Deo, (cuncta enim plena ipso sunt) inboneste te babeas (98). It must be confessed ingenuously, that the last of these three Observations has no great strength in it; for these two Sayings of Diogenes might be nothing but meer Raillery, and indeed the first is attributed to a professed Atheist (99). Generally speaking, it cannot be concluded from a Man's witty

(86) See, in Diog. Laërt. n. 40, what he says against those who are terrified at their Dreams. You are not afraid, says he, of what you do when awake, and yet are concerned for what you dream of in your Sleep.

(87) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 24.

(88) Id. n. 39.

(89) Rem. [I], Citat. (50).

(90) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 58.

(91) See the Article HARPALUS, Rem. [I].

(92) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 3, cap. 34.

(93) Abbas, hunc tandem Rufini pœnis tumultum, a mœnibus vitæ Deos.

(94) See the Article CONCINI, Rem. [F].

(95) See Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 2, cap. 31; also Petri Petiti Observationes Miscell. lib. 1, cap. 1.

(96) See, above, Rem. [H], Citat. (43).

(97) Diog. Laërt. n. 42.

(98) Id. n. 37.

(99) To Theodoros. See Laërt. lib. 6, n. 42.

cepts of Morality were very good in some things [O], and appeared so to several Fathers of the Church. His way of confuting the Philosopher, who denied the Existence of Motion, has been admired [P]. But I will shew that his Answer was much more sophistical than the Arguments of that Philosopher.

witty Sayings, whether he has really any Religion or not: for the Passion for a witty Saying is commonly so strong, that Men had rather gratify it than preserve a Friend, or prevent an unhappy turn of Fortune. Rather than lose a witty Saying, a merry Man, who believes a God, will speak like a prophane Man (100), and a prophane Man will speak like one who believes a God. Therefore I do not depend upon the Hypothesis of our Cynic, All Things are full of GOD; for he made no other use of it than to build a jest upon it. The Principle, by which he proved that all things belong to the Wife, would not induce me to think him no Atheist. All things, said he, belong to the Gods, now wise Men are the Friends of the Gods, and all Things are common among Friends, therefore all Things belong to wise Men. This Argument, in the Mouth of such a Scoffer as Diogenes, is no better a warrant of his Religion, than if Bio the Borysthenite should alledge the Dilemma which I have already mentioned (101).

To conclude with the Text of this Remark: It cannot be certainly said whether Diogenes was an Atheist or no. La Mothe le Vayer goes no farther than this in his Apology for this Cynic. I would not affirm, says he (102), that Diogenes was not as great an Atheist as that Writer makes him, nothing making me suspend my belief in that respect, but the Authority of the Fathers who speak so favourably of him; but to maintain he was one, because he laughed at the Gods of the Populace, is a very wrong Consequence. Observe that this Man, whose belief of the existence of a God is so uncertain, did nevertheless give some very excellent precepts of Morality. I shall say something of it in the following Remark.

[O] In some things his moral Precepts were very good. They were abominable upon some Heads, as we have already seen (103); but it cannot be denied that upon others they were very excellent. He preached against Luxury, Avarice, Ambition, and Revenge, as strongly as could be. He shewed the Vanity of human Occupations chiefly by this Reason, that we neglect to cultivate the Mind, being wholly intent on external Things. For instance, he censured the Grammarians, who carefully seek after the Misfortunes of Ulysses (104), whilst they are ignorant of their own Disorders. To use the Words of a celebrated Author: 'As to his Philosophic System, says he (105), which concerned . . . nothing but meer Morality, nothing can better serve to acquit his Professors of the vile Impurities which are laid to their charge, than the single Approbation of the Stoics, who were acknowledged to be the strictest of all the Philosophers, and who would have been far from giving their Suffrage in Favour of Persons that led such abominable Lives. Now it is well known they lived in a good understanding with the Cynics, as having one and the same end, to live according to Virtue, in which they placed their supreme Good: therefore the same Stoics called Cynism † the shortest way to attain to that exalted Virtue . . . As to the Person of Diogenes, the greatest Men of antiquity were admirers of him. Alexander had such a Value for him, that he protested, having discoursed with him, that if he had not been Alexander, he would have been Diogenes. Seneca is never weary of praising him, and having called him virum ingen-tis animi, in his Book of the Tranquillity of Life, he adds this great Encomium to the rest, that whoever doubts of the Felicity of Diogenes may as well doubt of the State and Blessedness of the immortal Gods. St John Chrysostom proposes him for a Pattern of many religious Virtues, in his second Book against the Despisers of a monastic Life. St Jerome † speaks honourably of him; he calls him greater and more powerful than Alexander, displaying all his Virtues before Jovinian, to make him ashamed (106). I shall add but one thing to this Passage, which is, that Dio Chrysostom in some of his Orations proposes the most rigid maxims of Morality under the name of Diogenes.

[P] His way of confuting the Philosopher, who denied the existence of Motion, has been admired. After having patiently heard the Lecture of this Philosopher, he took two or three turns in the Auditory (107). See the Remark [K] of the Article ZENO Eleates, where we shew, that he neither removed the difficulty, nor understood it.

(104) He laughed at the Grammarians, says Mr Moreri, who seek for the Errors of Ulysses, and neglect their own. The Word Errors is not current there. It was not the Faults of Ulysses, but his Adventures from Place to Place, that the Grammarians looked for.

(105) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. V, pag. 127, 128.

† Σύντομον ἐστὶν ἀρετῆς, Diogenes in Mened. in Zenone.

† Lib. 2. contra Jovin. cap. 9.

(106) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. V, pag. 129.

(107) Consult Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 39, compared with Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrohon. Hypotypos. lib. 1, cap. 22, & lib. 3, cap. 8.

DIOGENES, a Native of Apollonia, in the Island of Crete [A], was a considerable Man among the Natural Philosophers, who flourished in Ionica before Socrates taught

[A] He was a Native of Apollonia in the Island of Crete. We should not have known this if we had not had what remains of Stephanus Byzantinus; who is the only Author that can be quoted for it. He mentions Twenty five Cities named Apollonia, and he says the Twenty third was in the Isle of Crete, that it was formerly called Elutbera, and that Diogenes the Philosopher was born there (1). Meursius did not remember this Particular when he made a list of all the illustrious Men of Crete (2); for he has not put our Diogenes among them, though he made use of this Passage of Stephanus Byzantinus in a Chapter of the same Book (3). This Omission is a much less fault than the Error we find in the Jesuit Lesca-potier. He pretends, that the Diogenes Apolloniates mentioned by Cicero is Diogenes of Apollonia. Diogenes ex Apollonia urbe Illyrica, bodie Aulona (4). — That Diogenes, whom Cicero calls Apolloniates, is Diogenes of Apollonia a City of Illyricum now called Aulona. Mr Ménage falsely imagines, that certain Authors have said that this Diogenes was of Smyrna. He makes Diogenes Laërtius one of these Authors, supposing it should be read, in the Life of Anaxarchus, not ἐτος δὴν καὶ Διογένης τῷ Σμυρναίῳ (5), as it is in the printed Copies, but ἐτος δὴν καὶ Διογένης τῷ Σμυρναίῳ: hic (Anaxarchus) Diogenis Smyrnaei auditor fuit. So far he is right, and the Proofs he alledges are very good. He quotes a Passage of Clemens Alexandrinus (6), and a Passage out Eusebius, where he says, that Anaxarchus was the Disciple of Diogenes of Smyrna (7). But when he adds that the Diogenes, who is named Σμυρναῖος, in the Life of Anaxarchus, is the same with him that, in the preceding Chapter, has the Surname of Ἀπολλωνιδῆς, he is mistaken. Notandum autem, says he (8), Diogenem Smyrnaeum à Laërtio hoc loco appellari qui supra Apolloniates eidem dictus fuit, non enim diversi sunt Smyrnae-us & Apolloniates. . . . It must be observed, that this is the same Diogenes, whom Laërtius here calls Smyrnaeus, with that Diogenes whom he before surnamed Apolloniates, they being the same Person. To understand this mistake aright, two things must be observed. I, Diogenes Laërtius had said that Diogenes of Apollonia was the Disciple of Anaximenes, and Cotemporary with Anaxagoras (9). Is it credible that a few lines after he should make Anaxarchus his Disciple who, as he says expressly, had several Conversations with Alexander? From the Death of Anaxagoras to the Reign of Alexander, there had been three Successions of Philosophers at Athens: Archelaus, who had been the Disciple of Anaxagoras, left his Chair to Socrates, who, after he had sat long in it, left it to Plato, and Plato had Alexander's Preceptor for his Disciple. Chronology must be strained to find a Disciple of the Disciple of Anaximenes, who followed the Court of that Macedonian King. In the second Place, we see that the same Clemens Alexandrinus, who clearly insinuates that Diogenes of Apollonia was the Disciple of Anaximenes (10), and consequently one of the Members of the Ionian Sect, observes expressly that Diogenes the Smyrnesan, the Disciple of Metrodorus, who had been the Disciple of Protagoras, was of the Eleatic Sect, and taught Anaxarchus (11). How could he imagine that the same Philosopher had been the Disciple of Anaximenes, and the Disciple of Protagoras's Disciple?

(8) Ménage. in Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 58, pag. 423.

(9) Diog. Laërt. lib. 1. c. 1. lib. 6, n. 58, pag. 423.

(10) Clem. Alex. in Protrept. pag. 42. C.

(11) Clem. Alex. Stromat. lib. 1, pag. 301.

[B] He

(a) See Rem. [A] of the Article ARCHELAUS, the Philosopher.

taught Philosophy at Athens. He was a Disciple of Anaximenes, and there is some Probability that he taught after him in the Ionian School (a). He rectified in some measure his Professor's Opinion concerning the first Cause [B]; for he taught that the

Air

[B] He rectified in some Measure his Professor's Opinion concerning the first Cause. I know no Author that has given a detail of this Matter to well as St. Austin. 'Ille (Anaximander) Anaximenem discipulum, & successorem reliquit: qui omnes rerum causas infinito aëri dedit, nec Deos negavit, aut tacuit: non tamen ab ipsis aërem factum, sed ipsos ex aëre ortos credidit. Anaxagoras verò ejus auditor, harum rerum omnium, quas videmus, effectorem, divinum animum sensit: & dixit, ex infinita materia, quæ constaret dissimilibus inter se particulis, rerum omnium genera pro modulis & speciebus propriis singula fieri, sed animo faciente divino. Diogenes quoque, Anaximenis alter auditor, aërem quidem dixit, rerum esse materiam, de qua omnia fierent: sed eum esse compotem divinæ rationis sine qua nihil ex eo fieri posset (12). — Anaximander left his Scholar and Successor Anaximenes, who ascribed the cause of all Things to infinite Air; he did not indeed deny the Being of Gods, but thought that the Air was not created, but that they derived their Origin from it. Anaxagoras, his Scholar, made a Divine Intelligence to be the Author of every thing we see, and said that out of infinite Matter, which was composed of dissimilar Particles, all things were created by this Divine Intelligence according to their different Modes, and Species. Diogenes, another Scholar of Anaximenes, said indeed, the Air was the Matter from which all Things were made, but that it was endued with Divine Reason, without which it could create nothing.' Cicero gives a much shorter account of this Doctrine of Diogenes. Quid? aër, says he (13), quo Diogenes Apolloniatus utitur Deo, quem sensum habere potest, aut quam formam Dei? — As to Air, which Diogenes makes his God, what sense or form of a God can it have? Lescapier the Jesuit finds a great deal of foul play in these words of Velleius the Epicurean, one of Cicero's Interlocutors. We shall see with what an Air he lectures him (14). 'Quandiu impones, Vellei, extinctis, sepulstique philosophis, qui reclamare non possunt, & illis errores affinges in quos nunquam impegerant? ecce hic quoque aërem Diogenis Apolloniatus Deum facis, quem ille pro Deo nunquam habuit: nam dixit quidem libro nono Laërtii, aërem esse στοιχείον i. e. elementum, non autem Deum, & libro octavo de Civitate Dei, capite secundo, aërem esse materiam rerum de qua omnia fierent; sed eum esse compotem divinæ rationis, sine qua nihil fieret. Jam verò in altissima illa, divinaque ratione frustra sensum, frustra figuram requiris, quæ, nisi in corporea natura, non inveniri, opinor, intelligis; est enim illa ratio divina mere spiritualis. — How long, O Velleius, will you trudge the memory of Philosophers laid long since in their Graves, and who cannot now answer for themselves? How long will you impute Errors to them into which they never fell? Lo, here you make Air to be the God of Diogenes the Apollonian, which he never dreamed of. He said indeed, in the ninth Book of Laërtius, the Air was an Element, but not a God, and in the eighth Book de Civitate Dei, that Air was the Matter whereof all things were made, but that it was endued with a Divine Reason, without which nothing could be made. But it is in vain to call out for Sense or Figure in that sublime and divine Reason, which, as you cannot be ignorant, are only to be found in corporeal Natures, but That divine Reason is altogether spiritual.' The Jesuit's complaint is not just; for it is certain that the Passage in Cicero contains all the substance and force of that of St. Austin, and terminates in the same sense, which is to say that, according to the Hypothesis of Diogenes, the Air was God. He taught, if we may believe St. Austin, that there were two things in the Air. First, Matter, of which all the Bodies of the Universe might be produced. Secondly, a divine Virtue, without which nothing could be produced out of the said Matter. Was not this to make of the Air, and a divine Virtue, a Whole or Compound, in which, if Air was the Matter, a divine Virtue was the Soul or Form. Now, as it is the Form which specifies and denominates the Compound, it follows that Air, animated by a Virtue, or a divine Nature, ought to be called God; and consequently, when Cicero supposes, that, according to Diogenes, the Air was God, he supposes no more than what necessarily results from the Explication of the Doctrine of this Philosopher, as St. Augustin has given it. The Objection which the Jesuit sounds upon the word στοιχείον is null; for, as I have already said, our Diogenes admitted two Things in the Air, Matter and an efficient Cause, and he united them intimately together (15); upon which Supposition, the Air, as Matter, was the Element, or the στοιχείον of the different Bodies of the Universe (16); Yet this did not hinder, but that the Air, considered jointly with the divine Virtue it was endued with was God. This may be confirmed by a new Observation. By the words of St. Augustin we may judge, that this Reason, or divine Virtue, which Diogenes joined to the Air, was rather an Attribute than a form or a Soul distinct from the Air; that is to say, that, according to Diogenes, there was but one Substance in the Air, which was at the same time the material Principle of all Things, and the Reason, Wisdom, Intelligence, which, as the efficient Cause, directed the Production of all Things; Therefore it is with all the justice imaginable, that the Velleius of Cicero charges Diogenes with having taught that the Air is God. Aristotle will wonderfully favour those who understand St. Augustin's Phrase in this manner. He informs us, that, according to Diogenes, the Soul of Man was of Air, and that it had a knowledge and self-Motion by virtue of its Aerial Nature; its Knowledge proceeded from this, that the Air is a principle of all Things: its moving Virtue was founded on the Air's being the most subtle of all Beings. διογένης δ' ὥσπερ καὶ ἑτεροὶ τινες, ἀέρα τῶν οὐρανίων πάντων λεπτομερέστατον εἶναι, καὶ ἀρχὴν καὶ διὰ τὸ τοῦτο γινώσκουσιν τε καὶ κινεῖν τὴν ψυχὴν ἢ μὲν πρῶτον εἶσι, καὶ ἐκ τούτου τὰ λοιπὰ γινώσκουσιν ἢ δὲ λεπτομερέστατον κινήτικόν εἶναι. Diogenes autem, sicut & alii quidam, aërem ipsam censuit esse: hunc subtilissimam substantiam, rerumque principium esse putans. Ideo cognoscere atque movere, animam dixit: hoc quidem cognoscere, quo primum est, & ex hoc ipso cætera constant: hoc autem esse motivum, quo subtilissimum est (17). — Diogenes, and many others, thought it, the Soul, to be Air, as being the most subtle and principle of all Things; and that it thence had the Power of thinking and moving: of the former as being the first, and of the latter as being the most subtle. These words of Aristotle plainly shew that Diogenes gave to the Air the Nature of a first Principle, That of First Mover, Knowledge, and the highest degree of Subtlety, as Attributes, which constituted, per modum unius, one only and identical Substance, which was God. From whence it follows, that his System hardly differed at all from Spinozism: God was made by it to be at the same time the material, and efficient, cause of all Things; he was the immanent cause of all Beings; he produced in himself all the Bodies of the Universe, That infinite number of Worlds which Diogenes acknowledged (18). Observe, by the way, that the Verses of Sidonius Apollinaris, which I quote in another Place (19), agree infinitely better to the Doctrine of Diogenes, than to That of Archelaus to whom Savaron applied them. Justus Lipsius had a good deal of Reason to take them for the Description of Diogenes's Opinion (20).

Let us see how he philosophized upon the Production of the World: his Thoughts in certain Respects, and in the main, are conformable enough to the Hypothesis of Mr. Des Cartes. All things being in Motion, says he, some were condensed, and others rarified: now in the Places where the Condensation was made, bodies wheeled about, they turned round, and drew others along with them in their Revolutions; what was highest and most subtle mounted upwards, and formed the Sun in the superior Region. I shall copy his Greek for my warrant. διογένης δ' ἀπαλαυνιδίτης, ἀέρα ἰσίδεται στοιχείον κινεῖσθαι δὲ τὰ πάντα, ἀπείρους τε εἶναι τὰς κόσμους κοσμοποιεῖ δὲ ὅτως ὅτι τὰ πάντως κινεῖσθαι, καὶ ἢ μὲν ἀεὶ, ἢ δὲ σικνὴ γινώμενη, ὅπως (15) Aërem compotem divinæ rationis. August. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8, cap. 2, pag. 711.

(16) Note, That, according to Diogenes, there was no difference between ἀρχή, Principle, and στοιχείον, Element: for he acknowledged but one Element. Citat. (22).

(17) Aristot. lib. 1. de Anima, cap. 2, pag. 479. E, Tom. II. Oper.

(18) Diog. Laërte lib. 9, n. 57.

(19) Citat. (9), in the Article ARCHELAUS, the Philosopher.

(20) Lipsius Manuduct. ad Philosoph. Stoic. lib. 1, Dissert. 8, pag. m. 645.

(12) August. de Civitate Dei, lib. 8, cap. 2, pag. m. 711.

(13) Cicero de Nat. Deorum, lib. 2, cap. 12.

(14) Lescapier. in Cicero. de Nat. Deor. lib. 1, pag. 43, 49.

Air was the Matter of all Beings; acknowledging, at the same time, that nothing could be produced out of this Matter without the divine Virtue, which he attributed to the Air. Anaximenes had not explained the Generation of things in this manner. According to him, Air was the sole and universal Cause of all things, the Gods themselves having been produced from it [C]. Cicero has been wrongfully accused of not reporting faithfully this Doctrine of Diogenes (b). It cannot be doubted that Plutarch sometimes alledged the Opinions of this Philosopher [D], when he barely observes, that Diogenes taught this, or that. It is a very ill way of quoting, since there were many illustrious Philosophers of the Name Diogenes. He that is the Subject of this Article had a great deal of Eloquence (c). His Merit exposed him very much to the Envy of some Persons at Athens (d); so that he ran the Hazard of his Life there. The beginning of his Work is still preserved; by which Specimen we have an advantageous Idea of his Capacity. We see there that it was his Opinion, that a Doctor should first lay down incontestible Principles, and chuse a Style full of Gravity and Simplicity (e). I say nothing of the Opinions imputed to him by Diogenes Laërtius: they may be seen in Moreri. His Opinion upon the Origin and Distribution of the Winds is found in Aristotle (f). Clemens Alexandrinus (g) relates what he said of the Nature of the Seed, and from whence he derived the Etymology of the Word ἀσπιδία, that is to say, venereal Affairs. There is some Conformity between the Doctrine of this Philosopher and that of Mr Des Cartes concerning the Generation of the World (h).

(b) See Rem. [B] Cicero. (14).

(c) Diog. Laërt. lib. 9, n. 57.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Idem. ibid. and lib. 6, n. 81.

(f) Aristot. Hist. Anim. lib. 3, cap. 2.

(g) Clem. Alex. Paedag. lib. 1, pag. 105.

(h) See Rem. [B].

συνεχίσθη τὸ πᾶν, συνεσθὲν παύσαι, καὶ αὐτὰ τὰ λοιπὰ, κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον, τὰ κρυπτάτα τὴν ἀνὰ τὸν λαβόντα, τὸν ἥλιον ἀποτελέσαι. Diogenes Apolloniata, Aërem elementum ponit, moveri autem universa, & infinitos esse mundos affirmat. Cæterum ejusmodi somniat eorum molitionem: scilicet cum universum ita moveretur, ut rarius hic, alibi densius fieret, ubicunque major densitas contingeret, ibi convulsionem quandam effecisse, tum similem in modum cætera: quæ autem omnium levissimæ partes essent, eas regione superiori occupatâ Solem produxisse (21). — Diogenes the Apollonian makes Air the Element, puts all Things in Motion, and maintains an Infinity of Worlds, which he forms in this manner; all Things being in Motion, some parts were condensed, and others rarified: where the Condensation prevailed, there arose a circular Motion, by which means the biggest Parts ascending to the superior Region produced the Sun. It is not easy to reconcile this Hypothesis with what Aristotle, as we have seen above, says of the Opinions of this Philosopher. He charges him with teaching, that the Air is the most subtle of all Beings. How then could he say after that, that, in the beginning of the World, there were some Bodies that were condensed, and others rarified; that which is subtle, and attenuated to the utmost Degree, is not susceptible of Rarefaction. I see but one way to remove this difficulty; which is to suppose, that, at the first Agitation of the Air, it thickened, as we see Wine will grow foul upon shaking the Cask. The Motion continued, and, in the Progress of the Agitation, some parts were made thicker, and others clarified themselves. The latter did not attain a degree of Rarefaction, superior to the essential subtilty of the first Principle, but only superior to the Density, to which the whole Mass of the Air was reduced by the first Motion. If we had the writings of Diogenes, no doubt we should see that he had obviated or explained all these sorts of difficulties: but as his System is only known to us by a very small number of scattered Fragments, we are forced to feel in the dark, when we would attempt to adjust the disjointed Parts of it. Note, that Aristotle (22) praises him for having acknowledged, that, if all things were not made from one single Principle, there could have been no such thing as Action and Re-action; for cold and hot cannot be metamorphosed into one another: therefore they require a common Subject, which may be successively hot and cold. Aristotle found his account in this general Notion; he, who deprived the four Elements of the nature of a first material principle, to bestow it upon one single Being, which he called first Matter.

I believe that Diogenes Laërtius is mistaken when he says, that Diogenes of Apollonia admitted an infinite Vacuum (23). I rather chuse to follow Plutarch, who assures us, that all the Philosophers from Thales to Plato rejected a Vacuum (24).

[C] Air was the only Cause . . . the Gods themselves were produced from it.] It is a very strange thing, that ever there should have been any Philosophers blind enough to assign so low an Original to God. Order required their affirming, that God produced Bodies, and, on the contrary, some of them asserted that Bodies produced God. Can the Effect be more perfect than the Cause? Therefore an intelligent Nature cannot be caused by brute Matter. I know not whether the Experience of the human Species has not obscured the Notions of common Sense. They saw Heroes, wise Men, the greatest Men, proceed, from whence? The Eyes, the Imagination can hardly bear the object, so vile, so distasteful, so hideous it is. Nevertheless there you must find the Principles of the greatest Souls, unless God reveals to us, that he creates a Spirit to unite it to the Machine of the human Body. We shall see in another place (25), if what passes in the Propagation of the reasonable Animal might not cause that great Mistake in the minds of those, who have vented so many Chimeras concerning the Origin of the Gods.

[D] It cannot be doubted but that Plutarch sometimes alledged the Opinions of this Philosopher. I consider here only his Books of the Opinions of the Philosophers. The Places, where he relates the sentiments of Diogenes, as far as I can find, are these; the first, the eighth, and the thirteenth Chapters of the second Book: the fifth and sixteenth Chapters of the fourth Book: the fifteenth, twentieth, and twenty third Chapters of the fifth Book. I am persuaded he almost always means Diogenes of Apollonia, and I should think so without any exception, if Mr du Rondel had not writ to me, that we ought rather to believe, the Passage hereafter mentioned (26) concerns Diogenes the Cynic. This Passage is in the twentieth Chapter of the fifth Book of Plutarch, and seems to signify that the Diogenes, he cites, deprived the brute Beasts of Sensation. There is one Circumstance, which is a strong Temptation to think that he refers, in that place, to Diogenes of Apollonia. We have seen before (27) that he said the Soul was Air; now the Diogenes of this Passage in Plutarch taught that Animals partake of Understanding, and the Air (28). This was the Language that Diogenes of Apollonia ought to speak, being only desirous to take from Brutes actual Intelligence and Sensation; but not the Soul or Principle of Intelligence and Sensation. It plainly appears that this was his design: he admitted a Soul in Brutes, but he thought that the grossness and humidity of their Organs blunted the Activity of it. Francis de Fongrolles, who has translated into French, and paraphrased Diogenes Laërtius, ascribes this sentiment to Diogenes of Apollonia. He thought, says he (29), . . . that all sorts of Animals had Understanding, but that the greatest part of them being of a gross Constitution, have not the free use of Reason, no more than mad Persons, through certain Impediments. It is plain he aims at the Passage in Plutarch; but he does not give it us with any sincerity.

(25) In the Article JUPITER, Rem. [G].

(26) In the Article PEREIRA, Rem. [E].

(27) In Rem. [B], Cicero. (17).

(28) Marséus μὴν αὐτὸς τὸ νοῦν καὶ αἴσθησιν. Rationis & acris participes eas esse. Plut. de Plac. Philo. lib. 5, cap. 20, pag. 909.

(29) François de Fongrolles, Addit. a Diog. Laërt. pag. 655.

(21) Euseb. Præpar. Evangel. lib. 1, cap. 8, pag. 25, B.

(22) Aristot. de Generat. & Corrupt. lib. 1, c. 6.

(23) Diog. Laërt. lib. 9, n. 57.

(24) Plut. de Placitis Philo. lib. 1, cap. 18, pag. 883.

(25) Diog. Laërt. lib. 6, n. 81. See also Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 512.

DIODORUS, a Philosopher of the Sect of the Stoics, was surnamed the Babylonian (a), though he was not of Babylon, but of Seleucia upon the Tigris. The Neighbourhood of these two Cities was the Cause of this Surname (b); besides that sometimes

(b) Id. Diog. ib.

(c) See Bochart. Geogr. Sacr. lib. 2, cap. 8.

(d) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1, cap. 3.

the latter has been called by the Name of the former (c). This Philosopher was the Disciple of Chrysippus (d), and composed several Works [A]. His Reputation must have been very great, since he was deputed Ambassador to Rome by the Athenians with Carneades, the Head of the Academics, and Critolaus, the Chief of the Peripatetic School. I have elsewhere mentioned this Embassy (e). Our Diogenes lived Eighty eight Years (f), and philosophized to the end of his Life (g). He gave an Instance of great Moderation [B] when an insolent young Fellow spit in his Face. I think he ought not to be confounded with him that is censured by Athenæus [C]. But I do not distinguish him from

(e) In the Article CARNEADES, Rem. [F].

(f) Lucian. in Macrob. pag. 641, Tom. II.

(g) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. 7.

(1) Cicero lib. 1, de Divinat. c. 3.

(2) Athen. lib. 4, cap. 19, pag. 168.

(3) Id. lib. 12, cap. 6, pag. 526.

(4) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1, cap. 15.

(5) Id. de Officiis, lib. 3, cap. 12.

(6) Id. ib. c. 23.

(7) Seneca de Ira, lib. 3, cap. 38, pag. m. 580.

[A] He composed several Works. A Treatise of Divination (1), another of Nobility (2), another of the Laws (3), another of Minerva. He explained Physically, in this latter, what was said of the extraordinary Birth of that Goddess. 'Quem (Chrysippum) Diogenes Babylonius consequens in eo libro qui inscribitur de Minerva partum Jovis ortumque virginis ad physiologiam traducens, disjungit à fabula (4). Whom (Chrysippus) Diogenes the Babylonian imitating in his Treatise which he intitles de Minerva, accounts for the delivery of Jupiter, and the Virgin's Birth, by natural Causes, and separates them from the Fable.' I know not in what Work he taught what Cicero observes: it relates to uprightness in dealing. His Morality in that Respect was a little less rigid than that of his Disciple Antipater. 'In hujusmodi causis aliud Diogeni Babylonio videri solet, magno & gravi Stoico, aliud Antipatro, discipulo ejus, homini acutissimo. Antipatro omnia patefacienda, ut ne quid omnino, quod venditor norit, emtor ignoret: Diogeni venditorem, quatenus jure civili constitutum sit, dicere vitia oportere, cetera sine invidiis agere, & quoniam vendat, velle quam optime vendere (5). — In cases of this nature, the Opinions of Diogenes the Babylonian, a great Stoic, and Antipater, his Scholar, a Man of nice Distinction, clash; Antipater was of Opinion, that there ought to be no secrets in Contracts, but that the Buyer ought to be acquainted with all the Imperfections in the commodity, as well as the Seller; Diogenes, on the contrary, thought that, so far as the Civil-Power had directed, the Seller ought to discover the Faults; in other Respects to act without fraud, and then to make the best of his Market.' Here is another Passage: 'Querit etiam (Hecaton in libro sexto de Officiis) si sapiens adulterinos nummos acciperet imprudens pro bonis: cum id resecerit, soluturum se eos, si cui debeat, pro bonis. Diogenes ait, Antipater negat, cui potius assentior. Qui vilius num fugiens vendat sciens, debeatne dicere. Non necesse putat Diogenes: Antipater viri boni existimat. Hæc sunt quasi controversa jura Stoicorum (6). — If a wise Man should inadvertently receive false Money for good, whether, when he knew it to be false, he should pay it to his Creditors for good. Diogenes allows it; Antipater, whose Opinions I prefer, disapproves it. Or if a Vintner, who knows his Wine is upon the fret, ought to tell it. Diogenes thinks it not necessary; Antipater thinks an honest Man would. These are the controverted points of Justice among the Stoics. I should imagine that Diogenes treated of these things in his Book of Laws.

[B] He gave an instance of great Moderation. Seneca will inform us of the Fact. 'Contumeliam tibi fecit aliquis. Num quid majorem quam Diogeni, Philosopho Stoico? cui de ira cum maxime differentis adolefcentis protervus inquit. Tulit hoc ille leniter ac sapienter, non quidem inquit, irascor: sed dubito tamen an irasci oporteat (7). — Suppose some Person has affronted you. Is this affront greater than what Diogenes the Stoic received? Whom an impertinent young Fellow spit upon as he was warmly declaiming upon Anger; the Philosopher bore it with prudence and patience. I am not angry, says he, but I doubt whether I should not be angry. I am not angry, said he, and yet I question whether I ought not to be angry; this was preaching by Example. He was reading a Lecture upon Anger; he was combating with this Passion in the Pulpit; nothing is more easy. They gave him an Opportunity to practise what he advised others to; an enormous affront was put upon him in the midst of his Sermon upon Patience, and he shewed no Relentment. Here was a practical Stoic: but a word escaped him, which did not perfectly quadrate with the Doctrine of his Sect. As a Stoic, he ought to have been well assured, that it was his Duty not to be angry.

[C] I think he is not to be confounded with him that Athenæus has censured. He mentions (8) one Diogenes an Epicurean Philosopher, a Native of Seleucia near Babylon: he mentions him, I say, as a Man of some Eloquence and Learning, but as immoral, envious, satirical, without sparing even Kings themselves in his jelling Humour (9). He made himself acceptable to a King of Syria, who was, notwithstanding, prepossessed with the precepts of the Stoics (10). 'Αναδοχὸς δ' ἐτύχωνε παρὰ τῷ βασιλεὺς καὶ τοῖς τοῖς ἀπὸ τῆς σοφίας λόγοις χαίοντι (11). Acceptus gratulæ regi fuit quamvis Stoicorum placitis gaudenti. It was Alexander Bala: This Philosopher, by a boldness which was not consistent with his Character, asked the King's leave one Day to dress himself in a Purple Robe and a Crown of Gold, in the midst of which appeared the Image of Virtue. The Prince made him a present of both: immediately after the Philosopher presented them to a Woman he loved. Alexander, being informed of it, invited some Philosophers, and other illustrious Persons to Dinner, and ordered Diogenes to sit at the Table with the Purple Garment, and the Crown of Gold. The Philosopher excused himself, as it would be an indecent thing. The King made a sign for the Music to enter, and among the rest appeared Diogenes's Mistress with the Purple Robe, and the Crown of Gold, he had presented to her. The Company fell a laughing. Diogenes waited till it was over, and then made a long Harangue in praise of that Woman. Antiochus, who succeeded Alexander (12), could not bear the abusive Tongue of this Philosopher; he ordered him to be put to Death (13). A great many things convince me that this account does not concern our Diogenes. In the first place Athenæus says expressly, that he that was beloved by Alexander King of Syria was of the Sect of the Epicureans: but that Prince's Prepossession in favour of the Stoics did not prevent his Friendship to him. This shews that he does not speak of a Philosopher, who was a Stoic in Theory, and an Epicurean in Practice; therefore he does not speak of the Disciple of Chrysippus, and Colleague of Carneades in the Embassy to Rome. In the second place Cicero assures us, that Diogenes the Stoic philosophized all his Life, that is to say, that he read Lectures in the Portico at Athens till his Death. 'Num Philosophorum principes, Pythagoram, Democritum, num Platonem, num Xenocratem, num postea Zenonem, Cleanthem, aut eum, quem vos etiam Romæ vidistis, Diogenem Stoicum, coëgit in studiis obmutescere fenestras? an non in omnibus his studiorum agitatio vitæ aequalis fuit (14)? — Can you say that any of the greatest Philosophers, Pythagoras, Democritus, Plato, Xenocrates, or, after them, Zeno, Cleanthes, or Diogenes the Stoic, whom ye also have seen at Rome, desisted from writing by reason of their old Age? Were not their Studies exactly measured by their Lives? Could he say this of a Philosopher, who, after his Embassy to Rome, had spent the rest of his Life in the Court of the Syrian Kings? In the third place the Diogenes of Athenæus was alive in the Year of Rome 610; for Antiochus, who put him to Death, began his Reign at that time. Now Diogenes the Stoic was dead when Cato said of him what I have just quoted from the Treatise de Senectute, and it is certain that the Epoch of that Work, by some Years, preceeded the 610th Year of Rome (15). Lastly, it is utterly improbable, if the celebrated Philosopher, whom the Republic of Athens sent to the Roman Senate, had sullied his Reputation by a shameful old Age, and by a violent, but justly deserved, Death, that no Author should have taken notice of it. Let us conclude then, that Athenæus did not speak of him, and that Jonstus is mistaken (16) in placing his Death under the CLIXth Olympiad; for this Chronology has no other Foundation but Athenæus's account of it.

Note, I am a little diffident of the third reason, when I consider on the one side, that, according to Lucian,

(8) Athen. lib. 5, cap. 13, pag. 211.

(9) Τὸ γὰρ οὐκ ἀνδρὶ τῶν βασιλέων ἀρετῆς μόνον. Διὸ καὶ τὸν καπνὸν καὶ τὸν χρυσοῦν οὐκ ἐδέχθη. Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Thus it must be read, as Mr. Mease observes in Diogen. Laert. lib. 6, n. 8, and not χαίοντι, as it is in the Editions of Athenæus.

(12) Οὐ μὲν ἀλλὰ τὸν βασιλέα Ἀντίοχον. Καὶ οὗτος Ἀλεξάνδρου ἀσέβητος ἦν. Id. ibid. This is not exact, for there was one King between Alexander and Antiochus.

(13) Taken from Athenæus, lib. 5, cap. 13, p. 211.

(14) Cicero de Senect. cap. 7.

(15) Since Cato says, cap. 70, that he is in his 84th Year, it is the Year of Rome 603.

(16) Jonstus de Script. Hist. Philol. pag. 115, 190.

from the Person who taught Carneades Logic [D]. I shall observe an Error of Mr Moreri [E]. See the last Remark.

ian, Diogenes lived eighty eight Years; and on the other, that his Embassy was in the 598th Year of Rome. It follows from thence, that if he died before the time, in which it is supposed Cato said what we read in his Book de Senectute, he came Embassador to Rome at the Age at least of eighty three Years. Now as there is no body that observes this Circumstance, and as Cicero himself, who might have seen it, does not suppose that Cato took notice of it, I think it may be said this Philosopher was not so old, when he came to Rome, on account of the affairs of the Athenians. Let us not imagine that Cicero observed Chronology so nicely in his Dialogues, as never to mistake in that Respect. Nothing is more difficult than such an exactness, when we make a Man speak who lived before us. Sometimes we make him speak according to our Ideas. What he says of the Death, or of the old-Age of Persons, seems to be false, only because, instead of putting ourselves in his place, we put him in ours. Cicero might join Diogenes with the ancient Philosophers who had continued their Studies to the end of their Lives: but Cato could not do this; for, if I am not mistaken, he died before Diogenes. And yet, in the Dialogue de Senectute, he is made to discourse like one who survived that Philosopher.

[D] I do not distinguish him from the Person who taught Carneades Logic. The place where Cicero observes this is curious; for which reason I shall quote it. When Carneades happened to fall upon any subtle and intangled disputes, he would mix a little Jest with it: if my consequence is good, said he, I have gained the Cause, if not, let Diogenes return me my Money. Cum aliquid ejusmodi inciderat, sit ludere Carneades solebat: si recte conclusi, teneo; sin vitiose minam Diogenes reddat, ab eo enim Stoico Dialecticam didicerat, hac autem merces erat Dialecticorum (17).

(17) Cicero, Academ. Quest. lib. 4, cap. 30.

DIONYSIUS, Tyrant of Heraclea, a City in Pontus, took Advantage of the Weakness of the Persians after they had lost the Battle of Granicus against Alexander. He durst not aggrandize himself whilst he was in fear of them: but he feared them no longer when he saw them engaged in a War, wherein Fortune had declared for the Macedonians. However, he soon found himself deceived in the Hopes he had built upon the weak Condition of the Persian Monarchy. For he had more reason to dread the Conqueror than ever he had to stand in awe of the Persian Court. Those, who had been banished from Heraclea, fled to Alexander for Protection; they found him so favourable to their Interest, that, for their sakes, he was very near deposing Dionysius. It would certainly have been done, if Dionysius had not warded off the Blow by a thousand politic Artifices [A], one of which was his Application to obtain the Favour of Cleopatra. He saw himself delivered from all his Uneasiness by the Death of Alexander. This

News

[A] Alexander would have dethroned him, if he had not warded off the blow by a thousand politic Artifices. One of these Artifices was making his Court to Cleopatra: this is the usual way; nothing can be done without the fair Sex; in all Countries, if a Man would succeed in his designs, he must engage them in his Interest. Εξέπεσεν ἀνέι μὴ συνείη πολλὰ καὶ ἀρχαῖα καὶ τῇ τῶν ὑπὸ καὶ εὐνοίᾳ καὶ ἀγαπᾶται Κλεοπάτρας, τὰς ἀπειληδύντας αὐτῷ πολεμικοῦ δόξουσι. Et excedisset sane, nisi prudentia & sagacitate mentis, & studiis civium, & suis erga Cleopatram obsequiis, bella, cum minis sibi denuntiata, effugisset (1). — He had certainly been deposed, had he not diverted the threatened Storm by great Conduct and Policy, the Love of his Subjects, and the good understanding which he cultivated with Cleopatra. But I would fain know who is this Cleopatra. Was it Alexander's Sister, that Philip married to the King of Epirus (2), and who seized on Macedonia upon a false Report of Alexander's being killed (3)? The same in all probability. No doubt her Interest was very great, both with Olympias her Mother, and Alexander her Brother. It was very great after the Death of that Prince: We see that Eumenes went to see her at Sardis, to authorize himself with that Princess's Fame. Inde Sardis profectus est ad Cleopatram sororem Alexandri Magni, ut ejus voce centuriones principesque confirmaret, existimaturus ibi majestatem regiam verti unde soror Alexandri foret. Tanta veneratio magnitudinis Alexandri erat, ut etiam

(1) Photius, Biblioth. pag. 709, n. 224.

(2) Justin. lib. 9, cap. 7, lib. 13, cap. 6.

(3) Plat. in Alexandro, pag. 702.

[E] I shall observe an Error of Moreri. He pretends that our Diogenes was sent to Rome with Carneades and Critolaus, under the Consulship of P. Scipio and M. Marcellus in the time of the second Punic War. This is not doubted of, says he: nevertheless it is certain many question it, and that Lescapier, the Jesuit, condemns those who do not distinguish this Diogenes from him who was sent to Rome upon the Affairs of the Athenians. Cave tamen hunc (Diogenem Babylonium, Chrysippi discipulum, Stoicum) confundas cum altero Diogene Stoico qui cum Carneade Academicum ab Atheniensibus legatus Romam de maximis rebus missus esse dicitur libro secundo de Orat. quippe quos docti viri scire distinctos volunt (18). — But take heed you do not confound this Diogenes (named the Babylonian) a Stoic, and Scholar of Chrysippus, with the other Diogenes the Stoic, whom Tully mentions to have been sent Embassador extraordinary, with Carneades the Academic, from the Athenians; for they are Persons whom the Learned would have entirely distinguished. If Moreri had said, there is no reason to doubt, &c. I should not have blamed him; for it is certain, whatever the Jesuit may say of it, that there is but one Diogenes here. But this is not the principal fault I am to observe. He is much more to be censured in another place, since there is no Year during the second Punic War, in which a Scipio and Marcellus were Consuls, and the Embassy of these three Philosophers was after the end of the second Punic War. I have given demonstrative proofs of this in the Article of CARNEADES (19). Note, that Vossius supplied Moreri with this Mistake (20). I say nothing of some small Faults, part of which are not in the Dutch Edition (21). It was necessary to have shewn what Sect Diogenes was of; for by this means one Omission would have been remedied.

(18) Lescapier in Ciceron. de Nat. Deor. pag. 65.

(19) Rem. [N].

(20) Vossius de Philof. Sectis, pag. 103.

(21) They have corrected in it some Errors of Expression, but not the false Citations; for Instance, that of the sixth Book of Cicero de finibus, which Work contains but five Books. This Citation, and all the rest were taken from Vossius de Philof. Sectis, pag. 103.

per vestigia mulierum favor sacraei ejus nominis quaereretur (4). — From thence he went to Sardis to see Cleopatra, Sister to Alexander the Great; that she, by her Exhortations, might animate the Chiefs and Officers of his Army, who would be apt to flatter themselves that Success would declare for the same Party which Alexander's Sister espoused. So great was the Veneration paid to Alexander's Memory, that even the Women, who were related to him, were imagined to inherit a share of his Virtues, and a Power of conferring the same Favours. The Historian, from whom I have borrowed these Words, said before, that Perdicas sought her in Marriage in order to be King (5). Cassander, Lysimachus, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and each of the Heads of a Party, did the same; for they believed the Macedonians would chuse for their Master whosoever the should marry, and thus each of them hoped to obtain the Empire by being her Husband. Antigonus kept her under Confinement in Sardis: from whence she endeavoured to make her escape, and join Ptolemy; for she did not love Antigonus. The Governor of the City prevented her escape, and at length by Antigonus's Order, and the help of certain Women, he put her to Death. Antigonus, to avoid the Infamy of such a murder, ordered some of the Women to be executed, and buried the Princess in a magnificent Manner (6): Thus is the Public played upon, and some Princes better deserve the name of Comedians, than they who act on the Stage.

(4) Justin. lib. 14, cap. 11.

(5) Ut viribus auctoritatem regiam acquireret. Justin. lib. 13, cap. 6. See also Diodor. Sic. lib. 18, cap. 23.

(6) Taken from Diod. Sic. lib. 20, cap. 38, at the first Year of the CXXIIIth Olympiad.

(a) Taken from the History of the Tyrants of Heraclea, writ by Menan: the Extracts of it are in Photius, ibid. n. 214, p. m. 708, and following.

(b) Ælian. Hist. div. lib. 8, cap. 13. Athen. lib. 12, cap. 12, pag. 143. They mention also the Needles they ran into his Body to awake him.

(c) Apud Athen. ibid.

News was so exceedingly agreeable to him, that it almost turned his Brain [B]. After Alexander's Death, Perdiccas was no less inclined than Alexander to favour the Exiles of Heraclea; so that Dionysius was forced to have recourse again to a thousand Wiles to divert the Storm that threatened him. But this Difficulty was of a short Continuance, for Perdiccas was soon killed. From that time Dionysius's Affairs were always prosperous, to which his marrying AMASTRIS contributed not a little [C]. The voluptuous Life he led made him grow so fat, that he did little but sleep, and his Drowsiness was so great, that they could hardly awake him by running long Needles into his Flesh. He died at the Age of Fifty five Years, of which he had reigned thirty. His Subjects regretted his Death, for he had governed with much Lenity. He left his Wife Guardian of his Children, and Regent of the State (a). She built the City of Amastris [D]. I forgot to say, that our Dionysius was ashamed of his Fatness; and for that reason, when he gave Audience, or administered Justice, he placed himself in some Closet, that nothing might be seen but his Face (b). Some banished Persons of Heraclea call him the fat Swine, in one of Menander's Comedies (c).

[B] Alexander's Death was so exceedingly agreeable to him, that it almost turned his Brain. This is a very singular effect of Joy, and, if I am not mistaken, more rare than the causing Death. It is reckoned that several Persons have died of excess of Joy (7); but I do not remember ever to have read, that many people have lost their Reason by it: this makes me cite Photius's own Words: Εὐθυμίας μὲν ὁ Διονύσιος ἀγαλμα τὴν ἀσχηλίαν ἀκούσας ἰδρυσατο παθὼν τὴν πρῶτην προσβολὴν τῆς πολυλῆς χαρᾶς, ὅσα ἂν ἡ σφόδρα λύπη δράσειε μικρὰ γὰρ περιτρωπείε, εἰς τὸ πᾶσιν ἐπὶ χυβὶ καὶ ἀνὰ ἄρβυ γινόμενος. Laetitia statim consecravit: & ad primum famæ adventum eo affectus est modo præ exuberanti gaudio quo repentina hominem confirmatio adfecit. Nam prope erat ut vertigine corruptus prolaberetur, & à sana mente conficeretur alienus (8). — Dionysius, at hearing the News, dedicated a Statue to Joy, and from the first Impulse of Transport felt the same Emotion as another would from the excess of Grief. For he was seized with a fainting and dizziness in his head, and seemed to be quite besides himself. What can we do against the machinal Passions? Reason required, that, upon the first News of the Death of Alexander the Great, his greatest Enemy, he should have made serious Reflections upon the Inconstancy of humane Affairs, not without admiring the extraordinary Qualities of that Prince. But our Dionysius was so little in a Condition to reflect gravely upon the Homage due upon such an Occasion to the fate of Heroes, that he had very near lost his Senses, so violent were his first Motions which were far from being voluntary.

[C] His Marriage with Amastris did not contribute a little. He married her after the Death of his first Wife. Amastris was the Daughter of Oxatres, Brother to the last Darius; therefore she was Cousin-German to Stotira, the Daughter of that Darius, and Wife of Alexander the Great. They had been brought up together, and loved each other exceedingly. When Alexander married Stotira, he would have Amastris marry one of his most intimate Favourites. This was Craterus. He lived very happily with her till his Interest, and perhaps his Inclination also, after Alexander's Death, prompted him to marry Phila, Antipater's Daughter. Then Amastris, with Craterus's own consent, married Dionysius: she brought him a great Fortune, and, as he had an opportunity to buy the Furniture of Dionysius Tyrant of Sicily, he made a splendid appearance in his House, and with his great Treasures, and being also supported by the Affections of his Subjects, he made Conquests, and sent a powerful Assistance to Antigonus, during the Cypriot War (9). In Acknowledgment for these Succours, Antigonus married his Nephew Ptolemy, Governor of the Hellespont, to one of Dionysius's Daughters by a first Wife. Dionysius had three Children by Amastris, two Sons and a Daughter; the Daughter's name was the same with that of her Mother. One of the Sons was called Clearchus, and the other Oxatres. Every thing went well under the Guardianship and Regency of Amastris; for Antigonus declared himself Protector of Heraclea, and the Pupils, and, when he left it, Lyfimachus took his Place, and even married the Widow of Dionysius. He loved her passionately, till he fell in love with Arsinoë Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus. This new Amour caused a Rupture between Lyfimachus and A-mastris, for which Reason that Lady governed alone in Heraclea, till her eldest Son Clearchus was of Age. That Prince and Oxatres his Brother were wicked enough to make their Mother perish at Sea, for very slight Reasons. Εἰς ἐκθεσμον δὲ καὶ μαρτύρων ἐργον ἐξέπεσον. τὴν γὰρ μνῆρα μὲν ἐν περὶ αὐτὰς μέγα πλημμελήσαντων μηχανῇ θείῃ καὶ κακουργίᾳ ἐπιδόσαν τῆς Σαλασσῆς ἀποπνιγνῶναι κατεργάσαντο. Ad nefarium & execrabile facinus sunt delapsi. Matrem enim quæ nihil in eis grande peccaverat cum navi se commisit infigni commento & flagitio mari sufficandam curaverunt (10). Lyfimachus, who reigned at that time in Macedonia, upon hearing of this horrid Murder, felt his first Passion for her revive, and resolved to be revenged, and punish them. He dissembled his design, which no Man upon Earth knew better how to do; Κρύψει τὸ βελομενὸν θεινότητος ἀνθρώπων γυγονεῖαι λέγεται. Oculare enim quæ vellet ingeniosissimus mortalium fuisse peribetur (11); and expressing to Clearchus the same Affection as before, he was received into Heraclea as a good Friend. He put the two unnatural Princes to Death for destroying their Mother, seized on their whole Estate, and restored the Heracleans to their Liberty. They did not preserve it long; for Lyfimachus, returning Home, made so lively a Description of the flourishing Condition, in which the good management of Amastris had put Heraclea, and two other Cities, that Arsinoë his Wife begged them of him for a Present. At first he refused her; but as she was artful, and his great Age began to impair his Understanding (12), she obtained, at length, that fine Present, and sent a Governor into Heraclea, who treated the Inhabitants very harshly (13). We must not forget that Lyfimachus had a Son by Amastris named Alexander. Polyænus informs us of this (14): but the Passage is so corrupted, that it was very difficult to find out the true reading. Cosabon's Manuscript had it 'Αλεξάνδρος Λυσιμάχου καὶ Μαστρίδ' ἡδὲ. That great Critic corrected Μαστρίδ' by Μαστρίδης. Gretementil has conjectured more happily; for he thinks it ought to be read 'Αμαστρίδης. Another learned Man (15), who at bottom is of the same mind, chuses rather to read 'Αμαστρίδης or 'Αμαστρίδης. He shews (16) by a Medal of our Amastris, that the Genitive of that Name was 'Αμαστρίδης, as well as 'Αμαστρίδης; and he cites Herodotus, who says 'Αμαστρίδης in the genitive Case. He observes that Salmasius (17), and Trifan (18), are mistaken in believing Amastris to be the Sister of Darius.

[D] She built the City of Amastris. This City was one of the three that Lyfimachus boasted of to his Wife. Stephanus Byzantinus acknowledged that this City borrowed its Name from Amastris; the Niece of the last Darius, and Wife of Dionysius, Tyrant of Heraclea (19); but he pretends that before it was called Cromna. He had better have stuck close to Strabo, who tells us (20) that Amastris, the Daughter of Oxatres, &c. joined four Villages together, forming one City out of them, which was called Amastris. The four Villages were, Sesamus, Cytarus, Cromna, and Teius. They were in Paphlagonia. It is surprising that Mela (21) should make mention of Sesamus, Cromna, Cytarus, and Teius, without saying a Word of Amastris. It cannot be replied that the Union of those four Places under the Name of Amastris continued no longer than during the Life of Queen Amastris, and that afterwards each grew independent

(7) See Valerius Maximus, lib. 9, cap. 12, and Pliny, lib. 7, cap. 53.

(8) Phot. Bibl. pag. 709, n. 224.

HISTORY OF AMASTRIS.

(9) Αντιγόνου τὴν Ἀσίαν κατέλαβον: λαμπρὸς συμμάχος ἦν. Antigono Asiā tenenti, magnifice suppetias tulit. I chose rather to translate it thus, than as it is in my Photius, pag. 703 (of the Edit. of Roan, 1653: Antigono etiam jam magnifice Asiā tenenti suppetias tulit.

(10) Phot. pag. 712.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Ἦν γὰρ θεινὴν περιεβύβη ἡ Ἀρσινόη, καὶ τὸ γυγόνειον ἔδωκε Λυσιμάχῳ εὖ. Xen. ἐπὶ τῇ ἀρσινόῃ. Ingeniosa enim ad circumvenendum fuit Arsinoë, & jam senectus inde manifestum dederat Lyfimachum. Phot. Bibl. pag. 713.

(13) All this is taken from Menon, in Photius, n. 224.

(14) Lib. 6, pag. 443, apud Ezech. Spanhemium de Præf. Numismat. pag. 466.

(15) Spanheim. ibid.

(16) Id. p. 465.

(17) Ad Solinum, pag. 339.

(18) Comment. Tom. 1, p. 683.

(19) Cataneus, in Plin. Epist. 10, lib. 10. Id. charges Stephanus with saying that Amastris was the Wife of Dionysius, Tyrant of Sicily.

(20) Lib. 12, pag. 375.

(21) Lib. 1, cap. 10. Father Hardouin, in Plin. lib. 6, cap. 2, pag. 600, charges him with saying, that the Fortes of Amastris was called Sesamus. Mela does not say so.

- (22) Strabo, lib. 3, cap. 19.
 (23) Plin. lib. 6, cap. 2, pag. m. 650.
 (24) Mr. Spanheim, de Præf. Num. pag. 465, observes, that Holstenius has corrected this Fault in his Notes upon Apollonius.

dependant, and took again their former Name; for if that was true, Strabo would not have affirmed that Tæius alone broke the Union. He adds (22), the three others preserved their Community, and one of them, to wit Sesamus, was the Fortrefs of Amasris. We find such another fault, in Pliny, as that of Stephanus Byzantinus. Sesamum oppidum, says he (23) quod nunc Amasris. These two Authors may be excused by saying that Amasris, with respect to some parts of it, was formerly called Cramna, and Sesamus. There is a mistake in the Scholiast of Apollonius, on the 943d Verse of the second Book (24). It should be read that Sesamus changed it's Name, not into that of Damatrix, on account of Darius's Niece, but into that of Amasris. This City has been famous. The Bithynian Kings made themselves Masters of it (25). It is greatly extolled by Pliny the younger. 'Amasris, a city of the Strianorum, says he (26), civitas & elegans & ornata, habet inter præcipua opera pulcherrimam eandem, que longissimam plateam. — Amasris, a fine City, has, amongst it's other Rarities, one Street of uncommon Lengib and Beauty.' He requests of Trajan, to furnish the necessary Charges for covering the Common-sewers, which ran by the great Square of that City. He received a favourable Answer. Lucian says (27), that he found many Philosophers in it who were the Disciples of Timocrates. The Medals of Homer, which were struck by the Inhabitants of Amasris, are a Proof of their attachment to Literature (28).

- (25) Photius, Biblioth. p. 720.
 (26) Epist. 99, lib. 10.
 (27) In Pseudomanti.
 (28) See Spanheim, de Præf. Num. pag. 490.

DIONYSIUS, of Heraclea, a debauched Philosopher. Look for HERACLEOTES.

DIOSCORIDES, in Latin Dioscoridu (a), an Island in the Red-Sea, according to Stephen of Byzantium. It is supposed that it is now called Zocotora. If it is the same that Montagne speaks of, several different Relations must have been made of it; for, according to Moreri (b), the Inhabitants of Zocotora have no other Religion but the Mahometan, and tolerate the Exercise of no other, and are naturally Cheats. But, according to the Author cited by Montagne, they are Christians, and the best People in the World, without any other Defect than that of understanding nothing of the Religion they profess. This is a more common thing than one would imagine, and agrees in some manner with the Principles of the Quietists [A], whose pretended Devotion is loaded with so many mysterious Follies, that there is scarce any Extravagance, or Blasphemy, which they do not border upon in some Point or other. But let us hear what Montagne says [B].

- (a) So Pinedo in Steph. Byzant. pag. 230, affirms it should be called.

- (b) He cites Daviti and Linichos.

- [A] And agrees in some manner with the Principles of the Quietists. Their wretched Doctors teach (1) that 'the perfection of Contemplation does not consist in knowing God more perfectly than others, but in not knowing him. That (2) the true contemplative Person forms no Idea of God to himself, that he has no distinct Knowledge of any of his Attributes, that he does not know him by Ideas, by Reflexions, and by Reasoning, but by an obscure, general, and confused Faith, without distinction of Perfections, Attributes, or Persons. That true and perfect Contemplation has the essence of God for it's sole Object, considered under the most possible abstract Idea.' That (3) the Soul ought to be persuaded, that the Creatures are too gross to serve for a Master and Guide in the Knowledge of God. Therefore Love is to go before and leave the Understanding behind. That the Soul loves God as he is in himself, and not as the Imagination represents him. That if the Soul cannot know him, such as he is, it must love him without knowing him, under the obscure Veil of Faith, almost as a Child who never saw it's Father, and who, trusting to those that speak of him, loves him as much as if he had seen him! That all that the holy Scriptures say of God (4) 'must pass only for Flowers, and to stop there, would be to stop at the Superficies, because as God cannot be comprehended by the Mind, so neither can he be explained by Words, and when we would thereby raise ourselves to him, we fall still lower. That (5) God has caused those Books to be writ only to give us a high Opinion of his Greatness, that if we love him in what is said of him, we may love him yet much more in himself (6). But if the Soul should love God as he is represented in the Scriptures, it would love a Phantom, or the Mask of God, and not God as he really is.' That (7) God is nothing of what reason conceives, because all that we know can be comprehended, but God is incomprehensible. When we pretend to know God, we idolatrously change the Creature into God, and abase God to the Creature (8). That while the Soul knows any thing by Images or Similitudes of what nature soever, even though infused and supernatural, it does not know God. That the Idea St Paul gave of God to the Athenians adoring an unknown God (9) 'is false, in that it does not represent God as he is, for he cannot be either comprehended or known. That we are obliged to make use of terms proportioned to our weakness in speaking of him: but those expressions have nothing worthy of him, and the Ideas they form in us are not the true Idea of God. That it may be said of God VOL. II.

that he is Just, Gracious, a Rewarder, an Avenger, Almighty, &c. (10). But all that is not God. Faith does not behold him in this manner, having no other object than an unknown omnipresent God. See at the end of the following Remark a Passage of the false Dionysius the Areopagite.

[B] Let us hear what Montagne says (11) 'A Bishop has left in writing, that at the other end of the World there is an Island, that the Ancients called Dioscorides, blessed with all kinds of Trees, Fruits, and a wholesome Air: the Inhabitants of which are Christians, having Churches and Altars, which are adorned only with Croffes, without any other Images; they are great observers of Fasts and Fasts, exact payers of the Tenth to the Priests; and so chaste, that none of them can have above one Wife all his Life-time. Moreover they are so content with their Condition, that in the midst of the Sea they are ignorant of the use of Shipping: and so simple, that they do not understand one word of the Religion they observe so carefully. An incredible thing to those who do not know, that the Pagans, who were such devout Idolaters, were only acquainted with the Name and Figure of their Gods. The ancient beginning of Menalippa, one of Euripides's Tragedies, shewed this.

- (10) Ib. p. 322.

- (11) Montagne, Essais, lib. 1, cap. 56, pag. m. 545.

- (12) See the Remark [P] of the Article DEMOCRITUS.

- It is not a Name of the Pagans concerning God.

- (13) Acts, chap. xvii, ver. 23.

- (14) The noble Inscription St Paul saw, was according to St Jerom, Diis Afiæ, & Europæ, & Africæ, Diis ignotis & peregrinis. — To the Gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa, to the unknown and foreign Gods. Comment. in Epist. ad Titum, cap. 1.

- (15) Quinta illa non nominata magis quam non intellecta natura. — The fifth was as little known by Name as by it's own Nature. Cicero, Tufcul. 1, c. 17.

O Fove, of whom we here below Nothing besides the Name do know (12).

What Montagne observes of the ancient Pagans is very true: The Idea they annexed to the word GOD did no ways resemble the divine Nature, but was infinitely remote from it; so that the Athenians were not the only People to whom St Paul might have said, that they erected Altars to the unknown God (13). All their Altars deserved the same Inscription, and I cannot think of the distinction they made at Athens between the known, and unknown Gods (14); I cannot, I say, think of it, without remembering the distinction that was made, in the Schools of Aristotle, between occult and manifest Qualities. Among the Peripatetics there is no other difference between manifest and occult Qualities than this, that they have a word to denote manifest Qualities, calor, frigus, humiditas, siccitas, &c. and they have none to denote the Qualities of the Load-Stone. Just so among the Athenians there was no other difference between Gods, known, and unknown, than that they had a Name for some of them, Jupiter, Mars, Mercurius, Venus, &c. and they knew not what to call the others. If the divine Nature which they adored was not, like the Quintessence of Aristotle (15), as void of a Name, as of an Idea, (16) Apply here what Tacitus says, Arceantur aspectu quo venerationis plus inesse. — They were removed from the Sight to enhance their Devotion. Hist. lib. 4, cap. 45.

Idea, it was at least as little known. The Inhabitants of Marseilles openly professed to worship the unknown Gods, and they found that even this inspired them with a greater fear for their Deities (16). They worshipped them afar off, not approaching to the place where their Statues were. The Priest did not approach them without trembling, and dreaded their appearing to him, that is to say, he dreaded knowing them. Lucan imagines, that because in other places the Gods were adored under Figures exposed to the Eyes of the public, there was a great difference between the Masilians, and other People; for, says he, the Masilians, not knowing their Gods, had the greater fear of them. Therefore he imagined that in Greece and Italy the Deity was better known than at Marseilles: but he was much deceived; he ought only to have said, that in those Countries they knew better under what Figure the Statuaries and Painters represented it.

simulacraque mæsta Deorum
Arte carent, cæsisque extant informia truncis.
Ipse situs, putrique facit jam robore pallor
Attonitos: non vulgatis sacra figuris
Numina sic metuunt: tantum terroribus addit
Quos timeant non nosse Deos.

Non illum cultu populi propiore frequentant
Sed cessare Deis. Medio cum Phœbus in axe est,
Aut cælum nox atra tenet, pavet ipse sacerdos
Accessus, dominumque timet deprendere luci (17).

(17) Lucan.
Pharsal lib. 3,
ver. 412.

Old Images of Forms misshapen stand,
Rude and unknowing of the Artist's hand.
With hoary filth begrim'd, each ghastly Head
Strikes the astonish'd Gazer's Soul with dread.
No Gods, who long in common Shapes appear'd,
Were e'er with such religious Awe rever'd.
But zealous Crowds in Ignorance adore
And still the less they know, they fear the more.

(a) Plin. lib. 6,
cap. 5.

(b) Dioscurias
nunc usque nota.
Ammian. Mar-
cellin. lib. 22,
cap. 8, pag. m.
313.

(c) In Periplo
Ponti Euxini.

(1) Strabo, lib. 9,
pag. 343.

DIOSCURIAS, a City of Colchis. It was a Place of so great Trade, that Three hundred Nations, which did not understand one another's Language, trafficked to it [A]; and the Merchants of Rome kept there One hundred and thirty Interpreters. Pliny, who affirms this upon the Credit of Timosthenes, observes, that, in his time, this City was uninhabited (a). But Ammianus Marcellinus testifies, that, in his time, it still made some Figure (b). Some ascribe the Foundation of it to Castor and Pollux, and others to the Charioteers of those two Heroes [B]. Arrian, an Eye-witness, assures us, that it was then called Sebastopolis; and that it was a Colony of the Milesians, 2260 Furlongs from Trebizonde (c).

[A] Three hundred Nations traded to it.] Strabo says the same (1). It is true he observes, that some Authors instead of three hundred Nations make them but seventy. He attributes the Multitude of so many Languages to the savage way the People of those Countries lived in; for having no Society with one another, each preserved his own Language, without learning that of the neighbouring People.

[B] Some ascribe the Foundation of it to Castor and Pollux, and others to the Charioteers of those two Heroes.]

DOLABELLA (PUBLIUS CORNELIUS), Cicero's Son-in-law, was entirely devoted to Julius Cæsar's Party. He was present at the Battle of Pharsalia, at that of Africa, and at that at Munda [A]: in the last of which he was wounded. During his Tribuneship of the

[A] He was present at the Battles of Pharsalia, Africa, and Munda. Cicero's words, which I bring to prove this, will serve for something else. 'Quoniam modo igitur Dolabella pervenit (in Hispaniam?) aut non suscipienda fuit illa causa, Antoni, aut, cum suscepisset, defendenda usque ad extremum. Ter depugnavit Cæsar cum civibus, in Thessalia, Africa, Hispania, omnibus affuit his pugnis Dolabella: Hispanensi etiam vulnus accepit: si de meo iudicio queris, nollem; sed tamen consilium à primo reprehendum, laudanda constantia (1). — How then did Dolabella come into Spain? You should not, O Antony, have engaged in that cause, or else you should have supported it to the last extremity. Cæsar had three Battles with his Countrymen, in Thessaly, Africa, and Spain: Dolabella bore a part in them all,

(1) Cicero,
Philipp. 2, c. 30.

The pious Worshippers approach not near,
But shun their Gods, and kneel with distant fear:
The Priest himself, when or the Day or Night
Rolling have reach'd their full Meridian height,
Refrains the gloomy Path with weary Feet,
Dreading the Demon of the Grove to meet.

The Pagans could not retort this Observation on Christianity, under pretence that it's Professors are required to captivate their Understandings to the Obedience of Faith; and that Faith is by some said to be better defined by Ignorance, than by Knowledge; and that People are to be determined, not by the way of Examination, but by the way of Authority, and are to adore the Mysteries without comprehending them: this Retortion, I say, would be unjust upon Christianity in general, since the Protestant Communions reject not the way of Examination, and are not afraid, like the Priest of Marseilles, that the object of their Faith should be manifested.

We have seen in the preceding Remark the Maxims of the new Mystics; but we must observe here, that they pretend they are as ancient as Mystical Divinity; for they cite the words of St Dionysius (18). 'As for you, my dear Timothy, set yourself seriously to Mystical Contemplations, forsake your Senses, the Operations of your Mind, all sensible and intelligible Objects, and generally all things that are, and that are not; in order to raise yourself as much as Man can do, and that you may be united in an unknown and inexpressible manner to him, who is above all Being, and all Knowledge.' Note, there are some Philosophers who think, that what the Quietists say of the falsity of the Notions, under which the Deity is commonly represented, is very reasonable, and that the Images, made use of by the sacred Writers to exhibit him to us, want to be rectified. See what I shall cite of Charren, in one of the Remarks of the Article SIMONIDES (19).

(18) Mollinos,
Intro. à la
Guide Spirit. n.
14, cited by la
Bruyère, Dialogue 8, pag.
316.

(19) Rem. [G].

The first Opinion, which is Pomponius Mela's (2), is confirmed by the Name the City bore. Nevertheless Pliny (3), Solinus (4), Ammianus Marcellinus (5), &c. speak only of the two Charioteers. Pliny calls them Amphitus and Telebius: according to Strabo (6) they were called Rheca and Amphistratus: but Ammianus Marcellinus calls them Amphitus and Cercius. In some Editions of Justin (7) their Names are Fradius and Amphistratus.

(2) Lib. 1, cap.
19.
(3) Lib. 6, cap. 5.
(4) Cap. 15.
(5) Lib. 22, cap.
8, pag. m. 313.
(6) Lib. 11, pag.
342.
(7) Lib. 42, c. 3.

and in the last received a Wound. If you ask my Opinion, I should have advised you not to have undertaken it: but though the design from the beginning is blameable, yet a firm perseverance would have had something praise-worthy. Two things are observable here; one is a piece of Rhetorical Legerdemain, the other a very good Maxim. Cicero could not be ignorant that Marc Antony, slaying in Italy by Cæsar's orders, had done as much service to the Party, as if he had followed Cæsar into Egypt, and to the Kingdom of Pontus. He could not be ignorant, that fear of Danger was none of Antony's Faults, and that other reasons had prevented him from accompanying Cæsar into Africa and Spain. Nevertheless as a slay at Rome, considered in the whole under such Circumstances, was capable of receiving an ill turn, Rhetoric did not fail

to

the People he committed a thousand Disorders, which was a cruel Mortification to Cicero (a). He would have brought in a Law for the Abolition of all Debts [B], in order to gain the Affection of the Populace, and deliver himself from the Obligations he was under to pay his Creditors (b); but he found a strong Opposition. Marc Antony, whose Wife he had debauched, was the chief Obstacle to his Design: So that it may be said, if that Woman had been virtuous, the City of Rome must have been involved in a horrible Confusion, by an Union of two of the greatest Disturbers of the public Peace that were in Italy at that time. Every thing has it's Use in the World: the Intrigues of Marc Antony's Wife were of a signal Service to her Country, and induced (c) him to overthrow all the Attempts of a factious Tribune (d). Caesar was in Egypt during these Contest. His return to Rome restored the public Tranquillity: he pardoned Dolabella, and, contrary to the Law in that Case, raised him to the Consulship some Years after; for Dolabella was not of a competent Age, and had never been Prætor (e). Marc Antony opposed, with all his Power, his taking Possession of the Consulship [C]; but, as Caesar was killed some few Months after this fresh Quarrel between Antony and Dolabella, they put an end to their Differences, that they might the better oppose the Republican Party. They were both Consuls the Year that Caesar was assassinated; and took some Steps at first, which gave the Well-to exclaim against it as an act of Cowardice. He knew that nothing would shock a Military Man more than an insult of this nature, and therefore was sure to ply him from this point. 'Cui bello cum propter timorem tuam tum propter libidines desisti? . . . Tam bonus gladiator rudem tam cito accepisti? Hunc igitur quicumque qui in suis partibus, id est in suis fortunis tam timidus fuerit, pertimescat (2)?' — From which War your Cowardice and your Lust caused you to be absent. . . . Did Antony the great Gladiator so soon receive his discharge? Can any Man then fear him who proved himself a Coward, when his own Interest and Fortune summoned him to action? And to exasperate him the more, he forgot no Encomiums upon Dolabella. I wish Commentators would take notice of these Artifices of Rhetoricians.

[B] He would have brought in a Law for the Abolition of Debts. This was called novæ tabulæ. A learned Critic thus explains them. 'Sunt tabulæ novæ: nihil aliud quam lex seu decretum communi consensu factum, quo civitate per alterius partis ultimam pauperiem, & ex ea seditionem, in extremo periculo constituta, nexis atque obstratis, ad concordiam faciendam, debita in universum remittuntur, ita ut hoc nomine nec corpora eorum, neque bona vincula teneri queant (3). — The Tabulæ novæ, or Act of Insolvency, is only a Law enacted by common Consent, when the State being in imminent Danger from a necessitous and seditious Faction, rather than give Birth to a Civil War, cancels all Debts and Obligations, so that for the future, neither their Bodies nor Goods may be detained for the same.'

[C] Caesar raised him to the Consulship Marc Antony opposed, with all his Power, his taking Possession of it. Cicero enlarges upon this contest in his second Philippic, and pretends that Dolabella was imposed upon. They encouraged him to stand for the Consulship, they made him hope for it, and then deserted him. Caesar was at the bottom of all this Management. 'Nihil queror de Dolabella qui tum est impulsus, inductus, elusus: qua in re quanta fuerit uterque vestrum perfidia in Dolbellam quis ignorat? Ille (Caesar) induxit ut peteret: promissum & receptum intervertit ad seque transfudit: tu ejus perfidie voluntatem tuam adscripsisti (4). — I will pass over the base treatment which Dolabella received, whom Caesar encouraged and persuaded to stand a Candidate for the Consulship, and afterwards made him his Deceit. In which instance the perfidy of you both was so barefaced that every body must see it. Caesar prevailed upon him to stand, and afterwards revoked and cancelled his Promise, whilst you underhand contributed to carry on the Trick.' Cicero adds, that the Senate being assembled the first of January (5), Dolabella made a better Harangue against Marc Antony (6), and that the latter was furiously enraged against Dolabella. Caesar had declared, that when he departed upon his great Partisan Expedition, he would leave Dolabella in his place in the Consulship. Marc Antony was at that time Caesar's Colleague in that Office, and as he would not have Dolabella for his Colleague, he declared that being Augur, by virtue of that Dignity, he would either hinder Dolabella from being chosen, or make his Election void. 'Cum Caesar ostendisset se priusquam proficisceretur Dolbellam Consullem esse iustum tum hic bonus augur eo se sacerdotio præditum esse dixit, ut comitia auspiciis vel impedire vel vitare posset: idque se facturum esse asseveravit (7). The day of Election being come, the Suffrages fell upon Dolabella, upon which Marc Antony, who had said nothing during the Election, declared aloud, that the Assembly must be put off to another day. He said this as Augur, and would not desist from this Denunciation till after the Death of Caesar. Then it was his Interest to own Dolabella's Election for legal, and he was reconciled to him. 'Collegam tuum depositis inimicitiiis, oblitus auspiciorum a te ipso populo Romano nunciatorum illo die (i. e. three days after Caesar's Death) collegam tibi esse voluisti (8). On that day (namely the third after Caesar's Death) you declared him your Colleague, all former Enmity being clean wiped away, and all those insuspicious Omen, with which you had entertained the People, being lost in Oblivion.' Plutarch (9) relates in fewer words than Cicero, that Caesar having declared to the Senate his intention of resigning his Consulship to Dolabella, was forced to defer that affair to another time, upon account of Marc Antony's violent Opposition, who uttered a thousand reproachful things against Dolabella, and was repaid in the same kind. Some time after Caesar would have resigned in Favour of Dolabella, but was obliged to desist, Marc Antony pretending the Auspices were contrary to it. Dolabella, seeing himself abandoned, vented his rage in terrible Curses. I have nothing to say to this Account of Plutarch but this, that he has omitted one very material Circumstance, which is, that Caesar did not recede in such a manner, as not to leave entire to Dolabella his right of claiming. He left it undetermined whether Marc Antony's Opposition was valid or not. I freely believe he found himself embarrassed with these two Men, and though he said one Day he had nothing to fear from such fat and well dressed Men as those (10), but that he dreaded the lean and meagre Faces (11), yet he was sensible the Friendship of Marc Antony and Dolabella was an incumbrance to him: it is probable there was an understanding between him and Marc Antony upon Dolabella's Consulship: but it is certain Marc Antony treated him insolently upon other occasions, particularly when after the African War Caesar demanded an account of the sale of Pompey's Goods. These are Cicero's words upon it, which could not be better turned. 'Appellatus es de pecunia, quam pro domo, pro hortis, pro sectione debebas, primo respondisti plane ferociter: & ne omnia videar contra te, propemodum æqua, & iusta dicebas. A me C. Cesar pecuniam? cur potius, quam ego ab illo? an ille sine me vicit? at ne potuit quidem: ego ad illum belli civilis causam attuli: ego leges perniciosas rogavi. . . . Num sibi soli vicit? quorum facinus est commune, cur non sit eorum præda communis? jus postulabas: sed quid ad rem? plus ille poterat. (12). — A demand was made upon you for the Money which you owed for your House, your Gardens, and the Parcellage. At first you answered haughtily, and, to do you Justice, in some measure reasonably. Does Caesar require Money from me? And have not I as much reason to demand it of him?

(a) Id. cap. 29.

(3) Johan. Schefferus, in Libello de Novis Tabulæ, apud Casarem Sagittarium, in Vita Tullie, pag. 23. 14.

(4) Cicero, Philip. 2, cap. 33.

(5) In the Year of Rome 710.

(6) Invectus est copiosius multo in ipsum & paratus Dolabella quam nunc ego. Idem. d. C.

(a) See the Article TULLIA.

(b) Dio, lib. 42, pag. 223.

(c) Plutarch. in Antonio, pag. 919.

(d) Dio, lib. 42, pag. 224, and following.

(e) Id. pag. 225.

(7) Cicero, Philip. 2, cap. 32.

(8) Ibid. Philip. 1, cap. 13.

(9) Plat. in Antonio, pag. 921.

(10) Plat. in Antonio, pag. 923.

(11) He meant Brutus and Cassius. Id. ibid.

(12) Cicero, Philip. 2, cap. 29.

Well-affected a good Opinion of them [D]. But this did not last long. Dolabella obtained the Government of Syria, but made so little haste to take Possession of it, that Cassius had time to make himself Master of it: and as he was informed the Senate had conferred the same Government upon Cassius, he did not think proper to continue his Journey. Therefore he stopt at Smyrna, where he treacherously put to death Trebonius [E], Governor of Asia minor, and one of the Murderers of Julius Cæsar. As soon as the News of this Action got to Rome, the Senate declared Dolabella an Enemy to the Roman People. Upon the Death of Trebonius all Asia minor was subdued to the Discretion of Dolabella; he immediately marched towards Syria. All yielded to him, Cassius being absent; all, I say, submitted, except Antioch: but Cassius, returning with a good Body of Troops, besieged Dolabella in the City of Laodicea, and reduced him to the hard Condition, either of killing himself, or surrendering himself. Dolabella chose the former (f) [F]. It is said he was not then above Twenty six or

Twenty

(f) Taken from
Dio. lib. 47, ad
Ann. Romæ 712.

'him? Did he conquer without my Assistance? He could not. I laid the Foundation for him of a Civil War. I proposed Laws pernicious to the People. . . . Did he only conquer for himself? Is it not just that they who embark in an equal bottom in the same intricate Cause should equally share the Plunder? You, no doubt, demanded very modestly. . . . But what is that to the purpose? Cæsar had the greater Power! After his last Expedition into Spain, Cæsar used him

(13) Ib. cap. 32. with more Civility (13): He did him a thousand good Offices, which was a sign he looked upon him as a very wicked Man, very capable of doing him service or disservice. Cicero gives a very ill Character of Cæsar as to the choice of his Friends. 'Habebat hoc omnino Cæsar: quem plane perditum ære alieno, egentemque, si eundem nequam hominem audacemque cognoverat, hunc in familiaritatem libentissime cupiebat (14). — Cæsar courted the Friendship of Men in desperate Circumstances, and involved in debt, if he knew them to be immoral and resolute.' For the rest, you will find in Appian (15) a long account of Marc Antony's management as to the Consularship of Dolabella before their Reconciliation, and after the Death of Cæsar.

[D] Marc Antony and Dolabella took some steps at first, from whence the well-affected drew a good Omen. Three days after Cæsar's Death, Marc Antony harangued in the Senate upon Peace and Concord, and charmed the Men of Probity. He sent his Son for a Hostage to the Conspirators, who durst not come down from the Capitol. Cicero often refers him to that day. 'Unum illum diem quo in æde Telluris Senatus fuit, non omnibus iis mensibus quibus te quidam multum à me dissentientes beatum putant, anteponis? Quæ fuit oratio tua de concordia? Quanto metu veterani, quanta sollicitudine civitas tum à te liberata est (16)? — Do not you prefer that day, in which the Senate was assembled in the sacred Temple of Tellus, to the following Months, in which some of an Opinion far different to mine, think you happy?

(16) Cicero, Philipp. 1, c. 13. He says, in the 2d Philipp. cap. 36, Qui tu vir, Dii immortales, & quantos fuisses si illius diei mentem servare potuisses. Pacem traheremus quæ erat facta per obfidem, &c. . . . How amiable, O Antony, had been thy Name, hadst thou still retained the same Disposition of Mind that thou shew'dst that Day! We should then have enjoyed that Peace, of which we had then a Pledge.

(17) See Suetonius in Cæsar, cap. 85.

(18) Cicero, Philipp. 1, cap. 2. Sedition spread thro' the City, gathering every day fresh Strength, when those Persons erected a Funeral-Pile to Cæsar in the Forum, who strove to perpetuate his Burial, when the City was in continual danger from abandoned Slaves, and their more abandoned Masters, such was the check which Dolabella gave to both, and such his conduct in pulling down that cursed Column, that it is a wonder to me, &c.' See in the Remark [L] of the Article TULLIUS, another Passage of Cicero upon the same Fact.

[E] He stopped at Smyrna, and treacherously put to Death Trebonius.] He gave him so many proofs of his Friendship, that he prevented his being upon his guard. So that, in the Night, he easily made himself Master of Smyrna, and forced the House of Trebonius. He cruelly put him to the Torture for two days together, and then cutting off his head, he ordered it to be stuck upon the point of his Spear, and exposed to public View. His Body, after being dragged through the Streets, was thrown into the Sea.

Cicero describes all this with great Eloquence (19): 'Consecutus est Dolabella, nulla suspitione belli: quis enim id putaret? secutæ collocutiones familiarissimæ cum Trebonio, complexuque summæ benevolentia; falsi indices exstiterunt in amore simulato: dexteræ, quæ fidei testes esse solebant, perfidiæ sunt, & scelerè violatæ: nocturnus introitus Smyrnæ, quasi in hostium urbem, quæ fidissimorum, antiquissimorumque sociorum. . . . Interficere captum statim noluit, ne nimis, credo, in victoria liberalis videretur: cum verborum contumeliis optimum virum incesso ore lacerasset, tum verberibus, ac tormentis questionem habuit pecuniæ publicæ, idque per biduum: post, cervicibus fractis, caput abscidit, idque affixum gestari jussit in pilo: reliquum corpus tractum, atque laceratum abiecit in mare. — Dolabella obtained it, there being no Suspicion of a War. And who could suspect any? after this he had frequent and familiar Conversations with Trebonius, and Tokens of the greatest Friendship passed between them: but these were only outward Shews; their hands were joined as marks of Sincerity, but Treachery was the sole design. Smyrna was entered by night, not as the City of an Ally, but of an Enemy. . . . He (Dolabella) would not immediately dispatch his Captive, lest (as I suppose) he should seem over-liberal in his Victory; but having loaded this good Man with most base and malicious Language, and for two days successively tortured him to a Confession of the public Treasure, he caused his neck to be broke, and his head to be struck off, which he fixed on a Pole and carried about in triumph, whilst the rest of his Body was infamously dragged thro' the Streets, and being mangled was cast into the Sea.' I refer you to the Fountain-head; for I should be too prolix, if I should set down all that Cicero says upon this Subject in the Oration I cite. We shall see below (20) the pious Reflexion Marc Antony made upon the Death of this Murderer of Cæsar. People use themselves to descant upon Morality in a way, which the vilest Men have the impudence to make use of.

(19) Philipp. 11, cap. 2.

[F] Dolabella chose to kill himself.] Dion Cassius says he killed himself (21). But others say, one of his Guard, at his own desire, cut off his head, and then killed himself, without regarding the advice his Master gave him to present it to the Conqueror, and thereby obtain his Pardon (22). Appian calls him Marfus, but Dion calls him Octavius, which made Usher say (23) that Marfus and Octavius, killed themselves in Laodicea. It appears in one of the Philippics, that Marfus Octavius, a wretched Roman Senator, was one and the same Person. Cicero mentions him with the utmost Contempt. 'Quid opus fuit cum legione præmissa Marfo nescio quo Octavio, scelerato latrone atque egente, qui popularetur agros, vexaret urbes, non ad spem constituendæ rei familiaris, quam tenere cum posse negant, qui norunt

(20) In Remark [G], Cicero. (31)

(21) Lib. 47, pag. 393. (22) Appianus, de Bello Civ. lib. 4. (23) In Annali-bus.

(g) Anapian de Bello Civili, lib. 2, pag. 279, makes him Twenty five Years old at the Death of Julius Caesar. See Remark [E] of the Article TULLIA.

(24) Cicero, Philip. 11, c. 2.

(25) Noris Cenotaph. Milan. pag. 278.

(26) That of Prefectus Nocturnarum excubiarum.

(27) Onomast. pag. 638.

(28) Note, That as to this Fault there are some Chronologers who hold that Caesar was killed in the Year 709. See the Remark [O] of the Article CÆSAR.

(29) See Fabricius in Vita Clæronis, ad ann. ult. pag. m. 214.

(30) Cicero, Philip. 13, cap. 11.

(31) Apud Cicer. ibid.

(32) Cicer. Philip. 11, init. cap. 1.

(33) Valef. in Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 29, cap. 2, pag. m. 562.

Twenty seven Years of Age (g). To know his restless turbulent Temper; it is enough to remember, that, after the Example of Clodius, he got himself adopted by a Plebeian, in order to be made Tribune of the People (b). Moreri's Faults are considerable [G].

(mihî enim hic Senator ignotus est) sed ad presentem patium mendicitatis sue? Consecutus est Dolabella (24).—What Occasion was there for one Marcus Octavius, a necessitous Villain, to be sent with a Legion, to plunder the Country and harraßs the People, not out of hopes of enriching himself? (For those who know him, which I must confess I do not, say he never will) but for a present supply of his neediness? Dolabella, &c. This mistake of Usher, criticised by Father Noris (25), is the more excusable, as Appian describes his Marcus by an Employment of less Consideration than what Dion gives to Octavius (26). I believe it should be read in Dion Μαρκος Οκταβιος, and not Μαρκος Οκταβιος. If it be said, that on the contrary it should be read in Cicero Marcus Octavius, and not Marcus Octavius, I answer, my conjecture is founded upon Appian's calling this Person, merely Marcus. It would be absurd to read Marcus in Appian; for in a History they never specify People by their first name only: I would not totally reject Glandorp's Supposition (27), that this Man's Name was Marcus Octavius Marcus.

[G] Moreri's faults are considerable. I. He should not have advanced it as a doubtful thing, that the Dolabellas were descended from the Cornelian Family. For it is a certain Fact which none are ignorant of. II. In speaking of Dolabella, declared an Enemy to the Republic for the murder of Trebonius, he should not have omitted his Name or his Forename. I say the same concerning the other Dolabellas mentioned by Moreri. III. He ought not to have said that he was declared an Enemy to the Common-Wealth, in the Year 710, but in the Year 711; for the Death of Trebonius was heard at Rome a Year (28) after Caesar was killed (29). Hirtius, who was Consul in the Year 711, was actually discharging his Office (30), when Marc Antony wrote to him (31): 'De diffide pœnas scelerum, he speaks of Trebonius, cineri atque ossibus clarissimi viri, & apparuisse nomen Deorum intra finem anni vertentis, aut jam soluto supplicio paritidii aut impendente latandum est. The Wretch Trebonius has suffered this punishment to appease the Manes of that great Man, and the vengeance of the Gods displayed itself within the Year: we may rejoice now that he hath either suffered, or soon will.' IV. He should not have described this Dolabella by his great Power over Antony's Mind, since the quarrels between those two Men are a thousand times better known, and were of a much longer Duration than their Friendship. Quorum summum quondam inter ipsos odium, bellumque meministis, eosdem postea singulari inter se consensu, & amore devinxit impurissimæ naturæ & turpissimæ vitæ similitudo (32).—Their former Hatred, and professed Enmity, was converted into Friendship, by a concurrence of the most impure Minds, and a similitude in Villany. V. He should not have distinguished him from Cicero's Son-in-Law. VI. Nor perhaps from him who referred to the Court of Areopagus the trial of that Woman of Smyrna, who had poisoned her Husband. Valefius is of Opinion that the Dolabella, who refused to try that Woman, is the same that put Trebonius to Death, and that perished at Laodicea (33). VII. However, he ought not to have given the Author of that Reference the Forename of Cneus; since Valerius Maximus calls him Publius; nor let it be said that Aulus Gellius calls him Cneus; for besides that Moreri cites Valerius Maxi- mus, and not Aulus Gellius, it must be observed that Aulus Gellius cites Valerius Maximus for his Original. Therefore it is more reasonable to correct the Transcriber by Valerius Maximus, than Valerius Maximus by the Transcriber. VIII. He should not have said that the Woman, whose cause was referred to the Areopagus, was charged with having poisoned her Husband, and a Son of his by another Marriage; for the most natural and genuine Sense of the Author's Words, cited by Moreri (34), is that That Woman poisoned her Husband, and the Son she had had by that Husband, because they had killed the Son she had had by another Husband. Aulus Gellius, who has expressed this Story in other Terms, when he copied it from Valerius Maximus, did so well comprehend the sense I mention, that he took care the Reader might be in no suspense about it: Mulier Smyrnæa . . . id fecisse confitebatur, dicebatque habuisse se faciendi causam, quoniam idem illi maritus & filius alterum filium mulieris ex viro priore genitum, adolescentem optimum & innocentissimum, exceptum incidiis occidissent (35).—The Woman confessed the Fact, and insisted she had sufficient Reason for so doing, because her Husband and Son had betrayed and murdered another Son, a hopeful and virtuous Youth, whom she had by a former Husband. Ammianus Marcellinus speaking of this Fact, without doubt, avoided the Equivocation which might lie upon the Phrase of Valerius Maximus; but as his Text is much mutilated in this Place (36), it cannot entirely remove our Doubts. Some Editions have it, Smyrnæa materfamilias filium proprium & maritum venenisse necesse confessa;—She confessed that she had poisoned her own Son and Husband. Other Editions have it SOLEM PROPRIAM. All this condemns Moreri. We may observe, by the way, one thing, which might be repeated a hundred thousand times, if it was to be mentioned upon all Occasions, that the Latin Tongue has not the advantage of removing all ambiguous Terms as ours has. Here is Valerius Maximus, who, in relating a singular and very surprising Fact, makes use of an Expression, by which Interpreters are divided in their Opinion, concerning the kind of Crime that Woman committed. Mr Moreri is not the most learned Man, who has supposed that this Woman was Step-mother to one of the two Men she poisoned. The learned Valefius (37) has interpreted Valerius Maximus's Phrase in the same manner, in which he deserves less Credit than Aulus Gellius, who imagined that Woman poisoned her own Son. The difference is so great between the Crime, as described by Aulus Gellius, and the same Crime as represented by Valefius, that the Historian is inexcusable for relating a Fact of such consequence, in so ill a manner, as to give rise to such a Diversity of Interpretations. IX. Moreri ought not to have made the Woman's Husband the sole murderer of the young Man; for either her Son, or her Husband's Son, was an Accomplice with him. X. To conclude, he should not have assured us that the Accuser, and the Woman's husband were the same Person; for since she was guilty of having murdered her Husband, it was not her Husband that prosecuted her, and consequently the Court of Areopagus did not order the Husband to appear before them, together with the Accused at the end of a hundred Years.

DOLABELLA (HORACE), Author of a Book, intituled, Apologia pro Puritanis. It is properly a burlesque Satire against the Protestants. This Book must be very scarce; for it is not to be found, even in the Catalogues of the most numerous Libraries. I know it no otherwise than by having seen it cited in Father Garasse's Doctrine Curieuse. It is written by way of Question and Answer, and must needs have used the Scriptures with little Decency, since that Jesuit speaks of it in the manner he has done [A].

[A] He is the Author of a Book . . . in which the Scriptures have been used with little decency, since Father Garasse speaks of it in the manner he has done. That Author wrote a Book, which is much sought for, and valued by Men of Wit, in which he overthrows all the Maxims and Fancies of the Puritans; VOL. II.

by formal Texts taken out of the holy Scriptures; but I could wish he had shewn more respect to the Holy Ghost, and not have taken the liberty to make him sometimes say things that are somewhat shameful. Indeed they strike home; but in my Opinion, he had better have used other Weapons; and

(1) Garaffe, Docteur Curieus, pag. 672, 673.

(2) He takes it from the 3d Chapter, Question 38, and relates it pag. 514, 515.

(a) See the Remarks [C] and [G].

(b) And not 1543, as Moreri has it; or 1545, as Mr. Baillet, la Caille, &c. say.

(1) Histoire de l'Imprimerie, pag. 112.

(2) Baillet, Jugem. des Scav. Tom. IV, pag. 516.

(3) They, who had seen the Manuscript, affirmed it.

(4) This is taken from Thomassin in his Treatise de Plagio Literario, n. 409, & seq. Thomassin has taken it from some Passages of Francis Florinus Sabianus, and from the Answer of Dolet.

(10) See Thomassin in his Treatise de Plagio Literario, n. 409, & seq.

(11) See Thomassin in his Treatise de Plagio Literario, n. 409, & seq.

(12) See Thomassin in his Treatise de Plagio Literario, n. 409, & seq.

"and not have prostituted a golden Scepter to stir a Dunghill, as he has done (1)." Father Garaffe has quoted several Passages of this Book of Doletella: one of which follows (2): "Quero cur universa nobilitas Anglicana dedignetur servire in ministerio domus Dei, & quare vilissimos homines & idiotas cogantur assumere ad ministerium? Respondetur quia scriptum est Ezechielis XXVII, habuerunt naves ad ministerium; & Joan. II, Ministri autem sciebant qui hauserant aquam. — I should be glad to know why the English Nobility should all refuse to serve in the Ministry of the Church, and Persons of the meanest Capacity, and the lowest Station, are obliged to execute that holy Office. The answer is, because we find in Ezechiel, Chap. the XXVII, they had Sailors for the Ministry, and in the Second of St John, the Servants (i. e. Ministers) that drew the Water knew whence it was."

DOLET (STEPHEN), a very learned Man, burnt at Paris for his Opinions in Religion (a), the third of August 1546 (b), was a Native of Orleans. He applied himself to reform the Latin Style, and composed some pretty good Works [A] on that Matter. Some (c) have thought that, in his Commentaries on the Latin Tongue (d), he was much assisted by Naugier, with whom he had lived at Venice. Others have accused him publicly of Plagiarism [B]. He wrote some Latin and French Verses, which are not amiss [C]. He wrote an Apology for the Sect of the Ciceronians, whom Erasmus had insulted. Improving good Literature so much as he did, it must not be thought strange, that he had a share in the Affection of Castellan, a learned Prelate, and

(c) Stormius Praest. formulae linguae Latinae Stephani Doleti.

(d) They were printed in 1556, in 2 Vols. in folio.

[A] He composed some pretty good Works. You will find a more complete List of his Works in Gesner, and the Sieur de la Caille (1), than in Moreri. I must not forget that Dolet, who was Printer and Bookseller at Lyons, printed some of his own Writings. He would have printed the French Translation of most of Plato's Works that he himself had made, if he had not been prevented by his Execution (2).

[B] He was accused of Plagiarism. Before the Thesaurus of Charles Stephens, and the Observations of Nizzolius appeared, Dolet's Commentaries were no larger than the Elegancies of Laurentius Valla (3). They were afterwards swelled to two Volumes in Folio, at the expense of Charles Stephens, Nizzolius, Riccius, and Lazarus de Baif. This was soon known; Charles Stephens saw some Sheets of the second Volume whilst it was printing; and observed that almost all that concerned Navigation, was taken out of the Book of Re Navali, which Baif had published. Mark what he did: he composed an Abridgment of that Book of Re Navali, and published it. This gave him an Opportunity of shewing the Theft, and some Faults of Dolet, who to justify himself published a Treatise of Re Navali, extracted out of his second Volume, and added an Answer to his Censurer, and dedicated it to Lazarus de Baif. He did not deny that he had borrowed several things from Lazarus, but maintained it was no Robbery (4).

John Vallerius made very moving Complaints against the Persecution, which he supposed Jealousy had raised at that time against his Friend Stephen Dolet. See how he spoke of it to Cardinal John of Lorraine, upon dedicating his two Books of Epigrams to him, which he caused to be printed at Lyons: by Sebastian Gryphius, in the Year 1536. "Nemo: (ut ingenuè, quod sentio, dicam) tam inimicus nomini Gallico esse creditur, quam Gallus. Id cum multi haestus sunt experti, tum nuper STEPHANUS DOLETUS Aurelius, juvenis de lingua Latina (ne quid simplicis dicam) optimè prima jam adolescentia meritis: reliquo vitæ cursu quid non literis adferret tam divino natus ingenio? tanta laborum omnium patientia, tanta constantia, tanta animi alacritate ad nominis immortalitatem contendens? Is, inquam, ætatis nostræ lumen, ac Gallie sempiterna gloria, invidiæ morsus expertus est vel acerbissimos. Nam cum linguae Latinae Commentarios (at quod opus? quàm minimè à juvene expectandum? quante diligentiae? quanti laboris? quàm exacti iudicii?) ad publicam omnium linguarum Latinae amantium utilitatem in lucem emitti voluit, nullos magis sibi adversos censors sensit, quàm à quibus laboris uberrimum fructum jure merito expectabat. Sed valent hujuscemodi literarum pestes: qui, cum obesse surgenti doctorum gloriae conantur, tum vel maxime profunt. — No one (if I may ingenuously declare my Opinion) is a greater Enemy to the French Name than a Frenchman: of this there are many Instances, and one of a late date very notorious. Stephen Dolet bad, in his Youth, made a surprising Progress in the Latin Tongue. It is not difficult to conceive that so uncommon a Genius, joined to an unwearied Application, may one day prove an Ornament to the Republic of Letters. Yet this great Man, the wonder of his Age, and who will be a lasting Glory to his Country, was not above the reach of Envy; for being about to publish Commentaries of the Latin Tongue, a Work of immense Labour, and sound Judgement, of universal Use to the Lovers of that Language, and little to be expected from his Years, he met with the greatest Opposition and Censure from those very Persons, whose favour and applause he had the greatest Reason to expect. Yet these blusters of Merit do some good, since their censure most effectually turns to the Honour of the Person, whom they would injure. Note that among those Epigrams are many Lines in praise of Dolet, and against his Censurers, and particularly against one Maurus.

[C] He wrote some Latin and French Verses, which are not amiss. His Latin Verses, were in Gruterus's Opinion, worthy to be inserted in the Deliciae Poetarum Gallorum; and if they are not excellent, yet they are not so imperfect as Julius Caesar Scaliger represents them. That Critic's Passion against Dolet has something in it so outrageous, and, if I dare say so, something so brutish, that a Man can scarce forbear thinking that a personal Resentment directed that great Man's Pen (5). I shall cite the whole Passage; we shall find Dolet punished in it with Death, not for what was called Lutheranism, but for Atheism. Dóletus . . . Musarum carcinoma aut vomica dici potest. Nam præterquam quod in eo tam grandis corpore (ut ait Catullus) ne mica falis quidem, vult insanum agere Tyrannum in Poesi. Ita suo arbitrato Virgilianas gemmas suæ inserit pici, ut videri velit sua. Ignavus loquutulejus, qui ex tessellis Ciceronis febriculosis quidam conferruminavit (ut ipse vocat) orationes: ut docti judicant, latrationes. Patavit tantumdem licere sibi in divinis opibus Virgilianis. Ita dum optimi atque maximi Regis Francisci fata canit, ejus nomen suo malo fato fundum est, quodque tum illi, tum illius versibus debebatur, solus passus est Atheos flammæ supplicium. Flamma tamen eum puriorem non efficit: ipse flammam potius efficit impuriorem. In Epigrammatum vero colluvionibus atque latrinis illis, quid ejus tibi fordes dicam? Languida, frigida, insulsa, plenissima illius vecordiae, quæ summa armata impudentia ne Deum quidem esse professus est. Quapropter quemadmodum summus Philosophus Aristoteles in Natura animalium fecit, ut post enarratas partes, quibus constituuntur, etiam excrementorum faciat mentionem, hic ita ejus legatur nomen, non tanquam poetæ, sed tanquam poetici excrementi (6). — Dolet may be called the Muses Canker, or Impostume: he wildly affects to be absolute in Poetry without the least pretence to Wit, and endeavours to make his own base Copper pass by mixing it with Virgil's Gold. A Driveller, who, with some scraps of Cicero, has tagged together something, which he calls Orations, but which Men of Learning rather judge to be Latrations. He thought he might make as free with the immortal Works of Virgil. Whilst he sung the fate of that Great and Good King Francis, his Name found it's own evil Fate, and the Atheist suffered the Punishment of the Flames, which both he and his Verses so justly merited. But the Flames could not purify him, but were by him rather rendered impure. Why should I mention his Epigrams, which are but a common sink or store of dull, cold, unmeaning Truë, full of that thoughtless Arrogance

(5) Mr. Baillet blames him for it very justly in his Jugement sur les Poëtes, n. 1279, Tom. III, pag. 230.

(6) Scaliger. Poët. lib. 6, pag. m. 730.

and much beloved by Francis I. Castellan made such Intercession for him, that he got him released out of Prison [D], and justly checked a Cardinal for the Reproaches he had cast upon him on that Account [E]. I easily believe that Dolet promised to be a good Catholic;

THE Ground and Origin of Julius Cæsar Scaliger's Hatred to Dolet.

(7) Thou forgettest two who were better than thy Badius, viz. Geoffrey Tory and Stephen Dolet, whatever Scaliger, out of I know not what hatred, has said of the latter. Naudé's Dialogue de Majourat. pag. 8.

(8) This is what he wrote to Arnaud Fernon. See his 14th Letter, at the 35th Page of the Edit. of Toulouze, in 4to, 1620.

* that braves the Almighty, and that denies his Being. * Therefore as the Prince of Philosophers, Aristotle, first recounted the Parts whereof Animals were constituted, and then mentioned their Excrements; so let Dolet's Name stand, not for a Poet, but for a poetical Excrement. The learned Naudé, who suspected, not without reason, that Julius Cæsar Scaliger was urged to speak in this manner by some private Resentment, did not know the Original of it (7). I fancy I have discovered it. Dolet ventured to interfere with Scaliger; he wrote against Erasmus, in favour of the Ciceronian Sect, after Scaliger had supported that Cause. Now few Authors are pleased with such Seconds. It is looked upon as an affected Design, either of out-doing the first Champion, or robbing him of the Honour of being the only Person who breaks a Lance. It is even thought that he, who intermeddles with the Combat, judges that the Cause was but ill maintained, and stands in need of an Advocate. If this be, generally speaking, the Spirit and Character of Authors, judge what Scaliger's Indignation was when he saw Dolet enter the Lists, and surprise him, as he pretended, in some ill Practices. He pretended among other things, that the finest Passages of his Harangue had been pirated by Dolet, and placed in a disadvantageous Light; and as to the Praises which Dolet had given him, he did not thank him for them; they came too late, and with too ill a grace, to repair the first Offence. A better Judgment of all this will be made from these Words of Scaliger (8): 'Arbitror te Doleti vidisse Dialogum adversus eum (Erasmum) quem non puduit extantibus scriptis meis, flexu alio orationis omnia mea fusturari, atque ineptissimis inurere calamistris. Itaque eadem quæ in orationibus intemperatæ, stilus paulo minus asper, sed emendicatus, ut verbi potius alienis conquisitis, quæ corrogatis, quam oblato argumento ejus loquacitas excrecere videatur. At Cæsarem laudat, inquit; accipio. Nam te ajunt ad eum retulisse, consuleret dignitati suæ, qui temere atque stolidè nimis super Italico nomine ineptisset: à me integrum Dialogum apparatum, quo illius ostenderem & malevolum animum cum inani gloria conjunctum, & præceptis ingenium cum fupore, & impurum dicendi genus cum loquacitate, & amentem dictionem cum impudentia. Ita igitur abdanditum, ut animum meum deflenderet à proposito, ita laudasse, ut sequi potius aliorum judicium invitatus, quam suum ipse libens apponere videretur. Pro ea re data est à nobis opera, ut & eum & alium, quem velit ipse, peniteat posthac rabiei illius, seu impudicitie. Audio illum præfesse Lugduni Librariis, quorum manum emendat. Id quod si verum est, in his libris, quos nuper invulgatos à Grypho ære comparavimus, deprehenderunt etiam pueri nostri vel insigni scutica vitia animadvertenda. Peritrixini cum in hac secunda Oratione, sublati quidem nomine, sed ita depictum, ut vel ab infantibus Tolosanis agnosci possit. — I imagine you must have seen a Dialogue of Dolet's against Erasmus, whereof he was not ashamed to steal the greatest part from what I had published, giving it a different turn, and dressing it up in his own awkward Manner. There is the same irregularity as in his Oration, only the Style is something smoother, but then it is a poor piece of Plagiarism, so that his long winded Chat appears to be a servile Collection of other Men's Thoughts, rather than a series of proper Arguments. But you will say he praises Cæsar; I own it. For it is said that you advised him to consult his Character, and not too unwisely trifle with a Cæsar's Name; that I had finished a Discourse, wherein I should expose his Malice and empty Pride, his Pertness and Stupidity; his Brangling and Improperity, his incoherent Expressions and Impudence. The design therefore of all this fulsome Flattery was to divert me from my Purpose, and seems more the forced effect of other persons Opinions, than a voluntary acknowledgment of his own. Wherefore I have endeavoured to make him, and others, who they had been more sparing of their Rage and Impudence. I am informed he is a director of the Press at Lyons, and, if he had a hand in correcting those Books which were lately published by Grybbius, our very school Boys have taken Notice of Faults for which he deserves the severest Loss. I have drawn his Character in the second Oration, and though his Name is not put to it, yet I imagine the painting is not so bad, but that a Child may know for whom it was drawn. He says several other things against Dolet in the same Letter. Confirm, by the following Passage of Diogenes Laërtius, what I have said of Authors who write on the same Subjects. Εἰκοι δὲ καὶ Ξενοφῶν πρὸς αὐτὸν ἔχειν ἐν εὐμένεος ὥστερ γὰρ διαφιλονεικῶντες τὰ ὅμοια γεγραφοῖσι, συμπόσιον, Σωκράτους ἀπελογίαν, τὰ ἐδιδάκτο μνημονεύματα. Videtur & Xenophon haudquaquam amico in illum (Platonem) fuisse animo: nam veluti contentionis studio similia scripsere, Symposium, Socratis defensionem, commentaria moralia (9). — Xenophon, it seems, bore no great Affection to Plato; for out of a desire of Contention they wrote on the same Subject; The Symposium, the Defence of Socrates, and moral Tracts.

[D] Castellan made such Intercession for him, that he got him released out of Prison.] Here is what the Author of Castellan's Life says of it (10): 'Id magis verum esse credat qui Doletum longi carceris illuvie sedatum, prima accusatione impie fraudis reum, Castellano supplicie carcere emissus, & omni noxa condonata liberatum esse cognoverit. — He will more readily be inclined to believe this, who knows that Dolet was delivered from a long and grievous confinement, on an Accusation of impious Fraud, and received a free Pardon, at the Intercession of Castellan.' The Reproach that a certain Cardinal made Castellan testifies, that Atheism (11), or something like it, was the Crime that Dolet found himself suspected of: 'Unus primi nominis Cardinalis Castellano gravi & oburgatrice oratione adortus esset, quod cum in Ecclesia Orthodoxorum Pontificis locum teneret, contra omnes tamen homines quibus religio & pietas cordi esset, eorum qui non modo Lutherana luc infecti, sed etiam Dei expertes impietatis rei essent, partes tueri apud Christianissimum Regem ausus esset. — A Cardinal of great note sharply reprov'd Castellan, that he who filled, as it were, the Chair of High-Priest in the Orthodox Church, should, in Opposition to all who had the Interest of true Religion at Heart, openly espouse, before the most Christian King, not only those who were infected with the Lutheran Heresy, but even those who were professed Atheists.' In the following Remark we shall see the general Answer that Castellan made; and here is what he answered in particular concerning Dolet: 'Sed apud Regem Doleti fraudibus & sceleribus nullum patrocinium tribuisse, pro eo qui promitteret vitæ morumque emendationem homine Christiano dignum Regi supplicem factum esse. — That he had never offered to countenance Dolet's Frauds or Wickedness before the King, but had interceded only for a Person who had promised a true Christian Reformation.' This shews that Dolet promised to forsake his dissolute Course of Life.

[E] Castellan . . . justly checked a Cardinal for the Reproaches he had cast upon him on that Account.] He maintained that he had done what a Bishop ought to do; but that the Cardinal would have Bishops to act the Part of Executioners. He told him it was the Business of Bishops, to incline the Minds of Princes to Mercy, and bring home the stray Sheep on their Shoulders. I weaken Peter Galland's Expressions too much, and therefore I will give them in his own words, that the Reader, who understands Latin, may lose nothing. Memini Castellano cum paulum se collegisset animo satis incitato & commoto respondisse, se de quo accusabatur in accusatorem merito retorqueere posse, cum ipse quod viri Ecclesiastici & viri Pontificis proprium esset, fecisset; ille vero quod veri carnificis esset ab Episcopis exigeret. Episcoporum enim esse & Sacerdotum Christi & Apostolorum, virorumque sanctorum qui nobis suo sanguine Ecclesiam consecrarunt exemplo, Regem à sevitia & immanitate ad mansuetudinem, clementiam & misericordiam convertere, errantem ovem humeris impositam in ovile reducere, deque ea recepta tanquam expugnatis hostium castris gaudio triumphare (12).

(9) Laërt. in Platone, lib. 3, n. 34.

(10) Petrus Gallandus, pag. 62.

(11) See the Remarks [C] and [G].

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 62, 63.

Catholic; but as he did not keep his Promise, no body durst appear for him when he was imprisoned the second time. So that being abandoned to the Fury of the Inquisitors, he was condemned to death. A Letter has been published, which testifies that he recommended himself to the Holy Virgin [F], and to St Stephen, a little before he was strangled; but these kind of Testimonies are much to be suspected, for the Reasons that I have touched on in another Place (e). There happened some Skirmishes among the Poets of both Parties, on occasion of this Punishment. See some of their Verses in Mr le Laboureur (f), who is greatly mistaken in saying that Dolet was placed in the Martyrology of the Protestants [G].

It has been said (g), that he was a Bastard of Francis I, but not acknowledged as such. I cannot believe he was that Prince's Son: I know he was very young when he published two Volumes, in folio, in 1536; but I cannot persuade myself he was young enough to be the Son of a Man who was born in 1494 (h). It is affirmed, in the Patiniana, that he wrote some Harangues against the City of Toulouse, for which he made the Amende Honourable.

— I remember that when Castellan had a little recollected himself, he made this smart and proper reply, that he could easily retort the Accusation upon the Accuser, since he had done nothing but what was the Duty of a Person in his Station, but that He required that a Bishop should perform the Office of an Executioner. That it was the Duty of Bishops and Priests to imitate the Example of CHRIST, his Apostles, and those holy Men, who with their Blood consecrated the Church, to pacify the wrath of an angry Prince, and to melt him to Softness and Mercy; that to lay a lost Sheep on our Shoulders, and bring him back to the Fold, was as glorious as a Triumph.

[F] A Letter has been published, which testifies that a little before he was strangled he recommended himself to the holy Virgin, &c. Mr Almelooven (13) has inserted it in one of his Books (14). It was written from Paris the twenty third of August 1546. Florent Junius, who writ it, relates that on the third of that Month Stephen Dolet was executed, and that the Executioner, having prepared all things, advised him to think on his Salvation, and to recommend himself to God and the Saints; that Dolet making no haste, but only muttering something, the Executioner told him, he had Orders to speak to him concerning Salvation before all the People: So that, said he to him, you must call upon the holy Virgin, and St Stephen your Patron, whose Festival is celebrated this Day; and if you do it not, I know what I have to do. Immediately Dolet said a Prayer according to the Form of the Executioner (15), and advertised the Standers by to read his Books with much Circumspection, and protested more than three times, that they contained many things he had never understood; and having afterwards recommended himself to God, he was strangled, and then reduced to Ashes. Florent Junius says, that a Person who assisted as an Officer at the Execution, informed him of all these Particulars (16).

[G] Le Laboureur is mistaken in saying that Dolet was placed in the Martyrology of the Protestants. The pretended Martyrology of the Huguenots makes a great account of this Dolet, who was indeed a Man of Wit and Learning, but a Libertine, as were all the first Preachers of the New Gospel. These are Mr le Laboureur's words (17). A Man might very easily be deceived by them; for who could believe that he had advanced such a thing without having cast his Eye on the Volume, wherein, says he, they have praised Stephen Dolet to much? However, what he affirms is very false; the Martyrology of the Huguenots does not mention him. I have expressly consulted the little Latin Martyrology of John Crispin, and afterwards the large one in Folio that was printed in French in the Year 1582, but I found nothing in them concerning Stephen Dolet. I remember also to have observed, that Beza, who keeps a pretty exact account (18) of the Persons put to death in France for what was called Lutheranism, says nothing of this pretended Martyr. This Silence would have seemed strange to me, if I had not known that John Calvin placed Stephen Dolet among the impious. Agrippa, Villanovanum, DOLETUM & similes vulgo notum est tanquam Cyclopes quosdam Evangelium semper fastuose sprevisse. Tandem eo prolapsi sunt amentiae & furoris, ut non modo in filium Dei execrabiles blasphemias evomerent, sed quantum ad animae vitam attinet, nihil à canibus & porcis putarent se differre (19). — It is publicly known that Agrippa, Servetus, DOLET, and others of the same stamp, looked on the Gospel with gigantic disdain, and at last fell into such a state of Phrenzy and Distraction, that they not only opened their Mouths with horrid Blasphemy against the Son of GOD, but maintained that, as to Animal Life, there was no difference between them and Swine. Here Calvin and Prateolus are perfectly agreed; for Prateolus, speaking of Atheists (20), joins Stephen Dolet with Diagoras, Evemerus, Theodorus, and such others whom Antiquity had branded for not admitting a Deity. For the rest, Mr le Laboureur (21) cites some Latin Verses; at the bottom whereof is declared that Stephen Dolet, born at Orleans, was burnt in the place Maubert the third of August 1546, on St Stephen's Day, which was the Day of his Nativity (22). Therefore Moreri ought to have called those Circumstances reported by la Croix du Maine into question; and ought yet less to have grounded his doubt on la Croix du Maine's being a Protestant; for if any Mystery were to be found in these Circumstances, it were much more the business of a Catholic than of a Protestant to find it out; a Catholic would draw more devout Reflexions from it than a Protestant.

I have just now discovered, that Theodore Beza, who before he made a public Profession of the Reformed Religion, had published an Epitaph that was very much to the Honour of our Dolet (23), left it out of the Editions of his Poems, published after he had abandoned the Romish Faith. This is a proof, the Protestants did not concern themselves with the Punishment of that Man.

DOMITIA LONGINA, Daughter of the illustrious Domitius Corbulo (a), rendered herself unworthy of such a Father by her Lasciviousness. Domitian, having been declared Cæsar, gave himself over to all manner of Licentiousness. He debauched several Women, and finding Domitia much to his Mind, he obliged her to forsake her Husband (b). He kept her some time as a Concubine, and afterwards solemnly married her (c). The Dignity of an Empress did not hinder her from falling in love with a Comedian [A]. For this reason the Emperor repudiated her: But not being able

[A] The Dignity of an Empress did not hinder her from falling in love with a Comedian. That Comedian's Name was Paris: He was killed in the open Street by Domitian's Order for daring to lie with the Empress. Domitian would have had his Wife's Throat cut to punish that infamous Commerce, but by Urfus's Advice he was satisfied with putting her away. Xiphilianus tells us no more of it (1); but we learn from Suetonius, that Domitian soon called her home again. Uxorero Domitianam ex qua in secundo suo consulatu filium tulerat, alteroque anno a consulatu filiam, Augustam eandem Paridis Histrionis amore deperditam, repudiavit, intraque breve tempus impatiens discidium quasi effugitante populo reduxit (2). — He divorced

(e) See, above, Rem. [I] of the Article BÉRQUIN.

(f) Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 355, 356.

(g) Patiniana, pag. 22. Paris Edit.

(h) It is the Year Francis I was born in.

(14) He was Physician at Tergou, and is now, in 1699, a Professor of Polite Learning at Hardwicke.

(15) Intitul'd, Athanasius Theologico-Philologicae. Amsterdam, 1694.

(16) Mi Deos quem toties offendi propitius esto, teque Virginem matrem precor, diuque Stephanum, ut apud Dominum pro me peccatore intercedat. — My God, whom I have so often offended, be merciful, and thou, O Virgin Mother, and thou, O holy Stephen, intercede for me a Sinner. Apud Almelooven, pag. 79.

(17) Hec quæ scribo didici ab eo qui executioni interfuit ex officio. Ibid.

(18) Le Laboureur. Addit. aux Mémoires de Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 355.

(a) Xiphilin. in Vespas. pag. 217.

(b) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 11.

(c) Xiphil. ubi supra.

(18) In the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches of France.

(19) Calvin, in Tract. de Scandal. pag. 60. Tractatum Theologicorum.

(20) In Elencho Hæret. voce Athei.

(21) Ubi supra, pag. 356.

(22) Stephanus Doletus Aurelius Gallus, die sancto Stephano sacro, & natus & Vulcanus devotus in Malbertina area Lutetiae 3. Augusti 1546.

(23) It is among the Juvenilia Theodori Bezae, at the Tourny first Leaf of the Edition I use, which is in 1600 without the Printer's Name or Date.

(1) Xiphil. in Domitiano, pag. 230, 231.

(2) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 3.

able to live without her, he took her again a little while after (d); and to conceal this Indignity, alledged, that the People were desirous that he should take Domitia home again: Id populus curat scilicet. It is pretended, that this Woman, distrustful of her Husband's cruel Temper, sought means to rid herself of him, and that she had a hand in the Conspiracy by which he perished [B]. Titus, the Brother of Domitian, was suspected of having had to do with her; but she was judged innocent, when she denied it upon Oath; for, instead of denying such Adventures, it had been always her way to boast of them [C]. She had a great regard for Josephus, and never ceased doing him good Offices (e). As for her first Husband (f), he was not secure by parting with her: For Domitian, not satisfied to have taken his Wife from him, took away his Life also (g). We read, in Procopius, a Fact very worthy of Praise, concerning the Wife of Domitian [D]. The Question is if it be true.

(d) Sueton. ibid. cap. 3.

(e) Joseph. de Vita sua, sub fin.

(f) His Name was Aelius Lamia.

(g) Sueton. ibid. cap. 10.

* his Wife Domitia, by whom he had a Son in his second Consulship, and a Daughter the second Year after, because, though an Empress, she was enamoured with a Player; but in a little time, not able to live without her, he took her again under pretence that the People earnestly desired it. It is very likely that Dion had not forgot this Conduct of Domitian, and it must be owing to Xiphilin's ill taste, if it is not to be found in his Abridgment of Dion. I maintain that the suppressing such a Fact discovers an ill taste; for Domitian's ill Qualities are set in a much better Light, when it is known he had the Baseness to return the Dignity of Empress to a Woman who had prostituted herself to a Player: It is a very sensible Evidence of a worthless Soul, which draws on that Tyrant's Memory all the Contempt and Horror it deserves. And as it is the Duty of an Historian to discover the Character of his Actors by the boldest Strokes, which mark the Extent of their Virtues, or of their Vices; it is plain, that Xiphilin had but little Judgment if he did not think himself obliged to preserve the recalling of Domitia; for I take it for granted, he found it in the History he abbreviated. Nor let it be alledged that he did the Office of an Abbreviator; one Line was sufficient to inform us that Domitia was recalled. The Principle now laid down is not favourable to Suetonius, in relation to our Domitia. That Historian suppresses her having been Domitian's Concubine for some time: he pretends, she left her first Husband only to marry that Prince. This is extenuating her Fault, and concealing the Extent of her Irregularities from the Reader. Is this the Duty of an Historian?

[B] It is pretended that she had a hand in the Conspiracy, by which Domitian perished. Aurelius Victor is the only Person who remarks it: 'Adscita etiam in consilium tyranni uxor Domitia, ob amorem Parisidis Histrionis à Principe cruciatus formidante (3).

ADVICE to the Authors of Abridgments.

(3) Aurel. Victor in Epitome Imperatorum.

— Having engaged the Tyrant's Wife in the design, who, for her Love to Paris the Player, was in danger of being called to Justice by her Husband. It is surprising that the other Writers should be ignorant of this.

[C] Instead of denying such Adventures, it had been her way always to boast of them. This is the height of Impudence. Suetonius acted like a Historian of a good taste, in describing the Character of that Woman by so singular a mark as this. 'Quidam opinantur consuetudinem recordatum (Titum) quam cum fratrisc uxore habuerit, sed nullam habuisse perfractam Domitia jurabat, haud negatura si qua omnino fuisset, immo etiam gloriatura, quod illi promptissimum erat in omnibus probris (4).

[D] We read in Procopius a Fact very worthy of praise concerning the Wife of Domitian. Procopius (5) relates, that the Wife of Domitian, never having approved of her Husband's tyrannical Conduct, and never having done hurt to any Body, was much esteemed by the Senators. Which was the Cause that, after Domitian's Murder, they desired her to come to the Senate-house, and offered her all she should demand of that wicked Prince's Succession. She only desired leave to bury him, and to erect a Statue to him; when this was granted her, she caused all the dispersed and mangled parts of Domitian's Body to be sought for, and joined them as well as she could. The Body they patched up was the Model of the Statue she erected to her Husband in the Street which leads to the Capitol. The Statue stood there in Procopius's Time, and represented the Barbarity that had been exercised on Domitian. The Empress's Aim was only to preserve a Monument of the barbarous Action of the Murderers. Trifan has reason to admire, that so extraordinary a thing, if true, should be omitted by so many Historians (6).

(4) Sueton. in Tito, cap. 10.

(5) In his Secret History, cited by Trifan. Comment. Historiques, Vol. I, pag. 346.

(6) Trifan. ibid.

DONALDSON (a) (WALTER), born at Aberdeen, in Scotland, holds a Rank among the learned Men of the XVIIth Century. He had been in the Retinue and Service of David Cunningham, Bishop of Aberdeen, and Peter Junius, Great Almoner of Scotland, when they went in Embassy from King James to the Court of Denmark, and to the Princes of Germany. After his return home he went to Heidelberg, where the famous Dionysius Gotthofreidus taught the Civil-Law. Donaldson, having dictated a short Course of Moral Philosophy to some young Scholars there, found himself to be an Author before he was aware of it; for a young Man of Riga, in Livonia, who put this Manuscript to the Press [A], asked no body leave for it. The Author, in informing us of this, does not forget the many Editions that were made of that Work in Germany, and in Great Britain. Nor does he forget the Plagiarism of Keckerman [B]. He was afterwards Professor of Natural Philosophy, Morality, and the

(a) Konig calls him Donaldson: it should have been Donaldson: thus the Author calls himself at the Head of his Books.

[A] A young Man put to the Press the Manuscript of his Course of Moral Philosophy. His Name was Vernerus Becker. The Sieur Konig did not well know the date of that Work, since he says that the Author made his Synopsis Ethica in 1631. It is the same Book with the Synopsis Moralis Philosophiae, printed in 1604, according to the Oxford Catalogue.

[B] He did not forget the Plagiarism of Keckerman. The Collection of Plagiaries published by Thomafius, Professor at Leipsic, does not mention the Charge that is brought here against Keckerman. I shall set down our Author's Words at length, because a mistake is to be seen in them, which may be of some use to the Readers, towards teaching them to form a better Judgment of compiled Works. 'Accessit et eorum non tacitum, utcumque suppressio meo nomine, testimonium qui ex eo scripserunt, & in systemata sua quæ ad gustum videbantur transulerunt. Keckermannum cum meis qui conferet, haud vana hæc aut ostentationi dicta reperiet: plagii manifestarii ex eo mangonem deprehendent, quod ne erroribus quidem mutatis, tanquam mancipiorum nominibus, familiæ suæ pleraque adscripserit. Specimen accipe, quod libri secundi cap. 5. mendose ab operis erat vulgatum, 'plagiarius qui authorem ipsum ne de nomine quidem habebat notum sic nothum citat. Hoc loco subjicimus præclaram sententiam Cassii quæ est 2. lib. epistolæ Ciceronis: ipsi homini duplices manus, socias aures, oculos geminos divina tribuerunt, & quæ sequuntur. At vero apud Ciceronem nusquam ista extat sententia, nec eo libro ulla vel Cassii ad Ciceronem vel Ciceronis ad Cassium epistola: verba autem sunt Amalasuenthæ Reginæ apud Cassiodorum epistola tertia libri 10. variarum quam Senatui Romano scribit, the Greek Tongue in the Academy of Sedan, and Principal of the College during sixteen Years; after which he was called to open a College at Charenton; but an Opposition, by Law, was immediately made against that Establishment. Rather than be idle during the time of the Law-suit, he collected among his Papers the several Parts of his Synopsis Oeconomica, and printed it at Paris, in the Year 1620, in 8vo. He dedicated it to the Prince of Wales; it is a Book worth reading (b). It was printed at Rostock, in 8vo, in the Year 1624. The Book in which he reduced into the common Places, and under certain general Heads, all that lies scattered in Diogenes Laërtius concerning one and the same thing, may also have it's Uses (c). It was printed in Greek and in Latin at Frankfort, in the Year 1612, under the Title of Synopsis locorum communium, in qua Sapientiae humanae imago representatur, &c.

8 L

(b) Barthius, in Stat. pag. 39, having cited some Words of it, calls the Author fani judicii hominem.

(c) See the Preface of the Synopsis Oeconomica.

bit, rationem reddens cur fratrem in regni societatem assumpserit; cujus hoc est caput, astra ipsi cœli mundo reguntur auxilio & vicario labore participata mundum fulg luminibus administrant: ipsi quoque homi-ni, &c. (1). — To these may be added the Testimony of those, who, suppressing my name, have copied from it, and inserted whatever was agreeable to their taste in their own Systems. Whoever will compare Keckerman with my writings, will find that I speak not out of Ossification. The Plagiary may be manifestly detected, since he has adopted the very Faults, as Servants names, &c. As for Example. The Pla-giary, who knew not so much as the true Author's names, quotes him by that which the Printer had by mistake given him in the fifth Chapter of the second Book. To this I shall add a memorable Saying of Cassius, in the second Book of Tully's Epistles; Nature hath given to a Man two Hands, two Ears, two Eyes, &c. But there is no such sentence in Tully, nor is there in that Book any Epistle from Tully to Cælius, or from Cælius to Tully. But the Word is Queen Amalaphaba's, and to be found in the third Epistle of the tenth Book of Cassiodorus; She gives this, in her Letter to the Roman People, as a reason for taking her Brother as a Partner in her Kingdom, of which itself are the Heads; The very Stars of Heaven are supported by mutual Affiance, and administer Light to the World each in it's proper turn; and as to Man, Nature has given him, &c.' If the like Faults were looked for in Keckerman, they might be found in abundance. It is the common Practice of those who compose at the expence of their Neighbour: They carry off the Household stuff, and the Sweepings too: They take the Corn, and Chaff, the Broom, and the Dust at the same time. Rem auferunt cum paleiscales (2).

(2) See Plautus
in prologo Truculenti, ver. 9.

(a) Petrus Bem-
bus Epist. 6,
lib. 2, pag. m.
450.

(b) Id. Epist. 7,
lib. 2, pag. 451.

(c) Paulus Jo-
vius, Elog. cap.
56, pag. 132.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid.

DONATUS (JEROM), a Noble Venetian. I shall add something to what Mr Moreri has said of him. He commanded in Brescia in the Year 1496, and had already published his Translation of the Book of Alexander Aphrodisæus de Anima (a). Two Years after he commanded in Ferrara (b). He died at Rome, after having reconciled the Republic of Venice and Pope Julius II, and before the French were marched out of Italy (c). His Children suppressed the Writings which the Affairs of State had hindered him from perfecting (d). One of his Letters contains a Description of the Earthquake that happened in Candia, while he commanded there (e). Pierius Valerianus has placed him in the List of the unfortunate Learned Men [A]. We shall see the Judgment that Erasmus made of him [B].

[A] Pierius Valerianus has placed him in the List of the unfortunate learned Men.] And that for three Reasons. I. Because his Domesticks obeyed him so ill, and vexed him so much, that if he had not found some comfort in his Studies, he would have been the most miserable of all Men. II. Because that having had a thousand Troubles and Difficulties to surmount, with incredible patience, to appease the fierce Humour of Julius II. he had not the pleasure to enjoy the Fruit of his Labour; for he fell sick the same day that he had concluded the Treaty between that Pope and the Venetians, and his Distemper was so violent a Fever, that it soon carried him off; so that he never saw the Happiness he procured his Country, and which he marched out of the Hands of a Rubborn Fortune. III. Because that almost all the Works, which he had writ in great Numbers, to immortalize his Name, remained buried in Obscurity (1), a very sad Disgrace to a learned Man (2). The Author, who says all this, observes that our Donatus was not ignorant of any Science, and that he was a Poet, Orator, Philosopher, Divine, and a Mathematician in an excellent Degree.

(1) Quod eruditissimum indignissimum est acutissimum
genus. *Pier. Val-
lerian. de Litterat.
infelic. lib. 1,
pag. 62, Edit.
Amst. 1647.*

[B] We shall see the Judgment Erasmus made of him.] He had scarce seen any more of Donatus's Writings, than his Letters, yet he believed he was a Man who might have made himself Master of any part of Learning, if the business of the State had permitted him to dedicate himself to cultivating the Sciences: * Epistola, quod pene solum illius (Hieronymi Donati) habemus, declarant illum quidvis præstare potuisse, si voluisset huc animum intendere, sed Reip. negotia distraxerunt hominem ab ocio literario (3).

(2) Taken from Pierius Valerian.
ibid.

(3) Erasmo. in Ciceroniano,
pag. m. 71, 72.

(n) See the Remark [B].

DONATUS (MARCELLUS), Count of Ponzano, Knight of St Stephen, was a Florentine; but he settled at the Court of the Duke of Mantua, and had some considerable Employments there (a). He died in the beginning of the XVIIth Century, before his Scholia in Latinos Romanæ Historiæ Scriptores were quite printed. His Relation, Frederic Donatus, took care of printing the Remainder, and they were published at Venice, in the Year 1604. Gruterus inserted them in the sixth Volume of his The-saurus Criticus, in the Year 1607. It is agreed that Donatus had Learning, and yet they speak but meanly of his Performance. We shall see what Casaubon thought of it [A], and we shall add to it the Judgment of Barthius [B].

[A] We shall see what Casaubon thought of it. It is in his Commentary on Suetonius in the eleventh Chapter of the Life of Julius Caesar. ‘Tropaea femper scribendum, fays he, non trophæa. Nullo enim modo ferendus est Marcellus Donatus, qui tantum hoc loco perdit verborum, ut probet veram scriptionem esse trophæa. Fuit omnino vir ille plurimum literarum, & in Romana antiquitate adprime-re versatus: sed qui Græcæ eruditionis plane expertus esset, ἀνεύθυνον Criticum ubique sese prodit. Cu-

'jufmodi fane hoc eft illius judicium. — He fays, the true reading is tropæa, not trophæa. Marcellus Donatus is intolerable, who throws away fuch a quantity of words to prove the true manner of writing is tropæa. He was indeed a Man of great Learning, and well verfed in the Antiquities of Rome: but being entirely unacquainted with the Greek Language, he makes but an awkward Critic, and this may ftand as an Argument to prove it.'

[B] We shall add to it the Judgment of Barthius.] Take

Take it all together, it is rather disobliging than otherwise. I shall set it down at large: We shall see some Facts in it, that relate to the History of our Donatus: we shall first see the Plagiarism in it, and then a Copier of our modern Copiers. * Vide multis Andream Tiraquellum ad Legem Nonam Connubialem, pag. CCLX. Et Marcelli Donati dilucidationes in Tacitum, pag. CXXII. Plerique auctorum testimoniis Tiraquello debitis. Eum hominem fuisse plurimarum Litterarum, & in Romana Antiquitate bene veritarum iudicium esse. I. Casauboni, Ultima Editione Suetonii, ubi de Tropæi orthographia sermo est. Nos nihil inde detrahimus. Tamen exscriptorem strenuum recentium, & quidem vulgatorum, Rhapsodorum, ipforumque adeo Lexicographorum, agnoscimus. Editæ sunt ejus Lucubrations Venetiis, Anno MDCIV. Ut mirum sit tot paginis in Suetonium scriptis, non meminisse præclari Casauboni Commentarii, qui toto decennio ante prodiiit. Ipse se in Comitatu Principis Mantuani fuisse memorat, & in eo Germaniam habitasse, ad Claudium Suetonii, cap. VIII. Eidem Principi fuit à Libellis & Secretis, in Domitianum Ejusdem, cap. VII. Legatus quoque, deportandis Nuptialibus Muneribus, ad Capitoliū Claudium Albinum. Habuit suburbanum, idque coluit, Montanaria, quod est oppidum tertio à Mantua Millario. Quamvis autem hoc quod modo de exscriptione Nostericorum dixi, verum sit, etiam illud quod de summa Græci sermonis imperitia ipse fatetur, & notat Casaubonus; certum tamen fuisse in multis sanis iudicii hominem, & qui Juventutis commodo bene fecerit. Nos ista ea de causa huc adnotavimus, ut studiosa juvenus melius ejus Dilucidatoris meritum agnoscere, & cautius omnia arbi-trari possit (1). — Consult Tiraquellus in the ninth Matrimonial Law, pag. CCLX. and Marcellus Donatus's Explanatory Notes on Tacitus, pag. CXXII. The greatest part of the Testimony of Authors are owing to Tiraquellus. Casaubon, in his last Edition of Suetonius, where he speaks of the Orthography of the word Tropæum, allows him to be a Man of great Learning, and well versed in the Antiquities of Rome. I shall not dispute his Judgment. However I must own him to be a strict Copier from the Moderns, even the meanest, the Rhapsodists, Lexicographers, &c. His Lucubrations were published at Venice, An. 1604. So that it seems strange to me that he should write so many Pages on Suetonius, and never once mention the great Casaubon's Commentaries, which had been published ten whole Years before. He says, that he was in the Duke of Mantua's Retinue, and attended him in Germany, in Suetonius's Life of Claudius, chapter the eighth; and in the same Author's Life of Domitian chapter the seventh, he was Secretary to the same Prince, and employed as Ambassador to carry the Nuptial Presents, in the Life of Claudius Albinus. He had a Country House at Montanaria, three Miles from Mantua, which he lived in. Though what I have observed concerning his copying the Moderns be true, and his extreme Ignorance in the Greek Language, which Casaubon mentions, be granted, yet it is certain he often gives us Tokens of a sound Judgment, and has been serviceable to young Students. For whose sake I have made these Remarks, that they may be the better acquainted with this Annotator's Merit, and form their Judgments with the greater caution. Barthius was in the right to think that it is of use to give such Advice to young Men.

(1) Barthius in hac verba Statim Jacov. novæ. Silv. 1, lib. 2, ver. 49, pag. 171.

DONEAU (HUGH), in Latin Donellus, one of the most learned Civilians of the XVIth Century, was born at Châlons, on the Soane (a), in the Year 1537. His Schoolmaster, a severe Man, and a great Whipper, had so discouraged him, that neither Threats nor Promises could make him return to School [A]. But at last, for fear he should be put a Servant to a Swine-herd, he promised to pursue his Study for the future. He studied the Civil-Law at Toulouse, under the Professors John Corras and Arnoul du Ferrier (b), who had Four thousand Auditors. He commenced Doctor of the Civil-Law, at Bourges, in the Year 1551, and practised in the same Place with Duaren, Hotman, and Cujas [B]. He professed that Science afterwards at Orleans. He had like to have been murdered in the Massacre of 1572 (c), because he was a Protestant; and he could not have escaped the Violence of the Murderers, if some Germans, who had been his Scholars, had not saved him, by disguising him in a German Dress, as if he had been one of their Domestic. He had embraced the Reformed Religion in his tender Years at the Instigation of his Sister. He stayed some time at Geneva; and afterwards went into the Palatinate, where he taught the Civil-Law in the Academy of Heidelberg. He was invited to Leyden, in 1575, for the same Employment: he accepted it, and discharged it worthily. But having imprudently engaged himself farther than he should have done in Leicester's Faction [C], he found himself

(a) And not a little Town near Autun, as Moreri assures us, deceived by these Words of Meursius, in Hedius natus, which he did not understand.

(b) See Rem. [B].

(c) Note, that, according to Thuanus, lib. 52, pag. 1082, 1083, he taught then at Bourges.

[A] His Schoolmaster had so discouraged him, that they could not make him return to School. It may be the Reader will be glad to see the Latin words of the Author, who informs me of this Fact. Cum puer ob Præceptoris plagosi sævitiam à ludo literario planè alienaretur, ut nullis minis aut blanditiis ad eum reduci posset, fortè accidit, ut pater ejus pertranseuntem istâc pastorem suarum cerneret, quo ad se vocato, epram filio, rogare institit, equid famulo opus haberet? esse sibi domi filium, quem ei mancipare cuperet, aversum à literis & immorigerum. Ea voce puer adeo conterritus est, ut rem seriò agi existimans, & flens parentis genibus advolutus eum obtestaretur, ne se filium suum in eas sordes projiceret, velle se literis deinceps operam studiosè dare (1). — Having taken an Aversion to the School, whilst a Boy, by reason of his Master's severity, insomuch, that neither threats nor promises could engage him to return; his Father, walking out with him, accidentally met with a Swine-herd, and having called him, asked him before his Son, whether he wanted a Servant, telling him he had a Son whom he would willingly put to him for a Servant, because he was disobedient and hated his Book. The Boy hearing this, and thinking his Father was in earnest, burst into Tears, and falling at his Father's Feet, begged of him not to throw him into so sordid a State, promising for the future to attend his Study with the utmost Application.

[B] He professed the Law at Bourges with Duaren,

Hotman, and Cujas. The Author, whom I cited above (2), gives him another Colleague, to wit, Eguinard Baron; but because I know that Eguinard Baron died in the Year 1550, I would not say that he was Professor of Law at the same time with Doneau, who, according to my Author's own Relation (3), did not teach the Law at Bourges till he had commenced Doctor there in that Science, in the Year 1551. Duaren conferred that Degree upon him the seventeenth of July. The Speech he made on that Occasion in praise of Doneau, is printed among his Works. Father Jacob (4) who had read Doneau's Funeral Oration made by Scipio Gentilis, has distinguished, better than Paul Freher, what ought to have been distinguished. He says no more, than that Doneau was very assiduous at the Lectures of Eguinard Baron, and at those of Francis Duaren, and that he insinuated himself into their Favour, and that Duaren, in particular, testifies a singular Affection for him. I have corrected another Fault of Paul Freher: he calls Arnoldum Ferronum one of the Professors of Toulouse, of whom our Doneau was a Disciple; he ought to have called him Arnoldum Ferrerium, as Father Jacob has done. Let this serve for one Example of the Negligence I have mentioned before (5).

[C] He did imprudently engage too far in Leicester's Faction. Leicester had brought 6000 English into Holland about the end of the Year 1585, and instead of maintaining the Liberty of that new Republic, he

(2) Paul. Freher.

(3) Freher.

(4) Ludovici Jacob. de cl. ris Scriptor. Cabillonensis, pag. 42.

(5) In the Remark [B] of the Article DEMETRIUS, Citat.

(19).

(1) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 924.

(d) Taken from the Theatre of Paul Freherus, pag. 924, where he cites, Vite Professorum Leydenium, and the Funeral Program of Hugo Donellus.

himself obliged to leave Holland in the Year 1588. He returned into Germany, and was Professor of Law at Altorf all the Remainder of his Life. He died the fourth of May, 1591. His Memory was so extraordinary, that he knew the whole Body of the Law by heart (d). You will find the Titles of some of his Works in Moreri. The rest are of the same kind. He had endeavoured all his Life-time to lessen the Reputation of Cujas by his Criticisms upon him (e). Tbuanus has committed some Faults [D].

(e) See Rem. [D].

(6) Professor of Civil-Law at Franeker: he died the eighth of Novemb. 1694.

aspired to the Sovereignty: And as he was not ignorant that the People, being supported by the Preachers, adhered to the Interest of the Governour against the Magistrates Party; he dexterously fomented those Dispositions of the People, and succeeded the more easily because the opposite Faction drew the Hatred of the Clergy upon themselves, by opposing the Authority of the Consistories. Mr Hubert (6), who informs me of this, adds, that those of the Consistorian Party maintained, that the Sovereignty did not belong to the Magistrates, but to the People; a Thesis, which the States of Holland ordered to be condemned the sixteenth of October 1587. All these Intrigues of Leicester, filled the new Republic with Parties, and some Plots were even discovered, whereby he endeavoured to seize on some of the greatest Towns, and particularly of Leyden. These were the Affairs, in which our Donellus was concerned, and for which he was banished. 'Infidiae quoque civitatis Hollandiae occupandis, nominatim Dordraci Leidæque factæ sunt, ubi proditores quidam capite, & Hugo Donellus Juris Antecessor exilio multati (7). — There was a design formed also to surprise some Cities of Holland, particularly Leyden and Dort; but the Traytors, being detected, were punished, some with Death, and Doneau, Professor of Law, banished.' 'Eam conjunctionem (plebis & Concionatorum cum Gubernatore) Leicesterius imprimis curæ habuit, obtestando optimatibus, & concionatores plebeique specie religionis sibi conciliando. Quæ in re multum ei profuit, quod Optimates disciplinæ Ecclesiasticæ fere adversabantur, & Consistoria sibi adversa reputantes, quantum poterant, cohibere gaudebant. Quorum patroni vicissim plebi inculcabant, jus supremum non esse penes Proceres, sed penes populum, cui isti rationem reddere cogerentur. Contra quam sententiam Ordines Hollandiæ decretum five disputationem publicam ediderunt d. 16. Octobris 1587 (8). — Leicester was particularly careful in securing the Interest of the Clergy, and Commonalty, under the pretence of Religion, by railing against the Nobility. One thing of singular Advantage to him was, that the Nobility, in general, opposed the Ecclesiastical Discipline, and imagining that Consistories were against their Interest, endeavoured to the utmost to suppress them. Their Patrons, on the other hand, inculcated to the People, that the supreme Power was not lodged in the Nobles, but in the People, to whom the Nobles were obliged to render an account, which Opinion was condemned by a Decree of the States of Holland, the sixteenth of Octob. 1587.' Most People will take this Matter on the credit of Mr Hubert, rather than on that of Grotius; for which Reason I do not cite what the latter says in the fifth Book of his History of the Netherlands. Thus he must be cited, and not in the fifth Book of his Annals (9). Doneau was not the only Professor, who caballed against the Authority of the States in favour of England. Lambert Daneau, a French Refugee, Minister in Holland, and a Professor of Divinity at Leyden, engaged himself in the same Cabal (10). If Tbuanus may be believed, this was the Faction of the Preachers, and that of the Common People; and their

(7) Ulrichus Huber in Historia Civili, Tom. II, pag. 413.

(8) Id. ib. pag. 412, 413.

(9) Mr Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. II, pag. 424, cites the fifth Book of Annals.

(10) Thuan. lib. 88, pag. 147.

design was to subject the Republic to the Dominion of the English (11).

[D] Tbuanus has committed some Faults.] According to his Account, we must believe that Doneau upon his leaving France went to Leyden. 'Qui cum primum Avarici Biturigum (12) diu docuisset, post tumultum Parisiensem solum patrium vertere coactus Lugduni Batavorum aliquanto tempore hæsit (13). — Who having been a long time Professor at Bourges, was after the Massacre at Paris forced to leave his Country, and reside some time at Leyden.' Now this is false; for after his Flight he was Professor at Heidelberg, before he was so in Holland. Besides, Tbuanus is mistaken as to this Professor's Age: he makes him as long lived as Cujas, that is to say, sixty eight Years (14); and yet Doneau's Epitaph (15) shews that he died in his Sixty fourth Year. See Tbuanus's Words (16): 'Pridie Eid. Majas fatis concessit, eodem quo Cujacius ætatis anno, eo minore fama, quod illius famæ voce & scriptis obtereptere tota vita pro ludo habuerit. — He died the fourteenth day of May, in the same Year of his Age as Cujas, but not in so great Fame, having made it his Study and Direction to depreciate that Author's Reputation all his Life-time.' See Vossius's Twenty fourth Letter at page 73. I wonder Tbuanus could be ignorant that the Zacharias Furnesterus, of whom he speaks, is our Doneau: It is he who, under that false Name, refuted the Apology of the Massacre of Paris, sent to the Diet of Poland in 1572, by the Bishop of Valence. Contra eam defensionem biennio post contraria defensio edita est admodum virulenta à Gallo quodam in Germania profugo, Zachariæ Furnesterii nomine, quæ cum Monlucii nomen & pudorem admodum suggillaret, anno post Lugduni publicatur adversus illum Furnesterii libellum pro Joanne Monlucio episcopo & comite Valentino Dienti præscriptio elegantissime scripta à Jacobo Cujacio I. C. hujus ætatis principe, nomine tamen supresso (17): — Two Years after, an Answer was published to that Defence: it was indeed a virulent one, and wrote by a French Refugee in Germany, under the Name of Zachary Furnester; which being very severe upon the Character of Monluc, the next Year an Answer was published at Leyden against the Pamphlet of Furnester, in defence of Monluc, Bishop of Valence, wrote in an elegant Style, by James Cujas the famed Civilian, but without a Name.' Mr Decker (18) knew very well, that Donellus was the Author of the Writing of the pretended Furnesterus, but was deceived in two things: 1. In saying that Furnesterus's Answer was published in 1572: 2. In imagining that it confuted the Apology that Michael Seureus (a), a Knight of Malta, had made in the general Diet of Poland. 'Sub eadem Catharina infamis lanienæ Parisiensis defensor Michael Seureus, Eques Hierosolymitanus, coram Ordinibus regni Poloniæ fuit (19).'

[(15) a] Michael de Sevre, Knight of Malta, and Commander of the Order. The Journal of the Reign of Henry III, and the Memoirs of Queen Margarete, speak of him under the Name of the Chevalier de Sevre. REM. CRIT.]

(11) Ibid. pag. 146, & seq.

(12) That is to say at Bourges, and not at Rourdes, as it is said in the Translation of Tbuanus, apud Teiffier, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 160.

(13) Thuan. lib. 100, pag. 405.

(14) Id. lib. 99, pag. 378.

(15) Arnd Mercurium, Athen. Bat. pag. 132.

(16) Lib. 100, pag. 405.

(17) Thuan. Histor. lib. 103, pag. 1092, col. 1.

(18) Deckerus, de scriptis adefpotis, pag. 203.

(19) Ibid.

DONI (ANTONY FRANCIS), lived in the XVIth Century. He was a Native of Florence, and published a great many Italian Books [A], which made him pass for a Wit. The reviling satirical Character, which at first he shewed in his Writings, was not so much the effect of his own Inclination, as to satisfy the Request of one of his Friends. He suffered some Letters to be inserted in his Works, which were not of his

(1) Ghilini Teatro, parte I, pag. 2.

[A] He published a great many Italian Books.] Ghilini has given us this List of them (1). Quattro libri di Medaglie: le Novelle: tre Inettive, che hanno questi titoli, il Baleno, la Saetta, e il Tuono: tre Dialoghi separatamente stampati, cio è della Fortuna & Infelicità di Cesare, della Musica, e del Disegno: la Libreria, divisa in due parti: un Trattato dell' Uomo in tutte le forme, per comparazioni, alla qual' Opera diede titolo di Microcosmo: l'Eternità della Patria in cinque libri spiegata: una Comedia intitolato lo Stufaiuolo: i Marmi, ne quali s'introducono più persone a discorrere: i Mondi: gl' Inferni: la Zucca: la Filosofia morale: il Cancelliere: le Prose antiche di Dante: la Guerra navale tra la sacra Lega, e gl' Infedeli in versi heroici narrata: le Stanze alla villanesca: e le Lettere.

I shall touch a little upon some of these Books, beginning with that intitled Gl' Inferni. It is a quarto, of 224 Pages, printed at Venice, nell' Accademia Pergrina his own Writing: this did him an Injury; for the Authors of those Letters boasted soon after, that they had composed all that was published under the Name of Doni. He took care to remedy this Insult, by publishing a new Edition of his Works in a better Form, by the Advice of the Academy of the Perigrini. He suppressed the Elogies he had made upon Persons unworthy of that Honour, and praised others he had wrongfully censured. He died at Venice, in the Month of September, 1574 (a); where he had fixed his Abode about the end of the Year 1547, being about Thirty five Years of Age (b). He was Member of the Academy I have mentioned. He took the Surname of Bizarro, which agreed admirably well with his Genius; for he was a Man that had very particular ways, both in his Poems and Prose. His Inventions and his Concetti were strange Sallies of Imagination; and he endeavoured to distinguish himself, by surprizing his Readers by Fictions somewhat over-stretched. He was descended of a very good Family [B].

(a) Taken from Teatro d'Humani Litterati, Part I, pag. 20.

(b) See the 224th Page of his Inferni.

(2) See the 224th Page of his Inferni.

grina, per Francisco Marcolini, in the Year 1553. The Author had been then above five Years at Venice (2), and had determined to continue there all the rest of his Life. He makes seven Hells in this Work: 'Inferno de gli Scolari & de Pedanti. Inferno de mal Maritati, & de gli Amanti. Inferno de ricchi Avari, & de Poveri liberali. Inferno delle Puttane, & de Ruffiani. Inferno de Dottori ignoranti, Artisti, & Legisti. Inferno de Poeti & Compositori. Inferno de Soldati & Capitani poltroni &c. — The Hell of Scablers and Pedants. The Hell of bad Husband and Lovers. The Hell of rich Misers and poor Spendbriffs. The Hell of Whores and Rogues. The Hell of ignorant Doctors, Artists, and Lawyers. The Hell of Poets and Authors. The Hell of Soldiers, Coward-Captains, &c.' This is but the first part of the Inferni del Doni. I know not whether ever he published the remainder.

He had already published another Book, the Title of which I shall give at length, as it serves to discover to us the Method of this Man. 'I Marmi del Doni Academico Peregrino. Cio è Ragionamenti introdotti à farsi da varie condizioni d'Humani, à luoghi di honesto piacere in Firenze: ripieno di Discorsi in varie Scienze & Discipline, Moti arguti, Istorie varie, Proverbi antichi & moderni, Sentenze morali, Accidenti & Novelle morali; diviso in quattro Libri. Opera giovevole à persone d'ogni stato per il corregimento de' Costumi, & per ogni professione d'Humani. — The Marbles of Doni; in which are inserted Discourses of Men of different Conditions, innocent Conversations at Florence; Discourses in divers Sciences, witty Sayings, various Histories, ancient and modern Proverbs, moral Sentences, moral Stories; divided into four Books. Necessary for the Reformation of Manners and Men of all Professions, &c.' I have not the first Edition of this Book, which is that of Venice in 1552; but I have the Edition of 1609, in Venetia, presso Gio. Battista Bertoni, in 4to.

In the Year 1565, he printed another Book in 8vo, at the same place, appresso Fran. Rampazetto, intitled La Zucca del Doni Fiorentino, divisa in cinque libri di gran valore, sotto titolo di poca considerazione.

It is observed by Ghilini, that the La Libreria of Doni is divided into two Parts: but Mr Tessier speaks otherwise of it. 'La Libreria, says he (3), divisa in tre Trattati: Nel primo sono scritti li Autori volgari, con cento e più Discorsi sopra di quelli: Nel secondo, sono dati in luce tutti i Libri che l'Autore ha veduti a penna, il nome de' compositori dell' opere, i titoli, &c. le materie: Nel terzo, si legge l'invenzione dell'Academie, insieme con i soprannomi, i motti, le imprese, & l'opere fatte da tutti li Academici. In Vinegia appresso Gabriel Giolito de Perari, 1557, in 12, & ibidem apud Altabellum Salicatum, 1580, in 12. — The Libreria, says he, is divided into three parts. In the first, are vulgar Authors with above a hundred discourses thereupon. In the second, are all the Manuscripts that the Author had seen, the Names of the Authors, their Titles and Subjects. In the third, are Academical Inventions, with the Surnames, Devices, Emblems, and Works of the Fellows of Universities, &c.'

[B] He was of a very good Family. I have read a Letter written from Como by Benedict Valpe, in which he observes that he was Great-Grandson of SALVINO DONI, Cotemporary with Dante, and a good Poet. 'Io non ho già la Poesia per heredità, come voi, che sete Figliuolo d'un Nipote de' Salvino Doni, che fu compagno di Guittone Saluti Messer Cino, & Dante, Franchescin nostro, & tutta quella schiera (4). — I do not inherit Poetry, as you do, who are the Son of a Nephew of Salvino Doni, who was the Comrade of Guittone Saluti, Messer Cino, and Dante, our Franchescin, and all that herd of Poets.' Doni answered, that he was descended from a Man, who brought from Rome the Present of a Coat of Arms, which was made to the Florentines; that the Posterity of that Man remained in Florence to the time of Farinata de gli Uberti; that at this time one FRANCESCO DONI, who was of the Gibelin Party chose rather to leave Florence, than to consent the City should be dismantled (5). He married a Wife, a Native of Fiesola: from this Marriage are derived many Families settled at Pistoia, in Hungary, and in the Kingdom of Naples. Salvino Doni was descended from the latter. He wrote a Sonnet, to which Dante made a reply, which is printed in the Collection of old Pieces (6). Moreri's Dictionary makes mention of the Branches of this Family settled in France.

Note that all the Doni's were not Noble. Some of them are descended from a Factor who assumed the Name of his Master, 'Eui un' altra parte de' Doni, che son nati d'un Fattore, il quale faceva le facende loro, come ne sono molti nella Città di Firenze, i quali usurpono spesso la robba & i nomi delle case nobili, dove hanno fatto la fattoria molto tempo; cosa molto infame & vituperosa (7). . . . vi sapro dire quali sono i Doni nobili discesi dalla vera casa, & quali sono i plebei venuti per via di fattorie (8).

(4) La Zucca del Doni, folio 312, verso.

(5) Leandro Alberti, Descritt. di tutta l'Italia, folio m. 44, verso, relates the fact otherwise, and without saying a Word of Doni.

(6) Taken from a Letter of Doni, printed at the end of his Zucca, folio 314.

(7) Le Doni, folio 314, verso, of the Zucca.

(8) Ib. fol. 315.

(3) Tessier in Catalogue Astrum. &c. pag. 22, Edit. Genev. 1636.

DONZELLINUS (JEROM), a learned Italian Physician, and Author of some Books [A]. He flourished in the XVIth Century. He was born at Orzi Nuovi, in the Territory of Brescia, and practised Physic in Brescia for some time: but he was forced to leave it, by a Paper-Quarrel, in which he was engaged, against Vincent Calzavaglia, in defence of Joseph Valdagnia (a). They were both Physicians; the former published a Book against the other, and was confuted in so terrible a manner by Donzellinus, that Joseph Valdagnia and his Defender were both obliged to abandon the City of Brescia. The latter retired to Venice, where he practised Physic with great Success. But it is pretended that he came to a tragical Death there, and that, having been charged with an execrable Crime against the Majesty of Religion and the State, he was condemned to be thrown into the Water (b). Cozzando, who furnished me with this Article, places

(a) A Physician of Brescia, born at Verona.

(b) Leonardo Cozzando, della Libreria Brescia, na, pag. 197, 198.

(1) Printed at Basil, apud Petrum Pernam, 1550, in 8vo, Epit. Gesneri, pag. m. 775.

[A] He is the Author of some Books. He translated out of Greek into Latin Galen's Treatise de Pisfana, and eight Orations of Themistius (1). His Consilia and Epistole Medicæ may be found in the Collection published by Scholz at Frankfort in 1598. His Letter

De natura, causis, & curatione Febris pestilentis, ubi insuper de Tberiaca natura & viribus exatius diffinitur, was printed at Venice, in the Year 1570, in 4to (2).

8 M

[B] There

(2) See Lindner, nus Renovatus, pag. 419, 420.

places this in the Year 1560. There is a Book ascribed to this Physician, which may very well belong to another JEROM DONZELLINUS [B].

[B] There is a Book ascribed to him, which may very well belong to another JEROM DONZELLINUS. It is intitled Remedium ferendarum Injuriarum, sive de compensanda Ira, and was printed at Venice, in 1586, in 4to; at Altorf, in 1587, in 8vo; and at Leyden, in 1635, in 12mo (3). The Oxford Catalogue, Lindinius renovatus, Leonardo Cozzando, Konig, &c. ascribe it to the Author of the Books I have mentioned, but I doubt without sufficient Reason; for the Donzellinus, who wrote Remedium ferendarum Injuriarum, is surnamed Veronensis in the title of the Work; and it is certain the other is surnamed Brixienfis (4). If Cozzando had rightly fixed the tragical end of the latter, under the Year 1560, he would certainly have been wrong in ascribing to him the Remedium ferendarum Injuriarum, a Work that the Author dedicates to Sixtus Vicedomini, Bishop of Modena, and Son of Cardinal Moron's Sister. This Cardinal lived to 1580, and was dead when the Epistle Dedicatory was wrote of the Remedium ferendarum Injuriarum. This Treatise is full of good Morality: the Author declares, that he is not one of those, who imagine that the immortality of the Soul cannot be proved by philosophical Reasons (5), and he endeavours to justify Galen, who is charged with not distinguishing the Soul from the Constitution of the Body (6).

(3) This Edition contains 256 Pages.

(4) Epit. Gesneri, pag. 347.

(5) Donzell. Remed. ferend. Injur. pag. 143, 144, Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1635.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 143, & seq.

DORIEUS, Son to Diagoras, the Rhodian, acquired unparalleled Glory in the public Games of Greece. This was in some measure hereditary. For his Father bore an illustrious Rank among those who had carried the Prize in those Games. Dorieus obtained Crowns in the Olympic Games. He won eight Crowns successively in the Isthmian Games, and seven in the Nemean (a). See the Sequel of his History in the Article DIAGORAS (b).

(a) Ex Pausania, lib. 6, pag. 184.

(b) A famous Wrestler, Remark [D].

DRABICIUS (NICOLAS), a famous Enthusiast of the XVIIth Century, was born about the Year 1587 (a), at Stranitz, in Moravia, where his Father was a Burgomaster. He was admitted a Minister in 1616, and exercised that Office at Drabotutz; and when he was forced, by the Emperor's severe Edicts against the Protestant Religion, to seek a Refuge in foreign Parts, he retired to Lednitz, a Town in Hungary, in the Year 1629 (b). Having no hope of being re-established in his Church, he turned Woollen-draper, in which his Wife, the Daughter of one of the same Business, was of great service to him. He endeavoured to persuade other Ministers to follow a worldly Profession, notwithstanding the Regulations which had been made to prevent such a Disorder [A]. He forgot the Decorum of his former Character to such a Degree, that he became one of the greatest Drinkers in the Country, indulging himself in all the Actions of the Laics (c). Returning one day from a Fair, he was set upon by Robbers. He defended himself, and was wounded, and perhaps would not have come off so cheap, if he had not been assisted. The other Ministers, justly scandalized at his Conduct, gave their Superiors an Account of it: who calling a Synod in Poland, they examined into the Affair, and it was ordered, that Drabicius should be suspended from the Ministry, and if he did not live in an edifying manner, that the Church Discipline should be exercised upon him (d). This synodical Rigour made him behave with more Discretion. But it was quite another thing when he begun to fancy himself a Prophet. He had his first Vision in the Night of the Twenty third of February, 1638, and the second in the Night of the Twenty third of January, 1643. The first Vision promised him, in general, great Armies, from the North and East, to crush the House of Austria: the second signified, in particular, that Ragotski should have the Command of the Army that should come from the East, and ordered Drabicius to inform his Brethren that God was about to restore them to their own Country, and revenge the Injuries done to his People, and that they should, by Fasting and Prayer, prepare themselves for this Deliverance. He received Order to write down what was revealed to him; and to begin as the ancient Prophets did, The Word of the LORD came to me (e). The next Day he communicated his Vision to the Ministers who were Refugees at the same Place. They imparted it to others, but no great Account was made of it. Those two first Visions were followed by several others in the same Year 1643; and in one of them he was ordered to communicate the whole to Comenius (f), who was then at Elbing, in Prussia. He had one in the Month of January 1644, which assured Drabicius, that the Refugees should not be destroyed by the Imperial Troops (g). They committed great Ravages upon Ragotski's Territories, plundered the Town of Lednitz, and besieged the Castle. Drabicius shut himself up in it, and whether he was a little distrustful of his Vision, or thought the best Cause had need of Support, he did not trifle away his Time at Prayers, but kept near the Cannon as they were firing upon the Besiegers, and set his Hand to the Work [B]. Unhappily for him, the Flame flew into his Face, and

(a) Comenius, born in the Month of March 1587, says, Hist. Relat. pag. 138, that Drabicius was five Years older than him self. Moreri places the Birth of Drabicius on the fifth of December, 1588.

(b) Comenius, ibid. pag. 141.

(c) Politica illa cum plebe conversatione corrupti, licentiosiusque poculis indulgendo profanioris vite exemplis abripi visus est. Ibid. pag. 139.

(d) Idem. ibid. pag. 139, 140.

(e) De his visis & auditis in scriptum referendis mandatum accepit . . . & a verbis illis Fatum est ad me verbum Domini (i.e. non aliter) inchoare jubetur. Comenius, Hist. Revelat. pag. 141.

(f) Ibid. pag. 141.

(g) Ibid. pag. 145.

[A] The Regulations which had been made to prevent such a disorder. The Superiors of the banished Ministers took care to order that every one should continue in the Town he had chosen for his retreat, and though each Congregation had no more than one Pastor, yet that the other Ministers should preach by turns. This was done to avoid two great Inconveniences. One was, that, without this, some would have wandered from place to place to collect Alms. 'Volebant patres nostri Ecclesiis orbatos Pastores, confratres suos, non mendicitati vacare, & stipis querendae causa alienas terras (ut ab aliis scitatum vidimus) pererare (1)'. The other was that, by not preaching, they would have become less capable of edifying a Church, when ever it should please God to re-call them to their former Functions. 'Ut exilii tractu nemo prorsus laboribus sacris defuisset, potius sese mutuam diligentiam magis acuerent: ut si Deus nostri misertus rursus nos Ecclesiis redderet, nemo hebetatus rediret, exercitator potius (2)'. [B] He shut himself up in the Castle of Lednitz . . . kept near the Cannons . . . and set his hand to the

(1) Comenius, Hist. Revelat. pag. 139.

(2) Id. ibid.

and almost put out one of his Eyes. The Imperialists raised the Siege. But some time after they sat down again before it, and took it. The Refugees were plundered, contrary to the Article of the Capitulation, by which they were to have their Lives and Goods secured to them (b). Thus Drabicius fell into the Hands of the Imperialists. But this did not prevent his going to Ragotzki, and telling him, in the Month of August, 1645, that God had commanded him to ruin the Pope and the House of Austria [C]; and that, if he refused to attack that Nest of Vipers, he would draw down a general Destruction upon his whole House, which should not spare even him that pisseth against the Wall. That Prince knew before that Drabicius acted the Prophet: for Drabicius, according to the reiterated Orders he received in his Extasies, had sent him a Copy of his Revelations, which Ragotzki threw into the Fire (i). As to the Order the Prophet brought him in Person, he told him, he had just concluded a Treaty of Peace (k). The Death of that Prince, which happened in the Month of October, 1647, threw Drabicius into the utmost Uneasiness. He feared his Revelations would vanish into Smoke, and he saw himself exposed to Raillery. But he had one extatic Consolation, which gave him fresh Courage, and prevented him from throwing his Writings into the Fire, since God would send him Comenius, to whom they would be consigned (l). Comenius, having Business in Hungary, in 1650 [D], saw there both the Person and Prophecy of

(b) Ib. pag. 147.

(i) Ib. pag. 146.

(k) Ib. pag. 143.

(l) Ib. pag. 148, 149.

Drabicius

the Work.] Comenius blames him for it. 'Drabicio tamen, says he (3), vitio datum, quod dum ex Arce tormenta in hostem libarentur, ille non interesset tantum (ad alios presentia divina spe, juxta promissionem sibi factam, autimandum) sed & tormento uni ignem ipsemet admoveere voluit: cum cum in angulo esse, & precibus vacare, praestitisset. Sed inconsideratus hic novi Petri (materiali gladio Dominum defendere praesumentis) zelus à Domino ipso castigatus fuit: permisso ut flammæ pars in illum retrò se agens faciem illi ambureret, oculumque alterum laderet. Utili communitorio, ut quisque sibi demandata faciat, aliena munia aliis relinquat. — It was esteemed a crime in Drabicius, that, whilst the Cannons were playing from the Castle upon the Enemy, he would not only be present, to inspire the rest with the hopes of divine Assistance, according to the promise made him, but would also put fire to one of the Pieces, when he ought rather to have been at Prayers in private. But the rash Zeal of this new Peter, who dared to defend the Lord's Cause with the material Sword, was by the Lord himself chastised, who permitted the Flame to recoil, scorched his Face, and damage one of his Eyes. An useful Lesson, and which ought to warn every one to content himself with the Execution of his Office.' A Man, who thinks himself inspired, ought to be strong in Faith: he ought to say fata viam invenient, Fate will find a way.

But on the contrary, we see very often such a one distrusting the Providence of God, unless it is assisted with all that human Prudence can contribute to it. Our inspired, or pretending to be so, are more restless than other Men: their Agitation, their Disquiet, their Vigilance to prepare human Means, proper to bring about events, the least foreseen or foretold, shew that they are too much tainted with those Pagan Maxims, of which I have spoken in the Article of ACOSTA (4), that is to say, that, after the Example of the Lacedaemonians, they must invoke the Gods by applying themselves to the Work, and that, according to Hesiod's Precept, the Husbandman must pray with his Hands to the Plow (5), and that, in a Word, the Supplications of the slothful are unacceptable to Heaven, and sent back empty.

(4) Remark [B].

(5) Thus many understand the Passage in Hesiod, lib. 2, εργα και ημερα, ver. 83.

(6) Ovid Metam. lib. 8, ver. 72.

(7) Plut. in Paulo Emilio, pag. 265.

(8) Id. ibid. C.

Sibi quisque profecto
Est Deus: ignavis precibus fortuna repugnat (6).

For each is to himself, a God that dares,
And Fortune always laughs at idle Prayers.

They laughed at Perseus King Macedon (7), for retreating hastily out of the Battle, under pretence of going to offer Sacrifices to Hercules: they pretended that Victory was only due to that General, who asks it of the Gods by fighting bravely. This was the true way of being heard, according to the Heathens: Ἀλλὰ ταῖς Αἰμιλίᾳ παρῆν εὐχαῖς ὁ θεὸς εὐχετο γὰρ κράτος πολέμῳ καὶ νίκῃν δέρου κρατῶν, καὶ μαχόμενος παρεκάλεε σύμμαχον τὸν θεόν. Sed Pauli precibus volens propitiique annuit Deus, quippe petebat victoriam belli & palmam hastam tenens, pugnantisque opem implorabat Dei (8).

— The Gods give an Ear to such Prayers as those of Amilius; for Sword in Hand he addressed them, and as he fought invoked their Assistance. Our pretended Prophets at the bottom follow those Ideas.

[C] He went to let Ragotzki know . . . that God had commanded him to destroy the House of Austria, and the Pope.] He was ordered to go to that Prince's Camp, and to speak to him, first in a gentle Manner, and afterwards with threatening Expressions. He was to begin with informing him, that Heaven had chosen him for King of Hungary, but upon Condition that he should destroy the Austrian and Papal Government, in which God would assist him in a particular Manner. In the Conclusion, he was to tell him that, if he disobeyed the Voice of God, his whole Family should perish, even to the very Dogs (9). 'Ignarus horum arcanorum Drabicius (10), mandatum accipit 22. Julii & 31. Julii Principis Racotzki castra adeundi, Principemque primum blandis verbis, deinde duris, alloquendi. Blandis: electum esse divinitus in Regem Hungariae, sed eâ conditione ut Austriacæ & Papalis dominationi finem imponat: habiturus auxilio Deum ad omnes hostiles exercitus clade efficiendum (Rev. XXX.) Duris autem: si viperinam illam progeniem persequi renuerit, mala induturum esse Deum, excusumque de Domo ejus mingentem etiam ad parietem (Rev. XXXI. v. 4).' This is an exact Imitation of the Style and Manner of the ancient Prophets. I do not find that Drabicius spoke himself to the Prince; but imparted his Commission to him by other Hands (11).

[D] Comenius having some Business in Hungary in the Year 1650.] The Protestants that the Emperor had banished out of his Dominions were always in hopes of being restored: some depended upon the Leagues that were formed against the Emperor, and others upon the Visions of certain Enthusiasts. During the Life of Gustavus, the thing was almost certain, and, after his Death, they had no Reason to despair; for his Lieutenants carried on the War to the Honour of their Nation, and the Advantage of the League. Wherefore the Refugees hoped that their Re-admission would be made an Article of the Peace of Münster; but they saw with grief that long and important Negotiation end in the Month of January 1650 without any Notice taken of their Banishment. The House of Austria treated with so much Policy, that it obtained a hundred times better Conditions than they could have expected: the Church paid for the Emperor, notwithstanding the Protestations of the Court of Rome; all that he had done against the Sectaries in his Dominions remained fixt, and unalterable. Whereupon the poor Refugees, who were dispersed into several Places, saw themselves in a hopeless Condition, and resolved to call an Assembly to consult about their Affairs. Pacis Monasterii & Onabrugæ sexennio agitatz, tandemque conclusæ; iterumque Noribergæ biennio ventilatz, tandemque terminatz, ultima publicatio incidit in Januarium anni 1650. Quâ Bohemiarum Regno, cum incorporatis Provinciis, hereditatis nomine, Austriacæ Domui relicta, dispersi, propter Evangelium, à spe reditus æterni exclusi, quid jam agendum esset deliberare ceperunt (12). Those in Poland desired that the others should send their Deputies to them. All agreed to it but the Hungarians.

(9) Histor. Revelat. pag. 147.

(10) That is, that Drabicius did not know that the Turk sent Courier upon Courier to Ragotzki to forbid him joining his Troops with the Swedes, in Moravia, in 1645, and that the Emperor offered Ragotzki the most advantageous Conditions of Peace.(11) Per Theologum, Medicum, Auleque magistrum de sibi commissis informat. Drabicius, Hist. Revelat. pag. 147.

(12) Ibid. pag. 49.

- Drabicius*, and made such Reflexions, as he thought proper, upon that Person's being promised, by three Years Visions, Comenius for a Coadjutor. It is something remarkable, that Sigismund Ragotski, seeing himself pressed, on the one hand, by Drabicius to make War with the Emperor, and by his Mother, on the other hand, to live in Peace, knew not what to resolve upon, being urged on both sides by terrible Threats. Drabicius denounced against him the Wrath of the Almighty, in Case of Peace, and his Mother threatened him with her Curses in Case of War. In this Perplexity he recommended himself to the Prayers of Drabicius and Comenius (m); and kept himself quiet till the Day of his death, that is, to the fourth of February, 1652. Comenius, who did not expect this (n), was strangely surprized at it: the Angel, who had told him all, had not revealed this great Article to him [E]. George Ragotski, Prince of Transilvania, Brother of the deceased, knew nothing of all this prophetic Management; but Comenius informed him of every Particular, by giving him a Copy of Drabicius's Writings. Drabicius was restored to the Ministry, the twentieth of June, 1654 (o). Comenius did this in his Passage through Hungary, on his return to Poland. After his Departure from the Court of Transilvania, he was forced to make use of another Person to notify to the Prince the Visions of Drabicius. They came faster than ever, commanding continually that they should be communicated to the Coadjutor, that he might make them known to the Nations and Languages, and to all the People of the Earth, and particularly to the Tartars and Turks (p). Comenius found himself embarrassed between the Fear of God, and the Fear of Man. He was afraid of disobeying God by not printing the Revelations of Drabicius, and by printing them to expose himself to the Mockery and Censures of Men. He took a middle way (q). He resolved to print them, but not disperse the Copies: wherefore the Book was intitled Lux in tenebris (r). But the Resolution to keep this Light under a Bushel did not continue long; it was superseded by two signal Events, which he took for the great Crisis, and the unravelling of the whole Mystery. One of these Events was Ragotski's Irruption into Poland [F]; the other was the Death of the Emperor Ferdinand III. Neither the one nor the other helped on the Predictions; on the contrary they served to confound them. Ragotski perished in his Expedition into Poland; and Leopold, King of Hungary, was elected in the room of his Father, Ferdinand III; an Election, which restored the House of Austria to all its former Splendor in Germany, or very near it, and which totally ruined the Protestants of Hungary. The Hopes they conceived upon these two Events being soon blasted, they now repented of publishing their Book so soon. Drabicius was the greatest Sufferer

(m) Ib. pag. 156.

(n) Ib. pag. 157.

(o) Ib. pag. 177.

(p) Ib. pag. 179.

(q) Ib. pag. 183.

(r) See the Remark [A] of the Article KOTTERUS.

(13) See the Text of the Article COMENIUS, between the Citations (b) and (i).

(14) Comenius, Histor. Revelat. pag. 149, 150.

(15) Ibid. pag. 156, 157.

The Refugees in Hungary among other things alledged for their excuse, that since their common Banishment they had frequently sent Deputies into Poland, and it was but just that they should for once come to them. Particularly they desired that Comenius, Superintendent of the Churches of Moravia, should be sent to them: this was the more readily complied with, because Comenius was at this time invited by Prince Sigismund Ragotski to consult about reforming the Schools (13). For these Reasons, Comenius, setting out of Elbing, took his way through Silesia and Moravia, into Hungary, where he celebrated the Feast of Easter with several deputed Ministers, and Gentlemen. Drabicius was there, and communicated his Revelations to him, and from that time made him in some Measure his Coadjutor (14).

[E] Ragotski died in 1652 . . . the Angel, who told him all, had not revealed this great Article to him.] This Expression, which is an Imitation of a Passage in the Memoirs of the Dukes of Mazarine, occurring to me, I have made use of it. I hope shall be excused for it. Drabicius is, here, the Angel who told Comenius every thing; but, far from informing him of Ragotski's Death before it happened, he sent him some Revelations after the Death of that Prince, which supposed him still alive; upon which one of the Confidants said, that Drabicius certainly plaid upon them: Comenius was silent, but having had time to consider of it, and to examine the Conformity of several Visions, he found that they had prefigured the Death of that Prince a Year before. These are the Men for my Money: they are never at a loss, provided you give them but time to put their Pipes in Tune. 'Febris malignæ morbo correptus fuit (Sigismundus Ragocius) quæ illi 4. Februarii vitæ finem attulit. Quod quia nec prædictum adeo, nec expectatum fuit, novus offensionis lapis fuit factum. Præsertim cum Drabicius novas suas nobis submittere Revelaciones, tanquam de vivente adhuc fermocinaretur, quem nos non vivere jam certi eramus. Hinc amicorum rei consociorum unus (J. T.) ad me: Ludificamur quàm verè vivit Deus. Ad quod nihil quod responderem habens obmutui. Nunc ista ordine legenti sapientie Dei vestigia manifestè sese ostentant' (15). — Ragotski was seized with a malignant Fe-

'Fever, which put an end to his Life the fourth of February, which, as it had neither been foretold nor expected, was another stumbling Block, especially as Drabicius, still continuing to publish his Predictions, spoke of him as though he was still alive, which we were convinced he was not; whereupon one J. T. an intimate Acquaintance, said to me, We are abused as sure as there is a God. To which having nothing to answer, I was obliged to be silent. But on a second Examination, I could plainly trace the Footsteps of the divine Wisdom.'

[F] The Irruption of Ragotski into Poland.] Comenius sincerely acknowledges, that he took that for the Accomplishment of the Prophecy, which their three Seers had delivered, that the East should join with the North to bring on that terrible Day of the Lord (16). He confesses very ingenuously, that he was mistaken; he could not have said less, since Ragotski's foolish design had the worst success that could be. But Comenius accounted for his Error in this Manner: it was, says he (17), because I did not sufficiently observe, that, according to the Prophecies of Christina Poniatovia, the oriental and northern Lions were only to join, in order to confer together, and should not come to a good understanding, but should part without doing any thing: add to that, said he, that, according to Drabicius, Ragotski was not to have entered Poland without having taken his measures with the Tartars and the Turks, and without settling all things in good order at Home. We thought, continued he, that he had done all this before he took the Field, and we were deceived in this Point. Consider this well, and see in it a new Proof of the Obltinacy of these Men: they never want Evasions: there is always some Clause which was not attended to; so that they secure themselves a back Door, and a resource to renew their Predictions. If Ragotski had fulfilled the Conditions that Drabicius had prescribed to him, and his Expedition had notwithstanding been unfortunate, yet they would have denied that the Prophecies had deceived them: for did not Poniatovia foretel that the East and North should meet without doing any thing? Comenius was more cunning than is imagined, when he tacked his three Seers together: three Prophets are able to furnish more (16) Ab inspecto Principis Transilvanici adventu, credideramus jam illud impleri quod ab omnibus his Videntibus prædictum, ut se Orientis jungat Septentrioni, tremendumque illud orus Dei m. procedat. Ibid. pag. 183.

(17) Id. Ibid.

Sufferer by it [G]; for the Court of Vienna, knowing that he was the Man that rung an Alarm-Bell against the House of Austria, sought means to punish him, and it is said they succeeded in it. Comenius had nothing to fear from that quarter; he had secured himself in an impenetrable Asylum, by making himself a Burgher of Amsterdam, where he enjoyed all sorts of Protection. He had nothing to fear but from the Pen of some Divines, and the Reproaches of Ragotski's Secretary [H]. But this was no great matter to a Man, who wanted neither Wit nor Learning, nor a habit of writing Books, and especially a way of citing Scripture Phrases, and other spiritual Maxims, with great Airs of Zeal for the Cause of God, and the Destruction of Antichrist. With these Machines he kept his Ground, and, if he lost his Authority, his Reputation, his Glory, it was only with some few Persons of good Sense, who are hardly ever the Arbiters of Reputation. Those, who had once believed him, continued to do so still (I). Thus it will always happen. Thus all Visionaries and Fanatics, in time to come, have nothing to fear: they may boldly vent whatever comes into their Heads, provided they have Cunning enough to accommodate themselves to the Passions of the Times. Indeed they will not have the Laughters on their side, but they will have Patrons that are much more serviceable. Consult the Articles of COMENIUS and KOTTERUS. The Visions of Drabicius reach down to the Year 1666. They are mistaken that ascribe his Banishment to seditious Discourses (I); for he was banished for no other Reasons than all the other Ministers of Bohemia were, &c. We shall see, in another Place (u), whether Mr Jurieu ought to have said, that the Learned of Paris scarce knew the Name of Drabicius.

more Subterfuges than one. See, below, the Marginal Note (23).

[G] Drabicius was the greatest Sufferer. I never could find any Body that could tell me what his end was, and I know not how far the following Relation may be relied upon. I have it from a French Author (18): 'A great many Reflexions, says he, were made, which I shall not trouble the Reader with, who is not obliged to believe them, no more than the ridiculous Letter, which an arrant Fool, (whose Name and Person I desire to be a Stranger to) sent to a great Prince, according to the extravagant Visions of Nicholas Drabicius, a Bohemian burnt for an Impostor, and false Prophet, whose Book was carried to the Courts of all the Princes in Europe, even to the Grand Vizier, by a Minister of Zurich in Switzerland: who was fourteen Years in Prison on this account, during which time, as a Proof of his Madness, he let his beard grow down to his Wastle, as a Gentleman very worthy of Credit, who knew him, has assured me.' Mr Maresius had heard a very different Account, viz. that Drabicius, far from baptizing the great Turk, as he expected, was forced to fly into Turkey, where he died. 'Ad multa particularia processerunt (bi impostores) circa Ragocium . . . magnum Turcam a Drabicio baptizandum (cum è contrario feratur ipsum Drabicius ad Turcas transiisse & inter eos obisse) quorum imposturas & falsitatem oppositus eventus docuit (19). — These Impostors descended to a multitude of Particulars, concerning Ragotski . . . but the Grand Turk was to be baptised by Drabicius: but the event proved them to be all Chimeras; for it is reported that Drabicius went over to the Turks and died among them.'

[H] Comenius . . . had nothing to fear but the Reproaches of Ragotski's Secretary.] This Prince, having succeeded his Brother Sigismund, was initiated into the Mysteries of Drabicius: he did not discover whether he believed them or no, but he ordered that they should communicate to him the Visions which Drabicius might have for the Future (20). The Princess, his Mother, was made Privy to it. Drabicius was commanded in a Night Vision to go to her and pronounce a Blessing, or a Curse, according as she should receive his Prophecies (21). They were referred to the Examination of John Bisterfeld, a Divine, and Counsellor of State, who rejected them (22). However the Reproaches of Ragotski's Secretary are an evidence that That Prince had, to his Sorrow, given but too much credit to Drabicius. He was not silent upon these Reproaches. Comenius represented that the Prince had not followed the Seer's Orders; for he was in Poland without the consent of the Turks. 'Brevi post à Principis Transylvaniæ Secretario, C. S. tristes venerunt (ternâ vice) quibus historice Principis fui ruinam recitans, non obscure culpam in Revelationes istas (quasi fidem illis habens eò impulsus fuisset Princeps) conferre videbatur, causa fuit data ad nebulas illas discutendum scribendi aliquid (23). — Soon after, three successive Messengers came from the Prince of Transylvania's Secretary, on the same melancholy Subject, to whom historically relating his Prince's ruin, he seemed to charge it upon those Revelations, (as if the confidence, the Prince had placed in them, had brought him to it); there was therefore Reason to write something, to clear up the Difficulties, and dispel those Clouds which shadowed the true Cause.' It is hard to say whether Ragotski did really believe Drabicius's Prophecies, or whether he thought they would procure him the Victory, by the influence they might have upon the People. It is possible enough that a Prince of Courage, and much Wit, but no learning, should be staggered by such Discourses as those of Drabicius, I mean that he should think there was something Divine and Prophetic in them, and should be afraid of the Curses pronounced by that Prophet. They gave George Ragotski to understand, that his Father and Brother had felt the Effects of them: why should we not think then that he became credulous? but besides, it is very possible that a Prince, capable of laughing at these Chimeras, should form Projects, and great Designs, conformable to the Visions of these People: for to prepare the people by apocalyptic Explications, delivered with an Air of Inspiration, and Enthusiasm is a very powerful Machine to bring about great Revolutions. This made the Enemies of the Protestants say, that their Authors had laboured so much upon the Apocalypse, only to kindle a War over all Europe, by inspiring such a Prince with a desire of improving the Conjunction, who himself had no Thought of it. Comenius was not clear from this Suspicion. See the Article KOTTERUS.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES), Minister of the Church of Paris, was born the tenth of July 1595, at Sedan, where his Father had a considerable Post [A]. He went through the Study of Classical Learning and Divinity at Sedan, but was sent to Saumur to study Philosophy under the Professor Duncan. He was admitted to the Ministry in

[A] His Father had a considerable Post at Sedan. At first he was Secretary to Henry Robert de la Mark, Duke of Bavillon and Sovereign Prince of Sedan, and afterwards he was chosen Register to the Supreme Council of that City (1). He married N. Bayrette, the Daughter of Nicholas Bayrette, Advocate of the Parliament of Paris. Which Advocate embraced the Reformation; his Wife and Children followed him with so much Zeal, that Thomas Bayrette, his eldest Son, is in the Protestant Martyrology; and James Bayrette, his second Son, devoted himself to the Ministry, and would actually have been one of the Pastors of the Church

(f) Toties ineptis ejus decepti, eum pro magno Propheta habere pergunt, nec quicquam inde detrimenti auctoritas ejus sentit. Sic mundus vult decipi. Append. Discursus Theolog. Arnoldi contra Comenium.

(i) Moreri committit tibi Fault.

(u) In the Remark [A] of the Article KOTTERUS.

(22) Ibid. pag. 175.

(23) Ibid. pag. 182. Note. That if Ragotski's Attempt had succeeded, no regard would have been had to the Non-observance of the Conditions prescribed by the Prophet, and thus the same Clauses are Essential or Accidental to the Prophecies of those People, just as the Event pleases to determine. This is their Grand Key.

(18) Rocoles, Vienne deux fois delivree, pag. 381.

(19) Maresius, in Antirrhethico contra J. A. Comenium, pag. 67.

(20) Hist. Revel. pag. 162.

(21) Ibid. pag. 165.

(1) The Manuscript Life of Charles Drelincourt.

in the Month of June, 1618, and exercised his Office near Langres [B], 'till he was called by the Church of Paris, in March 1620. In 1625 he married the only Daughter of a rich Merchant at Paris (a), by whom he had sixteen Children [C]. The Blessing of God, which was visible in his Marriage by an uncommon Fruitfulness, was not less visible in his Ministry. His Sermons were very edifying: he had an inimitable way of comforting the Sick; he employed himself with great Success in the Affairs of his Church, and also in those of other Flocks, upon which he was always consulted if they were of any Consequence. The great Services he did the Church by the Fertility of his

(a) His Name was h-luc; he had turned Protestant.

(2) See the Epist. Dedicat. of the IX Dialogues de Mr Drelincourt contre les Missionnaires, touchant le Service des Eglises Réformées.

(4) See the same Epistle Dedicat.

(4) Taken from the Epistle Dedicatory of the third Volume of his Sermons. He dedicated it to Mess. Heudelet, Lords of Preigny, and to the rest of the Faithful, in, and about, the City of Langres.

Church of Paris, if he had not died the very Week that was pitched upon for his Ordination. Thomas Bayette, by the Advice of Calvin and his Colleagues, undertook the Ministerial Office at nineteen Years of Age, and exercised the same at Lyons (2). 'Some Years after, he was forced by the Fury of the Persecutions to retire to Geneva . . . but finding no Comfort but in the Work of his Vocation, he was soon sent to Bezançon, where God enabled him to found a private Church, and to advance the Kingdom of JESUS CHRIST in a wonderful manner.' His Mother, not having seen him since he was a Minister, was passionately desirous to see him; wherefore he took a Journey to Paris the very Year of the Massacre. The third day 'he fell into the hands of the Murderers, who having learned from his own Confession, what was his Religion and Office, put him cruelly to Death, together with John Molk, the Husband of Mary Bayette his eldest Sister, and inhumanly dragged both the Bodies into the River. This is the Thomas Bayette mentioned in the Book of Martyrs, where he is ranked with the Ministers of JESUS CHRIST who have sealed the Truth of the Gospel with their Blood. His Mother was preserved from this Deluge of Blood by a kind of Miracle, and fled to Sedan with the rest of her Children, where she brought them up 'in the Fear of God.' The last of all was a Posthumous Daughter, and was married to PETER DRELINCOURT, who was also a Refugee at Sedan, and was at that time Secretary to Henry Robert de la Mark (3). These are the Father and Mother of our Charles Drelincourt.

[B] He was admitted to the Ministry . . . and exercised his Office near Langres.] They thought they might find a Church at the Gates of Langres as in a Bailiwick. Those, who laboured at this Establishment, desired that Mr Drelincourt might be the Minister of this growing Church. As 'they assured him there was the Prospect of a great Harvest in those Parts, he accepted the Call with Joy, preferring it to all that then offered; for though he was but twenty two Years and some Months of Age, he had the happiness to be desired by many Churches in the Kingdom, and even by some of the most considerable Foreign Churches. . . Upon his arrival at Langres, he was full of Hopes; for he found in that City a bundance of those People that were called Temporizers, who seemed only to wait for an Opportunity of declaring themselves: and in the Country he saw the People breathing after the Purity and Simplicity of the Gospel, and even at the sole report of a Church being to be established there, above 500 Persons ran together in hopes to hear a Sermon. But the necessary Decree for it could never be obtained from the King's Council. 'Mr Drelincourt was so sensibly affected with Grief at this, that it threw him into a fit of Sickness for three Months, which almost carried him to his Grave. . . In expectation of the so much desired settlement, he preached to the neighbouring Churches, and even in the Castle of Preigny, where he received the Imposition of hands 'in the beginning of June 1618. He was never suffered to make his ordinary abode at Langres: This made him more diligent to visit, instruct, and comfort the 'Protestants in the Country.' At length, when all hopes were lost of seeing the Church of Langres established, he accepted the Call of the Church of Paris. He preached there the first time the fifteenth of March 1620. But he always preserved a particular Affection for the Members of his first Church (4).

[C] He had sixteen Children. The first seven were all Boys: the rest were intermixed, six Sons and three Daughters.

The eldest of all was LAWRENCE DRELINCOURT. He was first Minister of Rochele; but being forced from them by an Edict, forbidding that Church to have any Pastors born out of Rochele, 'he was called to Niort, where he followed his Ministry with great Reputation and Faithfulness, till God having deprived him of his Sight in 1630, he died six Months after, being fifty six Years of Age. We have several fine Sermons of his, also a Collection of Christian Sonnets (5), politely turned, and very much esteemed by those who have a taste for Piety, as well as Wit. Besides, being a judicious Divine, a good Preacher, and well versed in Hebrew, he had this in particular, that having at his leisure Hours perfectly studied the French Tongue, he knew admirably well all the delicacies and purity of it, so that the famous Mr Conrad consulted him almost every Point upon such Matters. He left one Manuscript among the rest, the design of which is to purge the French Tongue of all low and obscene Expressions, which well deserves to be published. . . . Lawrence Drelincourt was married, and left only Daughters (6). If any one desires to see how much he was beloved by his Father, they need only read the Epistle Dedicatory of the Falsé Pastor convicted.

The second Son was named HENRY DRELINCOURT. He was consecrated to the holy Ministry, and exercised it first at Gien, and then at Fontainebleau. These two Brothers had the Consolation to receive the Imposition of hands from their own Father. The Sermons he preached on these Occasions have been made public. Henry Drelincourt died before the last Persecution (7). He was an Advocate before he was a Minister (8).

The third Son is the Illustrious CHARLES DRELINCOURT, Professor of Physic at Leyden (9), whom I have had occasion to mention more than once (10). 'Scarcely had he taken his Degrees at Montpellier in 1654, but immediately was he chosen first Physician to the King of France's Armies in Flanders, commanded by Marshal Turenne. Afterwards, being married at Paris, he was called to be Professor of Physic at Leyden in 1668. He is at present Dean of the University. He served William III, King of England, and Queen Mary his Consort, till their advancement to the Throne. It was to him alone that the King committed the care of the Queen in her Journey to the Waters of Aix in 1681. He had also the Advantage of being Physician to all the great Persons of the Court at the Hague (11). I will not pass over in silence one thing, which I have met with in the Epistle Dedicatory of the Falsé Pastor convicted, viz. that he had a desire to be made a Minister even after he had taken his Doctor's Degree in Physic. If he has not the Tide, it is certain he does not want any of the Qualifications that a true Minister of the Gospel ought to have. No Divines are better versed in Scripture than he, and very few that he does not excel in this way. His Piety is solid, beneficent, obliging, charitable. Nor has he spared his Purse, or Credit, or Council, to the Refugees who have stood in need of his good Offices. Never was any Man a more faithful Friend than he. Those, who shall write his Panegyric, will find it very hard to determine, whether the Character of the Scholar, or the honest Man, is raised to the greater height in him. If all the Encomiums of different Authors upon him were collected together, they would swell into a Volume. Those his Colleagues give him in their public Harangues (12) seem to me of great value, and it is known they have very lately (13) spoke of his Merit to much Advantage upon an occasion (14) which called them to another object, the greatest and most noble that possibly can be, and the most capable of fixing and exhausting the utmost Attention of the Orator. All the Writings he has published are of an original and inimitable Character. Consult the News from the Republic of Letters, wherein you will find Extracts of some of his Medicinal Works. See also the Epistle Dedicatory to a Sermon printed at Leyden in 1682 (15). He understands

(5) There are six Editions of it: the last is of Amsterdam, by Nicolas Parmetier, 1693.

(6) Taken from the said Life in Manuscript.

(7) Manuscript Life.

(8) See the Epist. Dedicat. of the Falsé Pastor convicted, dated the fourth of April, 1656. He was not then a Minister.

(9) See the following Article.

(10) See, among other Places, the Preface of the Article ACHILLES; the Rem. [A] of the Article ANDROMACHUS, of Cré; and the Remark [G] of the Article BRISEIS.

(11) Taken from the Manuscript Life.

(12) See the Funeral Oration of Mr Hermann, composed by Mr Bidou, the illustrious Professor of Physic at Leyden. I omit many other Speeches where he is praised.

(13) In March, 1635.

(14) The Funeral Oration of the Queen of England, Melissius Spanheim and Perizonius have each made a fine Oration upon the Death of that Great Princess.

(15) It is intitled, The Stars of the Church, and the Mythic Candlesticks. It was preached by Lawrence Drelincourt, before the Synod of Paris, at Fontenay, the 25th of October, 1677. The Author of the Epist. Dedicatory is called Mr Baymax. He was Minister of Poitiers, and married the eldest Daughter of Lawrence Drelincourt.

his Pen cannot be fully represented [D], both with respect to Books of Controversy, and to Books of Devotion. There is so much Piety in the latter, and they breathe the Spirit and Language of Scripture in such a manner, that good Souls have been, and still are, wonderfully edified by them. It is impossible to express how much the Protestants were fortified by what he wrote against the Church of Rome; for by the Arms he put into their Hands, even those, who had no manner of Learning, were enabled to make Head against the Monks and Priests, and boldly cope with the Missionaries. His Writings made him be looked upon as the Scourge of the Catholic Controversists, and yet he was beloved by that Party too [E]. The great Lords of the Protestant Party always expressed a very great Regard for him [F]. He died the third of November, 1669, in the most devout Disposition that could be expected from a Minister, who had always been animated with an ardent Zeal (b), and who had devoted all his Labours, with indefatigable Application, to the Glory of God, and the Service of the Church [G]. He applied himself extraordinarily to Prayer, and in the last Years of his Life, if he was alone, he never heard the Clock strike, without falling down upon his Knees in Prayer to God (c). The Sieur Paul Freber is mistaken in many things [H].

(b) Consult his Devotives Heures. They were published after his Death, and annexed to his Books of Consolations against the Fear of Death, in the latter Editions.

(c) Taken from a Manuscript of his Life, composed by a French Refugee, Minister in England, who is writing the Lives of the famous French Ministers.

the French Tongue admirably well. Neither Vaugelas nor Bohours could mark with so much exactness the faults and neglects of our French Writers. The least and most imperceptible defects of stile never escape him, when he will take the trouble to observe them.

The fourth Son is named ANTONY DRELINCOURT. He is a Physician at Orbes in Switzerland, and greatly esteemed in his Profession. The Lords of Berne have appointed him their Physician Extraordinary.

The fifth Son died at Geneva during his Theological Studies.

The sixth is PETER DRELINCOURT. He is a Priest of the Church of England, and Dean of Armagh in Ireland. A Man of great Merit.

All the other Children either died very young, or in the Flower of their Age (16), except one Daughter who is yet alive. She was married to Mons. Malnoë, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris; and instead of following him to Holland, where he fled for his Religion, in the time of the Dragooning, she staid at Paris, where she makes an open Profession of the Roman Catholic Religion.

[D] He did great service to the Church by the Fertility of his Pen. His first Essay, was a Book of Preparation for the holy Sacrament. That Book, and his Catechism, his Abridgement of Controversies, and his Consolations against the Fears of Death, are those of all his Works which have been oftenest printed. Some have been printed above forty times, and translated into diverse Languages, German, Flemish, Italian, and English. His charitable Visits, in five Volumes, serve for a perpetual Consolation to private Persons, and for a Source and Model to Ministers. He published three Volumes of Sermons. His Polemical Works that I can remember are; *The Jubilee: The Roman Combat: The Jesuits Owl: The Church's triumph under the Cross: An Answer to Father Caussin: A Dispute with the Bishop of Bellai concerning the Honour due to the Virgin Mary: Of the Honour due to the Sacrament: An Answer to la Milletiere (17): Dialogues against the Missionaries in several Volumes: The False Pastor convicted: The False Fate of Antiquity: The pretended Nullities of the Reformation: An Answer to Prince Ernest of Hesse: An Answer (18) to the Speech of the Clergy spoken by the Archbishop of Sens: The Defence of Calvin. He wrote some Letters which are published, one to Madam de la Trimouille upon her Husband's turning Papist: one of Consolation to Madam de la Tabariere: one upon the Restoration of Charles II. King of Great-Britain: Some upon the English Episcopacy, &c. I do not mention the Prayers he published. Some were made for the King, others for the Queen, and for the Dauphin.*

[E] He was beloved by the other party. It is well known that he had free access to the Secretaries of State, to the first President, to the King's Advocate, and to the Civil and Criminal Lieutenants: but he made no other use of their favour, than to assist the afflicted Churches; or to serve an infinite number of private Persons, whom he either advanced in the World, or delivered from the Whip, the Gallows, and Gallies (19). It is certain that the Catholics in France were superior to the Protestants, as to all worldly Advantages, yet the latter were not afraid to preach boldly against the Doctrines of the Romish Church, and to put out Books of Controversy, in which they freely enough called every thing by its own name (20). Many Persons of Merit and Authority, in the contrary Party, were reasonable enough to do a Protestant Author Justice, who defended his Cause well, and kept to his Subject. We have an instance of this in our Mr Drelincourt. Mr Claude is another; for he was very much considered by the Roman Catholics (21). By which may be seen the Error, or gross Artifice, of some People, who make a Merit of being hated, like the Plague, by the Catholics, or by the Arminians, Anabaptists, &c. If they had done no more than defended their Cause well, they would never have become the object of universal Hatred: Therefore it is owing to their way of acting, to personal Injuries, or unfair Practices in their Writings, that People have such an Aversion for them.

[F] The great Lords of the Protestant Party always expressed a very great regard for him. The Duke of la Force, the Marshals de Chatillon, de Gassion, and de Turenne, Madam de la Trimouille, had a great esteem for him. They invited him to their Palaces, and honoured him from time to time with their visits. Foreign Princes (22), and Lords, the English and Dutch Embassadors, did the same, and frequently all of them made use of his wife Countess (23).

[G] He had devoted, with indefatigable Application, all his Labours to the Glory of God, and the Service of the Church. As he was of a strong Constitution, he never spared himself when any Ministerial Function was to be performed. Upon an extraordinary occasion, he had Courage and Strength enough to preach seven times in a Day. It was through this Strength of Body and Mind which God had bestowed upon him, that, being the third Minister after Mr du Moulin was removed, he was able to serve the Church of Paris for twelve Years. . . . But among other things he was more diligent and ready to visit the Sick than any had been before him. . . . He took so much Pleasure in discharging his Functions, and chiefly in combating Error, that he desired to die with his Pen in Hand (24). He preached till the last Week of his Life; for his last Sermon was that of October the twenty seventh 1669.

[H] The Sieur Paul Freber is mistaken in many things. I. He places the Birth of Charles Drelincourt on the tenth of October (25): And he ought to have placed it on the tenth of July. II. He makes him enter upon his Ministry at Paris in 1619; and yet Mr Drelincourt, who had been a Minister from the Year 1618, did not begin to serve that Church till the Year 1620. III. He says, that at the same time (26) Mr du Moulin retired to Sedan; so that Mr Drelincourt and John Mesrezat were alone charged with the care of that flock for many Years. Du Moulin retired to Sedan in the Year 1620, and there remained three Pastors in the Church of Paris. Charles Drelincourt was one of the three; and for twelve Years he served that great Church himself, being the third Minister (27). IV. He assures us, that Mr Drelincourt, not having Strength to go up into the Pulpit through the Infirmitates of old Age, often preached in the Churchyard, which was near the Temple (28). All this is false. They never preached in the Churchyard of Charanton, but upon Sacrament Days, or some other Solemnity, which made the Assembly more numerous than ordinary. Upon such Occasions they preached in the Church according (20) See the History of the Edit of Nantz, Tom. II, lib. 11, p. 8. 556.

(21) See the Rem. [E] of the Article CLAUDE.

(22) He was particularly valued by the House of Hesse, as appears by the Books he dedicated to Princes and Princesses of that Name.

(23) Manuscript Life.

(24) Taken from his Manuscript Life.

(25) Freber. in Theatro Viror. erudit. pag. 696.

(26) That is, according to him, in 1619.

(27) See Remark [G].

(28) Viribus tamen ob senium diminutis Cathedrali confectore nequiret, sepius in cimiterio proximo conciones peregit. Freber. in Theatro Virorum erudit. pag. 696.

(16) Among others a Daughter, who died, very piously, the fifth of December 1655. See the Epistle Dedicatory of the Falſe Paſtor convicted.

(17) He had a Conference with la Milletiere, and confounded him. The Acts of it are published. See the History of the Edit of Nantz, Tom. II, pag. 515, 516.

(18) He writ it under the Name of Philalethes, in 1656.

(19) Manuscript Life, as above.

(20) Manuscript
Life. See Rem.
[G].

to Custom, and besides there was a Sermon in the Churchyard. A Minister, who had not had Strength enough to get into the Pulpit, would not have been able to have preached in the Churchyard; for there they preached also in a Pulpit. Mr Drelincourt, whether old or young, was not chosen sooner than another to preach in the Churchyard. V. What he adds concerning the eighteen last Months of his Life is a lame Story: it is directly contrary to this Truth, that this Minister preached to the last Week of his Life (29). Will not those, who are acquainted with the Practice of the Paris Physicians, be very much surprised, that the Public should be told as a very strange thing, that this Minister was bled four times, during a Distemper of eighteen Months? 'Sequitur: no ante obitum à M. Majo A. 1668. catharris frequentior ad pectus delapsis cum tussi & asthma miserè afflictus; postquam INTEREA quater ipsi vena secta fuisset . . . vitam morte beata terminavit' 3. Nov. A. C. 1669 (30). I cannot tell whether the German Book, cited by Mr Fréber, contains these Faults; but I make no great doubt of it.

(30) Fréber.
pag. 696.

(a) See the Epist.
Dedicat. to Mr
Van Beuning,
before his Treatise
de Oculi et Partu vitæ.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES), Son of the former, was born at Paris, the first of February 1633. He received his Degree of Doctor of Physic at Montpellier, in 1654, and after having signalized himself in the Practice of it, both in the Army in Flanders, commanded by Marshal Turenne, and at Paris, he was chosen by the Curators of the University of Leyden, to be Professor of Physic, in 1668 (a). He accepted this Employment, and discharged the Duties of it, with extraordinary Success. His Method of teaching was the clearest, and most exact in the World; and in Anatomy he discovered such Dexterity and Skill as was admired by all. He thoroughly understood the Latin and Greek Tongues, and, considering the vast extent of his Erudition, one would have thought that he had applied himself all his Life to nothing but the Study of polite Learning. You may see more of his fine Accomplishments in the Remark [C] of the preceding Article. He died at Leyden, the Thirty first of May, 1697, after having endured for some Months the most acute Pains, with a truly Christian Patience. He had had the Comfort to see CHARLES DRELINCOURT, his only Son, made Doctor of Physic (b), well married, and the Father of two Sons. He ordered, there should be no Funeral Sermon for him.

(b) The third of February, 1693.

(a) De Eloquentiæ & Historiarum studio. It is printed with some others of the same Author.

DRESSERUS (MATTHEW), born at Erfurt, the Capital of Thuringia, the Twenty fourth of August, 1536, got a considerable Name among the Learned. The first Academical Lectures he heard were those of Luther and Melancthon, at Wittenberg. But he did not profit long by them; for the Air of that City being very pernicious to him, he was soon obliged to return to Erfurt, where he studied Greek under Maurice Sideman. No sooner was he advanced to the Degree of Master of Arts, in 1559, than he read Lectures in Rhetoric at Home: after that he taught in the College of Erfurt, and, being admitted into the Number of Professors of Philosophy, he taught Classical Learning and the Greek Tongue. Having taught sixteen Years in his own Country, he was called to Jena, to succeed Lipsius, who had been Professor of History and Eloquence there. He made his inauguration Speech (a) in the Year 1574. Some time after, he went to Meissen, to be Head of the College there, and having held that Place six Years, he obtained, in 1581, a Professorship of Polite Learning in the University of Leipsic, and a particular Pension was allowed him to continue the History of Saxony. Upon his Arrival at Leipsic, he found a great many Disputes among the Doctors. Some were for introducing the Philosophy of Ramus; others would not bear it. Some were advancing towards Calvinism; others would have no Innovations in Lutheranism. He resolved to keep clear of all these Broils, with respect to Innovations in Philosophy: but when he found their Connection with the other Disputes [A], he became one of the

RAMISM and CARTESIANISM involved in Theological Disputes.

[A] When he found their Connection with the other Disputes.] I suppose it happened at that time in Saxony, as it has done since in Holland. The Divines of the Augsburg Confession, who were inclining to Calvinism, had properly no interest to protect the Ramists; for what Connection was there between the Hypotheses of Ramus, and the Geneva Confession? Nevertheless the Cause of the Ramists and that of these Divines were combined together: both Parties thought good to unite their Interests, that they might be in a better Condition to oppose those who would suffer no Innovations. Without doubt this was the reason that the rigid Lutherans opposed the Ramists, with the same vigour as they did the Abettors of Calvinism. By this you will understand what I said, that Matthew Dresserus declared himself against the subtilties of Ramus, when he observed that they were complicated with the Theological Disputes which troubled Saxony. This is a just Representation of the Combination, which is seen in Holland, between Cocceianism, and Cartesianism: these two things have only this in common; that one is looked upon as a new Method of explaining Divinity, and the other as a new Philosophy. For any thing further, the Principles of the Cocceians, and the Spirit of their Hypotheses, are vastly different from the Cartesian Spirit.

Let us see Melchior Adam's own Words. 'Venit autem Lipsiam eo tempore, quo (verba referimus ipsius Dresseri) anceps malum in Academiam illam invaserat: dum nonnulli argutias Rami, repudiata doctrina Aristotelis & Melancthonis invehere conarentur: alii religionis quædam dogmata ad sensum Calvinii inflecterent. Utrumque extremum declinare ipse cupiebat: & quoniam concertatio de Rami novitatibus Philosophicam communitatem vehementer conturbabat, abstinendum sibi ab ejus consortio esse putavit, ne in medium certamen atque discrimen se objiceret (1). — He came to Leipsic (to quote his own Words) at the very time, when a complicated Error had made its way into that University, some endeavouring to establish the subtle Philosophy of Ramus, and banish the Doctrine of Aristotle and Melancthon, others to wrest certain Topics of Religion to Calvin's Sense. He strove to avoid each extreme; and because he received Philosophy had been strangely confounded by the new-fangled Notions of Ramus, he thought it expedient to keep himself clear from that Quarter, lest he should be unawares engaged in the heat of the Contest. Berlepsi, the Electoral Commissary, brought him off from this pacific Design, and it happened to Dresserus what often befalls those who come late into these kinds of Quarrels; they are hotter than the first promoters of them. Dresserus looked upon Ramism as a horrible Monster (2): he entered into all the Views of the Electoral Commissary, who, on his part, took great care of the Interest of Dresserus, doing his utmost to suppress the Book the Ramists published against this Adversary, and to get the Authors of it punished. Idem Berlepsi sibi

(1) Melchior.
Adam. in Vilis
Philosoph.
Germanic. pag.
496.

(2) Ubi vero
cognovit cum Rami doctrina conjunctam esse illius dogmatis disceptionem, magno animi
ardore pestiferam id genus amor-
vere conatus est.
— As soon as he understood that the Calvinists had united with the Ramists he laboured with excessive Zeal to extirpate so dangerous a Set of
Men. Ib. p. 497.

the warmest Anti-Ramists in all that Country. The rest of his Life he spent at Leipsic, and died there the fifth of October, 1607. He is the Author of several Books [B]. He married in the Year 1565, became a Widower in 1598, and married again two Years after (b). He was an industrious Man, which he shewed at Erfort; for he got all his Colleagues, who were all Roman Catholics, but one, to consent, that the Augsburg Confession, and Hebrew, should be taught in the Univerfity (c).

(1) Taken from his Life among those of the German Philosophers, compiled by Melchior Adam, pag. 495, and following.

(2) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philosph. Germanor. pag. 497.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Juvenal, Sat. 11, ver. 23.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Id. ibid.

(23) Id. ibid.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) Id. ibid.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Id. ibid.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Id. ibid.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) Id. ibid.

(35) Id. ibid.

(36) Id. ibid.

(37) Id. ibid.

(38) Id. ibid.

(39) Id. ibid.

(40) Id. ibid.

(41) Id. ibid.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) Id. ibid.

(44) Id. ibid.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Id. ibid.

(47) Id. ibid.

(48) Id. ibid.

(49) Id. ibid.

(50) Id. ibid.

(51) Id. ibid.

(52) Id. ibid.

(53) Id. ibid.

(54) Id. ibid.

(55) Id. ibid.

(56) Id. ibid.

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) Id. ibid.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Id. ibid.

(61) Id. ibid.

(62) Id. ibid.

(63) Id. ibid.

(64) Id. ibid.

(65) Id. ibid.

(66) Id. ibid.

(67) Id. ibid.

(68) Id. ibid.

(69) Id. ibid.

(70) Id. ibid.

(71) Id. ibid.

(72) Id. ibid.

(73) Id. ibid.

(74) Id. ibid.

(75) Id. ibid.

(76) Id. ibid.

(77) Id. ibid.

(78) Id. ibid.

(79) Id. ibid.

(80) Id. ibid.

(81) Id. ibid.

(82) Id. ibid.

(83) Id. ibid.

(84) Id. ibid.

(85) Id. ibid.

(86) Id. ibid.

(87) Id. ibid.

(88) Id. ibid.

(89) Id. ibid.

(90) Id. ibid.

(91) Id. ibid.

(92) Id. ibid.

(93) Id. ibid.

(94) Id. ibid.

(95) Id. ibid.

(96) Id. ibid.

(97) Id. ibid.

(98) Id. ibid.

(99) Id. ibid.

(100) Id. ibid.

Clodius accusat mcechos, Catilina Cathegum (6).

Clodius tax Bavos, Catbogu Catiline.

TATE.

[B] He is the Author of several Books. Of a Rhetorica inventionis, dispositionis, & elocutionis, exemplis sacris & profanis quam plurimis illustrata: of three Books Gymnasmatum Literaturæ Græcæ, Orationum, Epistolarum, & Poëmatum ex Autoribus sacris ac profanis, cum exemplis modum scribendi monstrantibus: of an Isagoge Historica per millenarios distributa, & ad annum usque nonagesimum primum supra mille quingentos deducta: of several Orationes, and other little Books for the use of the Youth (7). This is all that Melchior Adam says concerning Dresserus's Writings. He makes no mention of some Books of Physic, which are ascribed to him by others (8), nor of the Treatise De festis diebus Christianorum, Judæorum, & Ethnorum (9). He does not even intimate, that Dresserus ever meddled with Physic, or any other Profession, but that of teaching the Languages, History, and polite Learning. Who can tell but there might have been a Physician named Matthew Dresserus, whose Works have been ascribed to this learned Man? I forgot to observe, that he was attacked by Bodin upon the four universal Monarchies, and that he defended himself (10), and that one Gaspar Hap published a Book entitled Erratica Historia Dresseri.

(1) Paul Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1504.

(2) Id. ibid. ver. 27.

(3) Cum aliis Libellis juvenutis Scholasticæ utilibus. Melch. Adam in Vitis Philosph. Germanor. pag. 497.

(4) The Title is, De Partibus humani corporis & animæ, ejusque potentis libri duo. Adjectæ sunt ad finem Morborum & Medicamentorum communissimorum Appellationes. Merklm. in Lindenio renovato, pag. 793. Paul. Freher. Theatr. pag. 1505.

(5) Freher. ibid. pag. 1504. ascribes it to him.

(6) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philosph. Germanor. pag. 497.

DRYADES. The Name of certain Female Pagan Deities of the second Class, who presided over Woods [A]. Their Condition was much happier than that of the Hamadryades, who, as I shall say in their Article, were so closely united each to her Tree, that they grew up, and died together with it. But the Dryades had the Liberty of walking about, and diverting themselves [B], and could survive the Destruction of those Woods of which they had the Direction.

[A] Who presided over Woods. Their Name is derived from hence; for the Greek Word δρῦς, which signified properly an Oak, signified also in a less rigorous and more general Sense, all sorts of Trees. Servius abides by the former Signification. Dryades, says he, à quercibus (1). He had said in another Place, Dryades sunt quæ inter arbores habitant. Oreades quæ in montibus (2).

[B] The Dryades had the Liberty of walking about, and diverting themselves. If we believe Ovid, they often danced round the Oak, which the impious Erysichthon cut down:

Sæpe sub hac Dryades festas doxere choreas;
Sæpe etiam, manibus nexis ex ordine, trunci
Circumiere modum (3).

Where all the Wood-land Nymphs their Revels play'd,
And footed sportive Rings around it's Shade.

DRYANDER (a) (JOHN), a Protestant Martyr, was of Burgos in Spain. John Dias, made famous by the Barbarity of his Brother [A], owed to him those Instructions which induced him to quit the Roman Catholic Church, and embrace the Reformed Religion. Dryander was forced to stay at Rome, in obedience to his Father; but he could not forbear expressing on some Occasions his Opinion upon the Disorders of the Church. He was just setting out for Germany to join his Brother FRANCIS DRYANDER [B], when he was accused of being an Heretic. The Pope, assisted by

Nay they had liberty to marry. Pausanias says, the Wife of Arctas, Son of Jupiter and Calista, was a Dryade (4): some pretend that Eurydice was one also (5), and ground themselves on these Words of Virgil:

At chorus æqualis Dryadum clamore supremos
Impleverunt montes (6).

Her Sister Dryades the Mountains tear,
With loud Laments, and break the yielding Air.

Virgil says this, after having related the misfortune of Eurydice, the Wife of Orpheus. Note, that the Poets often confound the Dryades with the Naiades, &c. and that there were some Hamadryades who lay with Men. We shall speak more fully of all this in another Place (7).

(1) Pausan. lib. 8, pag. 604. Edit. 1690.

(2) Servius in Georg. lib. 4, ver. 460.

(3) Virgil. Georg. lib. 4, ver. 460.

(4) In the Article HAMADRYADES.

(a) His Spanish Name was Enzinas, which was translated into Greek by the Word Dryander. The Spaniards call a sort of Oak Enzina.

(2) Acta Martyrum, pag. 337. Edit. 1565, in 8vo, & fol. 152, Edit. 1660, in 4to. Histoire des Martyrs, fol. 159, Edit. 1582, in folio.

Hatchet, the Twenty sixth of March 1546. The Protestant (2) Martyrology supposes that our Dryander was burnt after the Murder of John Dias. I have followed Beza who makes it preceded by the Martyrdom of Dryander.

[B] FRANCIS DRYANDER his Brother. He is the Author of a Spanish Translation of the New Testament,

VOL. II.

80

(b) Taken from Theodorus Baza in Iconibus, and from the Acta

(3) Histoire Critique du Nouv. Test. Tom. II, cap. 41, pag. 494.

(4) In the second Chapter of the second Part, pag. 111, and following.

by the Cardinals, examined him. Dryander did not flinch, he boldly declared his Faith, and was condemned to the Stake. He was burnt at Rome, in the Year 1545 (b).

flament. Mr Simon (3) calls him Francis Enzinas, and says, that this Version was dedicated to Charles V, which made a great Noise in the Low-Countries: it was printed at Antwerp in 1543. He has given his Judgment of it in an ample Manner, in his new Observations upon the Text and Versions of the New Testament (4). This Dryander was recommended to Cranmer, with great Elogies, by Melancthon, in the Year 1548. See the Forty third Letter of Melancthon. He was committed to Prison, at Brussels, after he had dedicated his Work to Charles V, where he remained fifteen Months. He got out the first of February 1545, by laying hold of an Opportunity that offered, which was, seeing the Prison Door open about eight o'Clock in the Evening (5).

Martyrium of Crispin. Natus, that Crispin, folio 152, placed this Martyrium in 1546.

(5) Crispin. Ad Mart. fol. m. 151.

DRIEDO (JOHN), in Flemish Dridoens, a Native of Turnhout, in Brabant, went through his Studies at Louvain, where he received his Doctor's Degree in Divinity in the Month of August, 1512. Adrian Florent, who was afterwards Pope Adrian VI, performed the Ceremony of his Promotion, and observing, that this Disciple applied himself too closely to human Sciences, he informed him of the Distinction, which he ought to make between the Mistress-Science, and those which are only her Handmaids. After this Hint Driedo devoted himself chiefly to the Study of Divinity (a). He became Professor of this Science in the University of Louvain (b). He was also Curate of St James, and Canon of St Peter, in the same City (c). He vigorously opposed Lutheranism: but, if one may judge of him by one of Erasmus's Letters, he moderated his Zeal somewhat better than the other Doctors of that Country [A]. He printed some Books of Divinity [B]; but meddling with Chronological Difficulties, he blundered pitifully [C]. He died at Louvain, in 1535 [D]; though those who published his Epitaph place his Death upon the fourth of August, 1555.

(a) Valer. Andree, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 494.

(b) See his Epitaph in Swert. Athen. Belgic. pag. 420.

(c) See the same Epitaph.

[A] If one may judge of him by one of Erasmus's Letters, he moderated his Zeal, somewhat better than the other Doctors of that Country. Here is what he wrote to Gadesdale Resemond, Rector of the University of Louvain in 1519. 'Disputationibus vestris ad-
' versus Lutherum semper constantissime favi: sed mul-
'tis magis scriptis, maxime Joannis Turenholtii qui 'docte & fine affectibus disputavit, ut audio (1).—
'I have constantly espoused your Disputations against 'Luther, and your Writings more zealously, especially 'those of John of Turenhout, who, I am informed,
'disputed both coolly and learnedly.'

(1) Erasmi. Epist. 12, lib. 12, pag. 605.

[B] He published some Books of Divinity. They concern the Disputes between the Roman Catholics, and the Protestants; they treat. De gratia & libero arbitrio: de concordia liberi arbitrii & predestinationis: de captivitate & redemptione generis humani: de libertate christiana; de Scripturis & Dogmatibus Ecclesiasticis.

[C] But meddling with Chronological Difficulties, he blundered pitifully. He could not fail of this, when he took the Persius and the Metasthenes of Annii of Viterbo for genuine Works. His Treatise de Scripturis & Dogmatibus Ecclesiasticis is divided into four Books, of which the third regards the Times: 'Ad illustrandas obscuritates in Sacra Scriptura emergentes: sed erravit in multis toto (ut dicitur) celo, eo quod statuerit sequendam supputationem Beroffi Chaldei, Metasthenis Persæ, & Philonis Judæi, aliorumque quorum Chronographiam cum Hebraica Sacra Scripturae veritate concordare conatur: at bonus vir alioquin doctissimus nondum animadverterat auctores esse supposititios (2). — To explain the Difficulties to be found in the holy Scriptures. But he is often quite mistaken, by following the Chronology of Berosus, the Chaldean, Metasthenes, the Persian, Philo Judæus, and others, whose Accounts he would reconcile to the holy Scriptures. But the Author, tho' in other respects a Man of great Learning, had not considered that those Authors were spurious. In this manner Francis Swert speaks of them (3). Consult Possévin (4).

(2) Valer. Andree, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 494.

[D] He died at Louvain in 1535. This is what Aubertus Miræus (5), and Valerius Andreas say; but Swert does not say so; on the contrary he produces Driedo's Epitaph, where it is said obiit atque hic sepultus est a nativitate Domini c. 13. Is. Lv. iv. Men. Augusti (6).—He died, and was buried August the fourth 1555. Therefore Father Labbe was wrong to refer those to Swert who would correct the Error of a certain Author, he does not name, who placed Driedo's Death in 1555. 'De eo plura Valerius Andreas, Swertius, Miræus, &c. ex quibus corrigendus qui anno 1555, die 4. Augusti sub Paulo IV. Papa mortuum docuit (7). — Valerius Andreas, Swertius, Miræus, have spoke more fully of this Matter, by whom he is to be corrected, who fixes his Death to the fourth of August 1555, under the Pontificate of Paul IV. Francis Swert is so far from being able to supply the Correction of this Mistake, that he is the most proper Person to persuade us that Aubert le Mire, Valerius Andreas, and the others, are all mistaken, for who does not give more Credit to an Epitaph, concerning a Person's Death, than to the single Testimony of an Historian? Paul Freber (8) quotes Driedo's Epitaph with the same false Date as Francis Swert. This should be a Caution to Compilers to take particular care, not to let Printers falsify Titles, and public Monuments.

(3) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 420.

(4) Possévin. lib. 2, Biblioth. Selectæ, cap. 14, and in Apparatu Sacro.

(5) De Scriptore. Sæc. 16, pag. 28.

(6) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 420.

(7) Philippus Labbe de Script. Ecclesiasticis, Tom. I, pag. 558.

(8) In Theatro, pag. 166.

(a) This Article, both Text and Remarks, was communicated to the Bookseller the sixteenth of --- 1695, and it is printed just as it was received.

(b) It is called St Margaret's Road.

DRUMMOND (a), a most Noble and Ancient Family of Scotland, of which the Earl of Perth is now the Chief. The first of this Family, that bore the Name of Drummond, was an Hungarian Gentleman, named Maurice, who left England with Edward Atheling, lawful Heir to the Crown, to avoid the Persecution of William the Conqueror, who took Possession of England in 1066. Maurice was Commander of the Ship in which Edward Atheling embarked, together with his Mother Agatha, and his two Sisters, Margaret and Christina. A violent Storm forced them upon the Coasts of Scotland, and they landed in a Harbour on the River Forth, which to this day retains the Name of one of Edward's Sisters (b), who, having been very famous for her Sanctity during her Life, was canonized after her Death. In a word, it is St Margaret. She married Malcolm III of that Name, King of Scotland, who conferred great Honours and Pensions on our MAURICE DRUMMOND, together with an Estate, in Land, in the Province of Dumbarton, and the Office of Seneschal of Lenox. The Queen also honoured him with Marks of her Esteem, and gave him one of her Maids of Honour in Marriage. From this Marriage proceeded a Son, who was named Malcolm, the Father of Maurice, the Father of John, the Father of Malcolm. We know nothing of their Actions or Alliances ; but we know their genealogical Successions by Acts and Records, preserved, for some Ages, with great care, in the Abbey of Inchafry, and at last transferred into the Archives of the Family. Some of them were lost by the Pillage they were exposed to in the great Revolution of 1688 ; but enough remains to make good what is set forth in this Article, which is besides sufficiently attested by the Scotch Historians. We shall see, in the Remarks, the Line of Succession from MALCOLM DRUMMOND, the second of the Name [A], to JAMES DRUMMOND, the third of the Name, Earl of Perth [B], Chancellor of Scotland, who is at present (c) Chief of the Family, and a Refugee at Rome for his Religion. We shall see, in this Succession, a great Number of very illustrious Alliances, which alone is a certain Proof of the Splendor in which this Family has constantly maintained itself.

(c) That is, in the Year 1695.

[A] We shall see . . . the Line of Succession from MALCOLM DRUMMOND II of the Name . . . His Son MALCOLM III, surnamed Begg, that is, the little, married Adda the Daughter of Malduin, Earl of Lenox, who had but one Brother that left no Children, and who married the Sister of that John Monteith, that sold the illustrious William Wallace, Viceroy of Scotland, to the English. This John Monteith foreseeing that the Earl of Lenox, his Brother-in-Law, would leave the Earldom to Malcolm, his Sister's Husband, persuaded the King to ask it of him. He hoped, the King, when he had obtained it, would have given it him ; but he was mistaken : the King gratified Robert Stuart with it, whose Descendants have been Earls of Lenox. Malcolm Begg had four Sons by his Wife Adda, JOHN, MAURICE, THOMAS, and WALTER. This last was Secretary to the King. Maurice married the Daughter of the Seneschal of Strathern, and succeeded him in his Honours, and great Estate. Thomas was made Baron of Balfroun. Their elder Brother John Drummond, seventh Seneschal of Lenox, declared War against John Monteith. There was an ancient hatred between their Families. Monteith was vanquished, and lost three of his Sons in this War. The King ordered them to agree : the *Grande*s of the Kingdom assembled to make this Pacification, and the Earls of Douglas, Angus, and Arran, and the Lord Robert, the King's Nephew, were Guarantees of it. These Hands and Seals are still to be seen to the Treaty ; and it appears that the Lord Robert, the King's Nephew, owns himself to be one of the chief Relations of the two Families that were then reconciled. Drummond, having lost, by one of the Articles of the Treaty, the Lands he was possessed of in the County of Lenox, by the Death of the three Sons of John Monteith, retired with his Family into the County of Perth, where he enjoyed the Lands of Stobball and Cargill. He married the eldest Daughter of William de Montfex, Great Treasurer of Scotland. His eldest Son, MALCOLM IV of the Name, married Isabella Douglas, Hereditary Countess of Marr, and contracted a very strict Friendship with the Earl of Douglas, his Brother-in-Law. He joined with him in a War against the English, and signalized himself at the bloody Battle of Otterburn (1) ; where he took Prisoner Ralph Peirey, a General of great Renown among the English. For this Action he was honoured with a Pension during Life. His Brother William married the Daughter of the Baron of Airth, who brought him, for her Fortune, the Barony of Carnoc. From this Marriage is derived the Branch of Atbornden.

(1) In the Language of the Country it is called Chevy Chase.

We must say something of the four Daughters of John Drummond. The eldest was called ANABELLA and was married to Robert III, King of Scotland. This Queen is greatly extolled, by the Scotch Historians, for her Virtue and singular Prudence : she was the Mother of James I, King of Scotland. One of her Sisters was married to Archibald, Earl of Argyle, another to Alexander Maidonald, Lord of the Isles, and eldest Son of the Earl of Ross, and another to Stuart of Dualy. Malcolm IV of the Name dying without Children, JOHN DRUMMOND, his Brother, became Head of the Family. He married Elizabeth of Sainte Clare, Daughter of the Earl of Orkney, Caitbness, Rossin, &c. most illustrious among the Danes, as well as the Scots. He had by her three Sons and a Daughter, who was married to Lord Thomas, Baron of Kinnaird. We shall speak of Walter the eldest of three Sons. Robert, the second Brother, married the Heiress of Barnbongall. John, the youngest of all, went to the Madera Islands, where his Posterity at this day makes a good Figure.

WALTER DRUMMOND married to Margaret Daughter of the Lord Patrick Rutboen, Head of a very Noble Family, was Father of the Malcolm, that follows, of JOHN Bishop of Dumblain, and of WALTER, who was made Baron of Leiderief, from whom is derived the Branch of Blair Drummond, which produced two other Branches, that of Newton, and that of Gardrum.

MALCOLM V of the Name married Maria Murray, Daughter of the Lord of Tullibardin (2), and had by her John Lord DRUMMOND, created Peer of the Kingdom. WALTER, Lord of Deanston, JAMES, Lord of Corriwebster, and THOMAS, Lord of Drumminersich, from whom are descended the Branches of Invermay, Cultmalindre, Comrie, and Pitcairns.

(2) The Earls of Tullibardin, now Marquisses of Arbuthnot, are his Descendants.

JOHN DRUMMOND, eldest Son of Malcolm V, married Elizabeth Lindsey, Daughter of the famous Earl of Crawford (3), and became Illustrious and Powerful. He was a very great Genius. He was Great Justiciary of Scotland, which at that time was the highest Place in the Kingdom. He bought all the Lands of the Baron of Concraig, his Kinman, situate in the County of Strathern, and by the King's Permission, the Post of Hereditary Seneschal of that County. He did James IV, King of Scotland, good Service ; for he defeated the Earl of Lenox, and the Lord Lisle, and their Adherents, who were marching to join the Earl of Marishall, and the Lord Gordon, who had formed a Design to secure the Person of the young King, and govern the Kingdom under pretence of revenging the Death of James III. He was sent Plenipotentiary into England, to conclude a Treaty of Peace with King Richard III. After the Death of the King, he was deprived of his Estate, and his Offices, for giving a King at Arms a Box on the Ear, who came to summon him, in the Castle of Drummond, to appear before the Parliament, and give an Account of the Queen's Marriage with the Earl of Lenox (4) ; but by the Solicitations of the Queen, and the Intercession of the great Men of the Kingdom, his Estate and Honours were restored to him two days after, in Consideration of his Quality and Services. He had four Daughters, one of whom, named MARGARET, pleased King James IV so well, that he resolved to marry her. But a Dispensation from the Pope being necessary, on account of their being related, the impatient Prince married her in private ; from this clandestine Marriage issued a Daughter, who was afterwards Wife to the Earl of Huntley. The Dispensation being come, the King was desirous to celebrate his Marriage publicly ; but the Jealousy of some of the Nobility against the House of Drummond suggested to them the wicked Thought of poisoning Queen Margaret, that his Family might not have the Glory of giving two Queens to Scotland. Her Sister ELIZABETH was Countess of Angus. EUPHEMIA, another of her Sisters, was married to the Lord Fleming, and ANNABELLA, her other Sister, was Countess of Montrose.

(3) He was commonly called Earl Beards.

(4) The Count, who kept in the Castle of Drummond, was summoned at the same time.

WILLIAM DRUMMOND, Son of John, and Husband of Isabella Campbell, Daughter of the Earl of Argyle, had two Sons, Walter and Andrew ; he and his Family entered into open War with the Family of Murray, and some of his Friends barbarously burnt some Gentlemen of the House of Murray in a Church (5). He was innocent of the Crime ; but nevertheless, as the King did not love him, he was condemned to lose his Head for it. Which was executed accordingly. His Son ANDREW was created Baron of Belliebston, and gave Rise to a Branch, of which the last Male, MAURICE DRUMMOND, left four Daughters, who were honourably married in England. One of them was the Wife of Caryl, Secretary to King James. WALTER DRUMMOND, eldest Son of William, had by Elizabeth Graham, Daughter of the Earl of Montrose, but one Son, viz.

(5) In that of Minnivard.

DAVID

DAVID DRUMMOND, who married Margaret Stuart, Daughter of the Duke of Albany, Viceroy of Scotland, by whom he had only one Daughter, who was Wife of the Lord of Poury Ogilby. After Margaret's Death, he married Lilia Rutben, who brought him five Daughters, 1. JANE, Wife of John Earl of Montrose, Chancellor and Viceroy of Scotland: 2. ANN, married to John Earl of Marr, Great Treasurer of Scotland: 3. LILIA, Countess of Crawford: 4. CATHERINE, Lady of Tullibardine: and MARGARET, Lady of Keir. The two Sons of DAVID DRUMMOND are PATRICK, who follows, and JAMES Lord of Maderly, from whom are descended the Viscounts of Stratballan, and the Barons of Marchani. The first, who was created Viscount of Stratballan, was named WILLIAM DRUMMOND. He was a Lieutenant-General in King James's Army, and a great Man, both for the Field, and the Closet.

PATRICK DRUMMOND, married to Margaret Lindsay, Daughter of the Earl of Crawford, from whom is derived the Branch of Edzel, had five Daughters. 1. CATHERINE, Countess of Rothes. 2. LILIA, Countess of Dumferlin, Mother of the Countesses of Lauderdale, Kelly, Balcarras, and Cathness. 3. JANE, Countess of Roxburgh, Governors to King Charles the First's Children. 4. ANN, Lady of Torray-Barelay. 5. And ELIZABETH, Wife of the Lord Elphinstoun. Besides these five Daughters, PATRICK DRUMMOND has two Sons, JAMES and JOHN.

JAMES DRUMMOND, created Earl of Pertb, married Isabella Seatoun, Daughter of the Earl of Winton, and left only one Daughter, who was Countess of Sutherland. He died young. JOHN, his Brother, Earl of Pertb, succeeded him: He married Jane Keir, Daughter of the Earl of Roxburgh, by whom he had four Sons, and two Daughters, one of whom was Countess of Winton, and the other Countess of Tullibardine. The four Sons are JAMES, who follows; ROBERT, who died in France; JOHN, who founded the Branch of Logy Almond; and WILLIAM, Earl of Roxburgh, who founded the Branch of Roxburgh, and that of Bellandin.

JAMES DRUMMOND II of the Name, Earl of Pertb, married Ann Gordon, Daughter of the Marquis of Huntley, by whom he had two Sons, and one Daughter, viz. JAMES, whom I shall speak of in the following Remark, JOHN, and ANN. The latter is a Lady of great Merit, and married, the Earl of Errol, Hereditary Constable of Scotland. JOHN DRUMMOND, Earl of Melfort, Secretary to James II, King of Great Britain, was twice married, first with the Heiress of Lundin, by whom he had three Sons, and three Daughters; ANN, married to the Baron of Houffon; ELIZABETH, Wife to the Viscount of Stratballan, and MARY, who is unmarried. The three Sons are JAMES Baron of Lundin, ROBERT and CHARLES. He married to his second Wife Euphemia Wallace, Daughter of Thomas Wallace, Baron of Craigie, the Head of a very ancient Family. By this second Marriage, he has six Sons, and three Daughters; JOHN, Lord of Torth, THOMAS, WILLIAM, ANDREW, RINALD, and PHILIP: CATHERINE, TERESA, and MARY.

[B] JAMES DRUMMOND III of the Name, Earl of Pertb. He was made Counsellor of State, in the Year 1679, Justice-General of Scotland in 1682, and High-Chancellor of Scotland in 1684. He was so moved by reading the Papers, found in King Charles the Second's strong Box, concerning the Controversy between the Protestants, and the Church of Rome, that, having examined sincerely the Affair of Religion, he was brought to believe the Roman Catholic to be the only true one, and accordingly he made an open Profession of it. His Attachment to this Church, and his Zeal for King James's Service, whom he endeavoured to follow into France, exposed him to ill Treatment both from the Populace and Council of Scotland. He was kept a close Prisoner in Sterling Castle for two Years, and seven Months, after which he was allowed to take a little Air for his Health, and then imprisoned again, where he continued nine Months. At last he had leave to go out of the Kingdom. He retired to Rome, where his Virtue, and Zeal for the Catholic Religion, gained him a universal Esteem (6). His greatest Enemies have never charged him with any other Crime than his professing the Romish Religion. He has had three Wives, 1. Jane Douglas, Daughter of William Marquis of Douglas; 2. Lilia, Countess of Tullibardine; 3. Mary Gordon, Daughter of Lewis Marquis of Huntley, and Sister to the Duke of Gordon. By his first Wife he had MARY, Wife of William, Earl of Mareschal, Hereditary Marhall of Scotland. ANN, who is not married, and JAMES Lord DRUMMOND, who at fifteen Years of Age left the University at Paris, to follow King James into Ireland in 1689. He was present at the Siege of Londonderry, and at the Battles of Newtown-Butler, and the Boynne. Being returned into France with King James, he performed his Exercises in the Academy of Paris, after which he travelled through France, Italy, Flanders, and Holland. He is now in Scotland. The Earl of Pertb had two Sons, by each of his other two Wives.

(6) That is in 1695.

DRUSBICKI (a) (GASPAR), a Polish Jesuit, entered into the Society the Twenty-fourth of August, 1609, at twenty Years of Age, and exercised successively the most considerable Offices in it; for he was not only Master of the Novices for seven Years, but also several times Rector of a College, and twice Provincial of the Province of Poland. He was sent twice to Rome by this Province, as their Solicitor, and he assisted at two general Congregations (b). He was very zealously addicted to Prayer, and it is believed that God revealed many things to him. His Devotion for the Virgin Mary was of a superlative Degree. His severe Treatment of himself was astonishing (A). He died piously at Poznan, the second of April 1660, and it is reported that his Body continued for many Years free from all kind of Corruption. He wrote several Books, but did not publish many of them (B). The History of his Life, composed by Daniel Paulowski (c), has many considerable things in it (d) (C).

[A] His severe Treatment of himself was astonishing. Witness the Bruises that were found upon his Body in his last Sickness, the Effects of the terrible Discipline he gave himself. Desipientissimus fui, corpus fenum inclementer admodum tractabat, id quod patuit in extremo morbo quando infirmariis exuentibus eum & induentibus, carnes miserandum in modum flagris concisae apparuerunt (1). — He treated his own Body with incredible Severity, and when the Undertakers laid him forth, his Body appeared miserably torn with the Lash during his last Sickness.

[B] He wrote several Books, but did not publish many of them. During the Interregnum, a Professor of Cracow printed and dispersed among the Nobility a Writing against the Jesuits. This Libel was answered by Gasper Drusbicki. His Answer, published in Polish was intitled, Declaratio memorialis exorbitantium, & processus Academiae Cracoviensis inter ordines distributi.

By the Title alone it appears that this was not a Process carried on against the Jesuits by a Professor of the University of Cracow; but that the Body of the University had some Difference with them (2). The other Writings of Drusbicki, which have been published in Latin, are Books of Devotion, De Passione Jesu Christi Filii Dei. Fasciculus Exercitiorum & Confessionum de principis virtutibus Christianae fidei. Sol in virtute sua, sive Jesus Christus in splendore suarum excellentiarum speciosus (3).

[C] The History of his Life . . . has many considerable things in it. I conjecture, those things are not concerning the Administration of the Affairs of the Society which were committed to him, but they are rather Visions and Extasies, and such like Incidents of an overtrained Devotion. They, who have the Book, will do me a Favour by informing me, if I am mistaken.

(2) There are very few Universities with which the Jesuits have not had some Difference, and generally speaking they might say, with regard to their Differences, Quia regio in terris nostri non plena laboris. Virgil. Aeneid. lib. 1, ver. 460.

(3) Southwell, ubi supra.

(a) The true Polish Orthography is Drusbicki. I follow that of Southwell, cited below.

(b) At the 8th and 10th.

(c) It was printed at Cracow, in the beginning of the Year 1670, in 8vo.

(d) Taken from Nath. Southwell. Biblioth. Sec. Jesu, pag. 278.

(1) Nathan. Southwell, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 278.

DRUSILLA, Daughter of Agrippa, first of the Name, King of the Jews, was but six Years old when her Father died. She had been promised to Epiphanus, Son of Antiochus, King of Comagena (a); but the Marriage was broke off, and never was consummated, because Epiphanus refused to keep the Promise he had made of embracing the Jewish Religion. Azizus, King of the Emeseni, was not so scrupulous; he consented to be circumcised, provided he might have Drusilla. Accordingly she was given to him, and he became a Jew (b). She was a most beautiful Woman: Felix no sooner saw her, but he fell in love with her. He proposed Marriage to her, and promised to make her so happy, that she accepted his Offer. She quitted her Husband Azizus, and her Religion at the same time [A], and married Felix, who then commanded in Judea. The Jealousy between her and her Sister Berenice [B] was one of the great Motives that inclined her to this Change (c). The Holy Scriptures make mention of Felix and Drusilla (d). They had a Son named Agrippa, who

(a) Joseph. Ant. lib. 19, cap. 7.

(b) Id. ibid. lib. 20, cap. 5.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Acts, chap. xxiv, ver. 25.

[A] She forsook her Husband and her Religion at the same time.] I promised in another place a Remark upon this (1). A learned Man (2) has represented to me that the words of the Jewish Historian only signify that this Marriage of Drusilla was contrary to the Laws; now that does not imply a change of Religion. I confess it; but Josephus seems to me to inform us of what I have said. His words are (3): 'Η δὲ (Δρυσίλλα) καὶ τὸν ἀδελφὸν Βερνίκην βασιλεὺς ὄντων, διὰ τὸ τὸν καλλὸς παρ' ἑκείνης ἐν ἡμῶν ἐλπίσιν, παρὰ τὸν νόμον περιέτρετο, καὶ τὸν φίλον ἄνθρωπον. That is to say, according to Galenus's Translation: Ille (Drusilla) male consilia volens evadere molestias fororis Bernices, invidentis sibi formæ præcellentiam, consensit calcata religione patria Felici nubere: which Genebrard renders in this manner: She being ill advised, and desiring to avoid the Envy of her Sister Berenice, who was vexed at her great Beauty, consented to FORSAKE HER RELIGION, and to marry Felix. Mr Arnauld d'Andilly translates the Historian's Greek Text in the same manner, with respect to her abjuring the Jewish Religion. What convinces me that Genebrard has translated it right, is the improbability that Felix, in the Post he was in, should dare to marry a Woman that should look upon the Religion of the Romans as abominable; that he should dare, I say, marry such a Woman without representing to her the necessity there was of her having other sentiments of the Worship of the Roman Gods. There is no likelihood that Drusilla would reject this Condition, when she was to marry a Person who had the Command over Judea, who had a great share in the Emperor's Favour, and whose Brother was the same Emperor's Favourite. I know the Romans were very easy in tolerating Religions; but there is a vast difference between tolerating a Religion which does not condemn your's, and tolerating a Sect that anatomizes and damns you. And this is what the Jews did with respect to all other Religions. And besides, there is a great deal of difference between suffering a Woman quietly to profess Judaism, and marrying her, notwithstanding that Profession. We may also make an Observation upon the Construction of the Words in Josephus; for if he had only meant to say that our Drusilla married with a Pagan, that the Jewish Laws did not permit her to marry, there was no necessity for dividing the words as he has done: the words evidently contain two Propositions, one that she had violated her Religion, and the other, that she married Felix. This is an Argument that there is something in the first which is not included in the second. But I would not insist too much on this proof: for there are too many instances which make it appear how little Authors observe the strict Laws of Logic in their placing of words; and it was anciently a Figure of Grammar (4) to divide one object by two Expressions. Pateris libanus & auro (5), for pateris aureis. We drink out of Cups and Gold, for Golden Cups.

It must not be imagined that I would represent Felix as a devout Pagan, and a conscientious Man; I give him nothing but Political Scruples. I only suppose he was not ignorant, that the Growth of his Fortune awakened the Jealousy of several powerful Courtiers, to whom he ought not to give such a specious handle to discredit and ruin him at Court, as to be able to say he had married a Wife that publicly professed an abhorrence for the Household Gods, and all the Religion of Rome.

VOL. II.

[B] The Jealousy between her and her Sister Berenice.] I have spoken of this Berenice: She was beautiful and ambitious, an amorous and intriguing Woman; I do not wonder she did not love her Sister; for she was a most beautiful Sister, and younger by ten Years than Berenice. The latter would willingly have quitted to her in this respect her Birth-right: in point of Beauty, ten Years advance makes a Birth-right very troublesome, which they would gladly be rid of, or change for the title of younger Sister; but nothing can be done against Nature. Berenice's jealousy was no secret Disposition: Drusilla felt the effects of it; so that she was very glad, by her Marriage with the Governor of Judea, a Man of great Credit with the Emperor Claudius (6), to be in a Condition of disputing the Ground with Berenice. The Ancients had a Proverb concerning the Hatred of Brothers: Fratrum inter se ira sunt acerbissima (7): Hatred among Brothers is the bitterest Hatred: I fancy the hatred of Sisters is still more violent; and if all those times may be said to belong to the Iron Age, in which fraternal Friendship was a rare thing, Fratrum quoque gratia rara est (8), I believe it may much better be said with respect to Sisters. There are three things which commonly (9) prevent their jealousy, the Grace of God, want of Qualities worthy of Envy, and a great Degree of Stupidity: for if their Age suffers them to appear together in the World, in the splendor of Beauty, Wit, and Fortune, it is almost impossible they should love one another, and you cannot make your court to one in a worse manner than by praising the other. Many of them have skill and firmness enough to conceal the vexation it gives them, but they are not the less sensible of it. I shall finish this Remark with the Conclusion of a Letter from Mr de la Fontaine to the Dukes of Bourillon. 'These Sheep, Madam, under Favour, are your Highness, and Madam Mazarin. And here I have a proper Opportunity to make her Panegyric, in order to join it with your's; but as these sorts of Parallels are dangerous things, I am of Opinion it will be much better to let it alone.

Like Sisters you love, and the sovereign Sway
Between you divide, while your Subjects obey:
But I'll no dispute about Preference raise,
Since nothing's so nice to be parted as Praise.
Were TULLY now living, whose eloquent Vein
Did the Hearts of the People and Senators gain,
His Rhetoric would fail in such Matters as these,
Two Heroes, two Wits, and two Beauties to please (10).

Cunæus reasons well upon the Motive of the Mosaic Law, forbidding to marry two Sisters at the same time. 'In Leviticus cap. XVIII, says he (11), edictum Numinis extat, quo Judæi duas forores eodem tempore habere uxores vetantur, non ob aliam causam profecto, quam quod ardentissima esse inter hæc æmulatione in tali conjunctione solet; cum cæteræ omnino, quæ eâ consanguinitate non sunt, æquiore animo sub eodem marito ætatem unâ agant. — In the XVth chapter of Leviticus, says he, there is a Decree of Moses, whereby the Jews are forbid to have two Sisters for Wives at the same time; for no other reason, than because, under such a Conjunction, there frequently happens between them the fiercest Contention; when others not so nearly allied pass their Lives with greater unanimity under the same Husband.'

S P

[C] B

(1) In Remark [E] of the Article BERENICE, the Grand Daughter, &c.

(2) Mr de la Roque, a French Refugee Minister at London.

(3) Joseph. Ant. lib. 20, cap. 5, pag. 693.

(4) Called διὰ δύο διού.

(5) Virgil. Geor. lib. 2, ver. 192.

(6) He was the Emperor's Freedman, Sueton. in Claud. cap. 28, and Brother to Pallas, Joseph. Ant. lib. 20, cap. 5. Tacit. Anal. lib. 12, cap. 54. Pallas stood well with Claudius, Sueton. ibid. Tacit. ibid.

(7) Erasmus, in his Comment upon this Proverb, cites Aristotle, Politic. 7, who says, "ὅταν εἰρηται, χαλεκοὶ γὰρ πάλαι ἀδελφῶν. Unde proverbio dicitur, acerbæ enim bellæ fratrum."

(8) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1, ver. 145.

(9) Let this Word be considered well; for every body may know of good and just Exceptions to this Rule.

(10) St Evremont's Works, Vol. II, pag. 386, Edit. Lond. 1727.

(11) Cunæus de Repub. Hebr. lib. 2, cap. 23, pag. m. 216. See Polygamia Triumphant, pag. 373.

(e) Joseph. Ant.
lib. 20, cap. 5.

who perished, with his Wife, in a Conflagration of Mount Vesuvius (e). It is very probable Tacitus is mistaken concerning Felix's Marriage [C]. Mr Moreri is fallen into some Errors which he might easily have avoided [D], if he had written with Attention, and formed his Mind to the Rules of Exactness.

(12) Tacit. Hist.
lib. 5, cap. 9.

[C] It is very probable Tacitus is mistaken concerning the Marriage of Felix. His Words are (12): 'Claudius defunctis regibus aut ad modicum redactis Judæam Provinciam equitibus Romanis aut libertis permisit. Ex quibus Antonius Felix per omnem sævitiam ac libidinem jus regium servili ingenio exercuit, Drusilla Cleopatæ & Antonii nepte in matrimonium accepta, ut ejusdem Antonii Felix Progener, Claudius nepos esset. — Claudius, when the Jewish Kings were all deceased, or at least extremely shortened in Power, bestowed Judæa, to be ruled as a Province by the Roman Knights, or his Freedmen; Antonius Felix was one of these, one who, rioting in the excesses of Licentiousness, and Cruelty, exercised the Authority of a King with the Spirit and Baseness of a Slave. He had indeed received in Wedlock Drusilla, Granddaughter to Antony and Cleopatra, inasmuch that, whilst the Emperor was Antony's Grandson, Felix was married to the Granddaughter of that very Antony.' These Words of Tacitus plainly signify that Felix was the Husband of Drusilla, Granddaughter to Marc Antony and Cleopatra, while he commanded in Judæa. Now there is no shadow of Probability in this; for Josephus, who is more to be depended upon than Tacitus, in this respect, informs us, that Felix courted Drusilla soon after he arrived in Judæa. But durst Felix have done this, if he had been actually married to the Emperor's first Cousin? could he have married Drusilla, Sister of Agrippa, the second of that Name, during the Life of the other Drusilla, Marc Antony's Granddaughter? could he, I say, have done this without divorcing the other Drusilla? and if he had divorced her, would Josephus have been silent upon such an Affair as this, so proper to render that Governor odious; for in this Case, Felix must have broke through two Marriages to satisfy his Passion. He must have repudiated one Drusilla, and forced another Drusilla to forsake her Husband. A national Historian does not forget such Circumstances as these. Tacitus is the more easily to be suspected of Negligence, because it is certain he notes the time wrong when Felix was Governor of Judæa. He supposes (13), that Felix and Cumanus commanded at the same time in that Country; Felix in Samaria, and Cumanus, in Galilee. Nothing is more false; for according to Josephus, who is no doubt better acquainted than Tacitus with those Things, Felix was not sent into Judæa, till after Cumanus had been condemned to Banishment for his Mildemeanours (14). Perhaps I may be asked from whence this Error of Tacitus proceeds: I believe two Causes may be assigned for it. Proceeding that Felix had been married to Drusilla, he might imagine that That Drusilla was the Daughter of Juba, and of Cleopatra Selene, Daughter of Marc Antony and Cleopatra, and never concerned himself whether there was not, in Judæa, a Lady of the same Name: but on the other side it is possible that Felix, before he went into Judæa, might have had for his Wife Drusilla, the Granddaughter of Marc Antony, and that this Drusilla was dead before he fell in Love with the other Drusilla of the Jewish Nation. This last Opinion will appear the more probable to those who know that, according to Suetonius, Felix married three Queens (15), by which we may understand three Princesses of Royal Blood. But besides, no Body makes mention of a Drusilla, who was Granddaughter to Marc Antony, and Cleopatra. Those who would pretend that Drusilla, the Jewess, was born of the Marriage of Agrippa with a Daughter of Marc Antony and Cleopatra, are confuted by Noldius (16).

[D] Moreri is fallen into some Errors. I. He should not have said, that Epiphanus promised Drusilla to become a Jew. Such Promises are not made to a Child of five or six Years old: it was to Drusilla's Father he made this Promise, as Josephus observes (17). II. He ought not to have confounded Agrippa, the Father, with Agrippa the Son: he should have said that the former betrothed Drusilla to Epiphanus, and the latter married her to Azizus. III. It is not said in the Acts of the Apostles, that Drusilla was present, when Paul reasoned, before Felix, concerning Justice and Judgment to come.

(13) Tacit. Ann.
lib. 12, cap. 14.

(14) Joseph.
Antiq. lib. 20,
cap. 5.

(15) Nec minus
Felicem quem colitibus & aliis provinciisque
Judææ præpositum trium regnum
maritum, Sætra,
in Claud. cap. 23.
See the fine Note of Mr Grævin upon this.

(16) Noldius de
Vita & Gestis
Herodum, pag.
469.

(17) Josephus, Antiq. lib. 20,
cap. 5.

DRUSILLA (JULIA), Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, was married to Lucius Cassius, in the Year of Rome 786 (a). She degenerated; for her Life was very scandalous [A]. She had to do, in her tenderest Youth, with her Brother Caligula, who was taken in the Fact before he had attained to the virile Gown (b) [B]. She continued all her life-time abandoned to this incestuous Commerce, and Caligula's Passion for her was so violent and public, that nothing was ever before seen like it. He took her from Lucius Cassius, her Husband, and lived publicly with her as if she

(a) Tacit. Ann.
lib. 6, cap. 15.

(b) See Remark
[D] of the Article
CALIGULA.

A. Observation
on the Joke,
Et sequitur leviter
filia matris iter.

[A] She degenerated; for her Life was very scandalous. If any Lover of Scandal should come and tell me, that the Latin Joke, Et sequitur leviter filia matris iter, — Like Mother, like Daughter, is never true, but when the Mother is naughty; that, in such a case only, the Daughter treads faithfully in the steps of her Mother, I should stop him short, without going out of this Family. Drusilla, it is true, did not follow the good Example of Agrippina her Mother, who was the chastest Lady of her time: but neither did Agrippina follow the ill Example of her Mother Julia, who was the most lascivious Woman of the Age.

[B] She had to do with Caligula, who was taken in the Fact before he had attained the virile Gown. Upon this Occasion, we might say something not unlike our Proverb, the Habit does not make the Friar. Caligula wore a Child's Garment, and was not a Child. He had not the virile Gown, and gave strong Proofs of his Virility; nevertheless, we must not imagine he was one of those extraordinary Instances that Authors make mention of, an Instance of those Boys who have got Children at ten or twelve Years of Age. We must represent things as they are, and do Justice to all the World; Caligula's wicked Disposition might indeed have hastened his criminal Resolutions, but could not give him the necessary Vigour to commit an act of Incest. The Child's Garment he had on, when he was found in the Act, did not hinder him from being of a competent Age according to the course of Nature. He did not take the virile Robe, till he was twenty Years of Age, and he was eighteen when he came to his Grandmother's. Vigesimo ætatis anno, accitus Capreas a Tiberio uno atque eodem die togam sumpsit, barbaramque posuit (1). — In the twentieth Year of his Age, being sent for by Tiberius to Caprea, he took the Toga Virilis, and was shaved for the first time on the same Day. Now it was at her House, that he was taken in the Act with his Sister. He was brought up, 1. with his Mother, 2. with Livia, 3. with Antonia. Pri-mum in matris, deinde ea relegata in Livie Augustæ proaviæ suæ contubernio mansit. Quam de-functam prætextatus etiam tum pro rostris laudavit, transiitque ad Antoniam aviam (2). — He first lived with his Mother, and after her Divorce with his great Grandmother Livia, whose Funeral Oration he spoke before he took the Toga Virilis, and was then removed to his Grandmother Antonia. But he did not go to the latter till after Livia's Death, that is to say in the Year 782; and he was born in the Year 764 (3). Nevertheless, God forbid I should retract what I have said in another Place (4), that Caligula's Corruption appeared betimes. Though he had been but twenty Years old at the time of his Incest, I had reason to say of him, that, in wicked Dispositions, Vice does not wait for a number of Years.

(1) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 20.

(2) Idem. ibid.

(3) Idem. ibid.
cap. 8.

(4) In the Text of the Article
CALIGULA.

(c) Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 24.

(d) Dio, lib. 59, at the Year 791.

she had been his lawful Wife (c); and when she died, in the Year of Rome 791, he gave into the most impious Extravagancies to honour her Memory [C]. Dio reports that she was married to Marcus Emilius Lepidus (d). Moreri has committed two Faults: he should not have said, that Germanicus was the Brother of Tiberius (e); nor that Drusilla was the Grand-Daughter of Augustus (f).

(e) He was the Son of Drusus, Tiberius's Brother.

(f) She was his Great Grand-Daughter.

One cannot mention his Name, without exciting the Idea of the most excessive Wickedness that a Man can be capable of. His Life is a Series of such furious Enormities that the Historians have been suspected by some of making him worse than he was. It is true such Monsters are very rare, and much more rare than great Saints, and the most accomplished Heroes: but yet Caligula is not the only one in whom humane Nature has shewn how far she is capable of carrying Corruption. I question whether she ever exhibited, upon the same Throne, four such Instances of this Kind, in so short a time, as she did upon the Throne of the Caesars from Tiberius to Domitian.

[C] He gave into the most impious Extravagancies to honour her Memory. Her Funeral was performed with the utmost Magnificence: he procured a Decree, to honour the Memory of Drusilla, like that which had been made for Livia, the Wife of Augustus; and besides that, he made a public Decree, declaring Drusilla to be in the Number of the Immortals. A golden Statue was erected of her, in the Senate House, and another Statue of her in the Forum, like that of Venus, and the same Honours decreed her, that were paid to That Goddess. A Temple was particularly consecrated to her: it was ordered that Men and Women should consecrate Statues to her; that Women should swear by her Name when they attested any thing; and that her Birth-day should be honoured with the same Games as those of Cybele. She was called the Panthea (5), and divine Honours were paid to her in all the Cities. Livius Geminus, a Roman Senator, declared he saw her ascend to Heaven, and converse with the Gods, and made Imprecations against himself, and his own Children, if what he said was not true, and among other Deities he called that of Drusilla to witness it. This was worth a good Sum of Money to him. The Romans were never under a greater Perplexity than at this time: they knew not what looks to put on; if they were sad, they were accused of denying her Deity; if gay, they were charged with not lamenting her Death (6). Caligula made use of his Sister's human Nature, against those who did not weep, and of her divine Nature, against those who did. During the time of the public Mourning, which he ordered for her, it was a crime to laugh, to go into the Bath, or to eat with ones Family (7). A poor Man, who sold hot Water, was put to Death as guilty of Irreligion. Τὸν ἀλλήσαντα θερμὸν ὕδωρ ἀπέκλειψεν ὡς ἀσεβήσαντα. Quidam ob a- quam calidam venditam impietatis reus factus, à Caio trucidatus fuit (8). After her Death, Caligula never swore, either in the Senate, or in the Army, upon things of the utmost Importance, but by the Deity of Drusilla (9). Add to this the other signs of his Madness, mentioned under the Article of CALIGULA. Seneca has excellently described the wild and extravagant Follies of Caligula's mourning (10).

(c) That is to say, All Divine. These wretched Flatterers went farther in three Days than the Eastern Christians have done in many Ages. I speak of those who called the Virgin Mary, The All-Holy, Panagia.

(6) Taken from Dio, lib. 59, at the Year 791.

(7) Eadem defuncta iustitium indixit, in quo risisse, lavasse, cenasse cum parentibus, aut conjuge liberisque, capitale fuit. Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 24.

(8) Dio, lib. 59, ad ann. 791.

(9) Idem. ibid.

(10) Seneca de Consol. ad Polyb. cap. 34.

(a) The Family Name was Drusicius.

(b) He was Professor of Divinity.

DRUSIUS (a) (JOHN), born at Audenard, in Flanders, the Twenty eighth of June 1555, was a very learned Person among the Protestants. He was designed for the Study of Divinity, and sent to Ghent betimes, there to learn the Languages, and after that to Lowvain to go thorough a Course of Philosophy. His Father, having been outlawed on account of the Protestant Religion, in the Year 1567, and stript of his Estate, retired to England. His Wife, a good Catholic, did her utmost Endeavour to hinder our John Drusus from taking the same way. She called him back from Audenard, and sent him to Tournay: but the Vexation to see herself deprived, at the same time, of her Husband and Estate throwing her into a fit of Sickness, she could not have such a strict Eye upon him, but he found means to slip away, and join his Father at London. He arrived there about the end of the Year 1567. Care was taken of his Studies; Masters were appointed him; and he soon had a favourable Opportunity of learning Hebrew under Antony Cevallier, who had fled into England, and taught that Tongue publicly in the University of Cambridge. Drusus lodged with him, and had a great share in his Friendship. He did not return to London till the Year 1571, and was making Preparations to go over into France [A], when the News of the Massacre on St Bartholomew's Day diverted him from his Resolution. Not long after he had an Invitation to Cambridge from Thomas Cartwright (b), and to Oxford from Lawrence

Humfred

(1) Curlander in Vita Drusii, pag. 5.

(2) Idem pag. 6.

[A] Was making Preparations to go over into France. Meursius, for want of Attention, has not well understood this Latin of Curlander. 'Postea cum Cevallierus à suis in Galliam revocatus abiret, pararet, interpretavit à patre (Drusus) ut ibi adhuc annum integrum commorari posset (1). — Afterwards when Cevallier, being recalled by his Friends, was preparing to return into France, Drusus prevailed with his Father to let him continue there a Year longer.' The chief difficulty does not lie here, but in the following Words: 'Anno post discessum Cevallieri Janus noster profectus est Londinum, hac fine, ut in Galliam, Philosophiae studium profsequendi gratia, denuo concederet (2). — The Year after the Departure of Cevallier, Drusus went to London, with an Intent to go to France again, to prosecute his philosophical Studies.' Meursius, interpreting one of these Passages by the other, imagined he might say that Drusus followed Cevallier into France, and being come back to London, was preparing for a second Voyage to France, when he was prevented by the Massacre on St Bartholomew's Day. 'Revocato in Galliam Cevalerio eum comitatus, ad Hebraeam summam cum contentione animum advertens, privatim quoque adolescentes duos Anglos docere cepit. Inde Londinum reversus cum recurrere eo omnino statuisset, laniena Parisiensis nuntiatur. Qua de causa mutato consilio, &c. (3). — He accompanied Cevallier on his return to France, and began to apply himself closely to the Study of the Hebrew, being private Tutor to two English young Gentlemen; from thence he returned to London; and being again upon the point of setting out for France, he was diverted from his design by the News of the Massacre at Paris.' It is certain that Drusus did not go into France with Cevallier, but staid at Cambridge, where he taught the two English Pupils mentioned by Meursius. This is plain by Curlander's Narrative, page 6. It is also certain that, after Cevallier's Departure, he applied himself more to Greek and Philosophy, than to Hebrew: from whence it appears that Meursius has not given a good Idea of that young Man's Employment. In the second Passage of Curlander, the Comma should be put after denuo, and not before it; and this deceived Meursius. The Author's meaning was, that Drusus intended to go to France, in order to continue somewhat longer his philosophical Studies. I am confident, one might find a hundred such Faults in Books, if one took the pains to compare the Abridgment with the original Book; and observe, by the way, what Faults the bare mis-pointing is capable to occasion.

(3) Meursius, Athen. Batav. pag. 253.

[B] He

- Humfred.* He accepted of the latter [B], and by this means became Professor of the Oriental Languages at the Age of Twenty two Years. He taught them four Years at Oxford with great Success. After which, being desirous to see his native Country again, he went thither, and studied the Civil-Law at Louvain. The Troubles on account of Religion obliged him to return to his Father at London: but the Pacification of Ghent (c) brought both Father and Son back again to their own Country; the latter turned his Thoughts towards Holland and soon found there a Professorship of the Oriental Languages (d). While he was discharging the Function of it at Leyden, he resolved to marry. In 1580 he married a Gentlewoman of Ghent, who was more than half a Convert [C], and after her Marriage was fully instructed in the Reformed Religion. The Pension, Drusus received in Holland, not being sufficient for the Necessities of his Family, he gave People to understand, that he should accept a better Settlement elsewhere if it was offered him (e). The Prince of Orange being informed that he had in a manner put himself up to the best Bidder, writ to the Magistrates of Leyden not to part with such a Man. However he got from them. They suffered him to go to Friesland, whither he had been invited to be Hebrew Professor in the University of Franker. He was installed there in the Month of June 1585, and discharged the Duties of his Place with great Glory to his Death, which happened the twelfth of February (f) 1616 (g). It is certain he was well skilled in the Hebrew [D], and had acquired great insight into the Jewish Antiquities, and the Text of the Old Testament. This appears by several Books he published [E]. His Capacity in this Respect was so well known, that he was ordered to work upon those Subjects, and paid for it by the States General [F]. They had designed that he should make a new Translation of the Bible into the Dutch Tongue
- (c) It was made in 1576.
- (d) The Year 1577.
- (e) Quoniam vero familiam ex tam puro stipendio, quod annuatim numerabatur, alere nequit hic noster, alio cogitare incipit, suique fruenti, si legitime vocetur, spem facere. Ab-1 Curiander in Vita Drusii, pag. 8.
- (f) Old Style.
- (g) Taken from his Life, written by Abel Curiander, his Son-in-law.

- [B] He had an Invitation to Cambridge . . . and Oxford . . . he accepted the latter. That is Oxford: correct then a Fault of Paul Freber, who says in his Theatre of illustrious Men (4), Hebraeae Linguae Professor in Universitate Cantuariensi an. aetatis 22 constitutus est. Two Faults for one. It is false that Drusus was Professor at Cambridge, and it is false that the University of Cambridge is called Canteruariensis. This last word is the Adjective of Canterbury. [C] He married a young Woman of Ghent, who was more than half a Convert. Her Name was Mary Vander Varent: she chose rather to renounce her Country, and her Estate, than her Religion, and was exceeding charitable to the poor. I think she died in the Year 1599 (5). 'Hec cum in Flandria virgo, gustum melioris puriorisque doctrinae percepisset, conjux in Hollandia ita in illa confirmata est, ut citius bonis luculentissimis privari, deque civitate & patria, quam de sententia sua dimoveri potuerit. Præter alia, hoc de illa referunt, quod in exhaustis in Pauperes fuerit benignitatis, qui unanimi & consona voce Frankeræ clamitant, cum ejus mentio incidit: Erat illa parens & mater unica regis, et omni adversitatis solamen (6). — Before her Marriage, she was in Flanders; imbibed the Principles of a better and a purer Religion, wherein, after her Marriage, she was in Holland so confirmed; that she chose rather to renounce an ample Fortune, and her Country, than her Religion. Amongst other things it is related of her, that she was an inexhausted Source of Charity, and that the poor of Franker, on the mention of her Name, cry out with one accord, she was their only tender Parent in their Want, and place in their Distress. He had three Children by this Marriage: a Daughter, who was born at Leyden the Twenty second of March 1582, and was married in 1604 to Abel Curiander, who published the Life of his Father-in-law (7): another Daughter, who was born at Franker the first of April 1587, and was married the Twenty ninth of May 1608 to Abraham Valkins; and a Son, who was born the Twenty sixth of June 1588. I shall speak of him hereafter. The second Daughter died at Ghent, the twelfth of November 1612, where he had been upon Business. A Priest, knowing her to be dangerously sick, came to her to take her Confession, and administer the holy Unction to her; but she sent him away, and her Husband had almost beat him. It was with great Charge and Danger that they got the Body of the deceased transported to Zeland; for at Ghent they threatened to deny it a Burial (8). [D] It is certain he was well skilled in the Hebrew. To show that I speak without Hyperbole, I shall cite an unexceptionable Author. Drusus, who holds the seventh Rank among those Critics (9), ought to be preferred, in my Opinion, before all others; for besides that he was learned in the Hebrew Tongue, and could himself consult the Jewish Writers, he had read with great exactness the ancient Greek Translators; so that he had formed a better Idea of the sacred Language, than the other Critics, who only apply themselves to the reading of the Rabbies. To which it may be added, that he had also read the Works of St Jerom, and some other Fathers. In a word, Drusus is the most learned, and most judicious of all the Critics, who are in that Collection (10). [E] He published several Books. Those who have his Life will find in it an exact List of all that he published, and of all that he designed for the Press: those who have it not will do well to consult Meursius (11). It is impossible to consider the Labour of this learned Man without Astonishment: he revised, corrected, and enlarged, before his Death, all the Books he had published (12), and had composed several New Treatises, and prepared many Additions for Works which came from other hands, which would have been more considerable than the Works themselves. Sequuntur libri à D. Drusio quamplurimis additamentis aucti, adeo quoque ut si recudendi essent cum additamentis istis, à Drusio potius quam ab Authoribus nomen tracturi essent (13). — Now follow the Books which Drusus so much enlarged, that if they were to be published with his Additions, they ought rather to take their Names from him, than from their Authors. [F] He was ordered to work. . . . and was paid by the States General. In 1600 the States General ordered him to make Notes on the most difficult places of the Old Testament, and promised him an annual Pension of 400 Florins for some Years. They wrote a Letter to the States of the Province of Friesland the eighteenth of May 1601, desiring them to dispense with Drusus in all Business which might be a hindrance to this Work. In quibus (Literis) humanissime petunt, Drusius ut omnibus illis oneribus & incommodis eximatur, quæ opus illud Reipub. Christianæ maxime profuturum ullo modo impedire possent (14). As soon as this Letter was read, the Deputies of the States of Friesland discharged Drusus from all Academical Functions, allowing him to put another in his place for the ordinary Lectures, and paid an Amanuensis for him. He demanded his Dismission in the Year 1603; but they refused it, among other reasons, because many Strangers were drawn by his Reputation to the University of Franker. (15). He worked upon Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, upon the eighteen first Chapters of Numbers, and particularly upon the most difficult places in the Pentateuch, the Book of Josua, the Book of Judges, the Books of Samuel: he worked, I say, in obedience to the Orders of the States General; but he could get nothing of all this printed, and was often disturbed in the Execution of those Orders (16). [G] They
- (4) Pag. 1510.
- (5) Among the Letters of the Arminians there is a Letter from Arminius. It is the 147th, dated in May, 1599, wherein he concedes with Drusus upon the Death of his Wife.
- (6) Curiander in Vita Drusii, pag. 7, 8.
- (7) Ibid. pag. 8.
- (8) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.
- (9) That is, among those which were printed in England in the Work intitled, Critica Sacra.
- (10) Faler Simon, Hilscie Critique de Vieux Testament. lib. 1, cap. 14, pag. 443.
- (11) In Athen. Batavis.
- (12) Antedictorum nullum esse librum qui postrema Authoris cura non sit factus melior aut auctor. Curiander in Vita Drusii, pag. 20.
- (13) Idem. pag. 26, 27.
- (14) Ibid. pag. 24.
- (15) Ibid. pag. 24.
- (16) Ibid. pag. 23, 24.

Tongue [G]; but there were some People that laboured with Success to get him excluded. He kept up a great Correspondence by Letters with learned Men [H], by whom he was informed of the Esteem they had for his Works, and was continually exhorted by them to labour for the public Good. He had need of this Consolation (b); for he had many Enemies by his side, who threw a thousand Rubs in his way [I], and cruelly attacked his Reputation. Whether through Modesty, or a Freedom from Prejudice, he was more reserved than others in condemning or applauding; for which reason they discredited him as a bad Protestant [K]. What he answered deserves to be considered

(b) See the Remark [M].

(17) This is a Body which represents the States of the Province when they are not assembled.

(18) Curlander in Vita Drusii, pag. 12.

(19) Ib. pag. 13.

[G] They had designed that he should make a New Translation of the Bible into the Dutch Tongue. The Deputies of the States of Friesland (17) sent him a Commission in 1596 to go upon this Version, together with the Sieur de Sainte Aldegonde and some others. A great many learned Men thought him very fit for this Work, and recommended him earnestly to the States (18). It will not be amiss to see what the Sieur de Sainte Aldegonde wrote to him concerning it in the Year 1594 (19): 'De Bibliorum versione, quæ est, quam ad Ordines Belgii commemoras sententia, et si video te gravibus commotum rationibus, non possum tamen assentiri. Ego enim nostram hanc, quæ vulgo manibus teritur versionem ejusmodi esse existimo, quæ planè novas lucubrationes, novumque penitus opus requirat. Inter omnes autem omnium versiones ego ingenuè fatebor, mihi visam esse nullam tanto abesse ab Ebraica veritate intervallo, atque sit Lutheri versio à qua manavit nostra: ex vitiosa Germanica facta vitiosior Belgico-Teutonica. De quo si nobis liceat aliquando familiariter conferre, pro heremæ duxerim. Id vero vehementer doleo, plebsque nostris homines in me videri oculos defixisse qui satis intelligam quanta mihi. Itaque velim Ecclesiæ nostras, quod ego multis etiam suasi, in te respicere, tibi que hanc demandare provinciam. Idque si id tibi non ingratum fore intelligam, ero illis author quantum potero, etsi video nihil dum eos certi statuisse. De quo si tuum mihi animum aperueris, facies gratum. — Though I find the Opinion which you have delivered to the States, concerning the Version of the Bible, has some weighty Reasons to support it, yet I cannot come into it. For I look upon the common Version to be such as demands a thorough Revision, or rather an entire new Work. Amongst all the Versions I have met with, I will ingenuously confess that I have seen none that differs so widely from the true Hebrew, as that of Luther, from which ours took its Rise, and from a very erroneous High Dutch one, it made a much more erroneous Low Dutch one. Might I freely declare my Sentiments, on this Subject, I should move for a new Translation. But it is not without great Uneasiness, I observe, that many seem to have fixed their Eyes upon me for this Purpose: I am too well acquainted with my own Inability for such a Task. Wherefore I would advise our Churches, and have already persuaded some of them, to give the Commission to you. If I understand the Office well not to be disagreeable to you, I will promote it to the utmost of my Power, though I do not find they have yet come to any certain Resolution. You would oblige me by giving me your Sentiments upon the Matter.' This Passage bears hard upon Luther's Translation, and still harder upon that which the Churches of the Low-Countries made use of that time. Mr Simon could not have said worse of it (20). I see in the Letters of the Arminians (21), that Arminius and Uytenbogaard recommended Drusius, both for the Commission which had been given him by the States-General in 1600, and also for the new Version; but their Offices were doubtless prejudicial to him, with respect to this last Affair. Probably they believed that, since they judged him fit for it, he was not really so. However it be, I have read in those Letters (22), that, in one of the Synods of Holland, an Act was passed by which he was excluded, not only from the Translation, but also from the revising of what should be translated.

[H] He kept up a great Correspondence by Letters with learned Men. Besides the Letters which he received in Hebrew, Greek, French, English, and Flemish, he received 2300 in Latin, which were found among his Papers (23).

[I] Many Enemies . . . threw a thousand Rubs in his way. The Synodal Act, I have already mentioned, concerning the Translation of the Bible, was made on purpose to exclude our Drusius. Tu quidem illius folius excludendi causa decretum factum esse prudenter animadvertetas, sed juvenis viginti annorum hoc ex ore Roggii aperte est professus, ignarus proculdubio quo loco Drusius apud me esset (24). — You rightly observed indeed, that this Decree was made on purpose to exclude him; but a young Gentleman of twenty openly declared it to be at the Instigation of Roggius, little imagining in what esteem I held Drusius. He wrote, with his own Hand, at the end of his Commentary upon Genesis, with what Violence he was opposed in the Execution of the Orders that the States-General had given him: These are his Words. Absoluta fuit hæc in Genesis commentatio undecimo Aprilis scilicet veteri anno Christi 1602, quam aggressus eram biennio ante auspiciis illustrium Ordinum Generalium Provinciarum Federatarum, procurantibus hoc negotium Johanne Wytenbogaard, Jacobo Arminio, Jacobo Basilio, aliisque verbi divini Precatoribus, non tam facundis quam doctis ac piis, veritatique ac solidæ doctrinæ studiosissimis. Deus illis & mihi largiatur; illis premium quale merentur, mihi otium & bonam valetudinem, ut possim in cæteros libros similia præstare. Quod futurum puto ex usu Ecclesiæ Orthodoxæ, quam amo ac veneror, ut contra odi Ecclesiam errantium & imperitorum, quorum illi familiam ducunt qui me in hoc opere non semel turbant. Deus illis condonet, cui laus & gloria in ævum (25). — This Comment upon Genesis was finished the eleventh of April, Old Style, in the Year 1602; which I entered upon two Years before, under the Direction of the High and Mighty States-General of the United Provinces, and at the Intercession of John Wytenbogaard, James Arminius, James Basilius, and other Ministers of GOD's Word, Men equally distinguished by their Love of Truth, and sound Doctrine, as by their Learning and Eloquence. May it please GOD to bestow on them those good things which they deserve, and on me Health and Opportunity, whereby I may be enabled to proceed in the same manner with the rest of the Books. Which I hope will be of service to the Orthodox Church, which I love and reverence, as, on the contrary, I hate that of the blind and mistaken, the Leaders of which have more than once interrupted me in the Prosecution of this Work: may they find Pardon of GOD, to whom be Glory for ever and ever. At last he grew out of all Patience: He wrote something against his Persecutors; for I doubt not he called them so, but I never saw what it was: I only know he wrote something by the following Quotation out of his Life (26). Drusii ad Abelum Curlanderum generum suum Epistola, in qua agitur de vehementia qua usus fuit in Epistola sua ad Fratres Belgas. Item Speculum Theologorum misologorum ex Erasmo. — Drusius's Letter to Abel Curlander, his Son-in-law, wherein he speaks of the heat which appeared in his Letter to his Brethren in Holland. Also the Misologist's Looking Glass from Erasmus.

VOL. II. N^o. LIII.

[K] He was reserved in condemning or applauding, for which reason they discredited him as a bad Protestant. He was not a Man who pronounced magistrally in Matters of Divinity; This is Heretical; That is Orthodox. He meddled with nothing but Grammar, often declaring that, if he was in an Error, he was at least free from Heresy, because he was not obstinate, but ready to yield to good Advice, and that he submitted all his Works and Person to the Judgment of the Catholic Religion. Tenuis mea scientia versatur tota circa Grammaticam & Historiam (v. scilicet) Dogmata fidei aliis me doctioribus tractanda relinquo. . . . Pertinacia facit hæreticum, non simplex error, nam humanum est errare, humani autem à me nihil alienum scio. Monitus non ero pertinax, nec unquam fui. Olim professus sum quod nunc iterum repeto, me mea omnia subicere judicio Ecclesiæ (27). — My small Sphere of Knowledge takes (24) Arminius ad Uytenbogaard, Epist. 52, præf. ac erudit. Virotum, pag. 102.

(25) Curlander in Vita Drusii, pag. 23.

(26) Pag. 26, 27.

(27) Drusius, in Libro de Hæresibus, pag. 22, apud Curlander, pag. 21.

(20) See, above, the Remark [B] of the Article A M A N A.

(21) See Letters 47, 48, 49, 50, 61, folio Edition.

(22) In the 53d.

(23) Curlander, in Vita Drusii, pag. 11.

considered [L]: but it did not hinder him from groaning under his hard Fate [M]. His Son (28) In Tetragrammato, pag. 81, apud Curiandrum. ibid.

in only Grammar and (sacred) History. I leave Points of Faith to be canvassed by able Heads. Positiveness, not simple Error, makes the Heretic; Error is entailed on all Mankind. I never professed Infallibility. On Conviction I always did, and always will, submit: I will repeat a Declaration I formerly made, I submit myself, and my ALL to the Judgment of the Church.

In another place he says (28): 'Non sum Theologus: an Grammatici nomen, quod aliquando mihi probe obiectum, tueri possum nescio. Amici quos nostri negant, ego non contradico. Quid igitur es, inquires? Christianus sum, $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\iota\alpha\lambda\eta\varsigma$ sum, qui scribendo proficio, & proficiendo scribo. — I am no Divine; I do not know whether I can defend my Title to the Name of a Grammarian, which has sometimes with scorn been given me. My Friends, you know, I say I cannot. I do not say I can. What are you then? I say you: I am a Christian, and a Lover of Truth, who improve by writing, and write by improving.' I shall only add these words: 'Quod superest, scripsi hæc animo juvandi, non lædendi. Si læsi quempiam jam nunc poenitet. Si offendi pias aures, monitus libenter mutabo. Si erravi uspiam, monstretur mihi error: Non ero pertinax. Denique provoco ad iudicium Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, cui me meaque omnia

(29) Hæc & alia que hoc libro continentur ut & in aliis omnibus à me unquam editis aut edendis subijcio libens Ecclesiæ Catholicæ iudicio, à cuius recto sensu si dissentio non ero pertinax. — Wrote: or I have hitherto published, or whatever I shall publish hereafter, I freely submit to the Judgment of the Catholic Church, from the true sense of which should I differ, I will innoceently retract. Thus he speaks in the Preface of his Enchiridion, apud Curiandrum, pag. 22.

(30) In Libro Prætoritum, pag. 454, apud eundem. pag. 22.

(31) Scaliger is mistaken: Drusus left Louvain in 1567, at seventeen Years of Age, and never returned after that but for some few Months in the beginning of 1576: this is plain by his Life.

(32) It would not have been una fidelis dux parietes deserte, but deturpare & conjurcare.

of the Reformed Church brings them in a great Revenue, free of all Taxes; they enjoy a kind of Papacy, Praises, Honours, Flattery, mean Submissions from the People: they would lose all these Advantages if they forsook that Profession; and they never leave charging with indifference, and furiously persecuting upon that account, many Persons who are ruined, as to this World, by the very same Profession: A Profession which gives them nothing, but deprives them of a hundred Advantages they might procure by forsaking it. I make this Remark, that it may be seen how much Ages and Nations resemble one another. This will shew whether I have ill translated the following Latin Passages I have borrowed from Drusus. 'Sparserunt de me rumorem vanissimum, summa est me alienum esse ab hac Religione. Quid dicam? Post natam calumniam non fuit unquam major calumnia. Egone alienus à religione, cujus causa pater meus p. m. amisit anno 67. octodecim millia florenorum? Quum autem exularet Londini una mecum, habebat penes se libras Flandricas, quas majores vocant, mille quingentas. Ex illis mille quadringentas impendit in causam publicam. Princeps Auricius partem accepit, aliam Ordines Hollandiæ & Zelandiæ, tertiam pauperes, qui religionis ergo in Angliam confugerant. Centum quæ resabant postliminio revertisse retuli domum. Quod dico vero verius est. Idem propriis sumptibus me aluit in studiis. A publico nihil unquam accepi. Quum Professorem agerem Leidæ, stipendium erat tam parvum, ut coactus fuissim ex meo impendere quotannis trecentos, aliquando quadringentos. Habeo in Flandria redditus non poenitendos quibus frui possem si essem in patria. Quorum ista, inquires? Nempe ut scias vanum esse quod æmulis mei sperarunt, qui omnes simul tantam jacturam non fecerunt, quantam ego solus feci, quos hæc religio divites, ut me pauperem fecit, quem nunc contemnunt propterea, optime de ipsis meritum (33). — They have spread a very idle report concerning me, the substance whereof is, that I am an Enemy to their Religion. I am Enemy to that Religion, for the sake of which my Father in the Year 67 lost eighteen thousand Florins? Who, after he was banished, and with me, at London had in his own Possession fifteen hundred Flanders Livres. Fourteen hundred of which he spent in the common Cause. The Prince of Orange had one part, the States of Holland and Zealand another, and the poor, who had fled into England for their Religion, a third. What I say is undeniable. The hundred, which remained, at my return, I brought with me home. He maintained me in my Studies at his own charge. I never received any thing from the Public. When I was Professor at Leyden, my Salary was so small, that I was obliged to spend three hundred, sometimes four hundred, Florins of my own. I have in Flanders a considerable Revenue, which I might enjoy, were I in my own Country. Why all this? You will say. Only to prove that what my Enemies have advanced has no Foundation. They have not all, taken together, suffered so much as I alone, but grow rich by that Religion, by which I am grown poor, and despise me, though I have deserved well of them.

[M] . . . Did not hinder him from groaning under his hard Fate.] Thus he writes in the Letter I have just quoted. 'Jam nunc experior verum esse illud; homo homini Deus: sed & alii me docuerunt verum esse, homo homini lupus. Per eos injecta remora de qua scribis. . . . Tantam experior hominum ingratitude, ut propemodum in animo sit edita prole Machabæorum posthac quiescere. — Now, I find, by Experience, the Truth of this Saying, Man is to Man a God; but others taught me the Truth of another, Man is to Man a Wolf. The delays you complain of were occasioned by them. I have met with such Instances of Ingratitude, that I could almost resolve, after publishing the Genealogy of the Maccabees, to sit still for the future.' Must not so great an Author be sensibly affected with the Persecutions he was exposed to, when his grief prompted him to condemn his Pen to an eternal Sterility. One Passage more will furnish us with several fine Reflexions of Drusus (34). 'Turbæ bones nostri nunc quiescent, aut pudet eos preteritorum, aut expectant occasionem novam. Mihi quidem

(33) Drusus, Epistola ad Franciscum Casticum, dated the sixth of February 1560, apud Curiandrum, in sua Vita, pag. 34.

(34) In a Letter dated December 21, 1599, apud Curiandrum, pag. 32.

Son would have been a Prodigy of Learning if he had enjoyed a longer Life [N]. Scaliger speaks well of him; Scaliger, I say, who otherwise was very abusive to our Drusus [O]: for what can be said more bitter and shocking against a Professor of the Holy Language, than that his House is a Brothel. Drusus had a Disciple that succeeded him, and defended his Memory against those who charged him with leaning towards Arianism (i): he also took care of the Manuscripts and Daughter of the deceased [P]. Mr Boffuet, Bishop

(i) See the Text of the Article AMAMA, between the Citations (f) and (g). of

* quidem multis de causis quies non solum optatissima est, sed etiam necessaria. Sed si hanc personam Deus humanæ fabulæ choragus mihi imposuit, partes delegatas oportet agam. In hac arena mihi video moriendum esse, nam ut viri isti quiescant nihil est spei. In eo toti sunt ut me aut latronibus objiciant, aut amore confectum occidant. Sed bacenus gratia Dei, nec animum à suo proposito labefactare poterunt, nec studii mei ita multum detrimentum attulerunt. Consolatur me primum conscientia recte factorum, deinde favor doctorum & bonorum virorum, quos hactenus æquissimos habui erga labores meos. Quod partim Literis, partim donis ac muneribus declarant. . . . Quis unquam in sole ambulavit absque umbra, quis insignem virtutem exercuit sine invidia? quis bonas literas professus est cum aliqua fama, absque odio Theologorum; Capnio, Erasmus, Arias, Hieronymus experti sunt. Hunc postremum Romæ expulsum, cum Bethlehem in tuguriolo degeret, ne sic quidem latentem effugit invidia. Ex præsens Sapientibus quidam interrogatus, quid ageret? Nihil, inquit, nondum enim mihi invidetur. Regium est, cum benefeceris audire malè, inquit ille. Et profecto ita est, Industria parit virtutem, virtus gloriam, gloria invidiam, qui morbus ferè peculiaris est iis, qui aliqui pietatem profitentur, cum nihil sit alienius à vera pietate. Obrepat enim hæc pestis pietatis imagine, dum videri vult virtutum odium, ac virtutis zelus. . . .

The Storm is now blown over; they are either ashamed of what is past, or wait a fresh Opportunity. To me Rest is on many accounts, not only the most desirable, but even necessary. But if God has designed me this Part on the Stage of Life, I must act it, and die in the Performance; for there is but little hope, that they will ever be quiet. It is their sole aim to expose me to Ruffians, or murder me piece-meal with Grief. But thanks be to God, hitherto they have neither been able to divert my Mind from it's purpose, nor done any considerable Injury to my Studies. The Confidence of well doing is my chief Comfort; and the favour of the learned World my next, which they have partly testified by Letters, and partly by Presents. . . . Who can walk in the Sun without a Shade? who was ever truly great, and yet unenvied? who ever distinguished himself in good Learning, without drawing down upon himself the hatred of Divines? Capnio, Erasmus, Arias, and Jerom, have found it too true. The last, after his Banishment from Rome, was haunted by Envy in his Cottage at Bethlehem. One of the old Sages, being asked what he did, answered, Nothing, for that Envy had not yet marked him out: It is, says he, something noble to be ill spoken of for good Actions. It is indeed true, Industry is the Mother of Merit, Merit of Glory, Glory of Envy, which is a Disease inherent in those who make a profession of Piety, tho' nothing be more contrary to true Piety. For this Pestilence steals upon Men under the disguise of Piety, and would pass for an Aversion to Vice, and a Zeal for Virtue.

[N] His Son would have been a Prodigy, if he had lived longer. I have already said that he was born in the Year 1588. His Name was JOHN DRUSIUS, as well as his Father's. He began at five Years of Age to learn the Latin and Hebrew Languages; at seven Years he explained the Hebrew Psalter so exactly, that a Jew, who taught Arabic at Leyden, could not see it without Admiration. At nine Years, he could read the Hebrew without Points, and add the Points where they ought to be, according to the Rules of Grammar; which is more than the Rabbins can do now. He spoke Latin as well as his Mother Tongue, and could make himself understood in English. At twelve Years, he would write extempore in Prose and Verse, according to the Manner of the Hebrews. At seventeen, he harangued the King of Great Britain, in Latin, in the midst of all his Court, and was admired by the whole Company. He had a lively Wit, and solid judgment, a great Memory, and an indefatigable ardour for Study. He was also of an agreeable Temper, and made himself much beloved. He had noble Inclinations, and was of a singular Piety. He died of the Stone in England, at Twenty one Years of Age, at the House of William Thomas Dean of Chester, who allowed him a very good Pension. He left divers Works, many Hebrew Letters, and Verses, and Notes, in the same Tongue, on the Proverbs of Solomon. He had begun to put into Latin the Itinerary of Benjamin de Tudela, and the Chronicle of the second Temple, and he had ranged, according to the alphabetical Order, the Nomenclator of Elias Levita, to which he added the Greek Words which were not in the first Edition (35). Joseph Scaliger says, (36) that Drusus's Son knew more of Hebrew than his Father.

[O] Scaliger . . . was very abusive to our Drusus. These are some touches of the Character he draws of him. He has an ill Reputation; for he is a Whore-monger, and his Daughter is a Whore, and his House is a Brothel. He knew more of it than Dujin, Drusus has a mean Judgment; he understands nothing but his Grammar: he does not know so much as Serrarius, excepting in his Hebrew Grammar. . . . Drusus Lipsii simius habet miram latinitatem, non latine scribit. --- Drusus apertè Lipsii's Latinity, but cannot write Latin. Drusus is nothing in comparison of Buxtorf. He has taught Grammar these thirty Years, and knows nothing besides it, & mirum esset nisi sciret optime. Ego bene scio quid sit Drusus, est doctus in Grammaticis & in textu Hebræo. . . . Drusus non est doctus licet se putet esse doctissimum. --- And it were a wonder if he were not a perfect Master of it. I know what Drusus is. He is well versed in Grammar, and in the Hebrew Text . . . but he is not learned, though he thinks himself very learned.

[P] Drusus had a Disciple . . . who took care of the Manuscripts, and Daughter of the deceased. See the Letter which Sixtinus Amama wrote, the third of December 1626, to Gaspar Barlaeus (37), to desire him to prevail upon a considerable Person, to whom they designed to dedicate the twelve lesser Prophets of Drusus, to accept the Dedication. Amama observes, that eight of those twelve Prophets had been published long before, but that the four others had never been made public: he represents to Barlaeus the miserable Condition Drusus's only Daughter was reduced to, who had been five Years Curiander's Widow: he adds that having published several of Drusus's Works, he had always dedicated them to some charitable Mecenas, who, by some small Present, had relieved the indigence of that Woman, for which Reason he begs Barlaeus to get that Man of Figure to accept of the Epistle Dedicatory, telling him the Widow would be contented with a little, and that fifty Florins would make her happy. Ago causam viduæ pauperulæ quæ nunc cum bonæ mentis sorore strenue luctatur. Ea est filia unica Cl. Drusii quam D. Havelius Curiander ante annos quinque reliquit viduam. Ex MS. parentis ejus b. mem. multa nunc publici juris feci, quævisque illis ejusmodi Mecæneses qui aliquo præmiolo ejus pauperiorem iuverunt sublevatum. . . . Non expectabit magnam remunerationem: si quinquaginta florenos vel daletos simplices obtinuerit, beatam se judicabit. Hæc eo dico ut videas & intelligas quam angusta res sit hujus feminae, vel propter parentem meliori fortuna dignæ, & quam fit exiguum quod illa expectat (38). --- I plead the poor Widow's Cause, who struggles nobly with Poverty. She is the only Daughter of the Great Drusus, and was left a Widow by Curiander about five Years ago. I have published several of her Father's MSS, and endeavoured to find out such Patrons, as might relieve her Necessity with some small Present. . . . She does not expect much, but would think herself happy in a Present of fifty Florins. I mention this to let you see the narrow Circumstances of one, who, for her father's sake, deserved a better Fortune, and

(35) Taken from the Preface of John Drusus ad lib. 10, Prætorum. The Account he gives of all this is curious: we find these Words in it. Quod si vite ei longior contigerit, & ad justam ætatem pergere potuisset, dicam præfatione (absit verbo invidia) fuisset interpres literarum sacrarum eximius, qualem fortasse orbis Christianus alium non habuisset. --- Had he been favoured with a longer Life, had he arrived to Maturity of Age, I may with boldness affirm, he would have been an eminent Interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, and such a one as perhaps the Christian World could not have equalled.

This young Man deserves a Place in the second Edition of Mr Barlet's Enfans Célèbres.

(36) In Scaligerian. pag. m. 68.

(37) It is the 44th among those of the Arminians, pag. 723, folio Edition.

(38) Sixt. Amama, pag. 723.

of Meaux, took advantage of a thing he had read in Drusus concerning the Pope's Mitre [Q]. A Jesuit, who pretended to criticize our Drusus [R], has only exposed himself to Censure.

'and what a trifle it is she hopes for.' What Pity, that an Author's only daughter should be reduced to so great Poverty, when the Children of so many Blockheads roll about in Coaches! Sic visum numini.

[Q] Mr Bessuet . . . took Advantage of a thing he had read in Drusus, concerning the Pope's Mitre. I shall first set down the Passage of the Bishop of Meaux, with all that belongs to it, summary Quotations, &c. and then make some Reflexions upon it. He says (39): 'It would not be worth while to take Notice here of a story which is current among the Protestants, if their deplorable Credulity did not make them take every thing for true, that their People tell them. The English Critics have inserted among their Remarks, that a Man worthy of Credit had told Mr de Montmorenci, when he was at Rome, that the Pontifical Tiara had written in the front of it, in letters of Gold, MYSTERIUM, but that, now, they had altered that Inscription. Mr Jurieu adopts this Story which is very fit to deceive simple People, and sets it off with these magnificent Terms. It is not without a particular Providence, that God permitted the Popes formerly to bear this Word MYSTERIUM, written upon their Mitre. Joseph Scaliger, and divers others, have attested that they have seen some of the old Mitres that had that Word written upon them.'

(39) The Bishop of Meaux's Averment for l'Explication de l'Apocalypse, n. 6, pag. 319. Edit. of Holland.

A RIDICULOUS Story of Scaliger, contemned by Drusus, a Protestant, and adopted by Mr Jurieu, a Minister.

Crit. ad cap. 17, v. Tom. 7 col. pag. 858, Preleg. I. Part. cap. 7, pag. 121.

Critic. ad cap. 17, v. Tom. 7, pag. 4857.

This artful Minister adds of his own Head, that Scaliger had seen it: we have just now seen, that what is written on it, is only hearsay, and without any certain Author. Drusus, a Protestant Author, agrees to this, and acknowledges that what Scaliger says of it, is upon the credit of another. Nay, he makes light of this little Story; requiring better Proof, and better Evidence for it. They might look long enough before they find it: it is Invention, in nubibus; but Mr Jurieu will lose nothing, and believes every thing that makes ever so little against the Pope.

It is very unjust to insult a whole Body of Men, upon pretence that some Authors among them discover Signs of a little too much Prejudice. The Bishop of Meaux ought to have considered this; this is my first Reflexion. A Man does a great injury to his own Party, without Doors, by employing, in it's Defence, all sorts of Reasons, good or bad, without ever retracting what has been once said. But this Conduct is far from being against the interest within Doors; it nourishes Prejudices, and Confidence, in the Minds of the People, and inspires them with the Passions of those who dispute. These People take great care of making any steps from which any Advantage may be taken against them, by their own Party, never divestling themselves of the right of alledging this or that, such or such Pretensions. This multiplies their Writings; this animates and warms them. It is not for the temporal Interest of any Communion, that all the Members of it should be Men of Judgment. Passionate People, who follow only a Spirit of Faction, humanly speaking, do a thousand good Services; therefore it is beneficial to them to have some of these infatuated Agents among them; It is a necessary Evil. This is my second Reflexion. It must not be thought that, in a great Body, learned Men of Drusus's Character are so scarce, as they seem to be. All that can be said is, that few will expose themselves to rash Judgments; most Men of Reason and Temper, observing that the rash and forward carry away the Acclamations and favour of the Multitude, let them alone, and sometimes swim with the Stream, in order to live in quiet and free from Suspicion. If they are privately asked, why do you not write as Drusus did? they will fetch their Answer from an Apologue.

Quod si me populus Romanus forte roget, cur,
Non, ut porticibus, sic iudiciis fruar iisdem;
Nec sequar aut fugiam quæ diligit ipse, vel odit:
Olim quod vulpes ægrotæ cauta leoni,
Respondit, referam: Quia me vestigia terrent
Omnia te adversum spectantia nulla retrorsum (40).

(40) Morat. Epist. I, lib. 1, v. 70.

Should the Crowd ask, why, since I live in Town,
Walk the same Streets with them, I do not own

The same Opinions, why I don't approve,
And baste the same Things, which they baste and love?
My answer must be what fly Reynard said
To the old sickly Lyon, I am afraid,
Great King of Beasts, for all the treats I see
Are to thy Den, none back; that frightens me.

CREECH.

This is my third Reflexion: my fourth and last is this. I shall not examine whether our Drusus ought to have been silent upon this particular thing mentioned by the Bishop of Meaux; but I will venture to say, it was better to do as he did, than to quote the Testimony of Scaliger unfaithfully. This could not have been done with impunity at the Bar; for there is not a much greater difference between false Money and good, than between a hearsay Witness, and an eye Witness. So that Scaliger, who was an Evidence by hearsay, ought not to have been brought as an ocular Evidence by Mr Jurieu.

This dispute between a Bishop and a Minister has given Birth to several Writings, published in Germany: a Divine of the Ausburg Confession undertook to prove, that the Bishop of Meaux was wrong in denying, that the word Mysterium was formerly inscribed upon the Papal Tiara. He published a Work divided into two Parts. The first is intitled Mysterium in Pontificis Romani corona apertum: the second is Mysterium in corona Pontificis opertum & remotum. In the first he has collected together as many Proofs as he could find, and in the second he inquires in what manner, and for what Reasons, the said Inscription was taken away. A Doctor of Philology, named John Lewis Hanneman, answered this Divine in a Book he published at Hamburgh, in the Year 1698, under the Title of Mysterium Papali coronæ adscriptum non ens, seu Commentarius in caput XVII Apocalypsis v. 5 quo demonstratur Papali coronæ mysterion nunquam fuisse inscriptum. In which he does two Things. 1. He confutes all the Arguments of his Adversary. 2. He alleges divers Proofs to shew that That Inscription was never upon the Pontifical Tiara (41).

[R] A Jesuit, who has pretended to criticize Drusus, has only exposed himself to Censure.] Father Garasse having affirmed (42) that Charron 'wanted common Sense in making such ridiculous Comparisons (43), adds that this 'puts him in mind of three Men, very absurd in their manner of acting: the first was the Emperor Heliogabalus, who . . . in his greatest Entertainments, mixed Horledung among his choicest Dishes . . . the second was the Emperor Alexander Severus . . . who placed Jesus CHRIST, among the Images of Apollonius Tyanæus, Orpheus, Abraham, . . . in fine, the third may be the Minister Drusus, who in his Centuries upon the holy Scripture, is as unhappy in his Quotations of Authors, as Charron in his Catalogue of great Persons: for he commonly quotes half a dozen Writers in this Manner: Isaiab at his second Chapter, Plautus in Amphytrio, St Luke in the Acts of the Apostles, Ovid in the Book de Remedio Amoris: St John Chrysostom in his Homilies upon Genesis, Horace in his Book de arte Poetica. Not that we should rigorously abstain from citing prophane Authors, or not commend, in the great Men of the Age, the valuable Gifts they have received from God: but what I cannot digest, is, such a strange jumbling of Persons as this, Socrates, Jesus Christ, Papian, the Martyrs, St John, Plautus, Jeremiab, Aristenetus, St Augustin, Ovid; for in these Alternations, there is something prophane, as well as a want of Judgment. It might easily be shewn, that this Critic, who accuses others so much of want of Judgment, says nothing here, but what convinces us of his own want of it: but I shall confine myself to what relates to Drusus. His Censurer calls him Drusus, and makes a Minister of him: so that he was ignorant both of the Name and Profession of the Man he pretends to criticize; for Drusus was no Minister, and we have seen before (44), that he declared he meddled with nothing but Grammar and History, leaving the Doctrines of the Faith to others, and that he was no Divine. Mr Baillet (45) reports, that he was so confident of his own Merit, that he gave himself

(41) Taken from the Utrecht Journal for November and December, 1698, pag. 854, and following.

(42) Garasse, Somme Theologique, pag. 847, 848.

(43) That is naming together Socrates, Phocion, Seneca, Regulus, Jesus Christ, the Martyrs.

(44) In the Remark [K], Citat. (27).

(45) Baillet. Jugem. des Scavans, Tom. IV, pag. 226.

(47) In the Remarks [K].

(47) De quo supra COLONIES Citat. (30).

(48) In Remarks [K] Citat. (38).

himself the Title of divine Grammarian. I have put this in the Margin (46) in the first Edition of this Dictionary, and I added, that I would desire to know where this was to be found. Mr de la Roque (47) was pleased to write me word that he had read it in Serrarius's Tribaresium. Not having that Book by me, I have recourse to Conjectures: I imagine then that Serrarius advanced that, upon the credit of some Adversary of Drusus, and without a literal Proof taken from the Writings of that Author. Be that as it will, we have seen (48), Drusus declared publicly that he knew not whether he ought to assume the Title of Grammarian, which some have reproached him with, and that some People say he ought not, whom he would not contradict: this is a Modesty very opposite to the Pride charged on him by Mr Baillet. But let us return to Father Garasse, and say, that his Censure is worth nothing. It is possible that, in the same Chapter of Drusus, we may find a Citation from a sacred Author, preceded and followed by a Citation from a prophane Author, but not according to the ridiculous order the Jesuit complains of. Drusus's Method is to be very short upon every Subject, joining things together which have a Relation one to another; from whence it happens that, in a short Chapter, he explains sometimes three or four Things, upon each of which he shews the Agreement between sacred and prophane Authors: thus having alleged Passages of Scripture, he cites Greek and Latin Authors: after this, entering upon another Subject, he brings again Passages out of Scripture, and then a Poet, a Historian, &c. This Conduct has nothing ill in it, and was ignorantly, and impertinently condemned by the Censurer.

DRUSUS, a Roman Family, a Branch of the Livii, or of the Family Livia, the Plébeian, had a share in the highest Posts of the Common-wealth. It had enjoyed the Dictatorship, and the Office of Colonel-General of the Cavalry. It held the Consulship eight times, twice the Dignity of Cenfor, and three times it had been honoured with a Triumph. It had produced Persons of great Merit, and among others Marcus Livius Salinator, and MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS. The latter was surnamed Drusus for his having killed Draufus [A], the Enemies General (a). They make him to have recovered, out of the Hands of the Gauls, the Money their Ancestors had formerly received when they besieged the Capitol. If that is true, we are not to believe the Report that Camillus forced them to restore it (b). The best way to know the time when the first Drusus lived, is by remembering that CAIUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, his Son, or Grandson, was Consul with Scipio Africanus, the younger, in the Year of Rome 606. The Emperor Tiberius descended, by Adoption, from the Drusian Family; for LIVIUS DRUSUS CLAUDIANUS, his maternal Grandfather, one of the Descendants of blind Appius, was adopted by a Drusus (c). It is probable that another Drusus adopted one of the Scribonian Family, in which the Sirname of Libo was very common; for we find a MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS LIBO, Consul in the Year 738, and a LUCIUS SCRIBONIUS LIBO DRUSUS the Pretor, who killed himself, to avoid the Punishment he feared, finding himself accused of Treason, under Tiberius, in the Year of Rome 769 (d). We shall say a word of some of the Descendants of the first Drusus [B] in the Remarks, but shall [A] Marcus Livius . . . was surnamed Drusus, for his having killed Draufus. This is like all those silly fabulous Traditions, which are preserved in ancient Families, and which ascribe the Origin of the first Name, and their Coat of Arms, to some valorous Feat. If the Drusian Branch had owed their Original to the Exploit mentioned by Suetonius, it would have been known in what time, and at what place this happened, and against what Enemy; and Suetonius would not have spoke of it in so general a Manner as he has done.

Drusus hostium duce Drauso cominus trucidato sibi posterisque suis cognomen invenit (1). — Drusus having slain the Enemies General, Draufus, hand to hand, gained this Name for himself and his Posterity. Besides, he makes mention of one CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, who lived before the first Punic War (2); which proves that this Sirname was known either before the first Drusus of the Livian Family killed the pretended Draufus, or at least did not depend upon that Combat; for who would venture to say, that, because one Livius vanquished Draufus, therefore one named Claudius was surnamed Drusus?

[B] We shall say a word of some of the Descendants of the first Drusus. I believe that CAIUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, Consul in the Year 606, was descended from him, but I cannot tell whether he was his Son or Grand son. He left a Son named MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, who was Consul in the Year 641, and fought with great Success against the Scordisci, a People of Thrace, descended from the Gauls (3). We shall see hereafter whether he triumphed on that Occasion. He was Cenfor with Marcus Emilius Scaurus, and died during his Office (4). I think he ought not to be distinguished, as Glandorp has done (5), from that Marcus Livius Drusus, a Man of Wit and Eloquence, who was Tribune of the People with Caius Gracchus, and favoured him in his Designs, but afterwards, changing sides, maintained, with so much Vigour, the Interest of the Patricians, that he was called the Patron of the Senate (6). He was Athenes of the first Drusus (7), and had a Brother named CAIUS DRUSUS, who distinguished himself by his Eloquence (8). I see our Grammarians are not agreed upon the Signification of the word Athenes; for Montf. Danet, citing Suetonius, understands by this Term Great-Grandson: in Calepin the same Term is taken for the Son of the Great-Grandson. It is even true that Suetonius (9), and several other ancient Authors, do not exactly observe the Degrees of Parentage. There is mention made of a CAIUS DRUSUS, a great Lawyer, and so laborious, that, though he was old and blind, yet his House was always full of People that came to consult him. C. autem Drusi domum compleri consultoribus solitam accepimus, quum quorum res esset sua ipsi non videbant cæcum adhibebant ducem (10). — I have heard that Drusus's House was usually crowded with Counsellors, who, not seeing on which side Justice stood, applied to a blind Man for Direction. Valerius Maximus speaks honourably of him. Confimilis per everantia Livius Drusus qui ætatis viribus & acie oculorum defectus jus civile populo benignissime interpretatus est, utilissimaque discere id cupientibus monumenta composuit. Nam ut senem illum natura, cæcum fortuna facere potuit, ita neutra interpellare valuit ne non animo & videret & vigeret (11). — Such was the Perseverance of Livius Drusus, who, though enfeebled by Age, and deprived of Sight, taught the People Civil Law in a most obliging Manner, and composed most useful Directions for those who desired to learn it. For though Nature made him old, and Fortune made him blind, neither of them had power to deprive him of the Perseverance and Vigor of Mind. A certain Commentator (12) falsely imagines that this Drusus is the Father of him who caused so much trouble in procuring the Latins the Freedom of Rome. He is mistaken; for the Father of the latter was named Marcus Livius, and not Caius Livius. He is the same that was honoured with the Title of Protector of the Senate. Another Commentator (13) is surprised that Pomponius should say nothing of the Lawyer Caius Drusus: indeed it may well be wondered at, since that Lawyer was also an Author, and that Cælius makes an honourable Mention of him in his Digests (14). The Moderns are

(a) Taken from Suetonius in Tiberio, cap. III.

(b) Traditor etiam, propretorem ex provincia Gallia retulisse aurum. Senonibus olim in obsequio Capitolii datum nec, ut fama, extortum à Camillo. He is reported likewise to have recovered, during his Government in Gaul, the Money formerly given to the Gauls when they besieged the Capitol, and that it was not forced from them, as some say, by Camillus. Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii. cap. xxxi.

(8) Cicero, in Bruto, p. m. 204

(9) He calls Cæsar for Avunculus of Augustus, and yet Cæsar was the Great-Uncle of Augustus. Sueton. in August. c. 7.

(10) Cicero, Tusculan. lib. v. fol. m. 278, B.

(11) Valer. Max. lib. viii. cap. vii. num. 4.

(12) Oliverius in hunc locum Val. Maximi.

(13) Colerus.

(14) See Guill. Grocius, in Vitæ Jurisconsulti, pag. divided 33.

make a separate Article for each of those who made the greatest Figure. Mr Moreri deserves to be censured in some Particulars [C].

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) In Fastis.

(17) Plin. lib. xxxiii. cap. xi. pag. m. 69.

(18) Father Harduin puts X, instead of XI.

W E T H E R
Marcus Livius Drusus triumphed over the Scordisci.

(19) He speaks thus in Lib. xxiij. Cap. vi. Precipiebant ista qui triumphali denas argenti libras in supplicile criminabant. These were the Decrees of those who condemned one, who had been honoured with a Triumph, for having Plate to the weight of ten pounds.

(20) Libras 32 argenti Africanus sequens heredi reliquit. Plin. lib. xxxiii. cap. xii. pag. 68.

W H E N Luxury is at the Height, they treat what is said of the ancient Frugality as fabulous.

(21) Or Twenty thousand, according to Harduin's Correction.

(22) Aulus Gell. lib. iv. cap. viii. & lib. xvii. cap. xxi. Valerius Maximus, lib. ii. cap. ix. num. 4.

divided upon the Question whether this Caius Drusus is the same that was Consul in the Year 606, or the Brother of the Consul of 641. Rutilius embraces the latter Opinion: others, preferring the former, confute it by the word Accepimus, which Cicero makes use of. It is very probable that Cicero speaks of a Man he had never seen; for afterwards he mentions another blind Man, he might have seen, who gave his Voice in the Senate, and answered those who consulted him, and was writing a History. Now it seems Cicero might have seen Caius Livius Drusus, the Brother of him that was Consul in the Year 641; therefore it is probable he speaks of the Consul of the Year 606. (15).

Let us see now if the Consul of the Year 641 triumphed over the Scordisci. I believe not; for all the Proof alledged by Sigonius (16) is a Passage in Pliny misunderstood. Pliny's words are (17). 'Frater ejus Allobrogicus primus omnium pondo mille habuit. At Livius Drusus in Tribunatu plebis XI (18). Nam propter quinque pondo notatum a Censoribus triumphalem senem (19), fabulosum jam videtur.' To understand these Words aright, we must observe, that Pliny opposes the Frugality of former times, to the Luxury of the latter. He shews by what Gradations Luxury crept in upon them. Scipio Africanus left his Heir no more than sixty four Marks in Silver Plate (20). His Brother Quintus Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus was the first who had to the value of two thousand Marks in Plate. But Livius Drusus in his Tribuneship of the People had twenty two thousand Marks (21); for, adds Pliny, we look upon it as fabulous, that an old Man, who had the Honour of a Triumph, should be noted by the Censors on account of ten Marks. 'Nam propter quinque pondo notatum a Censoribus triumphalem senem, fabulosum jam videtur.' Thus in every Age they can hardly believe what Historians say of ancient Times, if it is too remote from the modern Customs. Thus we should say, it looks like a Fable or Romance to Ladies of the first Quality, when they are told that formerly Persons of their Rank walked the Streets on Foot, suckled their own Children, and spent only so much a Year in Cloaths. The History, which according to Pliny then appeared fabulous, does not relate to Livius Drusus whom he had just mentioned. It is a much ancienter History. It was a Censorial Act, exercised in the Year of Rome 478, against Cornelius Rufinus who had been Dictator, and twice Consul (22). The Censors degraded him from the Dignity of Senator for his Luxury, because they found in his House ten Pound weight of Silver Plate. The weight of five Pound was allowed, so that he was degraded for the weight of five Pounds: 'Propter quinque pondo notatum a Censoribus triumphalem senem.' When Valerius Maximus relates this Story, he falls into the same Reflexions as Pliny. He fears to be reckoned a Writer of Fables, and confesses it hardly credible, that the same City, which despised Poverty to so great a Degree, should punish a Man of Consular Dignity, for having twenty Marks in Silver. 'Ipse medius fidius mihi literæ sæculi nostri oblupefcere videntur, cum ad tantam severitatem referendam ministerium accommodare coguntur; ac vereri ne non nostræ urbis acta commemorare existimetur. Vix enim credibile est, intra idem pomerium decem pondo argenti, & invidiosum fuisse censum, & inopiam haberi contemptissimam (23).'

I wonder Sigonius should misunderstand the Text of Pliny as he has done. Could he imagine, that after the Year of Rome 641, the ancient Frugality of the Common-Wealth was so well observed, that nine or ten Marks of Silver, more or less, should be able to degrade a Senator? Things were no longer upon such a Foot: Corruption and Luxury had already spread in a terrible manner. But could not Pliny's own Words have set Sigonius right? They shew precisely that Drusus was Tribune of the People when he had so much Silver Plate, and immediately after Pliny mentions a Censure passed upon an old Man, who had formerly obtained the Honour of a Triumph. It is plain then, that That old Man was not Drusus; for if Drusus had been censured on account of Luxury, it must have been in the time of his Tribuneship; or else Pliny must be charged with relating things in a very impertinent manner. Nevertheless it can hardly be imagined how many have been deceived by this Passage of Pliny (24).

[C] Moreri deserves to be censured in some things.] He says that 'the Family of Drusus was a Branch of that of the Claudians, and though Plebeian, yet it was remarkable for eight Consulships . . . and illustrious for the great Men it had produced, among whom the Chief were Salinator and Drusus.' I pass over all his Omissions, and confine myself to these Observations: 1. That the Drusian Family was a Branch, not of the Claudian, but the Livian Family: 2. That it is the Livian Family, and not the particular Branch of the Drusian, which was distinguished by eight Consulships, &c. 3. That Salinator is no otherwise derived from the Drusian Family, than the House of Bourbon is descended from the House of Burgundy. Which Expression is not to be suffered. Two Streams, proceeding from the same Head, do not therefore proceed one from the other.

DRUSUS (MARCUS LIVIUS), Son of him who was Colleague of Caius Gracchus in the Tribuneship of the People, and who deserved the Title of Protector of the Senate, followed his Father's Example in supporting the Patrician Interest; but the Method he pursued raised terrible Disorders [A]. He was a Man of great Capacity

[A] He favoured the Patricians; but the Method he pursued raised terrible Disorders.] It is not impossible that the reason of Paterculus's espousing his Cause so heartily was to make his Court to Tiberius, descended without doubt from our Drusus; but perhaps also he did no more than follow his own Opinion. However that be, he ascribes the best Intentions in the World to him, and laments that the Senate should make such a blind and unjust Judgment of them. He expresses himself upon this Subject with so much Eloquence, that I take the Liberty to transcribe the whole Passage, in favour of those, who, without consulting a great many Books, would willingly see the Conduct of a great Man displayed. 'Tribunatum inquit Marcus Livius Drusus, vir nobilissimus, eloquentissimus, sanctissimus, meliore omnia ingenio, animoque, quam fortuna usus, qui, cum Senatui priscum restituere cuperet decus, & judicia ab equitibus ad eum transferre ordinem; (quippe, eam potestatem nacti equites Gracchanis legibus, cum in multos clarissimos, atque innocentissimos viros sævisissent, tum Publium Rutilium, virum non sæculi sui, sed omnis ævi optimum, interrogatum lege repetundarum, maximo cum gemitu civitatis, damnaverant) in illis, quæ pro senatu moliebatur, senatum habuit adversarium, non intelligentem, si qua de plebis commodis ab eo agerentur, veluti incensandæ, illicitæ, & quæ multitudinis causâ fieri, ut minoribus perceptis, majora permitteret. Denique ea fortuna Drusi fuit, ut malefacta collegarum, quam ejus optime ab ipso cogitata, senatus probaret magis; & honorem, qui ab eo deferrebat, sperneret; injurias, quæ ab aliis intenderantur, æquo animo reciperet; & hujus summæ gloriæ invideret, illorum modicam ferret. Tum conversus Drusi animus, quando tenè cepta malè cedebant, ad dandam civitatem Italiam: quod cum molienti revertisset de foro, immensâ illâ, & incognitâ, quæ eum semper comitabatur, cinctus multitudine, in atrio domus suæ cultello percussus, qui affixus lateri ejus relictus est, intra paucas horas decessit (1). — Marcus Livius Drusus, a Man of the first Rank, famed for his Eloquence and Integrity, was made Tribune; but was much more happy in the Endowments of Mind, than in his Fortune: for endeavouring to restore the ancient Dignity to the Senate, and transfer the Court of Judgment from the Equestrian to that Order, (for the Equites had been invested with that Power by the Laws of the Gracchi, and had exercised it with great Rigour against some most eminent and virtuous Men, particularly against Publius

(23) Val. Max. ibid.

(24) Plorique etiam hunc triumphalem volent. Glandorp. Onomast. pag. 543.

(1) Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xlii.

city and Eloquence, full of Wit and Courage; but he made an ill use of these Accomplishments, which was the Effect of his excessive Ambition; and of this he gave Proofs from his very Infancy. The City was divided into two Factions, that of the Senate, and that of the Knights [C]: the latter, besides raising the public Money, possessed all the Offices of Judicature (a) which had formerly belonged to the Senators: by this means they had, as one may say, their Foot upon the Neck of the Senate. Drusus, seeing that Cepio, his Competitor, favoured the Knights Cause [D], undertook to support and retrieve that of the Senate; and that he might not want Creatures (b), he contrived to get the Laws of the Gracchi revived concerning the Distribution of Lands among the People, and promised the Freedom of Rome to the Latins. The Violence he made use of against Pbilippus, the Consul, who opposed those Laws, cannot be sufficiently condemned [E]. The Promise he had made the Latins was the Occasion of a very vexatious Publius Rutilius, who was certainly the best Man of that or any preceding Age, whom they condemned on the Statute of Bribery, to the universal Grief of the City, he was opposed by the Senate in those very things which he laboured for their Advantage; they did not consider that whatever he did for the Benefit of the People was only meant to insinuate himself into their Favour, that, by obtaining for them some smaller Advantages, he might induce them to part with greater. In short, such was the Fortune of Drusus, that the Senate approved the ill Offices of his Colleagues, more than his best Intentions. They rejected the Honours which he offered them, and embraced the Indignities offered them by others. They envied his superior Glory, and were satisfied with the moderate Honours of the rest. When Drusus saw his honest Design could not succeed, he altered his Mind, and proposed to grant the freedom of Rome to all Italy. As he returned from the Forum, where he had been promoting that Affair, attended as usual by a vast Multitude of unknown Persons, he was stabbed in the Side, at his own Door, with a Knife, which was left in the Wound, and expired in a few Hours. The Reader will have a better Opinion of the Sincerity of Paternulus here, if he knows what Salust thought concerning the same Drusus; for which reason I shall here insert Salust's words. — M. Livio Druso semper consilium fuit, in tribunatu summa ope niti pro nobilitate: neque ullam rem in principio agere intendit, nisi illi auctores fieret. Sed homines factiosi, quibus dolus, atque malitia, fide cariora erant, ubi infellecerunt, per unum hominem maximum beneficium multis mortalibus dari: videlicet & sibi quique conficiis, malo atque infido animo esse, de M. Livio Druso juxta, ac se, exilimaverunt (2). — It was the Aim of M. Livius Drusus, during the whole time of his Tribuneship, to advance the Interest of the Nobility; nor was it his real Design at first to have any thing done but by their Authority. But Men given to Faction, who were sinder of Deceit and Malice than Honour, perceiving that a Benefit very diffusive was like to be owing to one Man, and being each conscious to himself that his own Actions were evil and knifiser, measured the Designs of Drusus by their own.

[B] Of his excessive ambition he gave Proofs from his Infancy.] While he was under the Tutition of his Guardians, and before he had assumed the Toga Virilis, he took upon him to sollicit the Judges in favour of the Accused, and that with so much Force and Vigour that he extorted from them more than once the Sentence they pronounced. Had he not reason then to say that he was the only one for whom no Holy-day had ever been made? Those that begin so early to distinguish themselves, deserve to be feared. Let us hear Seneca. 'Exsecratos inquietam à primordiis vitam, dicitur dixisse, Uni sibi, nec pueri quidem, unquam serias contigisse. Ausus enim & pupillus adhuc & prætextatus, iudicibus reos commendare, & gratiam suam foro interponere tam efficaciter, ut quædam judicia constet ab illo raptâ. Quo non irumperet tam immatura ambitio? scires in malum ingens, & privatum, & publicum, evasuram illam tam præcoquem audaciam. Sero itaque querebatur, nullas sibi serias contigisse: à pueri seditiosus, & foro gravis (3). — He cursed his restless manner of Life, and is reported to have said, that he had never, not even when a Boy, had any Intermission from Business. When a Youth, he had adventured to speak for the Prisoners at the Bar, and recommend their Cases to the Judges, which he did in so effectual a manner that he sometimes gained his Points. To what might not so early an Ambition force it's way? A Man might divine that so early Assurance would ripen into a very great public and private Calamity. He had reason afterwards to complain that he never enjoyed any Relaxation, having been seditious and turbulent in the Forum from a Boy. What he did in Asia during his Quæstorship is brought as an Evidence of his Pride. He exercised his Office without wearing the external Ornaments of his Dignity, scorning any Distinction but that of his own Person. The Latin expresses it better. Quæstor in Asia nullis insignibus uti voluit, ne quid ipso esset insignis (4). A learned Man (5) can hardly believe that Drusus had that Office, or that of Ædile. Ædilis manus magnificentissimum dedit. — In his Ædileship he gave a most splendid Entertainment. His reason is, that he died while he was Tribune of the People, a Post the Romans commonly enjoyed before the Ædileship. But perhaps Drusus, wanting to be Tribune, in order to put his Designs in execution, obtained that Office the second time in the Year he was killed.

[C] The City was divided into two Nations, that of the Senate, and that of the Knights. The Pallage in Patercul informs us, that the Græci had deprived the Senators of all the Tribunals of Justice, to gratify the Knights. Let us see how Florus confirms the same thing (7.): 'Judiciaria lege Caji Gracchi diviserant populum Romanum, & bicipitem ex una fecerant civitatem equites Romani, tanta potestate subnixi, ut qui fata fortunæque patrum vitæque principum haberen in manu, interceptis vestigalibus pecuniarum suæ jure rempublicanæ. —

By the Judiciary Law of C. Gracchus the Knights had divided the Roman People, and from one had made two Heads to the City. So great was the Power wherewith they were invested, that having a Power over the Fates and Fortunes of the Senators, and the Lives of the Princes, they converted the Taxes to their private Use, and plundered the Common-Wealth at Discretion.'

[D] Drusus, seeing that Cæpio, his Competitor, favoured the Knights Cause. The Emulation of these two Romans, which caused so much Confusion, and almost ruined the Common-Wealth, rose from a trifle. A Ring sold at an Auction was the cause of their Divisions (8): they bid upon one another, and were so exasperated at it, that afterwards they fought all occasions of crossing each other. This confirms what has been often observed, that great Revolutions of State commonly proceed from a Fancy or capricious Humour of some particular Persons (9). I know not whether the Influence before us was ever taken notice of. In vain Patriculus pretends that Drusus acted out of Zeal for the Interest of the Senate, whose Power he endeavoured to restore: we rather believe those who say, that Drusus embraced that Party, because he saw Cæpio at the Head of the other. In hoc statu rerum præcipuus, animis, dignitate (unde & nata Livio Druso æmulatio accesserat) Equitem Servilii Cæpio, Senatuum Livius Drusus asserere (10). — Whist stings were in this posture, Servilius Cæpio, and Livius Drusus, declared for different Parties, the former for the Equites, the latter for the Senate: they were Persons equal in Fortune, Courage and Honour, which had raised a Spirit of Emulation in Drusus.

[E] The Violence he us'd to Philippus the Confessor can never be sufficiently condemned. The Confolar Dignity was so little regarded, that he squeezed his Throat till the Blood flew out of his Eyes and Mouth.
Some say Drusus committed this violence himself;
and that far from relenting at the sight of the Blood, he made it a new subject of insulting him upon: he said it was not Blood, but the Sauce of Thrushes; thus re-proaching Cepio with his Gluttony. Philippo Confolari

‘ Ieribus

(a) Paterculus,
lib. ii, cap. xiii.
I quote his words
in Remark [A].

(b) Florus, lib.
iii, cap. xvii.

(4) Aurel. Viſt.
de Viris illuſtri-
bus.

(5) Corradus, in Brutum Cicero-
nis, pag. 332.

(6) Aurel. Viç.
de Viris illustr.
bus.

(7) Lib. iii. cap.
xvii.

(2) Sallust. Orat.
II. ad Cæsar.
p. m. 533, 534.

(3) Seneca de Brevitate Vitæ,
cap. vi.

(8) Inter Cæpionem & Drusum
ex annulo in au-dione venali inimicitie cape-
re: unde origo socialis belli &
exitia rerum.
Plin. lib. xxiii,
cap. i. pag. m.
12, 13. This War cost the Lives of 300000
Men. Paterc.
lib. ii, cap. xv.
See Florus, l. b.
iii cap. xxiii.

(a) See the Persées diverses sur les Comètes, n. 226.

(10) Florus, lib.
3, cap. 18.

(c) Ser. Rom. [D]
Citat. (8).

vexatious War, which was very near being fatal to the Roman People (c). He swooned away in a public Assembly of the People, and whether it was real or counterfeit, he made an Advantage several ways of that Accident [F]. The Credit he had obtained did not hinder him from being very much perplexed with the State he had brought things into [G]; wherefore every body judged he was seasonably killed in the Court of his own House [H], as he returned from the City, surrounded, according to his Custom, (11) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus. In the Valerius Maximus Variorum of Holland, pag. 778, in quoting this Passage, we read in Convivio, and not in Comitio, which is absurd.

(12) Valerius Maximus, lib. 9, cap. 5, n. 2.

(13) Florus, lib. 3, cap. 13.

(14) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(15) Drusus Tribunus plebis tradit caprinum (sanguinem) bibisse, cum pallio re & invidia venient fidi diti insimulare. Cessionem inimicum vellet. Plin. lib. 28, cap. 9, pag. 608.

(16) Plin. lib. 28, cap. 5, pag. 701. See Aul. Gellius, lib. 17, cap. 15.

legibus agrariis resistenti ita collum in comitio obtorfit, ut multus sanguis efflueret e naribus, quem ille luxuriam obprobans muriam de turdis esse dicebat (11).

— He so twisted the Neck of Philip, the Consul, who opposed the passing the Agrarian Laws, that the Blood streamed from his Nose, which he, in reproach of his Luxury, said was Thrush Sauce. Others say Drusus caused this violence to be committed by one of his Clients or Officers. Quæ (Senatus majestas) à M. quoque Druso trib. plebis per summam contumeliam vexata est. Parvi enim habuit, L. Philippum Consulem, quia interfieri concionantem ausus fuerat, ob tortâ gulâ, & quidem non per viatorem, sed per clientem suum, adeo violenter in carcere præcipitem egisse, ut multus e naribus ejus cruor profunderetur (12).

— The Majesty of the Senate was also notoriously insulted by M. Drusus, a Tribune of the People, who, without any respect, seized Philip the Consul, for interrupting him in his Speech, by the Throat, and dragged him to Prison; which Action was done, not by a public Officer, but by one of his Clients, and this was done so violently, that the Blood gushed in great quantity from his Nostrils. This is what Valerius Maximus says of it, and Florus's Words are: Ausus tamen abrogare de legibus Consul Philippus, sed apprehensum faucibus viator non ante dimisit, quam sanguis in ora & oculos redundaret (13).

— Philip, the Consul, had the Courage to oppose the Laws; but a public Officer seized him by the Throat, nor left him till the Blood gushed out at his Mouth and Eyes.

[F] He made an Advantage many ways of his swooning away. He had got all his Laws past, except that of the Freedom of the Latins. They insisted upon his Promise, and he knew not how to act, either to put them off, or give them Satisfaction. He fell down on a sudden in the midst of the Assembly, and this was a just Pretence to refer the Latins to another time. Livius anxius ut Latinorum postulata differret, qui promissam civitatem flagitabant, repente in publico concidit, five morbo comitiali, seu haulto caprino sanguine, semianimis domum relatus (14).

— Drusus, desirous to put off the Demands of the Latins, who vigorously solicited the Freedom of the City, which he had promised them, on a sudden fell down in the Assembly, being either seized with a real Fit, or having taken a draught of Goat's Blood, and was carried speechless home. It is plain the Historian, I take this from, has made a Mistake: the disjunctive Particle seu makes him speak absurdly: for if Drusus fell down suddenly, in order to put off the Demand of the Latins to another time, it cannot be said that he either fell down in the Falling-Sickness, or that he had drunk Goat's Blood. A real Fit of the Falling-Sickness is not in our own Power, and consequently cannot be directed to a certain end. The other part of the disjunctive Proposition is good: for a Man may take a Drug, in order to fall down in a Swoon three or four Hours after. The Truth is, Authors of Abridgements, by endeavouring to bring several different Relations into one Period, often make Nonsense of the whole.

Aurelius Victor, having heard say that Drusus fell down in the Falling-Sickness, and that he had drunk Goat's Blood, that by looking pale he might complain with greater probability of being poisoned by Cepio (15), attempted to join these two things together, but without success. I could easily believe that Drusus and his Adherents would make a handle of the fainting Fit, to render Philippus, the Consul, odious, as suspected of poisoning his Adversary: for what will not a State-Faction put in Practice to supplant an Enemy? This is sufficient to understand the Text of this Remark. I shall only observe farther that Pliny has a curious particular concerning Drusus's Falling-Sickness.

Drusus quoque apud nos Tribunorum popularium clarissimum (cui ante omnes plebs flans plausit, optimates vero bellum Maricum imputare) constat hoc medicamento (elleboro) liberatum comitiali morbo in Anticyra insula (16). — We have another instance at home in Drusus (the most eminent Tribune of the People, to whom they returned the thanks of their whole Body, standing, an Honour that had no Precedent, though the Senate accused him of fomenting the Marican War) who 'tis certain was cured in the Island of Anticyra of the Falling-Sickness by the use of Hellebore.

[G] The Credit, he had obtained, did not hinder him from being very much perplexed with the State he had brought things into. He imagined that all sorts of People were obliged to him, and yet most People complained of him. He had caused Lands to be distributed to the People. Those, they felt to, were pleased, but those, who were deprived of them, complained. He had procured the Order of Knights to be admitted to the Senatorial Dignity. Those, who were chosen to that Post, were pleased with it, but those, who lost their Elections, were discontented. He got the Tribunals restored to the Senate. This pleased that Body; but on the other hand, they were enraged to see Patricians and Knights blended together in the Senate. This was the cause of Drusus's Perplexity. Aurelius Victor expresses it in few Words (17). Idem ex gratia nimia in invidiam venit. Nam plebs acceptis agris gaudebat, expulsi dolebant: equites in Senatum lecti lætabantur, sed præteriti querebantur: Senatus permixtis judiciis exultabat, sed societatem cum equitibus ægre ferebat. Unde Livius anxius, &c (18). Madam le Fevre has made a Note upon these Words, equites in Senatum lecti lætabantur, in which she says, she cannot but suspect that Passage, for she can never believe that the Knights rejoiced to see those Juridictions, they were solely possessed of, divided between the Senators, and themselves. Hoc certe valde suspectum est, neque adduci possum ut credam equites quæ judicia ipsi possidebant ea ad Senatum æqua parte transmissa libenter didisse (19).

I believe, with her, this was not the ground of their Joy; but I take the Liberty to observe to her that this is not also what Aurelius Victor says. He does not speak of the general Joy of the Knights, but of the particular Joy of those among them who were made Senators. It is easy to suppose they were pleased at at this change in their Condition: the gain of the Senate was theirs, and they lost nothing by the Diminution of the Order of the Knights, being no longer Members of it.

[H] It was thought he was very seasonably killed in the Court of his own House. It is Seneca's Opinion.

Livius Drusus, says he (20), vir acer & vehemens, cum leges novas & mala Græchana movisset, stipatus ingenti totius Italiæ cœtu, exitum rerum non providens, quas nec agere licebat, nec jam liberum erat semel inchoatas relinquere, exsecratus inquietam à primordiis vitam dicitur dixisse, Uni sibi, nec puero quidem, unquam ferias contigisse. Disputatur an ipse sibi manus attulerit, subito enim vulnere per inguen accepto, collapsus est: aliquo dubitante, an mors voluntaria esset; nullo, an tempestiva. — Livius Drusus, says he, a Man of a fiery overbearing Temper, treading in the steps of the Gracchi, and promoting new Laws, attended by a vast Crowd from all parts of Italy, not foreseeing the Consequence of Things, which he could neither carry, nor safely relinquish, is said to have cursed his restless Humour, and, to have declared that his Life had been one continued Scene of Action from his Infancy. It is a question whether or no he died by his own Hands, for on a sudden he received a Wound in the Groin, and fell down; but tho' some doubt whether his death was voluntary, all allow it to be seasonable. Florus has much the same Sentiment (21): Sic pervim late, jussuque leges: sed pretium rogationis statim socii flagitare, quum interim imparem Drusum, ægrumque rerum temere moraturn, maturâ, ut in tali discrimine, mors abstulit. — So the Laws were passed and enacted by meer force. But our Allies immediately demanded the Reward of their Votes, when Death, very seasonable, at so critical a Juncture, carried off Drusus, unequal to his Enterprizes,

(17) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(18) See Seneca's Words in the following Remark.

(19) Anna Tanaquill. Fabri filia Not. in Aurel. Victor, pag. 3.

(20) Seneca, de Brevitate Vitæ, cap. 6, pag. 700, 701.

(21) Lib. 3, cap. 17.

Custom, by a Croud of People (d), some of whom were unknown to him. No Inquiry was made after the Murderer [I], and most Authors say he was never known. Cicero, I think, is the only one that names him [K]. Cornelia, the Mother of Drusus, expressed great Fortitude of Mind upon this Occasion [L]. His last Words were no less presumptuous [M], than those he had formerly made use of to proclaim the Services he had done [N]. The Answer he gave an Architect has been much spoken of [O].

(d) Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xiii. Apian. lib. i. Bell. Civil. l. 7. y. that Drusus durst no longer go abroad, and that the Multitude that were for him came home to him.

* and sick of the Commotions which he had unadvisedly raised. What increased the Perplexity Drusus was involved in was this: he not only saw no hope of obtaining for the Latins what he had promised them, but found himself charged with conspiring with them again Philippus, the Consul. The Accusation was founded upon his having advised that Consul to look to himself, from whence they concluded that he was privy to their Designs. Cum Latini Consulem in Albano monte interficere essent, Philippum admonuit ut caveret, unde in Senatu accusatus cum domum se reciperet, immisso inter turbam percussore corruit (22). — The Latins having entered into a design to kill the Consul on the Alban Mount, he advised Philip to take care of himself, whereupon he was accused in the Senate, and, as he returned home, stabbed in a Croud by an Assassin. In my Opinion, Madam Le Fevre makes a wrong Remark upon these words of Aurelius Victor. She begins by citing Florus (23), who has said. Primum fuit belli in Albano monte consilium, ut festo die Latinarum Julius Cæsar & Martius Philippus Consules inter sacra & aras immolarentur. Postquam id nefas proditiōne discussum est, &c. — The first scene of War was designed for the Alban Mount, where Julius Cæsar and Martius Philippus, the Consuls, on the Feast of the Latins were to be sacrificed at the Altar, as they were performing religious Service; as soon as this piece of Treason was discovered, &c. And then she says, that Drusus, who was killed the Year before, could not give this Information to Philippus. Sed tunc Philippum admonere non potuit Drusus, quem anno superiori mortuum tabulæ notant. It is certain Drusus might have informed Philippus; for, according to Florus, the Conspiracy of the Latins was to have been put in Execution under the Consulship of Julius Cæsar and Martius Philippus, since their design was to make away with those two Consuls. Drusus was assassinated, I confess, under that Consulship, that is to say, in the Year of Rome 662; but he lived several Months of this Year; witness the violence he used to the Consul Philippus (24). What might lead Madam Le Fevre into the mistake, was supposing that the Conspiracy, mentioned by Florus, relates to the first Year of the Social War. On this Supposition, Drusus could not have been in a Condition to give an Information; for the beginning of that War coincides with the Year 663, and with the Consulship of L. Julius Cæsar, and P. Rutilius (25). The Conspiracy of the Latins should be put to the preceding Year, since it was contrived against Martius Philippus, and Sextus (26) Julius Cæsar his Colleague, as Florus observes. It is certain the Latins were big with the War during the Life of Drusus (27): therefore he might be alive, when they resolved to kill the Consul Philippus during the Celebration of the Latin Festivals.

(22) Aurelius Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(23) Lib. iii. cap. xviii.

(24) See Remark [E].

(25) Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xv.

(26) Florus neither gives him this Forename, nor any other.

(27) Mors Drusi jam pridem tu mecum bellum excitavit Italiam. Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xv.

(28) Cicero pro Milone.

(29) Cotta calls him so; because Drusus, as Cicero assures us in Orator, ad Pontifices, cap. xlvii, had been of the College of Pontiffs. If Father LeClerc had known this Passage, he would not have spoke of it with an opinion, in his Commentary in lib. iii. de Natura Deorum, pag. 677, & 32.

(30) Thus this word is to be placed, and not as in the Edition after perit. See Freinsheim, upon Florus, lib. iii. cap. xvii.

* and poisoned Metellus, suffered a most exemplary Punishment, and died under the greatest Torture. Yet it had been much better, if they had lived, and he never paid the forfeit of his Villainy. Velleius Paterculus, Florus, Appian, Aurelius Victor, &c. say no more than that he was killed; and we have seen that, according to Seneca, it was not altogether sure, that he did not kill himself. Philippus the Consul, and Cæpio, were suspected of having suborned the Assassin (31). The Death of Drusus was also the Death of the Laws he had established with so much difficulty, they being all abrogated, under a Pretence that they had been enacted against the Auspices (32). [L] Cornelia, the Mother of Drusus, expressed great Fortitude of Mind upon this Occasion. If Seneca had not mentioned it, I believe no body now would have known any thing of it. Cornelia, says he (33), Livium Drusum, clarissimum juvenem, illustris ingenii, vadentem per Græciana vestigia, imperfectis tot rogationibus, intra penates interemptum suos amiserat, incerto cædis auctore; tamen & acerbam mortem filii, & insultam, tam magno animo tulit, quam ipse leges tulerat. — Cornelia lost Livius Drusus, a brave Youth, and of a most promising Genius, who trod in the Steps of the Græcians, and was murdered by an unknown Villain within his own Walls, when a great number of Laws which he endeavoured to make were still depending; yet she bore the deplorable loss of her Son (which was not revenged) with the same Greatness of Soul that he had shewn in enacting his Laws.

(31) Invidia cædis apud Philippum & Cæpionem fuit. Aurelius Victor, de Vitis illustribus.

(32) A'con Pedians in Orator Ciceronis pro C. Cornelio, pag. m. 13, & 12.

(33) Seneca de Consolat. ad Martiam, cap. xvi. pag. 75.

[M] His last Words were no less presumptuous --- When, said he, will the Common-wealth have such another Citizen as I? The Latin has it better (34). Sed cum ultimum redderet spiritum intuens circumstantium morientiumque frequentiam, effudit vocem convenientissimam conscientie suæ, & quando, inquit, propinqui amique, similem mei civem habebit republica? — When he was on the Point of breathing his last, he turned about to the Company, who were all in Tears, and uttered this Expression, which thoroughly spoke the Opinion that he had conceived of himself; When, O my Friends and Acquaintance, will the Commonwealth find a Citizen like me?

(34) Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xv.

[N] Than those he used, to express the Services he had done. I have said, in Remark [G], that he imagined the whole Body of the Commonwealth, the Patricians, Knights, and Plebeians, were under great Obligations to him. Some Writers say, he boasted, that, unless they made Presents of Heaven or of Dirt, none could exceed his Profusions. Extat vox ipsius, nihil se ad largitionem ulli reliquisse, nisi si quis aut cœcum dividere vellet, aut cœcum (35). This was setting himself above all Exception or Comparison; for no body would ever think of shewing their Magnificence by Presents of Dirt or Mire, and it is impossible Drusus should imagine that a Day would come, when the great Men of Rome would distribute Places in Paradise, and make a Lottery of Heaven (36); and if he had foreseen this, he need not have recanted; for he would have foreseen, not a Free-gift, but a Sale.

(35) Florus, lib. iii. cap. xvii. Cicero Orator pro Rabirio, cap. vii.

(36) Venefia nobis Tempia, Sacerdotes, altaria, sacra, coronæ, In's, thurs, preces, cœlum est, vane Desquæ. Fines, Temples, Priesthoods, Crowns, submit to Gold: Prayers, Heaven, and G d him self's Bopita Mantuanus, de Calamitate Temporum, lib. iii.

[O] The Answer he gave to an Architect has been much spoken of. It is a fine Thought. He promised him to dispose in such a manner the Apartments of his House, that no body should be able to overlook him. Rather, said he to the Architect, build it so that every body may be a Witness of what I do at Home. Cum ædificaret domum in palatio in eo loco, ubi est, quæ quondam Ciceronis, mox Centorini fuit, nunc Statilii Sifennæ est; promitteretque ei architectus, ita se eam ædificaturum, uti libera à conspectu, immunitis ab omnibus arbitris esset, neque quicquam in eam despiciere posset: Tu vero, inquit, si quid in te artis est, ita compone domum meam, ut, quicquid agam, ab omnibus perspicui possit (37). — When he was building a House in the Palatium, where Cicero's formerly stood, which afterwards was Centorinus's, and is at present Statilius Sifenna's, and

VOL. II.

8 S

His Sister Livia was the Mother of Cato of Utica [P].

'and the Architect proposed to build it in such manner, that no one should be able to look into it, or be a Witness of what he was doing. Nay, says Drusus, if you show your Art, contrive my House in such a manner that all the World may be able to look into it, and be Witnesses of what I am doing.' Erasmus (38) relates the Story, as if Part of the House was already so inconvenient, that what was done within might be seen from without, and that an Architect had promised, for five Talents, to remedy it. According to Erasmus, Drusus's Answer was this: I will give thee ten Talents if thou canst so order my House, that all the World may see what is done in every part of it. Erasmus calls this Drusus, Julius Drusus Publicola: the first of these three Words is a Fault, and the last of them is another; which proceeds from his not knowing that Δρακωνίδης ought to be translated by Tribune of the People, rather than by Favourite of the People (39). Erasmus did not take notice that the Word Publicola was become the Surname of the Valerii. So that he should not have used it to signify a Man that made his court to the People.

[P] His Sister Livia was Mother of Cato of Utica Her first Husband was the Father of that Cato, and her second Husband Q. Servilius Cepio. From this second Marriage proceeded Servilia, the Mother of Brutus. So that Cato was maternal Uncle to Brutus, for he was Servilia's Brother by the Mother's side. By this we see the reason of Cicero's calling our Drusus Cato's maternal Uncle (40), and Great maternal Uncle to Brutus (41).

(18) Erasmus. Apophth. lib. vi, pag. m. 491.

(39) See Leonard. Emendat. lib. x, cap. xvii.

(40) In Orat. pro Milone.

(41) In Brut. cap. xviii: he calls the Father of our Drusus, in the 4th Book of Finib. cap. xxiv. Avum Catonis.

(a) Sueton. in Claud. cap. i.

DRUSUS (NERO) (a) CLAUDIUS, Brother of Tiberius, descended, both by the Father's and Mother's Side, from Appius Claudius the Blind [A]. He was a Man of great Merit: or, to speak more justly, he was one of the greatest Men the Commonwealth of Rome ever produced [B], a Thunderbolt in War, most capable of the Affairs of the Cabinet, who, in the most exalted Fortune, and covered with all the Glory that a Person of his Rank and Age could possibly acquire, always preserved a surprizing Modesty, Courtesy, and Uprightness. He obtained a Dispensation of Age, in order to be capable of public Employments, five Years sooner than the Laws allowed (b). During his Questorship (c) he was sent, together with his Brother (d), in the Year of Rome 739, into the

(b) Dio, lib. 54, ad Ann. 735, pag. m. 604.

(c) In questuræ honore dux Rhæti bell. Sueton. in Claud. cap. i.

(d) Dio, lib. 54, pag. 611.

[A] He descended, both by the Father's and Mother's Side, from Appius Claudius the Blind. Appius Claudius the Blind, among other Children, left two Sons, one of which was named Tiberius Nero (1); from whom descended the Father of the Emperor Tiberius. The other was named Appius Pulcher; from him descended Livia, the Mother of that Emperor. The Father of this Livia, who was the adopted Son of a Livius Drusus, took the Name of Livius Drusus Claudianus. He followed the Republican Party, and, rather than be obliged to Octavius and Marc Antony for his Life, he killed himself in his Tent, after they had won the Battle of Philippi (2). I do not know that he left any other Children besides Livia, and I believe his Father, by Adoption, had no natural Children (3). So then all the Males of the Drusian Branch, both natural and adopted, ended in the Person of Livius Drusus Claudianus, the Father of Livia: and probably this was the reason that Livia revived the Surname of Drusus, by giving it to her second Son, while the eldest bore the Name of his Father; for every body knows that Livia, before she was Augustus's Wife, was married to Tiberius Nero. He was a Man, who had sided with both Parties. He was Questor under Julius Cæsar, during the Alexandrian War, and commanded the Fleet with so much Conduct, that he contributed not a little to the Victory. Cæsar was not ungrateful: he made him High-Priest in Scipio's Room, and gave him a Commission to conduct the Colonies of Arles, Narbonne, and several others in Gaul. After Cæsar's Death our Tiberius voted, that Rewards should be given to the Murderers. 'Cunctis turbarum metu abolitionem facti decernentibus, etiam de præmiis tyrannicidarum referendum censuit (4). — When, upon the Murder of Cæsar, the Senate was for passing an Act of Oblivion, he proposed a Bill to have Rewards assigned to those who slew the Tyrant.' After this he was made Pretor, and sided with Marc Antony's Party, when the Triumvirs fell out with one another. He followed the Consul Lucius Antony, Brother of the Triumvir, to Perugia, and was the only one that would not surrender. He fled first to Preneſte, and then to Naples: but not being able to make the Slaves take Arms, though he promised them Liberty, he passed over into Sicily. He took it ill, that Sextus Pompeius did not admit him immediately to an Audience, with the Ensigns of the Pretorship; wherefore he left him, and went to find out Marc Antony in Achaia. Peace being concluded, he returned to Rome, and yielded his Wife Livia to Augustus. He had had a Son by her, who was the Emperor Tiberius (5), and, three Months after Augustus married her, she had another, viz. Drusus, the Subject of this Article. Lovers of Scandal did not fail to jest upon Livia's speedy lying in, pretending Augustus was the true Father of the Child. 'Livia, cum Au-gusto gravis nupisset, intra mensem tertium peperit: fuitque suspicio, ex vitrico per adulterii confuetudinem procreatum. Statim certe vulgatus est verus: Tols εὐρυγῆσαι καὶ τελευτᾶν αἰσῖα (6). — Livia, being big with Child, when she married Augustus, was delivered, within three Months, of a Son. It was suspected he was gotten in Adultery by his Father-in-law. However this Verse was immediately spread abroad; The Great can have a Son at three Month's end.' But as these Stories are not to be regarded in genealogical Matters, I have made Livia's first Husband, viz. Tiberius Nero, the Father of our Drusus. The Emperor sent him the new-born Child, and entered this Act of his Diligence into his Journal. Livia's first Husband died soon after, and by his Will left Augustus Guardian of his two Sons (7).

I must observe here a Mistake of Mr Dacier. He says (8), that Drusus and Tiberius were descended from the two Consuls who defeated Asdrubal. He adds, by the Father's side they issued from Claudius Nero, and by the Mother's side from Livius Salinator. It is certain, as I have said already, upon the Authority of Suetonius, that they equally descended from Appius Claudius the Blind, both by Father's and Mother's side (9). It is true, their Mother's Father entered, by Adoption, into the Livian Family; but he did not enter into the Branch of Livius Salinator, but into that of Livius Drusus. All the Descendants of Salinator took that Surname, and never that of Drusus.

[B] He was one of the greatest Men that the Commonwealth of Rome ever produced. Here is the Elogium in Latin: It comes from the Pen of Paterculus, and ought not to be suspected, though that Historian flatters Tiberius without measure. 'Cura deinde, atque onus Germanici belli delegata Druso Claudio, fratri Neronis, adolescenti tot tantarumque virtutum, quot & quantas natura mortalis recipit, vel industria percipit; cujus ingenium utrum bellicis magis operibus, an civilibus suffecerit artibus, in incerto est. Morum certe dulcedo ac suavitas, & adversus amicos æqua ac par sui æstimationis inimitabilis fuisse dicitur. Nam pulchritudo corporis proxima fraternas fuit. Sed illum, magna ex parte domitorem Germaniæ, plurimo ejus gentis variis in locis profuso sanguine, factorum iniquitas, confulem, agentem annum tricesimum, rapuit (10). — The Management and Importance of the German War was conferred on Drusus Claudius, Nero's Brother, a Prince possessed of all the Virtues which human Nature can receive, or Industry attain. It is difficult to determine whether his Genius was better turned for warlike Achievements, or the Arts of Peace. He had an inimitable Sweetness of Temper, and esteemed his Friend equal to himself. The Gracefulness of his Person came the nearest to that of his Brother. But the Cruelty of his

(4) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. iv.

(5) Taken from Suetonius, ibid.

(6) Sueton. in Claudius, cap. i. See also Dion. Callius, lib. 48, at the Year 716.

(7) Dio, ibid.

(8) Remarks upon the 4th Ode of the 4th Book of Horace, p. 127. [Mr Dacier has rectified this in his third Edition printed at Paris, 1709. REM. CRIT.]

(9) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. 31, confirmat this: Pater ei Nero, fovee he, speaking of Tiberius, & utrinque origo gentis Claudii, quamquam mater in Liviam & mox Juliam familiam adoptionibus transierit.

(10) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. xcvi.

(e) It is now called the Country of the Gibetani.

(f) Livius, in Epitome lib. cxxxvii. & seq.

(g) Strabo, lib. vii. circa init.

(h) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. i.

(i) Dio, lib. 54, pag. 613.

the Country of the Rheti (e), to subdue that Nation. These were his first Feats of Arms, and they were glorious [C]. After this he passed into Gaul (f): where he reduced some rebellious Provinces; he defeated the Germans who were marched on this side the Rhine; he passed that River, routed the Sicambri in their own Territories, gained a Naval Victory over the Bructeri on the Ems (g); he subdued the People of Friesland [D], and was the first Roman General, who embarked upon the northern Ocean (h). At his return to Rome, in the Year 743, he obtained the Pretorship (i), but did not continue long there: he set out in the beginning of the Spring to continue his fine Exploits in Germany. He subdued several Nations, as far as the Weser, and built Forts in divers Places. This procured him at Rome the triumphal Ornaments, and the honour of an Ovation, together with the Dignity of Proconsul (k). In the Year 745 (l) he was advanced to the Consulship, and returned into Germany, where he pushed on his Conquests to the Elbe; he made an Attempt to pass that River, but could not (m); but it is thought, if a superior Power had not stopped him [E], he would have surmounted all other

(h) Idem, ibid. See also Sueton. in Claudio, c. i.

(i) M. de Larrey, in the History of Augustus, p. 205, pretends that Drusus spent the whole Year of his Consulship at Rome, and that he went into Germany in 745 as Proconsul.

(m) Dio, lib. 55, init.

* his Destiny took him off in the thirtieth Year of his Age, whilst he was Consul, having, in a great Measure, conquered all Germany, and in several Places spilt vast Quantities of the Blood of that Nation. What makes me believe Paternulus does not flatter Drusus, in order to make his court, is, that he might be assured Tiberius would not have prosecuted him, on pretence that Drusus's Elogy was not magnificent enough: for that Emperor could not behold his Brother's flourishing Condition without Grief. This is placed among the Misfortunes of his Youth. 'Causa prima ab infantia accipites: nam proscriptum patrem exul secutus; ubi domum Augusti privignus introit multis æmulis confictatus est, dum Marcellus & Agrippa, mox Cajus Luciusque Cæsares viguere, etiam frater ejus Drusus prosperiore civium amore erat (11). — His Life had been a continued Series of Difficulties. He had followed his Father in his Exile, and when he came into the Family of Augustus, he had many Rivals to struggle with, first under Marcellus and Agrippa, and afterwards Caius and Lucius Cæsars. His Brother Drusus also had a larger Share in the Affections of the People.' We shall see, in the last Remark, a Passage in Suetonius, shewing the great Opinion there was had of Drusus's Virtue and Justice, and also an Instance of the Perfidiousness of Tiberius towards him. We must not believe all that Valerius Maximus relates of Tiberius's fraternal Tendernefs (12). That Author has over-frained his Flatteries of that Prince in more places than one.

(11) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi. cap. 51.

(12) Val. Max. lib. v. cap. v. num. 3.

[C] His first Feats of Arms were glorious. I shall quote Horace, but not as a Witness, which amounts to a Proof. All the Proof I have is, that the Historians (13) agree that the Rhetians were forced to submit to the Yoke, though their Valour and the Advantage of their Situation rendered them capable of a very long Resistance. I shall only cite Horace, because his Verses are fine and pompous. If they contain nothing but the Truth, it must be imputed to Accident; for a Poet, who sings the Victories and Triumphs of a Prince, does not avoid fabulous Hyperboles, but when he does not want them: those who read the modern Poets will be convinced of this, and will easily believe that the Poets of Augustus's Court were animated with the same Spirit as the Poets of the present time. Nay, I even believe, the Votaries of Antiquity, the most zealous against Mr Perrault's Sect, do agree that our Age outdoes that of Alexander and Augustus in the Article of Elogy; for the modern Panegyrists carry their Ideas farther than the Ancients did, though the latter had more Subject to work upon. But to finish this Digression, and quote Horace (14).

(13) Dio, lib. 54, pag. 612, 614. Paternulus, lib. 2, cap. xcv.

(14) Horat. Od. iv. lib. iv. ver. 1, & seq.

Qualem ministram fulminis alitem

Qualemve lætis caprea pascuis
Intenta, fulvæ matris ab ubere
Jam lacte depulsum leonem
Dente novo peritura vidit;
Videre Rheti bella sub Alpibus
Drusum gerentem & Vindelici
- - - - - fed diu

Lateque viatrices catervæ
Consilii juvenis revictæ
Senlere, quid mens rite, quid indoles
Nutrita faustis sub penetralibus

Posset, quid Augusti paternus
In pueros animus Neronis.

Such as the Royal Bird of Jove

Such as the Lion, which his Dam forsakes,
And thro' the shaggy Herd wild Slaughter makes,
Chasing some Goat along the Plain,
That flies, but flies in vain:
Such Drusus did in Arms appear,
When near the Alps he urg'd the War.

At length when crush'd by the young Warrior's Hand,
They knew what Heroes, under Cæsar train'd,
Could do, to whom the Sire bequeaths
His Soul, in whom he breathes.

It must be acknowledged that these Praises are not carried too high: nay I should think it very strange, that Horace did not insinuate a little more upon Drusus's fine Exploits, if it was true that he composed that Ode after the Year of Rome 740 (15); for in that case he must have known the great things That young General had done beyond the Alps. How then could the Poet confine himself to the single War with the Rhetians?

(15) M. de Larrey affirms this in his Remarks on the 4th Ode of the 4th Book of Horace, p. 110.

[D] He subdued the People of Friesland. Dion is not the only one who observes this. Tacitus says the same, and adds, that Drusus laid but a very small Tribute upon them. He taxed them in a certain number of Ox Hides. 'Eodem anno Frisii transrhenum populum pacem exuere nostra magis avaritia quam obsequii impatientes. Tributum iis Drusus iusserat modicum pro angustia rerum, ut in usus militares coria bouum penderent (16). — The same Year the Frisians revolted, compelled thereto more by the Avarice of our Officers, than any unwillingness of their own to bear the Roman Yoke. Drusus had, in regard to the narrowness of their Circumstances, enjoined them a small Tribute, to furnish a number of the Hides of Oxen for the use of the Army.' Soon after they took Arms again, the Collectors of that Tribute committing a thousand Acts of Injustice upon them, with all the Severity of the most merciless Excitemen.

(16) Tacit. Ann. lib. iv. cap. 72, ad Ann. 781.

[E] It is thought, that if a superior Power had not stopped him. Thus I call the Vision it is pretended he had. It is said, that while he was pursuing his Victories from Place to Place, without designing to fix any where, a Woman, above the human Size, and dressed in the Barbarian Habit, appeared to him, and commanded him, in Latin, to stop. 'Hostem etiam frequenter cælum ac penitus in intimas solitudines actum non prius destitit insequi, quam species barbaræ mulieris humana amplior victorem tendere ultra fero: ne Latino prohibuisset (17).' Both Suetonius and Dion mention this Adventure; but Dion forgot to observe that the Spectre spoke Latin, which was a material Circumstance, not to be omitted by an exact Historian, if he knew it. On the other hand Suetonius has forgot a Circumstance no less essential; he has not told us, that the Woman, after reproving Drusus, that no Conquests could satisfy him, ordered him to retire and prepare for Death. If Drusus had had such a Vision as this, I should not wonder that he went back, or even soon after fell into a mortal Dis temper. I know not whether the most ardent Warriors now in other Obstacles. He marched back towards the Rhine, but fell sick, and died before he reached that River, (n) in the Year 745, being about thirty Years of Age. Some say he died of a Fracture in his Leg [F], his Horse falling under him. His Brother, who sat out at the first news of his Illness, found him in the Agonies of Death (o) [G]: he conducted the Body to Rome, where he pronounced the funeral Oration of the deceased (p). Augustus spoke another. All kinds of Honours were paid to the Memory of Drusus, and he had the Surname of Germanicus given him on Account of the Victories he obtained in Germany (q). He caused a Canal to be cut from the Rhine to the Sea [H]. We have mentioned in another Place (r) the extraordinary Chastity which is attributed to him. He left two Sons and a Daughter; one of the Sons was that illustrious Prince, who was so well known by the Name of Germanicus: The other was that stupid Prince, who was afterwards the Emperor Claudius. Their Sister Livia was married to Drusus, the Son of Tiberius, a Woman of no Reputation (s). There is in the World, let their Religion be what it would, could be proof against such an Apparition. What Confirmation then must it cause in the Soul of Drusus, who had been used to hear at Rome of nothing but Auspices and Prodigies, good and evil Geniuses. Let us see Dion's Words (18): *Ἰὼν γὰρ τις μείζων ἢ κατὰ ἀνθρώπων οὖρον ἀπαρτήσασα αὐτῷ, ἐφθ, Ποι δὲ ταῦτα ἐπεὶ γὰρ Δεῖσε ἀκόρετοι: ἔπειτα οἱ ταῦτα ἰδεῖν ἐπιτρέπεται. ἀλλ' ἀπὸ τοῦ καὶ γὰρ οἱ καὶ τῶν ἔργων καὶ τῆ βίᾳ τελευτῇ πάρεστιν ἡδὺν. Etenim mulier quædam humana amplior forma ei obviæ facta: Druse, inquit, quo tandem nullum tuæ cupiditati modum statuens contendis? Non tibi satis concessum hæc omnia videre. Quin tu abi; jam enim & operum tuorum & vitæ inflat tibi terminus. — A Woman, of more than human Size, meeting him, said, Whither, O Drusus, does thy unbounded Ambition hurry thee? Fate has not permitted thee to see all these things. Be gone therefore; for the time is at hand which shall put a Period to thy Life and Actions.*

(17) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(s) See the following Article, Remark [R].

(18) Dio, lib. 55, initio.

Who knows whether the Germani had not the Policy to dress some Man of an extraordinary Size, who could speak Latin, in a Woman's Habit, and order him to appear as a Spectre upon the Road Drusus was to take: I doubt not such a Stratagem has been practised more than once.

[F] Some say he died of a Fracture in his Leg. We should see the Particulars of that Accident, if we had the last Book of Livy; for the Summary we have remaining contains these Words: 'Ipse (Drusus) ex fractura equo super crus ejus collapsa tricesimo die quam id acciderat mortuus est. — Drusus died of a Fracture in his Leg, occasioned by his Horse falling upon it, thirty Days after the Misfortune happened.' Moreri is wrong here. 'Drusus, says he, was preparing to carry on his Conquests, when, falling from his Horse, he broke his Thigh, of which he died thirteen Days after.' Putting thirteen for thirty Days is not his only Mistake. He is contradicted by Dion upon another Head: for Dion assures us, that Drusus was returning towards the Rhine, so far was he from preparing to continue his Conquests. I omit the Faults of his Language, which the Skillful need not be advertized of; but I cannot do the same with respect to the beginning of the Article. DRUSUS was the Son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, who afterwards married Augustus, Brother to the Emperor Tiberius. Thus Moreri begins. Now this is misplacing his Words. The Word Brother may equally refer to three Persons, either to Drusus, or Tiberius Nero, or to Augustus. A Man not acquainted with History would be at a loss which of these three Relatives to chuse. But what follows is an Error of another Nature. Moreri says, that Drusus made War in Germany for several Years. There are few Readers who, from these Words, would not form an Idea of at least ten or twelve Campaigns, which is too much by half. I do not believe that Drusus ever made five Campaigns in that Country. This was the finest Jewel in his Crown. He performed more in one Year than other Warriors do in their whole Lives (19).

(19) See another of Moreri's faults in Remark [H].

(20) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xx.

(21) Val. Max. lib. v. cap. v. §. 3.

[G] His Brother, who set out upon the first News of his Sickness, found him in the Agonies of Death. He made so much haste, that Pliny has placed this Journey among the speediest that ever were made. He pretends (20) that Tiberius, travelling Day and Night, rode two hundred Miles, changing Horses but three times. Valerius Maximus agrees with Pliny as to the distance of the way: but he says Tiberius often took fresh Horses (21). I do not see how Dion Cassius can be excused, who says there was no great distance between the place where Augustus received the News of his Illness, and the place where Drusus lay sick; for tho' we should suppose, that neither Pliny, nor Valerius Maximus, have given the just distance, yet it would be certainly true, that Lombardy is far from Wetteravia. Augustus was at Pavia when he heard that Drusus fell sick: Drusus fell ill as he was retiring from the Banks of the Elbe towards the Rhine, and died before he reached the Banks of the Rhine. Let us suppose, to favour Dion as much as possible, that Drusus's design was to march to Mentz, it must be said, upon this supposition, that he fell sick in Wetteravia. What then does this Historian mean by the Parenthesis (ὅ γὰρ ἦν πρὸ πάσης). Augustus, says he, being informed that Drusus was sick, for he was not far from the place, immediately sent Tiberius to him. Dion's Translators free him from this oversight; for they make him speak so as may signify, that Augustus immediately sent for Tiberius, who was not far off. Περὶ πρὸς τὸν δ' ὁ Ἀύγουστος ἐστὶν ποσὶ ὅ γὰρ ἦν πρὸ πάσης τὸν Τιβέριον κατὰ τὰς ἐκτὸς ἐπέμπε. Ad famam egrotantis Drusi Augustus, qui non ita procul ab eo aberat, celeriter Tiberium accersit (22). But Cassiodorus confutes this Translation by two solid Remarks (23). I. The Greek Tongue will not allow the rendering ἐπέμπε by sent for. II. Augustus and Tiberius were then at Pavia, as Valerius Maximus informs us. Therefore it must be concluded, either that Dion has expressed himself like a bad Geographer, or as one that did not know the particulars of the Fact. Let us add another thing, which makes this Journey of Tiberius very remarkable. He went from Pavia into Germany, with all the swiftness of a Post-Boy, and he returned on Foot from Germany into Italy (24) with all the solemn pace of a Funeral Procession. Drusus died in the Summer, and his Body did not arrive at Pavia till the middle of the Winter, according to Tacitus. 'Ipsum quippe (Augustum) asperissimo hyemis Ticinum uique progressum neque abscedentem a corpore simul Urbem intravisse' (25). Augustus himself in the middle of Winter went to Pavia, and constantly attended his Body till it was brought into the City.

(22) Dio, lib. 55, initio.

(23) Cassiodorus in Sueton. Claud. cap. 1.

(24) Drusus frater in Germania amissit, cuius corpus pedibus toto itinere præguardiens Romanam usque pervehit. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. vii.

(25) Tacit. Ann. lib. iii, cap. v.

(26) Sueton in Claudius, cap. 1.

[H] He made a Canal between the Sea and the Rhine. See how Suetonius speaks of it. 'Trans Rhenum fossas novi & immensi operis effecit quæ nunc adhuc DRUSIANÆ vocantur' (26). Tacitus calls it fissam Drusianam, and it is the common name it bore among the Latin Authors. It was not a Work of a short continuance; for it not only served Drusus's Son, but remains to this Day. The place, where Tacitus mentions Germanicus embarking upon this Canal, is too fine not to be transcribed. 'Jamque classis advenerat cum præmisso commeatu, & distributis legiones ac socios navibus fossam cui DRUSIANÆ nomen ingressus, præcatusque Drusum patrem ut le eadem ausum libens placatusque exemplo ac memoria consiliorum atque operum juvaret, lacus inde & Oceanum usque ad Amisiam flumen secunda navigatione pervehitur' (27). — After the Fleet was arrived with the Provisions on Board, and the Legions and Auxiliary Troops had been assigned to their several Ships, he entered the Drusian Canal, and putting up Prayers to his Father Drusus to favour him in the attempt, to which he had been encouraged by his example, he had thence a good Passage through the Lakes and the Sea to the River Amisiam. The Invocation of the dead was so much used among the Pagans, that here is a Son, who offers solemn Prayers to the Ghost of a Father, who had never been deified. I confess they no probability that Drusus died of Poison, by order of the Emperor his Father-in-law [1]. Ovid's Confolation to Livia, the Mother of that illustrious deceased, is a Poem well worth the reading. Moreri's Faults, which are inconsiderable, may be seen in the Remark [F].

(27) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. viii, at Ann. 769.

(28) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii. cap. vii. they had erected an Altar to him in Germany; but that was no Apotheosis. 'Tumulum tamen nuper Varians legionibus structum & veterem aram Druso sitam disjecerant. Restituit aram (Germanicus) honorique patris princeps ipse cum legionibus decurrit: tumulum iterare haud visum (28). — They had demolished the Monument erected to the Legions of Varus, and the old Altar consecrated to Drusus. Germanicus restored the Altar, and in honour of his Father, performed with the Legions the Funeral Ceremony of running Courses.' Observe, that in order to form a just

Idea of the Countries, which were reckoned at Rome to be beyond the Rhine, we must imagine the Historians as copying the accounts which the Generals sent to Rome. The Generals marched with their Forces into the Provinces of Gaul, bordering upon the Rhine. To them then Germany was beyond that River. Suetonius and Tacitus follow their Style; for, in Truth, with respect to Rome, Germany is rather on this side than beyond the Rhine. I do not observe this as very material; but how many things are there in the Commentaries that are but little better? To conclude, it must not be imagined, as Moreri does, that all which is now called the Isle, is the Work of the ancient Romans; for Drusus did not join the Rhine to the Ocean, that is, to that which is now called the Zuyder-Zee, any otherwise than by cutting a Canal between the River Isle, and the Rhine (29). I shall observe occasionally, that he also begun to make Dykes upon the Banks of the Rhine, which were finished sixty three Years after. 'Ne segnem militem attinerent, Paulinus Pompeius inchoatum ante tres & sexaginta annos a Druso aggerem coercendo Rheno absolvit (30). — To keep the Soldiers in Action, Paulinus Pompeius finished a Dyke which had been begun sixty three Years before by Drusus to keep in the Rhine.'

(22) See Cluverius in Germania antiqua. (30) Tacit. Ann. lib. xiii. cap. 53.

[1] There is no probability that Drusus died by Poison, by order of the Emperor his Father-in-law.] Scandal is a terrible thing. The same Persons, who had most spread the report that Augustus was the Father of Drusus, were perhaps the very same who charged him with poisoning him. But since Suetonius rejects this as a groundless Story, it is to be supposed he could see no probability of it; for he naturally is not too forward to justify the twelve Emperors, or hide their Faults. He informs us of the singular tenderness which Augustus ever had for Drusus, and he mentions two instances of it, which must not be omitted here. Augustus made the Epitaph in Verse, which was engraved upon the Tomb of Drusus, and wrote the History of that great Man in Prose. I am not ignorant that the greatest Princes, and the most ambitious Monarchs are subject to a furious jealousy towards those of their own Blood, which puts them upon doing things very pernicious to their interest, when they apprehend the People may be too much delighted with a rising Glory that spreads apace. But I cannot see sufficient marks of this Passion, in the Conduct of Augustus, to conclude that his tender affection ever abated to a Prince, whom probably he believed his own Son, and perhaps not without very good reason. However, let us see Suetonius's words, in which we shall find an admirable touch of Drusus's Character. 'Fuisse autem creditur non minus gloriosi quam civilis animi.

'Nam ex hoste super victorias, opima quoque spolia captasse, summoque saepius discrimine duces Germanorum tota acie infectatus: ne dissimulasse unquam pristinum se Reipublicae statum quandoque restitutum, si posset. Unde existimo nonnullos tradere aulos, suspectum cum Augusto, revocatumque ex provincia: & quia cunctaretur, interceptum veneno. Quod equidem magis, ne praetermitterem, retuli, quam quia verum aut verisimile putem: cum Augustus tantopere & vivum dilexerit, ut coheredem semper filiis instituerit, sicut quondam in Senatu professus est; & defunctum ita pro concione laudaverit, ut Deos precatus sit, Similes ei Caesares suos facerent; sibi quoque tam honestum quandoque exitum darent, quam illi dedissent. Nec contentus elogium tumulo ejus verbis a se compositis insculpsisse, etiam vitæ memoriam prosa oratione composuit (31). — It is believed that he had no less Talents for a Military, than for a Civil Life. For besides his Victories, he gained also the Spolia Opima, and often singled out the German Generals, and pursued them through the thickest Ranks with the utmost danger: nor did he dissimble his design of one day restoring the Commonwealth, if it should ever be in his Power. For which reason, I imagine, some have adventured to say, that Augustus was jealous of him, recalled him from his Government, and because he did not immediately obey his orders, took him off by Poison. Which I have mentioned rather to avoid an Accusation of a willful omission, than that, I imagine it to be either true or probable. For Augustus had that esteem for him living, as to make him coheir with his Son, as he expressly declared in Senate; and in his Funeral Oration besought the Gods to make his Caesars like him, and grant him as honourable an Exit, as they had granted to the deceased. Nor was he satisfied with inscribing on his Monument an Elogium in Verse, of his own composing, but also wrote his History in Prose. He was more in love with Glory than Command, being actuated by a true Roman Spirit: he would have employed all his Credit for the Restoration of the Liberties of the Commonwealth, though his own private Interest engaged him to support the Imperial Usurpation of those times. It is even pretended that he wrote to Tiberius to persuade him to join with him, in a Design to oblige Augustus to restore things to their former State. If any thing made the Slander probable, which Suetonius has rejected, no doubt it was this: That Tiberius shewed the Letter Drusus writ him upon this Subject. Suetonius himself relates this (32). They were so generally persuaded at Rome of this incomparable and noble Disposition in Drusus, that it was the original Cause, of that excessive Love the People expressed to Germanicus. 'Drusi magna apud populum Romanum memoria, credebaturque si rerum potitus foret, libertatem redditurus, unde in Germanicum favor & spes eadem, nam juveni civile ingenium, mira comitas (33). — The Memory of Drusus was had in the greatest Veneration by the People of Rome, and it was believed, that had he been raised to the Empire, he would have restored Liberty, whence their Favour to Germanicus and their hopes from him were the same. For he was a Prince of a sweet and affable Temper.'

(31) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1. (32) Odium adversus necessitudines in Druso primum fratre detexit (Tiberius) prodita ejus epistola, qua secum de cogens ad restituendam libertatem Augustus agebat. Id. in Tiberio, c. 50. (33) Tacit. Ann. lib. i. cap. 33.

(a) Tacit. Ann. lib. iii. cap. 8. (b) Dio, lib. lvi. pag. 699, 701. (c) Idem, lib. 56, pag. 672. (d) Tacit. Ann. lib. i. ad annum 767.

DRUSUS, the Son of Tiberius, by his first Wife Vipsania the Daughter of Agrippa, did not resemble his Father in point of Dissimulation (a), but was not unlike him in Drunkenness, Cruelty, and Lust (b). He was made Questor in the Year 764 (c). After the Death of Augustus, he was sent into Pannonia, to pacify the mutinous Legions, which he happily effected, and was created Consul soon after his Return to Rome (d). He commanded an Army in Illyria, in the Year 770. They gave him this Command, both to gain the Love of the Soldiers, and to withdraw him from those Pleasures he was immersed in at Rome (e). He artfully fomented the Divisions which were crept among the Germans, and drew great Advantages from them (f); so that the Senate decreed him the Honours of an Ovation. He returned to Rome in 773 (g), and the next Year was Consul with the Emperor his Father (b). He was also the Emperor's Colleague in the Tribunician Authority; a Dignity much more considerable considerable than the Consulship [A]. Having obtained this important Office from the Senate, he would certainly have succeeded Tiberius, if Sejanus had not prevented it (i). The Ambition of this Favourite had no bounds; and besides, the Box on the Ear Drusus gave him prompted him to all manner of wicked Attempts against him. Which he could put in Execution with more Ease, as he kept up a criminal Conversation with Drusus's Wife [B]. Accordingly, in Concert with this Woman, he got him poisoned by the Eunuch Lygdus (k). The Poison took Effect. Drusus dying of it in the Year 776. He left some Children [C] as we shall see in the Remarks. Tiberius shewed

(i) Ibid. cap. 56, & seq.

(k) And not Ligius, as in Morel.

[A] He... had... also the Tribunitian Power.] Thus Augustus would call the Supreme Authority, in order to avoid the odious Titles of King and Dictator, and yet possess one that was superior to all others. He took his Son-in-law Agrippa for his Colleague in this Dignity; and after his Death his Son-in-law Tiberius. By his Example Tiberius would have an Associate in this Power, and chose his own Son. The Letters he wrote to the Senate concerning this Association, carried all the Force of a Command in them. 'Mitit literas ad Senatum, quibus potestatem tribuniciam Druso petebat. Id summi fastigii vocabulum Augustus repperit, ne regis aut dictatoris nomen adsumeret, ac tamen appellatione aliqua cetera imperia praeineret. M. deinde Agrippam socium ejus postulat, quo defuncto, Tiberium Neronem delegit, ne successor in incerto foret. Sic cohiberi pravas aliorum spes rebatur: simul modestiae Neronis, & suae magnitudini fidebat. Quo tunc exemplo, Tiberius Drusum summæ rei admoveret: cum incolumi Germanico integrum inter duos judicium tenuisset (1). — He sent Letters to the Senate, wherein he required them to confer the Tribunitian Power on Drusus. Augustus had invented that Title of Pre-eminence, instead of the more odious one of King or Dictator; yet, by that Appellation, had a Sovereignty above other Magistrates. He afterwards chose M. Agrippa for his Associate, and after his Death Tiberius Nero, that his Successor might be known; thinking by this means to restrain the ambitious hopes of others, trusting to the Modesty of Nero, and his own Greatness. In imitation of whom, Tiberius advanced Drusus to the same Dignity, though, during the Life of Germanicus, he had carried himself indifferently between them. If Morel had understood this, he would not have said that Drusus, upon his return from Germany, exercised the Office of Tribune. This does not express what Tacitus told us just now. I pass over two other of Morel's Faults contained in these words, Drusus was sent into Illyria to learn the Military Art, then into Germany. Drusus's first Expedition was that of Pannonia, the second that of Illyria. I do not think he was ever in Person in Germany with an Army, though he fomented some Divisions there.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. iii. cap. 56. ad ann. 775.

Errors of Morel.

HISTORY of Livia, Daughter of Nero Claudius Drusus, the Brother of Tiberius.

[B] Sejanus... kept up a Criminal Conversation with the Wife of Drusus.] Her Name was Livia, she was the Sister of Germanicus. She was first married to Caius Caesar, Augustus's Grandson, and after the Death of that Prince to Drusus, the Son of Tiberius. She was at first very homely, but afterwards became a perfect Beauty. Sejanus had so ill an Opinion of that Woman, as to believe that, by making love to her, he should engage her to second him in his Design of cutting off her Husband. Therefore he courted her, and easily obtained the enjoyment of her, and then he proposed to her if she would poison Drusus, that he would marry her, and make her Empress. This uncertain hope made her sacrifice, by an abominable Crime, a hope that was certain; so true it is that when a Woman has once prostituted her Honour, she suffers her mind to be turned this way or that, according to the Caprice of the Man she has abandoned herself to. This is Tacitus's Reflexion; not mine. Read what follows, and you will find in it, that Drusus gave Sejanus a box on the Ear (2). 'Drusus impatiens æmuli, & animo commotior, orto forte jurgio, intenderat Sejano manus, & contra tendentis os verberaverat. Igitur cuncta tentant promptissimum visum ad uxorem ejus Liviam convertere. Quæ soror Germanici, formæ initio ætatis indecoræ, mox pulchritudine præcellerat. Hanc, ut amore incensus, adulterio pellexit: & postquam primi flagitii potius est (heque femina amissa pudicitia alia abnuerit), ad conjugii spem, consortium regni, & necem mariti impulit. Atque illa cui avunculus Augustus, & fover Tiberius, ex Druso liberi, seque ac majores & posteror municipal adultero sedabat; ut pro honestis & præsentibus, flagitiosa & incerta expectaret (3). — Drusus being of a fiery Temper, and unable to endure a rival to the Empire, in an accidental Quarrel, had laid hands on Sejanus, and seizing him off to make Resistance, had struck him in the Face. Sejanus, after several debates with himself, resolved at last to attack his Wife Livia, as the surest way to be revenged. She was Sister to Germanicus, and from a very disagreeable Person at first, became afterwards a celebrated Beauty. This Woman he debauched by making Profession of a most ardent Passion, and after the first criminal Encounter (for a Woman who has forfeited her Honour, will stick at nothing) seduced her to consent to the Murder of her Husband, in hopes of being made Companion of his Bed and Throne. And though she had Augustus for her Uncle, Tiberius for her Father-in-law, and had had Children by Drusus, yet she stooped to an infamous Adultery, stained her own, her noble Ancestors, and her Posterity's Honour, and quitted a present Honour for uncertainty and shame. They gave Drusus a slow Poison, that it might be thought he died of a Distemper (4). Livia's Physician named Eudemus, who was also her Adulterer, was let into the secret (5). The Widow challenged Sejanus to keep his Word (6): Sejanus asked her in Marriage of Tiberius, but did not obtain his request. After Sejanus was punished for his Villanies, Apicata, his repudiated Wife, discovered to the Emperor the poisoning of Drusus, and Livia's Crimes: upon which Tiberius commanded that Livia should be put to Death; others say, that in consideration of her Mother he did not punish her; but that her Mother suffered her to be starved to Death (7). The Senate passed very severe Decrees against the Memory and Statues of that wicked Woman (8). I said Sejanus did not marry her; but Glandorp affirms the contrary: 'Primum repulsum patitur, postea tam cum non absteret, fit voti compos (9).' But Suetonius is more to be relied on, who represents Tiberius as alluring him with the hopes of his Alliance, at the same time that he was preparing to ruin him, as he did a very short time after. 'Spe affinitatis ac Tribunitiæ potestatis deceptum inopinantem criminatus est pendenda miserandaque oratione (10). — Having deluded him with the hopes of Affinity by Marriage, and of the Tribuneship, he accused him, when he least dreamed of it, to the Senate in a mean and pitiful Letter.'

(2) If we believe Dion, lib. 58, p. 709, it was Sejanus that gave the Blow.

[C] He left Children.] His Daughter Julia was first married to Nero her Cousin-German, the eldest Son of Germanicus, and afterwards to Caius Rubellius Blandus (11). Soon after the Death of Germanicus, his Sister Livia, Drusus's Wife, was delivered of two Boys, which so overjoyed Tiberius, that he could not help congratulating himself upon it in full Senate (12). One of these Twins died presently after the Father: the other, named Tiberius, was to have succeeded to the Empire with Caius Caligula; for the Emperor Tiberius declared them both his joint Heirs (13): but as Tiberius had foretold (14), Caligula made away with his Co-heir (15). We must not forget that he got Tiberius's Will cancelled, by which means he reigned alone; afterwards he adopted Tiberius the Grand-son. Fratre Tiberius die virilis togæ adoptavit, appellavitque principem juvenutis (16). — He adopted his Brother Tiberius on the day of his putting on the Toga Virilis, and styled him Princeps Juventutis, Prince of the Youth. I find some difficulty here: if Tiberius the Grand-son was born soon after the Death of Germanicus, as Tacitus assures us, he must be eighteen Years old when his Grand-father died. How comes it to pass then that his Grand-father had not made him take the virile Robe? this would have been of service to him towards securing the Succession. No doubt it will be answered me, that he thought him illegitimate, because

(3) Tacit. Ann. lib. iv. cap. 3. ad ann. 776.

(4) Idem. ibid. cap. viii.

(5) Idem. ibid. cap. xxxix.

(6) Ibid. cap. iii. See also Pliny, lib. xxix. cap. i.

(7) Dio, lib. 58, pag. 721. ad ann. 784. See also Suetonius, in Tiberio, cap. lxii.

(8) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi. cap. 2.

(9) Glandorp. Oonomast. p. 45.

(10) Suetonius in Tiberio, cap. lxxv.

(11) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi. cap. 27.

(12) Idem. lib. ii. cap. 84. ad ann. 772.

(13) Suetonius in Tiberio, cap. ult.

(14) Dio, lib. 58, pag. 729.

(15) Suetonius in Caligula, cap. 23.

(16) Ibid. c. 15. See also Dio, lib. lxx, init.

shewed upon this occasion the utmost Insensibility which the Stoics required (D). Nothing was more commendable in Drusus than the Friendship he preserved for Germanicus (E), his Cousin-Germain, and his Brother by Adoption.

(17) Dio, l. 58, pag. 720. Sueton. in Tiberio, c. p. lxix.

(3) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxi. See also Philo de Legat.

(19) Tacit. Ann. lib. iv, cap. viii. See also Sueton. in Tiberio, c. 52.

(20) Seneca, de Consolat. ad Marciam, c. 15. And many others make use of it.

(21) Sueton. in Tiberio, c. 62.

because of Livia's Adulteries, and for that Reason he neglected him (17). To conclude, that Youth was put to Death on a very slight Occasion. He had taken a medicine for a violent Cough. It was pretended this was Antidote, and that, by this Conduct, he tacitly accused Caligula of a design to poison him. 'Fratrem Tiberium inopinantem repente immisso Tribuno militum interemit . . . caussatus . . . quod antidotum oboluisse quasi ad præcavenda venena sua sumtum, cum . . . propter assiduum & vehementem tussim medicamento usus esset (18). — He slew his Brother Tiberius by surprise, sending in a military Tribune to dispatch him on a sudden, pretending he smelled strong of an Antidote he had taken out of Precaution lest he should poison him; whereas he had only made use of a Medicine for a violent Cough, wherewith he had been a long time afflicted.'

[D] Tiberius expressed the utmost Insensibility which the Stoics required. No manner of uneasiness appeared in him, while Drusus was sick, nor did he forbear going to the Senate, no not in the Interval between the Death and the Funeral of his Son. When the whole Senate were expressing their Grief by Sighs and Tears, he alone remained calm and unmoved. 'Tiberius per omnes valetudinis ejus dies nullo metu (an ut firmitudinem animi ostentaret) etiam defuncto necdum sepulto curiam ingressus: Consulque sede vulgari per speciem morositatis sedentes honoris locique admonuit, & effusum in lacrymas Senatam, victo gemitu simul oratione continua erexit (19). — Tiberius, to shew an evenness of Temper (which perhaps was affected), never appeared to be under the least concern; nay, in the interval of his Death and Funeral he went to the Senate, and finding them sitting in the meanest Seats, as a token of their Sorrows, he reminded them of their Place and Dignity, and without the least Emotion harangued the Senate all dissolved in Tears.' In all his Discourses he preserved so well the Character of his false dissembling Spirit, that it was easy to see that no sense of Grief disordered him. Read this in Tacitus, and you will not lose your Labour; but I very much doubt whether such an Example should be made use of in Treatises of Consolation (20); for Tiberius behaved in this manner only because he was destitute of all natural Affection. He looked upon Priam as a happy Man, for having survived all his Children (21).

